But there are other paths which do not lead to the grave: the path of faith, the path of duty—these lead, not to the house prepared for all living, but to that presence of the Saviour, wherein we shall praise him day and night, and see his face, and have his name in our foreheads.

REMINISCENCES OF WELLINGTON, WITH ANECDOTES OF HIS STAFF.—II.

BY LORD WILLIAM LENNOX.

AT an early hour next morning, we left for Dover. The duke was received everywhere with the greatest enthusiasm; the gathering multitude pressing, clinging, struggling around the carriage at every change of horses; for, in the language of Southey, "the people would not be debarred from gazing till the last moment upon the hero—the darling hero of England." At three o'clock a salute from the batteries at Dover announced the arrival of the duke, who, upon alighting at Wright's hotel, was joined by Vice-Admiral Foley. That gallant officer said that as the wind was blowing very fresh from the west-south-west, and the weather was very boisterous, it would be impossible to embark from that port, and that preparations had been made for the duke's reception at the hotel.

"I must proceed, if possible," replied Wellington. "Could we not embark at Deal?"

"Assuredly," responded the admiral; "but I have only a small sloop of war there, and I fear the accommodation will not be suitable for your grace."

"Never mind that; I must make the best of my way to Paris."

In less than an hour we were on board the Griffon sloop of war. Wellington was a wretched sailor, and as the captain had not sufficient time to prepare for so distinguished a guest, the duke had to rough it upon the ordinary sea provisions—hard biscuit, salt pork, and fiery rum; but neither adverse winds, a bad passage, nor seasickness, prevented the Iron Duke doing an act of justice to the crew of the vessel he was on board of. A short time previous, a malicious report had found its way into the newspapers, stating that there had been a mutiny on board the Griffon, and Wellington, in taking leave of Captain Hewson, referred in the handsomest manner to the statement, which he pronounced to be scandalous and unfounded. No wonder, then, when we disembarked at Bergen-op-Zoom, for we failed to make Ostend, that the crew gave the duke three of the heartiest cheers that were ever given by British tars.

On arriving at Bergen-op-Zoom, the duke witnessed the scene of that untoward and fatal enterprise, under Sir Thomas Graham, afterwards Lord Lynedoch, wherein Skerret, the intrepid defender of Tarifa, led the attack and fell; as also, Gore, Mercer, Carleton, and M'Donald; where 300 were killed, and 1,800 were wounded; and which attack, although it promised at the onset complete success, failed in the end from the loss of the principal officers of the right column, which caused it to fall into disorder; and from the left column being weakened by a loss of the detachment of the Guards, cut off by the enemy. It was with the deepest interest that Wellington inspected the town and fortress; his grace examined minutely the different points at which the gallant Graham had attempted to carry the place by storm; he saw the spot between the Antwerp and Water Port gates, where Cooke, despite of the difficulty of passing the ditch, on account of the ice, succeeded in establishing his column on the ramparts; he stopped opposite the Stenberger gate, where the feint attack was to be made by the third column. He paused for some time to the right of the New gate, where the second column, under Colonel Morrice, was compelled, from the heavy fire of the enemy, to retire; but the point that seemed to attract the all-absorbing attention of the duke, was at the entrance of the harbour, fordable only at low water. Here the right column, under Skerret and Gore, had forced their way into the body of the place; but the death of the latter, and the severe wounds of the former, had (as has been stated) caused the troops under their command to fall into disorder, and to suffer a great loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners. During the whole of the time our chief was thus employed, his brow was thoughtful, and his countenance portrayed grief.

The whole road from Bergen-op-Zoom to Antwerp was a scene of the greatest gaiety: "the bees had expelled the bear that broke open their hive." "Orange Boven!" was shouted everywhere; the bluff burghers were puffing freedom out of their short tobacco-pipes. On the 10th the duke arrived at Antwerp. As he was in plain clothes, he was not immediately recognised; but the moment he was known, he was very much cheered, especially by the English. His grace shook hands most cordially with many of his fair countrywomen. On the 11th he visited the dockyard and arsenal; and about one o'clock, having previously seen the cathedral, set out for Brussels. It was a most gratifying sight to see the young and gallant Prince of Orange, afterwards King of Holland, who had served in the Peninsula as aide-de-camp to the great duke, welcome his former chief to the country to which he had been so lately restored. The prince, whose Christian name was William, was, from his slim figure, nicknamed "Slender Billy." He was aware of this, for one day Lord Fitzroy Somerset, not knowing that he was present, said—

"Where is Slender Billy to-day?"

"Here I am, Fitzroy," responded the prince, "and shall be delighted to drink a glass of wine with you."

There was something peculiarly delightful in his royal highness's manner; his strict attention to military duties endeared him to his chief, while his affability and good humour made him truly popular with his brother officers. Many a page might be filled, showing the mutability of human affairs in the person of William of Holland. His early death closed a career chequered with disappointment—first, in finding himself supplanted in the affections of his ladye love, "the fair-haired daughter of the Isles," the late Princess Charlotte of Wales; and, secondly, by the loss of a portion of his dominions by the same successful rival, the late King of the Belgians. But I will not dwell more upon the history of the illustrious dead; suffice it to say, the King of Holland was a brave soldier, as his war services in the Peninsula and Waterloo campaigns bear ample witness.

To resume. Brussels at the time I write of was the scene of the greatest gaiety; and here I must dwell for a brief period to recount two anecdotes. Among other entertainments got up, was a concert given by the celebrated Madame Catalani, which was attended by the Queen of the Netherlands, Wellington, and a large concourse of Belgian, Prussian, Hanoverian, and English officers. Wellington throughout the evening was gay even to sportiveness, conversing with all around him. He never was seated, not even for a moment, and seemed enthusiastically charmed with Catalani, ardently applauding whatever she sang, except the "Rule Britannia;" and then, with sagacious reserve, he listened in utter silence. Who ordered it I know not, but he felt it was injudicious in every country but our own to give out a chorus of "Rule Britannia! Britannia rules the waves!" and when his officers began to vociferate an encore, he instantly crushed it by a commanding air of disapprobation; and thus offered every one an opportunity of seeing how magnificently he could quit his convivial familiarity for imperious sway, when occasion might call for the transformation.

The hall in the park had been opened with a company of English performers, "John Bull" was announced for the first night, and throughout the day it had been hinted that Wellington had acceded to the request of the manager, and that he would probably honour the performance with his presence; and under this hope, a private box had been retained. Although there was not a shadow of pretence for such a rumour, it spread like wildfire, and led to a ludicrous mistake. A brother officer and myself had been dining in company with the duke, who told us if we liked to see "John Bull," we might make use of his carriage after it had set him down. Upon reaching the park, the carriage was recognised, and a crowd immediately followed it. As we gained the entrance to the hall, the name of Wellington rent the air. This was heard by the manager, who thrust his head out from behind the curtain to give a signal to the leader of the band to play "See the conquering hero comes." The report that his grace was about to make his appearance, reached the occupiers of boxes, pit, and gallery, and all eyes were turned on the vacant stage-box. In the meantime, my companion and myself had alighted from the carriage, had tendered our money, and were not a little surprised at the obsequiousness of the box-keeper, who thinking we were the precursors of the duke, begged us at once to walk into the lobby. The bills always announce, "no money returned," this was the only instance in which I ever found "money refused." The manager had rushed into the private box to prepare the seats, and there, candles in hand, awaited the welcome visitor.

"And hand in hand, both laughingly there, Carolled and beckoned me into the air."—p. 428.

It was now easy to see the mistake that we had unwittingly caused, and anxious to explain it, we approached the open box door. No sooner were our uniforms visible, than the orchestra struck up the soul-stirring melody. In vain did we strive to correct the error; the audience had risen en masse; shouts re-echoed throughout the house, the curtain was drawn up, and the company came forward to sing "God save the King," but no representative of that sovereign to the newly-restored monarch of France appeared. For some minutes the cheers continued, when at length the mistake was explained, and after the excitement had a little subsided, my young friend and myself sneaked into the box, placing ourselves behind the curtain, fearful of calling the attention of the public to two mere urchins, who unintentionally were upon the point of receiving honours due to their chief.

After a brief stay at Brussels, the duke proceeded to visit the principal fortresses in the Netherlands, reaching Paris on the 23rd of August. Here his grace took possession of the Hotel Borghese, formerly the residence of the beautiful princess of that name. I pass over the festivities of the "City of Frivolity," given in honour of the newly-appointed ambassador, and shall only remark that at that period France could boast of a royal hunt. Wellington was fond of the chase, and having an excellent stud of hunters, kindly mounted me whenever he took part in it. Our first rendezvous was in the Bois de Boulogne, where Wellington met Marshal Ney in friendly intercourse by the covert's side. What extraordinary events occurred between the "meet" at the Bois de Boulogne, on the 27th of August, 1814, and the meet on the plains of Waterloo on the 18th of June, 1815! How much happened in that interval! but history has recorded all; suffice it to say that although the hunt was attended by the Ducs de Berri and D'Angoulême, and all the sporting men of Paris, the great object of attention that day was to witness the two rival generals riding side by side in amicable converse. Grosbois was our next place of meeting, then Rambouillet, where for the first time Wellington adopted the French hunting costume—cocked hat, gold laced coat, and jack boots. Never shall I forget the smile that beamed upon his countenance, when he saw Fremantle decked out in a similar costume. "What would they say of us in England?" he asked, as he took a full view of his ex-aide-de-camp, at that time attached to the embassy.

A WORD ON PRETENTIOUSNESS.

BY THE REV. W. M. STATHAM.

LET'S 'tend to be ladies," was a remark I heard from juvenile lips not very long ago, and being hard up, not so much for a new subject as for a title for the same, I had to thank them for a text: for, after all, that word thus abbreviated for pretend is one that has no exact synonym in our language. We read, certainly, an account of the Pretender, in those school-history books which are so marvellously adapted to the "proper" and current estimate of things in schools generally; but the English History Pretender is not the only one in English life: all do not seek exactly that crown of empire, but they aspire to one which does not properly belong to them. Having met a cleric who looked as nearly like a bishop as it was possible to be—the cassock being, waistwards, very deep, yet not an apron—it struck me very forcibly how remarkably sweet the grapes would be, could he but get hold of them; and, moreover, how thoroughly done some devoted curate would be by raising his hat to the ecclesiastical pretender!

The aim of this paper, however, is more directed to that generic subject, home-life; and sure I am that the misery of humanity is not in taxes, or police, or water-rates, or measles, or next-door pianos, or outside organ-grinders, so much as in this same pretence. In English life pretentious appearance is certainly running into an extreme that is supremely ridiculous. In the country, and at a farmhouse, it is considered nowise infra dig. for the girls of the family to rise early and tend the dairy, and milk the cows, and make the butter. They enjoy the work amazingly, and look fresh and fair enough both at it and also after it, when they are ready for afternoon's needlework or country walk. Why on earth those who live in cities, and can only keep one servant, should not let their daughters vary life by some domestic duties, I cannot understand. What if there is a double rat-tat-tat at the door, and Miss Amelia Talk-your-time-away does call! Let the girls come up with flour on their clean arms, or a duster in their industrious hands, and courteously tell the lady caller that they are very busy, and will she kindly come and have a chat while they work away in the domesticities of life? Capital confession that, I take it, and likely to raise their character high in the market of common sense—much more so than to shuffle up the work, and tell the maid-of-all-work to finish it, whilst they smartens and stiffens themselves, and go into the drawing-room with all due composure of manner and commonplace of talk. That's the kind of pretence that costs time, comfort, and self-respect. I remember hearing of a family in which there was only one maid, the said family being extremely genteel. A visitor was continually hearing sometimes of "Cook," and at other times of "Ann," when, after seeing continually the same servant's face "up-stairs, and down-stairs, and in my lady's chamber," she discovered, to her amazement, that Cook and Ann were the same identical person, the names being alternately applied, the one to the culinary and the other to the cleaning department of the establishment!

It strikes me that the Cook-and-Ann idea is one of the most contemptible manoeuvres in the world, and if people had not parted with a very considerable amount of common sense, they would see how contemptible they become in the eyes of others, when they resort to such dodges to be genteel. Borrowed plate at dinner-parties, and all that kind of thing, seems to me to partake of the same pretentiousness. I love to sit at the comfortable board of a Christian friend; but of all things unenjoyable, to share a dinner which is a strain in its viands, in its adornments, and general belongings, seems to me to be the most so. What if an accident happens? What if the tureen cover capsizes the candelabra, or a nervous waiter smashes up the well-cut wine-glasses borrowed from No. 7 in the Terrace? why, as possible contingencies and probabilities arise before your vision, your digestion gets desperately out of order; and then if the visitor part of the business breaks through; if the long-looked-for Count, or the ex-M.P., or the dear General does not come, then the discomfiture is great indeed—not to be concealed, and scarcely to be borne. Well, to what end is all this abominable pretence—silver salver and such like adornments? Because it raises the family, or keeps up the connection. Why the ex-Magistrate lays his next gout to the bad port, and the dear General departs to another engagement before the evening fairly begins.

But there are other pretences besides these, and of all possible pretences, pretension in religion is worst. There is nothing so nauseous in itself; there is nothing so pernicious in its influence. Real, earnest, devout religion is the most beautiful thing in the whole creation; but an affected pietism, a look-down-your-face expression when some innocent pleasure is spoken of; a grim and ungracious manner; when, accompanying all, there is a money-grabbing spirit, or a glumpy, sulky disposition, and an imbecile ignoring of all that makes life interesting—this is pretence indeed; a pretence which makes religion a by-word amongst men and a bugbear to children; a pretence which for a little while makes you think you must be very far off the mark, if you are not as sombre-looking as these persons themselves! Who has not known some of the most covetous old creatures this world has ever seen, who have been most pietistic in manner, and possessed of "gifts?" Who has not known some of the most uncomfortable men to live with in common life, cantankerous, and indeed cruel, who looked, so far as pious pretentiousness was concerned, as if a homœopathic globule would choke them?

The most caustic words that ever were penned, would not be too hot to apply to such. They have done harm immeasurable and irremediable. These are the men who want to know how to increase the heavenly mindedness of the church, when, if they were alive to their real state, they ought to inquire how to increase the heavenly handedness, the heavenly pocket-ness, and the heavenly home-life-ness of the church. Pretence, in other matters, is very objectionable, though, of course, not so desperately bad as hypocrisy in religion. Talking about mamma's carriage, when you only keep an old shan-dry-dan of a brougham; talking about our stay on the Continent, when you were only at cheap lodgings at Boulogne; talking about our yachting cruise, when you only went from Folkestone to Dover in a friend's boat! Pretence, ah! miserable pretence. I remember hearing of a youth who visited a farmer, and chanced to brag of the Latin he had learned. The wily farmer hooked him thus:—"What be the Latin for cart, Master R—?" he said.—"Cartibus," replied the nonplussed lad. "And fork?"—"Forkibus," returned the youth. "Oh! oh!" said the farmer; "suppose you take that forkibus and put some of this dungibus into that cartibus!" Honest and sensible reproof that. Would that all assumers of learning in the world of medicine and theology could be dealt with likewise.

I cannot forget the pretenders in the sphere of beggary. What a painful instance of the corrupt influence of sin on our better nature is to be seen in the shammings of this city! Some feign to be widows; in some cases death has been assumed, and living persons have been covered with a sheet, as if laid out; and in some cases sores are painted on the flesh, and clothes rent in pieces, to afford pictures of pain and poverty. All this is very terrible, and may furnish to those who doubt man's depravity some illustrations of the darker side of human nature. But there is pretence in the sphere of scepticism as well as of religion. The assumed self-satisfaction, the outward appearance of perfect fearlessness concerning death and eternity, this is all sham; and secularists know that it is; they might as well endeavour to blot out the sun as try to blot out the instincts of the soul. Tell me there is no sun, the next moment it shines upon me; tell me there is no immortality, the next moment the prophetic whisper is heard in my heart: "So then every one of us shall give account of himself to God." Of all pretenders, perhaps the sneering, supercilious sceptic is amongst the worst.

Next, however, to him is the pretender in politics—the rights of man advocate—the hair-thrown-back, dirty-handed style of orator roaring out about tyranny, and taxation, and tremendous wrongs, winding up with a kind of screaming peroration about this enlightened generation, and Liberty coming down upon the mountains! The echo which this sort of pretender likes to hear is, "Bravo, Buttercups!" The sight he likes to see is walls placarded with "Buttercups and Freedom!" "Buttercups and the poor man's Beer!" Buttercups himself sees beneath the printer's blue ink, "Buttercups and his own self," in very clear and distinct letters indeed. Pretentiousness is common to no peculiar era in life; but it is certainly amazing how quickly it is discerned, dealt with, and done for at college or school. "To take him down a peg or two," is a very common necessity with the spoilt boy who comes from home; and even parents themselves often have to confess that, after the first term, their boy comes home quite a different being, and certainly a much better one.

It is one of the characteristics of Christianity that it inculcates the beautiful lesson, "Not to think of ourselves more highly than we ought to think, but to think soberly;" and no one can study the sublime adaptation of the Gospel to our nature, without marking the Divine hand in the remedy. We need to apply its teachings to our innermost thoughts, even to our self-estimates; and sure I am of this, that the more we study Christianity as a system of pardon, peace, or practical godliness, the more we shall see that it reveals such a knowledge as only the Divine Understanding could possess, and such a power of renewal as only the Divine Omnipotence could bestow. Even pretentiousness receives its death-blow in the religion of the Redeemer.

SEASONABLE VISITORS.

TO my cot, nigh which a stream now purls,
And now is dumb, four visitors came:—
June, with rosed cheek and golden curls;
July, in a mist of odour and flame,
And hand in hand, both laughingly there,
Carrolled and beckoned me into the air;
When I saw them followed beyond the sheaves
By a figure crowned with yellowing leaves,
Heaped with apples, peaches, and plums.
Presently entered an old man, damp,
As if he had walked through a fog from the sea;
And, as he sat down, with a wat'ry look,
Beside the clean-swept hearth, he shook,
Moaning as though just seized with a cramp,
And talked for a while asthmatically.

Then, as he wheezed, at the door I saw
An older face, in whose icy jaw
The teeth chattered chill, who scarce could speak For cold, and who coughed as his ribs would break,
Who called to his comrade o'er and o'er
To give him a seat by the fire. But soon,
Both vanished; and, as I shut my door,
From the snowy hills looked in the moon,
And I heard from the eaves, by the wintry wall,
The wavering thaw-drop slowly fall.
And in the morning's softened light
Green tinge the pastures erst so white,
And o'er the fields where the first birds sing,
The soft blue breathing face of Spring.

T. C. IRWIN.

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT, ETC."

CHAPTER LVII.

THE RETURN.

IDAVID HALDANE fulfilled his promise to Henri, and sent him the supplies he needed; and as soon as he was released, the youth set about his search for Louis Oglivie. But he failed in finding the least track of the missing ones. They had disappeared without leaving a single clue by which to trace their steps. Their fate, living or dead, was a matter of mere conjecture.

A pit had been dug in front of the Louvre, where the slaughter had been thickest, and the bodies scattered over the battle-ground in its neighbourhood had been collected and buried there. A hundred and sixty bodies were laid together in that ghastly grave, and each one of the number represented a domestic tragedy of the saddest sort. Most of the dead were buried there unrecognised. The indiscriminate grave closed over the unnamed and unknown. Most of them were young men—many, indeed, almost boys; and mothers and newly-wedded wives went about, from hospital to hospital, in the vain hope of finding some dear one who was hidden for ever in that bloody heap of slain,—went about refusing to believe that they were not to be granted one last look before the final hiding of faces—one assurance of love before the long silence of the great separation.

And in the footsteps of these poor, distracted women followed the daughter of Louis Oglivie. Nothing would satisfy her short of such a personal search as this. Had some one died without a name among the hundreds admitted to one of the noble institutions of the city, she did not hesitate to look upon the face of the dead, in order that she might be assured that it was not him whom she sought.

But she was not alone in this mournful task; David Haldane went with her, and would have taken it on himself entirely, only that in the matter of identification he was useless. Grace Minto, too, insisted on accompanying her friend through those scenes of suffering, that she might find objects to whom her wealth might minister relief.

Inquiries among the friends of Madame Oglivie proved equally fruitless. The pair seemed to have sunk into the earth—whirled away in the wild, demoniac dance of the revolution. That two human beings should be so swept away in that terrible vortex, was, after all, not so strange or improbable. In some respects it was not difficult to account for such a catastrophe. Madame Oglivie had made up her mind not to quit or lose sight of her husband, and the unhappy man was almost insane upon the point. Under the morbid influence of his aversion, he might have rushed into danger, in the hope of thus ridding himself of her, at least for a time; while she, equally determined to keep him, might have braved the danger wilfully. Thus they might have perished together in one of the storms of grape that swept the streets that lay between Louis Oglivie's haunts and his home. It was never known exactly how many did perish in this way.

But however it might be that the wretched pair had ended their career, it was, perhaps, well that the veil of the unknown should hang over the end. For years to come Louis Oglivie's daughter cherished the hope of his reappearance; but it was a hope never to be realised. He had really and truly disappeared, and for ever.

At length a day of departure for England was fixed upon by David Haldane and his party. Their passports were made out in the name of "the Lieutenant-General, the Duc d'Orleans," and they proceeded to Dieppe, and from thence in His Majesty's packet Crusader, crowded with English people flying from all parts of France to England.

In the name of all the proprieties, Miss Minto protested against David and his betrothed going on together and alone. At London, therefore, they halted, and took up their abode for a few days at Miss Minto's house in town. From thence they were to go down into Sussex to join the rest of the Minto family; while David Haldane proceeded to Scotland by himself.

"Remember, we shall not give her up till you have a legal right to carry her away," said Miss Minto, in parting; and it was settled that he should return, and be married in England, as there were no near relations on either side to be consulted on the matter.

The Mintoes were a family of five. Fatherless and motherless, and rich, they were left almost entirely to their own devices. The eldest brother had a fine estate in Sussex, and inhabited a bright, large, hearty-looking old Sussex manor upon it. But the brightness had gone from it for him, and the heart had died out of it, since the sad event by which, unwittingly, he had darkened the life of his favourite sister. It was hardly a year ago, and yet the place looked deserted and neglected. Grace had kept house for him, and though her sister Bella had taken her place, she could not fight against the gloom which had seized upon her brother.

"Bella, do you mind having your flowers away from the house, somewhere where I cannot see them? they remind me of Gracie, and the happy days we had before——" he would say, and rise and go away, striding over the downs till he was exhausted.

The brother and sister had not met for many months; they had not even written to each other, each too fearful of reminding the other of the past, and all the suffering that had sprung from it. Grace had, indeed, sought to assure him of her unaltered affection, but that was when her every look seemed to him a reproach. His sensitiveness equalled hers, and his suffering had been even more severe.

And now that they were to meet, their friends were anxious concerning the meeting. When he heard that she was coming home ill, her brother had said, "Yes, she will die, it is the best thing for her; and for me too, if I could manage it, death would be better than life." But now he had heard of her rapid recovery, and that she was coming down to Sussex, and he prepared to go away at once. "It will only make her ill again, to see me," he said, "even if she can bear the sight of the place."

And both Miss Minto and Peggy felt it to be a great experiment, that going down to the place. It was in the hall of the old house that the fatal shot was fired; and in a room above—a white-curtained room, looking out into the orchard, where he had been carried wounded to death that—he died. They questioned whether it was wise to go there yet; but Grace knew that her cure was not complete till she had braved this renewal of suffering; and they yielded to her wish to get it over without delay. A return of the old inaction seemed to come to her till this was accomplished. It was possible, indeed, that it might prove too much for her. The experiment might fail. The absence of her brother, who next to her was the principal sufferer, seemed an element of failure.

A third sister had built a cottage on her brother's land, and called it "The Retreat." It was a real cottage, and not a sham. Except in the exquisite purity of everything in it, there was nothing to distinguish it from the better class of humble homes. The door opened straight into a square hall, which could be used as a sitting-room, scantily furnished with oaken chairs and table, and with a wooden settle on each side of the great fireplace, furnished with dogs instead of a modern grate. From the hall opened an inner room, one step higher, furnished with equal simplicity, its square of crimson carpet, and its table-cover of some plain material, being quite attainable by all but the very poor. The sleeping-rooms, equally simple, were reached from this room by a wooden stair. A door communicated with a similar cottage, built by the side of this one, in which dwelt the young squire's keeper and his wife, who served the inmates of "The Retreat," whoever they might happen to be. Behind, in a dwelling of their own, lived a noisy family of beagles, and two or three young ones were generally to be found crawling about along with the keeper's baby, and running the same risks of being trodden upon or burned alive.

It was to the cottage that Miss Minto resolved to come, and to bring the two young ladies; Miss Kate, its owner, being absent with another aunt in Scotland. It had strange tenants often, "The Retreat"—a retreat, indeed, not from splendour and gaiety, as its young mistress at first intended, but from many of the ills of life. As has been said, these young people were rich, and free to spend their riches; and both riches and freedom were beginning to be nobly used by them. Did Kate Minto find a poor young schoolmistress, toiling and fainting through the summer, in a close London schoolroom, she would send her down, with a mother or a sister for company, to stay a month at the cottage, to wander over the breezy downs, and eat fruit, and drink sweet milk ad libitum. At another time it would be a poor artist and his wife, to whom it was a double boon, giving life to his art as well as to himself, furnishing his exhausted portfolio with fresh sketches of lovely Sussex woods, picturesque with scattered farm and manor, church and cottage, amid the wavelike undulations of height and hollow.

Bella was at the cottage to receive them, and at first it seemed as if both sisters would have broken down at the meeting. It was Grace who recovered first, and presented Miss Oglivie to her sister. "We two," she said, holding her hand "have talked over this meeting, and I think but for her I should never have been able to bear it. Now I feel as if it was selfish to sorrow so much and so long. Where is he?"

"Ben? He does not know you are here," faltered her sister; "I was afraid to tell him. Oh, you do not know what he has suffered!"

"How glad I am," said Grace, looking at her friend with tearful eyes, "that you persuaded me to see him at once—that you guessed all this. Do you know she told me that he must be suffering more than me?" she said, turning to her sister.

Bella went up to Peggy and kissed her. "Oh, thank you so much!" she sobbed. And turning to Grace, "It will all be as it used to be at home again, will it not?" she asked, timidly.

"How will you let him know I am here?" said Grace.

"I do not know," answered her sister. "If he knew, I think he would go away. I know he has thought of giving up the place to Will, and going away altogether. I think if you had not come back, or if—if you had died, he would have done it soon."

Then Miss Minto was taken into consultation; and it was resolved that she should see "Ben," as her nephew was called, on the morrow, and tell him that his sister was at the cottage, and was coming to see him. But Fate had ordered it otherwise.

On the morrow, when Miss Minto had gone up to "the house," to fulfil her mission, Grace, who was very restless and excitable all the morning, was urged by Peggy to go out into the little wood. Anything to work off the feverish feeling which betrayed itself in the heightened colour and unnaturally brilliant eyes. Leaning over the stile which led out of the wood to the upland beyond, was a man who seemed immovable in his attitude of listlessness. At first Grace did not recognise him; but on their advancing close, he turned a little, and Grace, excited as she was, gave a little cry, and sank on the bank by the pathway. It was the very opposite to all she had intended her meeting with her brother to be. He turned and looked at her for a moment, and then with an expression which Peggy never forgot, as an embodiment of acute despair, he was about to fling himself over the stile.

But Peggy saw in a moment what had happened, and hastened towards him. She did not hesitate to seize his arm, explaining in a hurried whisper that they were there to see him. "Come to her," she added, "and all will be well."

But he stood still. "She cannot bear to see me," he murmured.

"Oh, yes, she can—she will; but she is trembling now, so that she cannot walk, and you must go to her."

He suffered himself to be led forward; but his sister had risen to meet him, and came to him crying, "Forgive me if I have hurt you, Ben. Indeed, I did not mean it; but we came upon you so suddenly."

Strong man as he was, Peggy could see his whole frame shiver with emotion as he took her in his arms.

Then the three walked together back through the little wood, growing calmer every step they took.

"Shall we go and find Miss Minto?" said Peggy, with a look of intelligence to her friend.

"Where is she?" said her nephew.

"She has gone up to 'the house' to tell you that I was coming. Let us go;" and his sister clung closer to his arm, while Peggy, excusing herself, turned aside into the cottage.

CHAPTER LVIII.

THE TITLE IN ABEYANCE.

DAVID HALDANE found on his return that things at the factory had gone on much in their usual course; but the old man had begun to murmur at his prolonged absence, though his stay beyond the allotted period had not been much more than a week. The old man murmured, because in his early days people had had no holidays at all. He himself had had none, he said; and, like all old people, he was inclined to measure with his own bushel other people's apples. He was, altogether, somewhat crusty with his nephew.

"I have another offer for Delaube," he said, in the first hours of their meeting.

"And I hope you have refused it," said his nephew, hastily.

"No, I haven't. I think I'll sell it. Captain and Mrs. Oglivie want the place taken off their hands, and Miss Margery makes another offer for it."

"I will take it," said David the Younger.

"And what wud ye do wi' it?" asked his uncle, almost angrily.

"Bring home my wife," answered his nephew.

The old man felt an intensity of interest which he did not choose to show. He did not want to be mollified all at once. "Where may she be?" he asked.

"She is in England," was the answer; "and I want to arrange for an absence early in October, when I mean to bring her back with me."

David Haldane the Elder had not shown his interest in his nephew's first statement; but he could not conceal his disappointment at the second. He had completely reconciled himself to the idea of an alliance with the Oglivies, and, from being reconciled, he had become eager for it. "I wud rather ye had married a countrywoman o' your ain," he said, testily. "They say the English lasses are baith bonnier and franker; but, as far as I've seen, there's mair ootcome in the Scotch."

"But surely Miss Oglivie is Scotch enough," said his nephew.

"Ou, ay; if it's her I've naething to say," rejoined the old man.

His nephew then told him the story of the "Three Days," and before he had ended his listener was restored to entire good humour.

"I'll settle about the house," he said. "Nae doubt she wud like to come back to the auld place. She seemed sore vexed to leave it."

David had undertaken to see Margery at the earliest opportunity. She was by no means prepared to rejoice over the marriage which awaited one of the last representatives of her noble house; but for David Haldane, personally, she had conceived a great admiration, which she showed by telling him her mind on the subject, concluding with—

"So ye're not afraid to marry one o' an evil race. For many a day the Oglivies have had the ban o' the Almighty on them. Few o' them have died a fair-strae death" (viz., died fairly in their beds). "No good have they ever done, no blessing have they ever brought."

David gave it as his opinion that his betrothed was blessing enough for a whole generation of Oglivies; but shrewdly added that, if her opinion of them was so bad, the race might as well come to an end.

"The lands and the gear will be hers some day," she said, half-meditatively.

"They needn't," he replied; "there are others who can claim them."

"And ye want nothing with her?" she rejoined with a queer look.

"Nothing," he answered, proudly, but with no evil pride. "What I want I win: the power to do this is my inheritance."

"Well, well, let it be," she answered; and they parted friends.

(To be continued.)

"WHAT A NUISANCE!"

"MISS MARY, just come and watch baby, while I go and make his food for him when he wakes."

I was reading a story-book very intently in the window-seat, when nurse's clear, brisk voice broke upon my ear. I did not answer just at first; to say truth, I was annoyed at being disturbed; I had just got to such a very interesting part of the story; so I merely frowned, and went on reading.

"Miss Mary, did you hear what I said? Will—you—mind—baby—while—I—go—down—stairs?"

Nurse spoke every word of her sentence very slowly and deliberately, and close to my ear, so that I was obliged to reply. I had no longer the slightest excuse to be silent, so I said, in a pettish, cross voice, "Oh, very well, nurse! what a nuisance you are! you never will let one read a story without interrupting one."

Then I turned with renewed energy to my book. But the subject was not to be dismissed so easily, for nurse continued: "I shouldn't ask such a disagreeable child to do anything for me, only baby's not been well these two days, and I don't like his symptoms."

Then nurse left the room, and I got up and went to the cradle.

"Symptoms, indeed!" I thought to myself; "a great fat, red child like that to have anything the matter with it! I don't believe it—it's as fast asleep as a top, and isn't likely to wake, either, till nurse comes back with the food."

Then I tried to go back to my book; but I had been thoroughly roused. I had got over the "pretty part," as I called it, and didn't care to read any more.

Baby was still asleep.

"Oh! what a nuisance!" I said, half aloud; "and I might have been playing with Rosie" (that was my last new doll). I went softly towards the cradle, with my arms up to balance myself in case I should take a false step. Still fast asleep was baby. While I looked the little hand clenched itself, and the little lip quivered. "Oh," I thought, "he's dreaming. All right." I crept softly to the door, turned the handle very gently, shut it after me, and went up-stairs to the lumber-room, where my playthings were.

I had played with my doll long enough, and was laying her snugly in her usual receptacle, when I heard a loud shriek, the most terrific cry I had ever heard. My heart almost stood still, and I felt the hot blood rush up to my face and neck. I stood leaning forward with my hands clasped for one second, then I made a rush down the stairs.

"Ring the down-stairs bell," screamed nurse from the nursery.

In my agitation and flurry I set almost all the bells in the house ringing.

"Rush down-stairs and tell them to bring hot water immediately," said nurse again.

I saw the housemaid coming up the stairs, and I shouted, "Hot water, Mary—baby—oh! I don't know what's the matter."

Nurse's voice followed mine down the stairs:

"Be quick for your life, and call missis. The baby's in a fit."

I crept back to the nursery, and was nearly knocked down by Mary, who arrived with a can of hot water. The baby was already undressed, and in another minute was in the water, but not before I had seen his little face almost black, his arms and legs distorted, and drawn up in a frightful manner and his eyes rolling horribly.

"Oh, nurse! nurse!" I said in agony, "what is the matter with baby?"

"Go away," replied nurse, in a cold hard tone, "go away, you wicked girl! you've killed your brother for aught I know."

Mamma was there, but she was too much occupied with baby to take any notice of me.

I saw all my fault and wickedness then. I was perfectly penitent and heart-broken. I thought I had killed my little brother, and I already looked upon myself as a murderer. I saw now that nurse was right, and I remembered the nervous twitching of the hands and eyes, which I had taken for the effects of dreaming. I wished I had never had a pretty book, nor a doll, to prevent my doing my duty readily and cheerfully.

I slunk down-stairs like a thief, as if I had no right in the house. I had an indistinct notion that some dreadful harm would happen to me if baby died, and I had a vision of myself poor, unprotected, and in rags, like the little girl at the corner of the street who swept the crossing, and received a penny from papa regularly every morning. I thought I should have to go a long way off, and never see papa and mamma again. I felt quite certain that I deserved such a fate; but it grieved me very much all the same, and I went and sat in the library, and cried till my eyes were so red and swollen that I could hardly see out of them.

I had not been in the library long when I heard the doctor's knock, and then his loud voice in the hall, and his squeaking boots ascending the stairs heavily and regularly, till he reached the nursery door, when there was a deadly stillness, awful to be borne. It seemed hours to my childish ideas before he came down again, and I endured horrible tortures the while. When I heard the boots on almost the last stair I darted out and said, "Oh, sir, will baby die?—tell me, sir, will he get better?"

"It's been a very near touch, little woman," said the doctor—"a very near touch. If nurse hadn't gone in when she did, there wouldn't have been much chance for the poor little chap—very little chance indeed." Then he patted my head. "I suppose you're very fond of little brother," he said. "Why, you've cried your eyes out almost. Oh, I dare say he'll get all right again, only he must be closely watched. There ought to have been some one with him when the fit came on. Ah! he wouldn't have stood it much longer, poor little chap;" and the old doctor opened the street door, and gave me a gigantic and sympathising nod as he closed it after him. I felt more wicked than ever then, and I had a great impulse to open the door and call after the doctor, and pour into his horrified ear the tale of my misdeeds, and tell him that I was crying as much for them as for my brother's illness.

All was quiet now; in fact, there seemed a deathly calm in the house. I sat on the stairs and cried softly to myself, and listened to the clock tick, tick, tick, and it seemed to tick harshly and angrily to-day. Presently I got up and slowly went up-stairs till I got outside the nursery door. I was afraid to go in. I dreaded the combined anger of mamma and nurse. I stood leaning against the door for a long time, still listening to the angry clock, wishing I could hear news of baby, and wishing I could go anywhere rather than be so miserable. Mamma came out suddenly, but quietly, and, grasping me firmly by the wrist, led me into her bedroom.

Mamma's scolding was not of the character I had anticipated: she spoke to me very calmly and gently. "Mary," she said, "I don't think I need say anything to you about your wicked, cruel neglect of a helpless little baby—your own brother; your punishment must be about as much as you can bear already, if you have any conscience: for the little fellow nearly died. Nurse tells me she mistrusted your watchfulness, or she would not have returned so soon. It was fortunate she came as she did, or you might have been wretchedly unhappy for the rest of your life. I hope this will be a lesson to you always, Mary. When you are inclined to be petulant, and disagreeable, and disobedient, remember how a life was once almost sacrificed to your temper and unwillingness to do your duty, and avoid even the chance of bringing such unbearable misery upon others and yourself."

I listened very quietly to mamma's speech, and then made a full and free confession of my naughtiness, and received that forgiveness which a parent should always be ready to accord to a child who is sorry for its fault.

E. W.

THE BIVYER

— Saturday, March 28, 1868. —

(Drawn by S. L. FILDES.)

“It’s pretty plain he worked con amore.”—p. 434.

THREE CHAPTERS IN A PAINTER’S LIFE.

CHAPTER III.

MAY had come round again, the Academy was open, and Walter Chesney’s success had far outrun his wildest hopes. Men and newspapers raved about his pictures. “The Painter’s Dream,” was sold; and so, too, was an exquisite little picture, in which he had immortalised the scene in the hairdresser’s shop.

Walter had given up his city lodgings, and taken a comical little cottage at Putney, where Denis and his wife kept house and garden for him, and where admirers of art and lion-hunters came and left piles of cards and invitations, very few of which Walter accepted. He was still coward enough to be afraid of meeting Marion; he even shunned the Academy, until one day he remembered Nelly had not been there.

"You must take your wife to see herself, Denis," he said.

But Denis looked troubled; he had an idea that Nelly would be politely mobbed if she showed herself inside the Academy, and that people would at once recognise her as the "Dream Angel." So he did not respond so warmly to his master's offer as that master expected, and finding out what the poor fellow really felt about it, Walter good-naturedly offered to take the little woman himself, and bought a marvellously pretty bonnet and dress, chosen with the express intention of setting off her beauty to its best advantage.

They went early, to avoid the crush, and were sitting before "The Painter's Dream," when Marion Riddley and a friend entered the room.

Marion saw Walter at once, and the colour flushed indignantly to the roots of her hair, for she recognised at one glance the heroine of his wonderful picture, and saw him leaning towards her with every expression of tender interest in his earnest face. Marion read the motto attached to "The Painter's Dream," and, remembering her words, her heart throbbed angrily as she thought, "He might have spared me the insult of putting my words in her mouth."

Walter had not seen her yet, of that she was sure, so she had time to school her face, before she must pass him. Very slowly, therefore, she followed her friend, talking of the pictures in a dry, hard voice. They had reached the next seat to that upon which Walter was sitting, his back was towards them, and so far as Marion knew he had never turned his head, he was too busy talking, telling Nelly of a plan he had formed for enabling her husband and herself to put their chosen wish of emigrating into effect, and Nelly was listening, with gratitude and happiness speaking in her lovely face. Others besides Marion were deceived as to the relationship of the two. A couple of men—acquaintances of Mr. Chesney's—were sitting near, and she heard one say, evidently in reply to some question put by the other—

"Wife! of course. Walter is one of the right sort."

"Then that accounts for his taking a cottage, no one knows where? Where on earth did he pick up such an angel? she looks as if she had come to meet him half-way."

"It's pretty plain he worked con amore," laughed the friend; "come along and try if he will introduce one," and they rose and sauntered on.

Marion saw Walter look up, as one of them addressed him by name in passing; saw him start, and nod hurriedly, then go on with his conversation; she saw this, but did not see that, in turning, Mr. Chesney had recognised her. She did not see the spasm and pallor that crossed his face; but Nelly, who knew every phase of suffering by heart, did.

"You are ill, master," she said, rising. "Let us go home."

"Not yet, Nelly; sit down again, and I'll tell you all about it. I've often meant to, but the right opportunity never seemed to come. It is the story of that picture, and of my life."

Walter's heart was full, and when that is the case, nature generally grows eloquent; and so he became not only eloquent, but impassioned, and Marion, looking on, saw it; but little suspected the story he was telling had any reference to herself. She looked on as long as she could, then the very agony she was suffering gave her courage, and, rising, she swept down the room, her stately figure drawn up and her head held proudly. As she passed Mr. Chesney, she turned and bowed, in that marked manner, which is more difficult to assume, and more galling to bear, than any cut direct, at the same time looking Nelly full in the face; and the poor little woman, whose heart was bleeding for her friend, blushed for very pity.

"She looks very proud, master," whispered Nelly, half-inclined to cry. "Is she a great lady?"

"Her father is a merchant."

"Oh!" said Nelly, dubiously. In her part of Scotland every man who sold a yard of tape was a merchant. "Are you sure she ever got your note, sir?" was the next query.

Walter's eyes opened, and grew earnest.

"What do you mean? how could it be otherwise? I gave it to the man myself."

"Ay, master, but flunkeys are sae lazy; and maybe he gave it till the ladie's maid, and she forgot it."

"Then why should she treat me as she did just now? she never used to do so."

Nelly's woman's instinct had a ready answer for this; but she did not tell Walter what she thought. If Marion did not care enough for him to trust him, it would be better that no new hopes should be roused, and unsettle the calmness purchased at the price of despair. He had spoken of his story as of the past, best let it so remain; and yet in her heart Nelly had strange doubts, and as she walked home, she formed a plan, which was simply this: to go and tell Marion of the letter, and of Mr. Chesney's goodness to her husband and herself; then leave the result in the hands of Providence.

Next day, Nelly presented herself at Davenport Street; and the footman, concluding she had come for orders, took her to Marion's private room.

Marion, who was alone, started when she saw her visitor.

"He has mistaken your name," she said, rising, and, though indignant at what she thought Walter's impertinence, determined to be friendly, and vanquish him by her very courtesy. "I must apologise for the blunder of a new servant, Mrs. Chesney; but you see it is rather earlier than our visitors generally come. Do sit down."

Nelly's face had been a picture in itself, during these few words. She had been terribly frightened of what she had undertaken, and only the intense gratitude she felt towards Mr. Chesney could have overcome her natural timidity. Now, however, she saw it all. The name Marion had called her by swept away the veil, and strengthened her for any amount of difficulty.

"I am not Mrs. Chesney, miss; my husband and I live with Mr. Chesney. He doesn't know I've come here to-day, miss; and if you'll please not to be offended, I'll just tell you how he found me out, and put me in his picture."

Marion sat down, she could not pretend to understand this woman; but something held her silent, and in a manner compelled her to listen, while bit by bit, and not without tears, Nelly unfolded her story; and when that was told, without giving Marion time to arrive at any conclusion, the cunning diplomatist launched off into the subject of the letter.

"What letter?" cried Marion, her colour deepening; "I never received any letter from Mr. Chesney."

"There now, miss, I told him so; but he said he put it into the man's hand himself, and that you wad get it, the very night." Nelly stopped with a sort of hysterical gasp. She saw it all, and the very happiness in store for Walter took away her breath.

"I never received any letter," repeated Marion, slowly; "but as Mr. Chesney could have nothing particular to say, I dare say it was of no consequence."

"Jist this," burst out Nelly, forgetting everything but the truth, "jist this, that it sent him out o' the country wi' a broken heart; and, at this moment, he dare na gang out o' the place, for fear o' meeting you, and remembering the love he had lost."

"Really," and Marion rose, "really, I do not see what right Mr. Chesney has to complain, or why you are to come and tell me this."

"Only for this, miss, that he wrote, and whan he never got an answer he went 'most mad."

"Well, then, tell him to bring his letter to-morrow morning, and I will honestly answer it. I can say no more. Please go home now. I dare say you mean it all well, but you don't understand. - At all events, I am glad he got such a good subject for his beautiful picture."

Nelly flew rather than walked home, and roused Walter out of one of his gloomy fits by a recital of her morning's work, and next day Mr. Chesney calling at Davenport Street, was taken to Marion, to whom he presented a copy of the much-thought-of letter.

He was standing by the window as she read it, but when she said, "Is it too late to tell you I would have proudly granted your request, Mr. Chesney?" he came closer to her, and leaning over her chair, tried to look into her face, as he said—

"Then for eight long months I have insulted you by every thought. Can you ever forgive me?"

Marion's eyes, no doubt, gave the necessary assurance, and more too, for Walter did not leave Davenport Street until nearly five o'clock, and when he did, a long tress of the golden glory lay in his pocket-book.

* * * * *

"I have news for you, Nelly," said her master, putting his head into his housekeeper's room; "I am going to be married, and as we owe it all to your great wisdom, you are required to go to Davenport Street with me to-morrow to be suitably thanked. Denis has to go too, for the gift will concern you equally. The truth is, Mr. Riddle has bought a little place in Ireland, and wants a steady couple to farm it for him; so, as one good turn deserves another, my friends, Miss Riddle has secured the post for you, and if you make haste and get over, we'll be able to spend our honeymoon in the old house. What do you say to going back to Ireland, Denis?"

But Denis could not just then say anything. His lips were shaking, and very little more would have upset him altogether; so Nelly, as usual, became spokeswoman, and very nicely and truly did she use the power.

"It's the Lord's doing, master, and it is marvellous in our eyes. I'll never doubt that the sma'est o' our actions are guided for guid, if we like to find it again."

I. D. FENTON.

THE PURITAN'S DAUGHTER.

I.

IT is the Puritan's daughter,
The daughter of Paul the Bold—
Paul the eloquent preacher,
The scoffer at rank and gold ;
Paul, you know, with the grey beard,
Looking a century old—
Paul who stands in the market-place,
Raving of Justice, and Faith, and Grace.

It is the Puritan's daughter,
The innocent Magdelene,
A ray in the house of her father,
Gliding the glooms between ;
His home in the stead of her mother,
Who sleeps 'neath a coverlid green—
Who sleeps in her bed with a heaveless sleep,
It is so peaceful, it is so deep.

It is the Puritan's daughter,
She sits in her cheery nook,
There you may daily find her,
Good sir, an you care to look—
Glancing anon to her needle,
Anon to the page of her book ;
And smoothly as runs the silken thread,
So run the thoughts of the Book in her head.

It is the Puritan's daughter ;
You may scan in vain for a trace
Of wile or guile in her quiet smile ;
'Tis only an unthought grace :
'Tis only the light of her spirit
Sunning awhile in her face,
Lustring deep in the wells of her eyes,
And rosily dying as daylight dies.

It is the Puritan's daughter,
And O for that joyful peace !
Those hours in the dim cathedral,
Despairing now, I cease ;
For the many rites have bound me
Till I groan for my release :
Ay, would I were Paul in the market-place,
Though he rave of Justice, and Faith, and Grace !

II.

It is the Puritan's daughter :
One spring-bright day as I went
Beneath the opening window,
With sorrowful face downbent,
A leaf came fluttering downward,
A page from a book, 'twas sent
Like a healing leaf from the Living Tree,
And I knew who plucked it thence for me.

It is the Puritan's daughter :
I caught the page, and I prest
To my lips the precious burthen,
The message true and blest :
"Come unto me," it whispered,
"And I will give you Rest :"
O words of love ! O bliss unpriced !
At length I found Thee, Jesu Christ !

It is the Puritan's daughter :
But where is the scene of old ?
Beyond the heaving of waters ;
And an ocean of woes untold,
Far, far from this verdure of gladness :
And what of that Paul the Bold ?
The Thunderer sleeps with a heaveless sleep,
It is so peaceful, it is so deep.

It is the Puritan's daughter :
She walks in the pleasant glades
Of a vast delightful forest ;
For in sooth she loves the shades,
And saith, "Where the sun is brightest,
All bloom the soonest fades ;"
So Magdelene blooms in the shades of life,
A comely matron, a fadeless wife.

It is the Puritan's daughter :
The night is drawing on ;
Her children kneel around her
Till the last faint ray is gone :
Now come away, my children,
She rests in the shades alone ;
And through that deep and heaveless sleep
The good kind God will her spirit keep.

B.

WORKING CHRISTIANS.

BY THE REV. J. B. OWEN, M.A., INCUMBENT OF ST. JUDE'S, CHELSEA.

THE word of Him who knew what was in man affirms distinctly, that the Christian life, so promissory of all the blessedness that men really and instinctively, though often blindly, yearn after and long for, is certainly attainable. The question is, how is it to be attained ? In other words, as the suddenly-arrested persecutor asked : "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do ?"

That young ruler was obviously no loose, unprincipled profligate, nor, in his own view, even an irreligious youth, who besought our Lord to tell him—"Good Master, what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life ?"

All classes of life, and all kinds of character, brought the same practical question to the Baptist, as he preached repentance, asking : "And what shall we do ?" Pharisees, publicans, soldiers, and all kinds of people came with the same question, as the Philippian gaoler: "What must I do to be saved?"

I want to answer that vital inquiry. There is something to be done, as well as something to be believed, for "faith without works is dead." True; and works without faith are equally dead. The body without the soul, or the soul without the body, equally imply a condition of death. Consequently, all that we need advance is essentially comprised in those two simple elements of godliness—faith and works.

When I say faith, I don't mean that haughty, inflated orthodoxy which shibboleths the dialect of heaven, but looks down with contempt upon its fellow-sinners, whom angels watch with tenderer interest, waiting to catch the first starting tear that wakes the unselfish "joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth." There is too much of that cold creed which freezes into diffidence, if not distrust, the poor, meek, timid, soul with which it comes in contact. I do not mean faith of that fashion, but a loving, active, ingenuous, and humble faith, that thinks little of itself, and much of others, and most of God. A hearty, honest faith that forgets its theological system in the glory of its centre—that sinks itself in its considerateness for others—a practical, as well as experimental faith, which turns with too much candid loathing from its own sins, faults, and infirmities—which, of course, it knows best—to have any element of contempt left for the sins of others, and only feels how much it has to undo for itself, and to do for its fellows. As the pious Joseph Alleine wrote from his prison, to his old flock at Taunton, "Beloved Christians, live like yourselves: let the world see that the promises of God, and privileges of the Gospel, are not empty sounds, or a mere crack. Let the heavenly cheerfulness, and the restless diligence, and the holy raisedness of your conversations, prove the reality, and excellency, and beauty of your religion to the world."

That "restless diligence" is the point which meets the defective spirituality of the day—the want of workers. We have too many talkers, and plenty of believers, so called, but not enough workers. There is a want of workers, not only in the direct work of Sunday-school teachers, district visitors, collectors for religious societies, active leaders and co-operators in mutual-instruction schemes, and such like; but we want also workers for God in your common workshops; Christians working for him while they are at work for themselves—glorifying God in their secular callings. A young Christian shines brightly in his business, when his Christianity makes him more active and conscientious, more in earnest at what his hand findeth to do, than worldly men. Your religion has done little for you, if it has not done that.

You may be a lawyer (like Sir Matthew Hale), or a physician (like Haller, Heberden, and Mason Goode), or a painter (like West), or a sculptor (like Bacon), or a poet (like Milton, Klopstock, and Cowper), or a merchant (like Thornton and the Hardcastles), or a philosopher (like Boyle and Boerhaave), or a hardworking artisan (like the Yorkshire blacksmith, or the watchmaker of Geneva), but your aim, your study, and daily prayer should be, to be not only a better Christian, but a better lawyer, a better physician, or painter, or sculptor, or poet, or merchant, or philosopher, or mechanic, than the mere man of the world.

You should let the world see that religion, so far from obstructing secular eminence, actually promotes it, and purifies it of idle fame-craft, and converts personal gifts into instruments of greater personal usefulness;—that it inspires a John Newton to write his Letters, and a Butler his "Analogy," and a Matthew Henry his Commentary, and a Cowper his Hymns;—that it restricts a contemplative Venn to his parish, and impels a Whitefield to make the world his field; locks up a profound Edwards in his study, and scatters the sweet perfume of a Wilberforce in the boudoir; so that each in his way works and waits upon God—"he that ministereth by his ministering, he that teacheth by his teaching, he that exhorteth by his exhortations, and he that ruleth by his diligence," and by his judgment and love unfeigned, without partiality and without hypocrisy. Thus the varied and sanctified field which, like Joseph, the Lord hath blessed, bringeth forth its fruits, "some thirty, and some sixty, and some a hundred-fold" to the praise and glory of the great and good "Lord of the harvest," whose cry is still for "more labourers." Alas! that the responsive cries are so few and far between, "Lo, I come to do thy will, O God."

God's moral operations, like his natural ones, are, for the most part, so quiet and unseen in their process, like the silent growth of a flower, or the ripening of a crop, though these are as much his handiwork as the louder echo of his voice in thunder, or the more obvious flash of his glory in the lightning, that the stillness fails to minister to some men's ambition, pride, or parade; and hence comparatively limited is the number of young men found engaged in "doing the work of an evangelist." There seems no scope for hero-craft, no dazzling materials for history, in stooping down to the level of back-street ignorance, to teach vulgar little boys and girls. No philosophy in reasoning oneself into a discussion with a wretched drunkard, or with that notorious young thief, his son, whose only lesson has been to be taught to steal for him. There is no poetry in diving down a back lane by gas-light, in search of the ragged refuse of the streets, to surprise and warm their precociously benumbed hearts with, perhaps, the first tones of fellow-feelinghood that ever thawed them. Yet there is a heroism, none the less sterling that it happens not to be fashionable—there is a philosophy, none the less real because it is not of the schools—and there is a poetry, sweet and holy as the melody of the harper of Bethlehem, in the sentiment which charmed evil spirits out of the conceits of a melancholy king, in the large and tender-heartedness which finds a channel for its sensibilities in rude and unlovely miseries, that require no metaphor to illustrate them, in midnight ignorance and degradation, which asks no laboured comment to expound them; the sight of which, without sensational descriptions, and the pitiful and gracious apprehension of which, without public or romantic inducement, constrain for the love of Christ, every personal energy of evangelical benevolence into the effort that yearns for their amendment and reclamation. And they best reclaim the waste places of society, who not only enclose the common, but sow it with seed to make it fruitful. It is a grand secret to teach a young lawless wanderer and wayfarer, not merely that he has been doing evil, that he was good for nothing—which, perhaps, the rough staves of the police have often told him already—but that he is good for something better, which he had never thought he was, before you told him so;—to persuade him that he has a gift which only lacks developing, like the resources of a once barren soil, whose culture produces wheat even more abundantly than it had brought forth its spontaneous weeds. This was the secret of Dr. Arnold's power as a teacher, that he impressed every pupil with the stimulating conviction that there was a work for him to do, and that he could do it. The boy woke to find himself of some importance; that there was a niche in the Pantheon of life which his humble statue was hewn out to fill, if only his own hand and heart quarried out the materials for the impartial sculptor. He raised the duty of study into a mental dignity, and thus made it each lad's ambition to be a conscientious labourer in the sphere of his individual gifts, assured that life was no lottery, with its contingent luck and loss, but that some prize was open to every one in the sure and just proportion of his industry, capacity, and truth.

The teacher who neglects the poor dull boy, or the bad wild boy, in the selfish forcing of the brilliant one, whom he destines for his own advertisement, is the reverse, not only of the Christian who "minds not high things, but condescends to men of low estate," but of the "old English gentleman" who,

"While he feasted all the great,
He ne'er forgot the small."

Minds, immortal spirits, have their forlorn hopes, and we want volunteers to dare them. There are acres of cold, hungry soils that want the slow and patient toil of spade husbandry to dig and develop their scanty capabilities.

There is too much easy-going charity and gaslight philanthropy in these days. What the practical needs of the age require is just that patient, obscure, conscientious elaboration of schemes of benevolence, whose only recompence is sought for in its success, and which looks for no other applause than the obvious benefit of its poor client: like the gardener, who early and late waters his plants and tends upon his flowers, seeking no other return, at least from them, than their budding into their own bloom and beauty in their appointed season.

I ask, then, the young men who are readers of THE QUIVER, who profess to believe in, to love and serve, the Lord Jesus, to be content to stoop as he did, to take the children of the streets "in his arms, lay his hands upon them, and bless them." It robs no ray of glory from the Redeemer's Godhead to picture him laden to the bosom with two or three little ones—poor people's too, for it was not in rich men's houses he met them, but in the bare streets and lanes of the city, whither many of his parables bade all who would be his disciples to go out and follow him. I give a prominence to this work of imitating Him who came "to seek, as well as to save them that were lost," for there is a "taking up of the cross" in it, greater than the less trying task of teaching the children when they have been gathered in under the wings of the school. May I not add, however humble a young man's gifts may be, or his modesty suppose them to be, or his indolence pretend them to be, every one has gift enough to be a street-searcher, a kind of moral scavenger (and Aristides was not ashamed to be a real one)? It wants nothing but the will, and the grace of God and the love of Christ working with that will, to be an effective explorer of those artificial dens and caves of the earth wherein great cities unwittingly hide the victims, or the agents, of their neglects, vices, and sins.

There is nothing nobler than the consecration of our gift, be it only the one talent, to doing good. To do good is to get good. We learn by teaching. "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine," is equally applicable to duty. God's Word demands men's exertions only according to their gifts, and any "man is accepted according to what he hath, and not according to what he hath not." Even an accidental infirmity, or natural defect, does not exclude the individual from his share of opportunities for well-doing. One night an elderly miner, returning to his home across the colliery fields of Worcestershire, lost his way.

He wandered helplessly in the thick darkness for several hours, till midnight overtook him, weary, worn out, and utterly at a loss to know where he was. At length, perceiving a light in a wayside hut, he tapped timidly at the door. A voice from within kindly bade him enter, and he asked his way to Cradley.

"Thee art three miles off the road," replied the cottager, and then cheerfully rising, added, "but I'll put thee right again;" and forthwith went out with the wanderer, and guided him safely to his home.

"How couldst thee find thee way through the fog?" said the grateful miner.

"It's no fog to me," said his friend; "I be blind as a mole."

All honour to the blind philanthropist, whose inner vision could recognise the claims of brotherly kindness, and convert his very infirmity into an instrument of usefulness. Such deeds put to shame many a selfish Pharisee, who "now saith he seeth, and therefore his sin remaineth."

If through "the gross darkness on the minds of the people," there were more searchers for scholars, there would be larger schools, and if there were larger schools, there would be more teachers. Young men and maidens could not for very shame see the children come crowding into the schools, and let them go away without a lesson. Like the Lord whom they profess to follow, they would have compassion on the tiny multitude, and dread sending them away fasting, lest they should faint by the way.

One of the modes, then, in which I would urge you into work for God, is to volunteer your services as Sunday-school teachers, and to be ready to take your turn cheerfully and promptly in the task of visiting from house to house in search of the little involuntary law-breakers, who know not what they are breaking, whether of God's law or man's, or the law of their own well-being. I repeat the assertion, you will do yourselves good by doing good to others. No one knows till he tries how much we actually learn by teaching—how many old errors are detected—how many old impressions are rectified or confirmed, and how many old truths are realised in new lights, by the simple process of teaching a child to read and know the Holy Scriptures. Their casual accents have often lisped a commentary unawares which never struck us before, and a new and bright light has flashed upon our understandings, from the unconscious theology of "one of those little ones," whom we must ourselves resemble in spirit, or ever "we enter into the kingdom of heaven."

SELFISHNESS.

Selfishness a virtue or a vice? Are people ashamed of it or proud of it? It would be very hard to answer these questions, if one had to form a judgment either from the ordinary conduct or the ordinary maxims of men. People do, for the most part, in fact, what they justify in theory—namely, look after "number one;" moreover, it must be confessed, that there is a kind of selfishness which, in a manner, coincides with perfect virtue. We say, for instance, that Almighty God seeks first of all his own glory; and so, in a far lower region, we feel that there is much more than mere prudence in the advice of Polonius to Laertes:

"This above all,—to thine ownself be true;
And it must follow, as the night the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man."

On the other hand, most people seem to think that, though they are themselves perfectly justified in preferring their own interests to everybody else's, it is a dreadfully mean thing for anybody else to prefer his own interests to theirs; or, to express it differently, selfishness in other people is a vice; but in oneself it may be regarded, at the very worst, as a painful necessity or a disagreeable virtue, and sometimes even as a particular form of unselfishness.

Of course, the devil never appears without disguise, if he can possibly help it; and if Selfishness were to wander about the world naked, it would be at once arrested and punished with a chorus of universal indignation. But from the very beginning of life, this particular vice, being, in fact, the fruitful parent of all other vices, is in a manner specially petted and cared for by the Father of Lies, dressed in coats of many colours, taught all manner of accomplishments, and furnished with every attraction that belongs to virtue, except its reality. Even little children, almost before they have finished teething, find out that if they give away one sugar-plum in perfect self-oblivion, they very often get two in return; and so by degrees they develop into such friends as those of Timon of Athens, of whom honest Flavius had bitter need to say—

"Happier is he that has no friend to feed, Than such as do e'en enemies exceed."

The coarser forms of selfishness, then, may be left out of the question. Murder may be one of the fine arts; and viewed as mere skill, the ingenuity of Charley Bates or the Artful Dodger is not without a grotesque sort of beauty. To pick a pocket adroitly, has many more attractions than the mere watch or purse that may be abstracted. There is the excitement of the chase, the sort of pleasure, not without just a touch of danger, which country squires find in hunting foxes; and this "touch of nature" may make even Charley Bates and the Rev. Charles Kingsley "kin." And above all, there is the fun of utterly deceiving your neighbours; shooting at them from their blind side, and betraying them, so to speak, with a kiss.

But society has not yet persuaded itself that the Ten Commandments can be safely broken in what one may call so honest a manner. Everybody will admit that it is indisputably and brutally selfish to fracture a man's skull, or gouge out his eye, for the sake of half-a-crown; nevertheless, as two negatives are often equivalent to an affirmative, so two breaches of a commandment are often considered equivalent to one keeping of it. As, for instance, if you not only can steal your neighbour's money, but also steal the appearance of not stealing it. "The Morality of Advertisements," even, would, if well written, make a queer chapter in a treatise on practical ethics.

The only forms of selfishness we need be very strictly on our guard against, are what one may call the virtuous kinds, and, perhaps, also the teasing, fidgety kinds. As to the latter, can two human beings be more preposterously exacting than two average lovers? When they get married, their selfishness takes the virtuous form, or, at any rate, combines that with the fidgety, teasing form; but while they are merely lovers, can anything be more heart-breaking than for a young man to look across a table and see that the object of his devotion is looking at somebody else? Is it within the reach of the human faculties that a heart in which you fondly believe you have taken up your own abode, can find room, even in its poorest and quietest corner, for any thought of regard for anybody else? Courtship is sometimes a horrible monopoly, when it is not a detestable sham. A loving girl is only too ready to give away to a lover far more of her affections than she can in the least afford to spare; but to require her to empty her heart of all its old associations, and begin life afresh, as if there were nobody in the universe but the sweet young man who comes a-wooing, is perhaps the stupidest and most cowardly form of fidgety selfishness. "Well, I don't know, my dear, but I think Tom is a little too exacting, isn't he?" "Oh, no, no! it isn't that; it's only that he's so very fond of me." Poor sweet innocent! how uncommonly young you must be; how unfamiliar with real life! Your devoted lover is rather fond of you, and very fond of himself.

Yes, but when they get married they will either get better or worse—of course. The family, and therefore the relation of husband and wife, is one of the Divine schools of unselfishness: but for that very reason, the devil is continually applying for the situation of under-master, and so manages to turn both the discipline and the instruction upside down. To begin with—what constitutes a really good and satisfactory marriage? There are many happy marriages, though the husband may be old and the wife young, and even—though much less frequently—when the wife is old and the husband young; so that disparity of age is no bar to happiness. So, again, such disparities as those of wealth, social status, and even mental culture, are not wholly incompatible with the true blessedness of marriage; though, unquestionably, a very wide experience may warn us that they are extremely hazardous. The true blessedness of marriage—that, in fact, without which both the legal status and the religious sanction are preposterous mockeries—is a perfect community of interest. Husbands and wives, if they are what they ought to be, acquire the habit of never living to themselves, but always for each other. And this is not at all difficult; indeed, with anything like a fair start it is extremely easy. All of us, whether married or not, ought to cultivate a similar unselfishness; and we should find it quite easy to do so, if we were continually reminded by the facts and experiences of life of our complete dependence on one another, and, it may be almost affirmed, our equal dependence on one another. Five times four make twenty, and because five is larger than four, we may fancy that it has a larger share in the product; but, in truth, the fours have as much to do with the twenty as the fives have, and four times five are as many as five times four. And so human happiness is made up of the combined efforts of very many individuals, and the result would be wholly changed by the absence of any one of its components, even though it might be the smallest. Masters and mistresses often fancy that their characters and conduct form by far the most important element in the happiness of a household; but they often find out, to their cost, that even the dirtiest scullery-maid, or the boy that cleans knives and boots for possibly sixpence a week, can completely destroy the peace and enjoyment of every member of the family. If masters and mistresses would never forget this, unselfishness, being dictated by the commonest prudence, would quite easily become habitual, and would at last be recognised, not only as one of the necessities, but one of the beauties and comforts of social intercourse. Now this necessity of unselfishness—of habitually considering somebody else's wishes and interests as well as one's own, and even placing them on the same level as one's own—this necessity is forced upon the recollection of married people every moment of their lives; it is recalled to mind, not only by grave and solemn duties, but even by the most trivial of every-day occupations. Of course, if husband and wife do not care for one another at all, if, in other words, their marriage is an odious farce from first to last, then this mutual and complete dependence will become one of the most irritating and exhausting torments of life. But many marriages are not positively vicious because consciously deceitful, but only negatively vicious because stupid, and empty, and ill considered. These silly marriages, however, get mended by time and the experience of life. When two people discover that mutual forbearance, and even active effort for one another's good, is necessary to the happiness of both and of each, they soon learn to accommodate themselves to the necessity, until at last it ceases to be in any degree burdensome, and becomes a second nature. As a matter of fact, the majority of marriages are at least tolerable, and the majority of husbands and wives would never dream of acting without a perpetual regard to the wishes and interests of each other.

(Drawn by M. ELLEN EDWARDS.)

"Lucy, answer and tell me true,
What of your old love and what of your new?"—p. 442.

But how very easily may fidgety selfishness assume the disguise of the unselfishness which is a necessary element of the happiness of marriage! There are thousands of husbands, and perhaps tens of thousands of wives, who are petty tyrants, and who all the while believe that their very tyranny is a proof of their singular affection. They are so dreadfully fond of one another that "they can't bear it." Can't bear what? Why, the husband "can't bear it" if the wife sees any beauty in the universe except in himself; and the wife "can't bear it" if the husband isn't a milk-sop, or at any rate a grown-up baby tied to her own apron-strings. That each should habitually regard the wishes and interests of the other, is not enough; it is required that each should habitually disregard the wishes and interests of everybody else. Now, when the devil has persuaded us, under the pretence of being completely unselfish towards one person, to be entirely and incurably indifferent to the happiness of everybody else, he has done an uncommonly good stroke of devil's business.

When people get married they have children, and then they have to learn new lessons of unselfishness, which may quite easily be perverted into fresh occasions of selfishness. Of course, parents are bound to take care of their children, to provide for their physical necessities, to give them a good education, and, negatively, to keep them out of harm's way. Nor can it be doubted by far the best method of discharging our duty to the whole human race, is to begin by thoroughly performing our duties to that small part of the human race which dines habitually at our own table. To weep over the agonies of little children—unhappy little tropical girls, for instance, flung out to die almost as soon as they are born—and at the same time to neglect one's own baby, would be the mere caricature of philanthropy. Even general education—that is to say, teaching every human being that is entrusted to our care as much as we can possibly get him to learn—has had scarcely a more dangerous adversary than the jealousy of parental love. "It's hard enough," says some muddle-headed father, with some half-a-dozen lazy, ill-taught sons. "to get situations for our boys as it is; but if the children of the poor are to receive gratis the education of gentlemen, we may just as well buy the boys brooms and send them out to sweep a crossing." Very likely, irritable old gentleman. The day has gone by, thank Heaven, for building up a reputation, not upon one's own goodness, but upon somebody else's want of goodness.

But enough. It is one of the grandest achievements of virtue to be perfectly unselfish. So magnificent is this self-sacrificing love that it has taken the place of piety, and furnished an object of worship, even for those who deny a God. Even M. Comte must have a religion, and the object of his worship, is the whole human race, "ascending into the unknown recesses of the past, embracing the manifold present, and descending into the indefinite and unforeseeable future." The deification of the human race is a sorry substitute for a living God; but while the religion of truth is infinitely superior, it may be well for us to remember that some people make it seem, by their perversion of it, as if there were no real superiority in it at all.

K.

THE WEDDING GOWN.

I SAID to Lucy, one summer night,
As she sat and worked at her wedding-gown;
Stitching away in the sunset light,
Which sprinkled gold on her tresses brown,—
"Lucy, answer and tell me true,
What of your old love and what of your new?"

With just a quiver upon her brow,
And the white work rustled across her knee,
She answered, "The old love remaineth now,
As much as ever it was to me:
A dream—a something I could not hold;
A fading fortune of fairy gold:

"And I did nothing that I can blame ;"
 And then she rustled her work and sighed.
 "One thinks no harm when I name that name," Right proud she said, "One is satisfied.
 First love calls for a smile and sigh;
 Life's love calls us to live and to die !
 "Can you recall when I wore some flowers—
 Flowers he gave me to deck my hair?
 Ere the twilight they dropped in showers,

And nought but the stems remained there.
 Life's love giveth a better crown :
 And I sit and work at my wedding-gown."
 Behind us, the eastern clouds lay dead,
 The west was bright as a golden sea,
 And Lucy gazed at it, as she said—
 "The old love is but a dream to me :
 In twilight hours we hail a star,
 But we know the sunshine is better far."

ISABELLA FVYIE.

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER LIX.

SIR MORACE.

IN the garden David encountered Captain Oglvie. He was sitting in the same wheeled chair in which Gilbert Oglvie had sat so long. He looked weak, and pale, and desponding—a wreck of himself. David Haldane was touched with a great pity, but its expression would probably have been utterly distasteful to the object of it, and he therefore bowed respectfully and passed on. Horace Oglvie was recovering his health by very slow degrees. His constant cry was to get away. He would sit for hours with his head bent upon his breast, speaking not a word to any one. If they endeavoured to rally him, he would turn on them fretfully, long before he was able to be moved, and cry, "You are keeping me here to kill me. I would be better if you would only take me away." He seemed also to be trying constantly, and vainly to remember something. He would sit knitting his brows with the effort to recollect; then he would institute apparently useless searches through his room and all his belongings, which ended invariably in fits of weariness and weak excitement, or in still deeper depression.

One day Margery came upon him while thus employed. His mother had complained to her of it frequently before.

"What are you doing?" she asked. There was an unusual tremor in her voice.

"Looking for some papers which I have mislaid," he replied.

"When did you see them last?"

He shivered.

"Before your illness?" she asked again.

"Yes."

"Let me try and find them for you."

"No, no!" he answered, sweeping the things before him together, with a strange expression of alarm. Then hastily he changed the subject. "Here is a note of my debts," he said, still speaking with weak excitement. "I have not kept quite straight on the score, you know. It is as well to confess it now, when I am too ill to be severely punished for it."

He looked, indeed, as if it would be as well for him to ease his spirit by confession. His smile was wretched: it seemed to throw a ghastly light upon his face.

"Your debts," she repeated; "to David Haldane?"

"How do you know?" he asked.

"When you were ill——"

"True. I talked nonsense." His face grew yet more ghastly. "He is a hard man. He will not let me go, perhaps, till I have paid the uttermost farthing."

"God forbid that we should any of us exact that," said Margery, solemnly; "but I have paid him all."

"Then you know all," he almost gasped. "I must have spoken of other things. Tell me what I did say, and I will not hide the truth from you. I am miserable."

It needed no words to tell that. The woman whom he thought so grim and ungracious, drew near him softly, and caressed the bowed head for a moment, as his mother might have done, only with an infinity of tenderness which was not in his mother's nature.

"Hush!" she said, softly; "tell me nothing: I know the worst, but I will think the best I can. I will think of you tempted more than your weak spirit was able to bear. It is best that this should lie between yourself and your Maker. Make no excuses to Him."

"And the papers?" he whispered.

"I have got them," she answered; and her voice was like that which is used in a sick chamber.

And truly the soul of Horace Oglvie was sick to death; but he had suffered, and was sick of life also, and very sick of sin.

"And you do not hate me?" he asked, after a pause, during which his face had remained hidden in his hands, and she had turned half away.

She stopped, as if to think. She was, in truth, thinking whether, if the suffering which had drawn upon her tenderness were not there, she would not hate him. At length she answered, "No." He was at least capable of suffering. She had known some who were not, whatever they inflicted.

After this, the preparations of Captain and Mrs. Oglvie for leaving Delaube were hastened. Captain was now Sir Horace Oglvie, but it transpired that he wished to drop the title, and it was never heard again in the house. He went away with his mother while he was still half an invalid, and proceeded abroad, plentifully supplied with money from Margery's ample means.

Not long after, his mother died, and he refused all further supplies. He might have been seen wandering about at quiet watering-places, one of those solitaires who have a history written in their faces, and yet whom no one knows. He was only known as Captain Oglivie. The title was in abeyance; the once-coveted inheritance no longer either hoped for or desired.

CHAPTER LX.

PREPARATIONS.

MEANWHILE Peggy was becoming domesticated among her new friends. Miss Minto and Grace remained at "the cottage," but they went daily to "the house," or else Bella and Ben came to them.

The wound was at length healed, and could be pressed without bleeding.

It had already been proposed that Grace should take her old place in her brother's household, and the necessity for preparing for the marriage of her friend made the arrangement the more desirable. The proposal had come from Bella, and as it was yet in the early days of their stay at the cottage, Ben had still to be made acquainted with the event that was pending, and of the use that was about to be made of his bachelor abode.

They were walking in the little wood, a long, narrow slip of plantation, chiefly of young birch-trees, which were already dangling their leaves like golden medallions mingled with the tresses of a maiden's hair.

Grace and her brother were alone together, for Bella had gone off with Peggy in search of any wild flowers remaining in the wood.

"When are you going to take me back, to keep house for you?" said Grace, almost gaily. "Bella is quite tired of it, I think."

"I shall be only too glad to have you back again," he replied. "Do you think you could bear it?"

It was the first time he had alluded to the great trouble of their young lives, and his voice almost faired him as he did so.

But she looked bravely into his eyes, and answered, "I am sure I can, and we will take care of each other. I am strong now—stronger than I ever was before. I used to think there was no fate so hard as mine—as ours: now I know that there are many as hard, if not harder."

"What we should do with our lives, seemed a question very hard to answer a little while ago," he said, musingly.

"I have learnt the best answer to it now and always," she replied. "It is to spend them in the service of others. I was roused out of my selfish trouble by those terrible days of bloodshed, and the cure has been completed by nearness to a thoroughly healthful spirit."

"Miss Oglivie. She does seem very bright and pure," he said, a little sadly.

"It is like breathing mountain air to be with her. She is so unconscious, so free of self, and so simply lofty," said Grace, with enthusiasm. "I want to be settled with you before she goes away, and leaves me to myself again."

"I fear it will be exchanging the mountain air for that of a dismal swamp," was the rejoinder, in a tone of melancholy. "When does she go?"

"Oh, very soon."

"She is engaged, is she not?"

"Of course she is, and we want her to be married up at the house. There, that is our plot."

"Who is he?"

"Her intended? why, the David Haldane we talk so much about. He is a Scotch manufacturer."

"Is he worthy of her?"

"You would have little doubt about it, if you saw him," said Grace.

"But she is of good family."

"That is so like a radical," she laughed.

He took up her lighter tone and went on: "Why did you or Bella not tell me all this sooner, instead of exposing me to the danger of unwittingly breaking the Tenth Commandment?"

"I thought you knew from the first."

"I got confused, I suppose, among your adventures; and, you know, I never was clever at enigmas. You women are so fond of little hints, that I did not think Miss Oglivie's fate was sealed so utterly."

"Would it have made any difference to you?" she inquired, eagerly.

"Never mind, Inquisitor-general. I think I see you and I in the future—mind, I give you my whole life, Gracie, and the future is not an unhappy one. There is Will, and Kate, and Bella to carry on the family name, et-cætera, and we will be the conservators of their interests—fairy godfather and godmother, in short."

Through the light, half-mocking words ran a chord of deep sadness, which touched the sister's heart.

"Dear old Ben," she said, caressingly, "if there would be the least use in it, I would turn a desperate intriguer on the spot. I would ruthlessly manœuvre to deprive David Haldane, much as I admire him, of his promised bride, and try to believe, in self-justification, that she would be ten times happier with you; but there is not the least use; she is hopelessly in love with him."

"Would you mind my going away for a time, Gracie?" he asked, abruptly.

"For how long?" she replied; "it depends upon that."

"Well, perhaps for a year or two."

"Oh, Ben!"

Her arms had fallen listlessly by her side; her whole expression and gait changed at once. But he was quick to notice it, and to see that it was his duty to remain. The next moment he cried out—

"I am a selfish fellow, Gracie! but you may keep me if you like—only get me plenty to do."

"I was just going to give you plenty to do," she said, smiling out again. "In the first place, will you give away the bride?"

"At your service," he said, but he winced a little.

"Then will you let us fill the old house from top to bottom? I want to take this opportunity for a reunion," she explained; "to make it as nearly as possible what it would have been, if Harry and I had been married. Why should it not?" she added, clasping her hands about his arm. "We must be happy in other people's happiness now."

"You shall do just as you like, darling," he answered, tenderly.

"Then we will all come up to-morrow," she replied, "and I will write at once to Kate and Will. Kate wants the cottage, for she has caught a poet, with ever so many children. He will be a fit person to write the epithalamium, by-the-bye, and she has invited him and his family to 'The Retreat,' so you must take us in."

The brother and sister finished their walk without coming upon the other two, who had returned by another path.

As they neared the cottage, they saw the postman turn in at the little gate that led up from the road, and, still in the shadow of the wood, they could see the lattice open and an eager hand stretched out to take the letter.

A little later, they looked in at the end window, which being in the shadow they scarcely darkened, expecting to see Bella and Miss Oglivie together. But they saw the latter only, and drew back instinctively; not, however, till they had seen the pretty picture which the room and its occupant made just then.

A fair girl was leaning over an open letter, her flowing curls brushed the open sheet, and from its folds she had lifted a sprig of white heather, and was pressing it to her lips the while she read.

"No, I won't go in," said Ben, in a whisper, and he turned his back on the picture, and with a squeeze of his sister's hand which almost hurt her, he strode away.

Dinner waited long for Ben up at the big house that afternoon. He had been battling with the breeze for hours upon the downs, and perhaps battling with himself, too, for his sister had henceforth no reason to complain of any slackness on his part in the preparations that were going forward; nay, he ran up to town one day by himself, and bought a brooch of amethyst and pearl for the bride elect.

Margery had her own way of doing things, and she had written to the elder Miss Minto without the least hesitation. Being satisfied with the reply she received, she had placed in that lady's hands a considerable sum of money for Peggy's use, whom she chose to treat as still a child. But, with the help of David Haldane's interpretation of her character, Peggy appreciated the delicacy which really underlay the arbitrariness of the proceeding, and rendered thanks for the kindness with real grace.

And in other matters she had to submit to a little arbitrariness also. Miss Minto insisted on spending the money entrusted to her on bridal adornments of the most perfect kind: on gleaming, pearl-white satin and delicate lace—adornments which suited well the character of the bride's graceful loveliness. And it is not to be denied, that Peggy rejoiced in them like any other fair young bride, glad that the gift she is giving—the gift of herself—should be enhanced even in its outward beauty, and be at the moment of giving at its fairest and best.

The bridegroom came down the day before the wedding, and found that, though he might be indispensable on the morrow, he was the last person wanted just then.

He had to submit to the most unceremonious treatment. Busy, merry Kate took possession of him, and quartered him for the night with the poet down at the cottage, threatening him with all sorts of penalties if he made his appearance before the appointed time, or was seen anywhere about the premises till after he had duly gone through the ceremony of the day.

After being wrought upon in this fashion, it was no wonder that he trembled and "looked as white as a ghost," according to Kate, when confronted with his bride. It seemed to him as if her loveliness had overflowed, and clothed her in that dazzling raiment, and that he stood by her side in a trance of the spirit from which a word might awaken him.

It is on record that he made the responses with great propriety, having learnt them off by heart; but it is believed that he did not hear a word of the service, of which the bridesmaids Bella and Kate had the benefit.

The little church was decorated for the occasion, and among the decorations was a quantity of white heath. But Benjamin Minto never confessed the trouble he had had in procuring it.

"Bless me! I am the only old woman here," said Miss Minto, when they were all assembled at the wedding-feast; "and I had quite forgotten the fact; but one can never be old while one feels with the young."

"Nor miserable," whispered Grace, "while one can rejoice with the happy."

(To be continued.)

THE TWO DOGS.

IZE goes for nothing," said the Terrier, turning up his nose; "so you needn't think yourself any better than I am, just because you're bigger. It's not the room dogs take, but what they do that makes them valuable."

"Quite true, my little friend," answered the Newfoundland Dog, good-naturedly. "Don't excite yourself; it's so bad for the system. Perhaps you'll kindly tell me what you can do, for I really don't know?"

"Do!" replied the Terrier, delighted at the opportunity of wagging his tongue and his tail over his own exploits; "why, the house wouldn't be safe if it were not for me. Scarcely a night passes that I don't arouse every one in it; and no thief dares come within a mile of the place."

"Then why bark?"

"What use should I be if I didn't bark, I should like to know?" and the Terrier glanced superciliously at his companion, quite astounded at the simplicity of the question. "My master would think nothing of me if I didn't call him out of his bed sometimes. If you want to be thought anything of in the world you must bark."

"I shouldn't thank you if I were your master. Why call him at all—why not fly at the thief yourself? I beg your pardon, I really forgot what a little fellow you are. Size does go for something, you see, after all."

"Personal remarks are odious," snapped the Terrier; "your breeding, Mr. Newfoundland, is like your coat, a little rough."

"Ah! I dare say. A sleek coat and a brass collar do make a dog a gentleman, I've no doubt. But which talked about size first?"

The Terrier snarled.

"And," continued the Newfoundland, for although the best-natured dog in the world, he could never help teasing the Terrier, "there is a little disadvantage in being small. You can be taken up and carried anywhere; and then to have your ears cut must be very trying to a dog with any self-respect."

"It's extremely vulgar and low-bred to wear ears; I wouldn't wear ears on any consideration," protested the Terrier, this being one of his sore points.

"You'll be less of a puppy when you grow older," said the Newfoundland, grinning, "and think more of your ears and less of your appearance. Well, I'm quite contented to leave you the elegancies, but I can't give in about the use; you certainly must grant me the superiority there."

"I shall do no such thing," barked the Terrier; "I'll not yield an inch to any dog, not even if he were twice as big as yourself."

"Then suppose we take a walk this fine morning, and hear what others have to say on the point?" said the Newfoundland; "it would be very amusing, and one is sure to learn something."

"With all the pleasure in life," said the other, trotting off concededly by the side of his big companion. "I'm appreciated in these parts, I flatter myself, and it's my impression you will learn something, Mr. Newfoundland."

The first animal they came across was the cat.

"Good morning, Miss Tabby-cat," said the Newfoundland; "this little gentleman and I want to ask you a question. Which of us do you think the most useful?"

Here was a question to be put to a timid cat. Despite her intimacy with both dogs, Miss Tabby, being of a nervous temperament, had never overcome her constitutional aversion to them. If she said the Newfoundland was the most useful, the Terrier would worry her life out; and if she said the Terrier, might not the Newfoundland put an end to her on the spot?

"Really, honoured sirs," she answered, trembling in her skin, "you've puzzled me extremely; you are both so celebrated for your shining qualities that it would be hard to answer your question."

"Don't let's have any flattery," said the Newfoundland, laughing.

"Speak the truth, or I'll pull your tail," snapped the Terrier.

At this awful threat the cat stood speechless.

"Come along. Don't you see the poor thing is frightened, and nobody speaks the truth when they are afraid of you. Here's the Horse, I'll ask him;" and the Newfoundland walked on whilst the Terrier gave the cat a parting snarl as she scampered off.

"I hope we're not disturbing you, Mr. Bay-horse, but my friend here and I are out this morning in search of the truth."

"I'm afraid you'll have to go a long way then."

"Well, anyhow we want your opinion. Which of us do you think of the most use?"

"Use!" and here the horse gave a contemptuous snort. "I'd be thankful to any one who would tell me what possible use that little snarling, yelping Terrier is? I shall kick him to Jericho one of these days if he comes barking at my heels every time I go out with my master, and so I tell him."

When the Newfoundland turned round to look for his companion, he saw him skulking off with his tail between his legs; and it was not until they had left the orchard for the lawn that it reappeared in its proper place.

"I wouldn't stop to listen to that horse," said he, looking askant at the other, "he's as ignorant as a blackbeetle. How can you expect truth from anyone steeped to his ears in prejudice?"

"And prejudice reaching to his heels, too," laughed the Newfoundland. "But, Mr. Terrier, what did you do with your tail? when I looked behind you I couldn't see an inch of it."

"I felt it a little cold, so tucked it up to get warm," answered the Terrier, far too proud to admit of feeling afraid. "Here's my old friend Goody Snail, let's have her opinion. How are you this morning, Mrs. Snail?"

"I am as well as can be expected," said the Snail, in a very thin, slimy voice; "but nobody knows what it is to carry one's house on one's back all day long, except those that have to do it."

"Why not leave it behind you then?" asked the Newfoundland; for, although a very sensible dog, he was profoundly ignorant of natural history, and didn't understand the habits of snails. "I might as well carry about my kennel and then grumble."

"And so you would if you were stuck to it as I am to my house," retorted the Snail, sneering with its horns. "But ignorance and incivility always go together."

"I beg your pardon, I'm sure. I meant no offence, Mrs. Snail. Ask her our question," he whispered, giving the Terrier a nudge with his tail. "I didn't mean to make the old thing angry."

"My friend is a little rough," said the Terrier, patronisingly; "you mustn't mind him, Mrs. Snail. I want you to tell me which of us you think the most useful."

"If you come to me in a month, I shall have digested the question. I can't do things in a hurry."

"So it seems," said the Newfoundland, walking off.

"I wonder you don't show respect to grey horns," said the Terrier, following, reproachfully. "You have hurt her feelings, I'm sure, by that last speech."

"Then why can't she give a plain answer to a plain question?" answered the Newfoundland. As he spoke they turned the corner of a walk, and came full upon the Peacock, pluming his gorgeous feathers in the sun. "Let's ask King Peacock. It's such fun to hear him talk."

"Would your gracious majesty be condescending enough to tell us which you think is the most useful—I, or the Terrier? You've so many eyes in your tail, surely you must see into everything."

"How can two ugly creatures such as you be of any use at all?" screamed the Peacock, for a scream was his royal mode of speaking. "Look at my dazzling beauty—see my purple and gold. There is no other creature of the slightest use in the world but I, for they are not worth looking at. I pity you; I do indeed."

"You needn't," said the Newfoundland; "for really, if your majesty will pardon me for saying so, we don't envy you. My friend and I are quite contented with our personal appearance, I can assure you. It wouldn't do to have a world full of peacocks, for all their fine feathers. Your eyes see nothing but yourself, I find; and we prefer to see beyond our own noses."

The next friend they met was the Butterfly. She answered their question with a laugh.

"What's the use of being any use? Why not enjoy oneself and be merry? Life is too short to be useful in;" and away she danced from flower to flower.

"Gentlemen," said the Bee, coming from the bell of a white lily, "what the Butterfly has just said is shocking morality. Pray don't mind her, the frivolous creature! I really didn't mean to listen, but being inside the lily I couldn't help hearing your question."

"Then, perhaps, as you have heard it, Mrs. Bee, you will be so kind as to answer it for us," replied the Newfoundland.

"I am not Mrs. Bee," replied she, with great dignity; "I am the little Busy Bee that improves each shining hour. I gather honey all the day——"

"From every opening flower," interrupted the Terrier, for although unacquainted with Dr. Watts, he considered himself very poetical, and liked to show his talents.

"No, I was not going to say that, Mr. Terrier; but it's quite correct, notwithstanding. I gather honey for the benefit of the human race; that's my proud position. I set an example to them also, and am known as the symbol of industry. Now, if you can tell me what each of you do, I can answer your question in the twinkling of my wing."

"I do a great deal," began the Terrier, pompously. "I guard the house at night; I bark at all the beggars; I am accomplished in a number of tricks; really, if it were not for me my master would have nothing to entertain his company with. I catch rats—in fact, I am invaluable."

"And what do you do, Mr. Newfoundland?" asked the Bee.

"Well, really, I have been puzzling my brains whilst my friend was talking to know what I do do. Not much, I'm afraid. I go out for a walk when I'm wanted; carry my master's stick, or the children's baskets and toys; go into the water when I'm sent—in fact, I do what I'm told."

"And that seems very little. I really think Mr. Terrier is the most useful, although he is so small."

Here the Terrier gave a bark of applause.

"I have saved my master's life once when he got out of his depth in the river, and I flew at a man's throat and saved my mistress from being robbed, if that's worth mentioning," added the Newfoundland, modestly.

The Bee clapped her wings in ecstasy.

"Why, you are a perfect hero! Yes, Mr. Terrier, that's what I call being useful to the human race. You must give up to the Newfoundland; for beyond doubt he is the most useful. You couldn't save anyone's life. But I must bid you good morning, and go to my honey-making."

The Terrier hung his head abashed. He had never before heard of the Newfoundland's deeds, and they struck him as being very grand, quite beyond the capacities of a little dog like himself. Perhaps, after all, size was something.

The two dogs sat for some time in silence after the Bee's departure: the Terrier too crestfallen, the Newfoundland too meditative, to speak.

"After all," said the latter, at last, "what the Bee said is partly true, but it can't be the whole truth. Jumping into the water is as easy to me as standing on your hind legs is to you; there can be no merit in one more than the other. I'll tell you what we'll do, we'll go and ask the Owl; she is the wisest bird in creation, and I'll be bound can tell us."

The Terrier was quite agreeable to this, by no means liking the Bee's decision; so when twilight fell they started off to the barn, where the Owl came every day in the dusk to catch mice. She was perched on its gable-end lost in contemplation, when the Newfoundland barked, "How d'ye do?" to her.

"Bless me, Mr. Newfoundland! how you startle a body!" cried she. "How are you this fine evening?"

"Pretty well, thank you. My friend the Terrier and I have come for the benefit of a little of your wisdom. Which of us do you think is the most useful?"

"Do you really want to know?" asked the Owl, looking down at them with a wink; "because so many come to me to hear the truth, and are furious when I tell it to them. The hedge-sparrow flew to me in a violent passion the other day, because the cuckoo had laid an egg in her nest, and when I told her she must grin and bear it, for such was the way of cuckoos, and no one could prevent them, she was ready to peck my eyes out. This is hard, you see, gentlemen, on an Owl that gives wisdom gratis."

"We'll be very grateful, if you'll only tell us the truth," barked both the dogs.

"Well, you shall have it. Each of you have separate duties appointed you: he that does his duty best is the most useful of the two;" and the Owl flew away with a grand air of philosophy before the dogs could thank her for her wisdom.

"She's quite right," said the Newfoundland; "and now, Mr. Terrier, I hope you're satisfied."

"Perfectly," said the latter.

It was noticeable that ever after the Terrier was less officious, barked less, and gave the horse's heels a wide berth. The Newfoundland went on much the same as usual, for never having overdone his duty, he couldn't improve in that way, and always having done it, he couldn't do any more.

SCRIPTURE ACROSTIC.

INITIALS.

True absolution from all sin was given
To one who sought it from the Lord of heaven;
To his all-searching ken her actions proved
How much she mourned her sin—how much she loved.

FINALS.

What though a sinner's soul was steeped in sin,
Her Lord saw faith and penitence within;
And, granting pardon from his bounteous store,
Bade her renounce the life she led before.

1. Of height stupendous—once in Persia reared,
Used for a man for whom 'twas not prepared.
2. He who when King of Israel sinned more Than all the wicked ones who reigned before.
3. The friendly shelter, where with loving care
A suffering man was placed—well tended there.
4. The town, whence issued forth the "mournful bier"
Which carried all the widow held most dear.
5. The king who fought upon Megiddo's plain,
Where one whom Israel loved and mourned was slain.
6. A name so sacred, all the soul o'erawes:
Before repeating it, oh! think and pause.
7. A holy youth, who, scorning dainty meat,
Drink of pure water asked, and pulse to eat.
8. He who, when aching hearts in sorrow pine,
Pours in His soothing balm, His peace Divine.
9. She who, when tempted, was her husband's snare,
And brought a curse upon the guilty pair.

A lesson wise these verses will impart;
That, if for pardon to our Lord we go
In humble faith, and penitence of heart,
Our sins, "though scarlet, will be white" as snow.

"THE QUIVER" ORPHAN-HOME FUND.

(NINETEENTH LIST.)

£ s. d.		£ s. d.		£ s. d.		£ s. d.
Brought forward from List		Miss E. A. Green, 4, Moss		C. L. D., Rangoon, British		Annie Radmall, Upton
Eighteen	843 4 3	Bauk, Cheetham Hill,		Burma	3 4 2	P. C. Jackson, Lieut. Ist.	0 10 0
J. J. T., Thame	0 5 0	Manchester	0 5 0	North of Ireland	0 2 6	West India Regiment,
John Barnwell, H. Bay	0 2 8	Laura, Chester ham	0 4 3	W. H.	0 2 6	Bahurst, Gambia, West
Tom Hicks, Photographer,		Miss Jackson, Rheddyllswyn,		I. James Walker, Edinburgh	0 3 6	Coast Africa	2 7 6
Burnley and Chester	0 2 6	Ruthia, N. Wales	0 8 0	Elizabeth A. Roberts, Grove		Miss Ingram, Wrexham	0 5 0
C. Beaver, The Mount,		Alice Beasley, Northampton	0 0 5	Street, Retford	0 3 3	D. Smoller, Aberdare	0 1 6
Sydenham Hill, Syden-		Eliza Hill, Sutton	0 2 6	Ada's Gift and Blessing	0 1 0	A Friend, Kilworth, Leicester	6 2 6
ham	0 4 0	F. L., Southwark, S.E.	0 2 0	Fred Bolt, Bristol (Second		Miss H. Ward, Dulwich	1 4 0
Sarah Ellen Ryding & Co.		A. Thank Offering from		Contribution)	0 3 0	C. H. Smith, Newcastle
E. C. and A. E. Webster,		Willie Moncrieff, for		A. B., Brighton	0 3 6	(Second Contribution)	0 2 6
88, per John Webster,		both Parents	0 1 0	Mrs. Melhuish, Cleethorpes		Ellen Brew, Tulla, county
Charnock Richard, Lan-		George C. annell, Foxgrove,		Road, Grimsby	0 3 0	Clare	0 9 1
cashire	0 10 0	Beckenham, Kent	0 5 6	E. A. —s.	0 5 0	Marie	0 2 6
A. Thank Offering from		Jane Kitchen	0 1 0	R. S., Hull	0 2 6
Willie	0 10 0	Mrs. G., Glasgow	0 6 0	E. A. L., Taunton	0 7 3

£362 0 4

THE BIVVER

Saturday, April 4. 1863.

(Drawn by G. J. PINWELL.)

"And this woman carried a baby under her cloak."—p. 450.

THE VILLAGE IN A PANIC.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MARY POWELL."

DO you know what a fright the village is in?" said Miss Hester Apreece, a gentle old lady, who, with her elder sister, lived in the smallest of genteel lodgings, on the smallest of genteel incomes. These two were samples of a very large class—spinsters, that were honours to womanhood, not libels on it. Theirs were not the envenomed tongues that carry evil reports, whether true or false, from house to house. They would rather cover a scandal and hush it up. True, they were fond of gossip—or, rather, small talk—but it was flavoured with the milk of human kindness. In earlier days they had entered moderately into society—and good country society, too; but they were not literary, or witty, or brilliant. It is to be supposed they had the usual hopes and wishes that arise in the youthful heart; but if these hopes and wishes faded away, and they found themselves left unregarded and stranded on Lethe's wharf, while others, gayer and more prosperous, sailed merrily by with a favouring wind, it did not convert their sweetness into acerbity, nor make them find a poor pleasure in speaking evil of their neighbours. Hence, if you went to them with the intention of an hour's chat, you might be pretty sure it would turn chiefly on the small affairs of the living and occasional anecdotes of the dead; but that you would never have need to say afterwards—

"At every word a reputation died."

Therefore, when Miss Hester Aprcece said to her friends, the Monktons, "Have you heard what a fright the village is in?" the mother and daughters looked up from their knitting, netting, and crochet, or whatever female handiwork they might be about, with pleasant and harmless interest.

It was a homely matter, after all, nothing to write a sensation story about, but yet one that stirred every mother of young children in the place; and it is quite worth my while to write about, and yours to read, because an easy solution was found of a difficulty that was theirs, and may, some time or other, be yours.

There was a passage-boat that made daily trips between the mainland and the pleasant little fishing-village of Sandynook, which is the scene of my story. Sandynook is in a neighbouring island. I have not seen it this many a year. It was a small place then, it is probably a small place now, out of the common route of tourists, and too tame in its prettiness ever to become much worth hunting up. There were very few gentry; but among these few were some offshoots of nobility. It was very quiet, it was very cheap, which were attractions to this little coterie; it was also very healthy, so that there was no resident medical man, nor need of one. The nearest practitioner lived at a large watering-place thirteen miles off—thirteen, that is, by land, six by sea; but, of course, a doctor's gig went by the former, though the captain's gig went by the latter. Once a week, then, Mr. Jones went his rounds, and came to Sandynook in the course of them; put up his horse and gig, unlocked the door of a little triangular parlour—which he used for his consulting-room and dispensary—received patients, inquired into cases—if there were any—gave a draught to one, a box of pills to another, and always bade the recipient return the pill-box.

This may seem foreign to my story, but it is not so. It was autumn. Barford's boat had crossed and come back again as usual, laden with its usual kind of cargo: a quart of vinegar for one, two pounds of fresh butter for another, a piano, a smoke-jack, and a few passengers. We will not inquire whether any of the women returned, lightened of the bladders of smuggled brandy they sometimes carried over under their petticoats. Among the passengers this time came a poor woman of the lowest class—perhaps not wrongly described as a tramp, and this woman carried a baby under her cloak. This mother and baby took up their abode in the only place there was for them, the common lodging-house, where there were several poor lodgers already; and then, too late, it was discovered that the baby was covered with small-pox.

So this it was which put the village in a panic, and well it might. It need not have done so, mark you, had the children been duly vaccinated; but that was far from being the case. We know how difficult it is to get poor people to attend to this important precaution, even when they have every facility, which at Sandynook they had not. It was not always convenient to mothers living in outlying farmhouses and cottages to come to Mr. Jones's lodging on the day and hour appointed. Perhaps if they did, they found he had not the needful; anyhow, they generally threw the blame on him, and then felt their consciences relieved of the obligation—just as if that saved their children from danger.

"Ah, my friends!" as their good clergyman used to say sometimes in the pulpit, when he was driving a plain truth home to them; "may we not spiritualise this a little?" I am sure we may, if we have a mind. Were the Sandynook mothers the only people that neglected to do what they should for their children, laid the blame on somebody else, and then discharged their consciences? Do parents never do this with regard to things that appertain to the soul, as well as the body?—Ah, my friends!

Now, too late, the villagers were frightened out of their senses to find a baby with the eruption full on it located in their midst, and went about piteously saying, "Oh! what shall we do?"

"Many may even have taken the infection already," said Miss Hester, looking anxiously at Mrs. Monkton, whom she was accustomed, even on short acquaintance, to consider a sort of household oracle; "but at any rate, those not yet infected should be kept out of harm's way; only, what should be done?"

"That which ought to have been done before," said Mrs. Monkton; "they should all be vaccinated without delay."

"That's what I think; only who's to do it?"

"The parish authorities ought to enforce it."

"Ah, but they never do what they ought," said Miss Hester, ruefully; "Mr. Sloman won't stir."

"Has he been spoken to about it?"

"Well, I believe so."

"We should never take things for granted. Perhaps if we inquire of him, we shall find he has not been applied to."

"If you think I should not seem meddling, I will ask him," said Miss Hester, hesitating; "only people are so apt to censure interference."

"But I think there is reason for it, in order to be helpful."

"Well, then, since you think so, I will."

And away sped the kind-hearted old lady, who returned after some time, very tired and disappointed.

"Mr. Sloman is away, and Mr. Brown won't do anything, nor will Mr. Green."

"Surely, then, Mr. Allworth will. He has children of his own, and, as a clergyman and father, will surely care for the infants of his parishioners. I will go and ask him."

"Oh, do," cried Miss Hester; "he'll be sure to attend to you."

Mr. Allworth was as good a clergyman, I think, as ever lived—as amiable, I mean, and kind-hearted, but not always equal to an emergency. His sweet little wife was dead; he had a large young family; and really the wonder was the poor man got on as well as he did; and when there was any shortcoming, all were willing to make allowances. He preached much on faith, and practised what he preached; but now and then he did not see his way quite clearly. And his voice was so balmy and tender, and his blue eyes so full of gentleness, that, as he stood folding one hand over another, saying, "I really don't exactly see what we can do," one had not the heart to be angry with him.

Yet Mrs. Monkton was very near being angry when he did so now, and spoke up rather briskly; but she might as well have tried to spin a bit of maslin like a teetotum. It was labour in vain. He smiled gently, sighed, and folded his hands—"I think we must have faith."

"But faith without works is dead," said she, hastily.

"Yes—yes, indeed; but how would you improve that?"

"I think Mr. Jones should be sent for to vaccinate the children immediately."

"Yes—yes, indeed."

"Then will you write to him?"

"Oh, I must not stir. There'd be no end of ill-will."

"Then who should?"

"Mr. Sloman, without a doubt."

"Mr. Sloman is away."

"Ha, so I think I have heard. Then Mr. Brown."

"Mr. Brown declines to take any step."

"Hum—then Mr. Green."

"Mr. Green will have nothing to do with it."

"I am not surprised. Well, then, you see nothing can be done."

"Not by writing to Mr. Jones?"

"Suppose you write; that will be the best way."

"I have not the least objection, if you authorise me, though I am a mere summer visitor. But it does seem strange, not one of the residents will take it up."

"It does—very strange. But, oh, I could have told you beforehand that Mr. Brown wouldn't, nor yet Mr. Green."

"You authorise me, then?"

"Oh, yes, I'll authorise you, as far as my authority goes; and I believe you'll find it quite sufficient. These people," with a quiet little laugh, "will never do anything for themselves that they can get another to do for them. It's their maxim. Good-bye, good-bye," shaking her hand with immense cordiality and a look of great relief. "I wish you every success."

She felt provoked at his putting it off on her, but the feeling changed to pity as she met a group of his little children just outside the vicarage gate.

"Poor little motherless souls!" thought she; "their complexions are like lilies and roses, and their skins so soft as to remind one of the Scriptural expression—'and his flesh came again unto him like the flesh of a little child.' I'll answer for it he has had all his own children vaccinated. He would not like their faces to look like a split muffin."

Home she went, and wrote a business-like little note to Mr. Jones, telling him of the emergency, and begging him to come over without delay.

Of course, time was lost before this note reached him. It brought back another. He was watching his immediate patients, and could not come before his regular day.

Back wrote Mrs. Monkton—each letter causing a delay of twenty-four hours—to beg, if he could not come himself, he would send his assistant.

Back came another answer, and the murder came out. It was no good for the assistant to come, because he had no lymph. He believed there was none in the island.

"Just as if he could not have written to the Vaccine Institution for some!" exclaimed Mrs. Monkton. "However, if he will not, I will."

So she wrote up to George Street, Fitzroy

Square, and, by return of post, received three quills with the desired matter. Then she wrote a brief line to Mr. Jones:—

DEAR SIR,—I have received the lymph from the Vaccine Institution. If you will kindly send over your assistant, the children shall be ready for him at my house any time you will appoint—the earlier the better.

Miss Hester was in ecstasies. Mr. Allworth rubbed his hands instead of folding them. "I knew you would manage it!" they echoed with glee.

Yes, so she did; but why could not they? Mr. Jones, shamed out of his indifference, said his assistant should come the day but one following, at noon. Notice was given at the post-office, and various parts of the village, that all who wished might bring their children, or be vaccinated themselves. The village was delighted.

And how many came, think you? Sixty! Not one less. Young men and maidens, big boys, little children, and babies; they filled the kitchen, hall, and passages, waiting for their turn, and a fine squalling there was of scared babies, whom the sisters pacified with lumps of sugar. It was an amusing, pleasurable scene—the mothers so glad and thankful. The young surgeon could not help laughing at the affair; he was greatly tickled at it. When he had finished, and they had all cleared off, the luncheon tray was brought in for him. He chatted over his mutton-chop and glass of wine, and then rode off on his pony.

Thus ended the village panic.

TELL ME, YE GOLDEN STARS.

TELL me, ye golden stars over my head,
 Tell me, ye restless waves hiding the dead,
 Tell me, ye moaning winds through the lone night,
 If the lost palpable are to your sight.
 If ye, O beating stars, like pulses fine,
 Hide in your eyes a love known here as mine;
 If in thy bosom deep, O sounding sea,
 Murmurs a plaintive voice ever of me;
 If on thy breath borne, O wingèd wind,
 Cometh a sigh for him fainting behind.

Eager for answer upward I gaze,
 Over me God's worlds silently blaze;
 On the wild ocean's face turn I mine eyes,
 But the wild ocean-wave nothing replies;
 To the rude winds I turn, waiting to hear,
 Only my throbbing blood startles my ear.
 Silent the wind and stars, silent the sea,
 Yet though no answer be vouchsafed to me,
 All this dumb mystery yet shall depart,
 Death shall make clear to me, love, where thou art.

MATTHIAS BARR.

A WORD UPON BEING OUTSIDE.

BY THE REV. W. M. STATHAM.

I WAS visiting the other day a young lady, the invalid sister of a North-country clergyman, who is dwelling alone in London, and who has been laid upon a couch of weakness for more than a year. It was Christmas-time, and fires were gleaming in opposite drawing-rooms, and children were being trotted along in cabs to their pleasant little gatherings, and she said to me, with an eye on that outside world of Christmas festivity, "Did you ever write or think upon being outside?" Ah, I understood all the meaning of the word at once. Shut out from the interests and joys of others, looking at the great world without, as having no ability to join in its friendly circles! Now there was nothing morbid in this utterance; no attempt to despise the world, or to underrate it, or to make believe that it was more religious to have nothing to do with it; but there was the quietly pensive feeling: "I have no part in all this; it is God's will that I should be shut out of all this: and I can bear it because it is his will; but there comes across my mind the feeling that I am outside."

Well, it is a most suggestive subject: I do not know one more so; and the first consideration that meets one is, that to be outside without God would be almost unbearable. To feel that we were severed from others by sickness and solitude, and at the same time severed from Him, would be heart-heaviness indeed. The world outside and God inside, is not so very hard to bear, especially as he seems nearer to us then; and as our meditative thought soars upward, there seems little to tempt the eagle-winged soul to alight or rest on any other object. We get very near to the Redeemer then; the air is still, and the voice of Christ is very clear; the sensibilities of the soul are keen, and the love of Christ is very tenderly felt! Yes, we are alone, yet not alone. Our thoughts, angel-like, go up and down the golden ladder of prayer, and we enter within the veil. Being outside the world, we are yet in no sorry case; for being Christians, solitude shows us truths as night shows us stars.

Let it not be thought though, for a moment, that the world loses its interests for us; from our best and holiest frames of mind we come down again to common interests, and cares, and joys. Being Christians, there is a human as well as a Divine side to our lives; and to treat the world as though we did not care for it, is no sure evidence that we are better than others. It is God's good world that is outside, and we cannot despise that, without despising something that he has made and pronounced very good. It is surely a healthy frame of mind, in every way, which, gazing outside and seeing the drawn curtains, and the forms of little children dipping into the snapdragon dish, feels a longing of the spirit and a wishing to be there. Look, too, next door. See old and young enjoying the merry games, shouting with delight when grandpapa gets wrong, or auntie gets out of breath, and surely it awakens a momentary longing to form part of that gathering of friends. Gathering, indeed! Why, the girls have been looking forward to it for the last fortnight, and are as graceful as they are good! Surely that is not worldliness, so called, but something different enough from that. Worldliness is baseness, graspingness, covetousness, bad tempers, stinging speeches, tricky dealings, hard, grabbing money-getting, sour-facedness, sulkings, snappishness, slander-talking, and taking people in. Oh! but the pride of dress. Well, perhaps people who talk about the pride of dress often have as much of it themselves as anybody. Oh! but the waste of time. Is recreation a waste of time? If so, keep grinding at the mill-wheel of duty day by day, night by night, year by year. Recreation, mirth, joy, these are parts of our mysterious nature; sorrow and suffering do not cast them out. For all things there is a season. Most beautiful and most Christian is that life which can use the world as not abusing it; which can feel the smile of God resting upon it in its pleasures as well as its duties, and which can lift up the heart to God amid the cheerfulness of the social gatherings, as well as in the solitude of the sick room. It is comparatively easy to gain a name for piety. If that be our aim, we have easy work. To abjure many pursuits and pleasures, to be constantly condemning others for their opinions or practices, may with many commend us as pious people, notwithstanding that we work intensely hard at mere money-getting, or are known to possess uncommonly awkward tempers; but it is not so easy to be a sincere disciple of Christ, to feel the constraint of his cross, and to be patient, kind, gentle, forbearing, tender, true, and good.

All these reflections come from the question. Shall we say to the weak one, You ought not to wish to be outside at these cheerful, happy gatherings; you ought to surrender it all without one thought about it? Well, we cannot say that; so let us talk a little about this outside world—about our neighbours A, and B, and C, about their joys and satisfaction; then let us turn to thoughts about that Gospel which makes us restful and happy, even when the great world is not for us; and then let us commend each other in prayer to the great Shepherd and Bishop of our souls.

Outside! Well, we have now to consider the relation of this subject to multitudes of other people. We pass the hospital. Ah! what scenes are being transacted there—what mysteries at this moment, the last tragedy, perhaps, being acted out! It is visiting-day, and friends are going in—some with little gifts of fruit, and some with tidings of home and friends. Speed on, dear visitors, we are happier now; we can think of those poor sufferers as feeling that the great outside world is not far off them, and is tenderly thinking of them, and providing for them. God save the Queen! Did she not send lots of toys to the little suffering children in the hospital lately; and did we not read of the pleasant and touching spectacle of their eager interest and delight?

Let us walk on. We are passing a prison now. How many hearts there are thinking of the outside world! Some young, and as yet unhardened ones, are there. When the grim warder shuts the gates, how those sullen stone walls seem to frown upon, and make them feel awfully shut out from men! I went once to visit a lad in Newgate gaol, and I shall not easily forget the feeling of having the locks turned in the gates as you went on. Outside—oh! there is freedom—friendship there—but in the cell! I like the prayer on Sunday morning, "That it may please Thee to show thy pity upon all prisoners and captives." Of course, people who have a notion that prayer should be chiefly connected with personal spiritual experiences, will not think much of it; but once visit a prison, and then see, if possessing a sensitive and religious heart, whether you will not think of the multitudes who are bearing the just burden of their crimes, but who have human hearts, and who have friends and brothers in the outside world. Of course it is easy to specify the circumstances in which, sometimes through sin, sometimes through sickness, sometimes through circumstances of a peculiar kind, men and women are shut out from the association of their brethren! How terrible must their state of feeling be when they have shut themselves out by personal sin, rather than have been shut out by the inscrutable providence of God.

There is yet another aspect of the subject which claims attention. There are special circles in society. It is the will of God that there should be grades and classes amongst men; difference of culture, difference of position, with various other difference, keep these circles in existence. If we commenced life with a perfect level to-morrow, then, most assuredly, before the week was out there would be a framework of society recommenced like unto that we have now. There are some people who indulge in a kind of sentimental whine because they are not amongst the circle of A, or the circle of B; envy passes into depreciation, and they manifest by their very temper that they feel being outside very much indeed. Well, it is a noble endeavour that is awakened when any one tries, by skill, energy, adaptation, and perseverance, to rise and gain a footing in the sphere he likes. I say that is a right noble instinct which prompts him to this, and is implanted by God. English society is so constituted that there is no circle into which energy, genius, wisdom, and perseverance, may not ultimately enter. We could cite cases of judges, bishops, authors, and commanders, who have, by their conduct and career, with the gracious help of God, conquered difficulties, and got inside the coveted circle. Success, for the most part, means struggle. The idle and sentimental live often in a world of discontent, and must remain where they dislike to be, very often outside.

There are two special religious applications of this you will expect me to make. The one is to the prodigal's home. I suppose no parable is so touching as the story of the prodigal boy. We feel at once that it brings the great truth vividly before us, that even in his harlot-loves and husk-eatings he is the father's boy still. Oh, that home! What thought is it which swells his breast near to bursting? What picture is it which makes his wandering life so terrible a misery? It is the father's house in the grey distance which he has left so far behind; it is the fare of plenty and the love that still yearns over him in the father's house. "I will arise, and go to my father." Outside, how bleak and cold it is! how scant love and pity are there! but inside, there is the dear old home, with all its household peace and joy, and a place for him. Perhaps there is no one parable which has had so much to do with the restoration of God's wandering children, as the story of the prodigal child.

The other application of the subject relates to the world to come. Whatever our conception may be of the future sorrows of the ungodly, this fact, at all events, comes before us, in the parable of Dives and Lazarus, with striking suggestiveness. The lost are outside. "Seeth Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom." Of all outsides, that must surely be the saddest which shuts the soul out from the joys of paradise and the fellowship of the Lamb. Happy, indeed, they who enter within the gates into the city!

There are certain minor suggestions concerning these words we should all do well to take to heart. Let us not keep outside our home-cares and sympathies those who are about us; let the servants who minister to our wants have a place in our affections and prayers, and let us never keep without the door of our hearts those who have manifest claims on our sympathy, benevolence, and charity.

There is one remembrance with which I would close. The subject it suggests is so full of infinite condescension that we dare scarcely touch it with human hands, lest we mar the beauty and glory of the fact itself. One of our best pre-Raphaelite painters has depicted the Saviour himself waiting at the door of our hearts. "Behold, I stand at the door, and knock." Who of us, dear reader, can venture to enlarge on the Majesty which stoops so low in mercy as that? What must be the icy coldness and the dread worldliness of that heart which suffers Him, whose face was marred, whose hands were pierced, whose head was bowed, and whose heart was broken for us, to stand outside!

PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROUND THE COURT," ETC.

CHAPTER LXI.

HOME.

NA, I'll stick to the sweeties noo. I'm no' so strong as I hae been. I'll be glad to see her bonnie face again; but I'll stick to the sweeties noo."

Such had been honest Jean's answer to David Haldane, when he pressed her to give up her shop and enter upon the position of housekeeper at Delaube, with two stout serving-maids to do her bidding, and to be held in check in their flirtations with a gardener and groom.

"I'm no' so strong as I hae been. I'm no' fit for hard wark, and I couldna see the hizzies that lasses are noo-a-days in my gate" (way), she had added; "but I'll gang up and see that a' things are richt to begin wi', an' be there to welcome her hame." And with this answer David had been obliged to content himself, for the independent old woman was not to be moved.

He had arranged everything for the reception of his bride, and he had made up, and drawn Margery into, a little plot, a joyful surprise for her return. She was not to know beforehand where her new home was to be; not, if it could be helped, till she had entered within its very doors. And Jean was to be counted on as far as the reception was concerned.

On the departure of Captain Oglivie with his mother, Margery had left the house, and had taken up her abode, for the time, with Mr. Keith and his wife. Workmen had been set to work, not to change, but to rehabilitate the mansion. No one of the three who consulted concerning it approved of modernising it. So it was left with its narrow windows and wainscoted walls, and only the offices were added to and improved, and a new carriage drive made round the easy slope of the hill. Old conversations on personal tastes had enabled David Haldane to make the interior arrangements accord with those of its future mistress. A severe simplicity, adorned with delicate, but never obtrusive, ornament prevailed. Thus, all was in readiness for their return.

It was evening, toward the middle of October, and already dark, when David Haldane and his newly-wedded wife neared home. They were alone inside the coach, and they still considered travelling alone a luxury; so that neither of them had much attention to bestow on outward objects, even if there had been light enough to see them by. One brief week in the bright October weather they had spent among the English lakes, and the time had seemed far too short. Still nothing could compare with this delight of home-coming.

A carriage was waiting for them, where the coach pulled up, and they hurried into it, and were driven on in silence.

"We must be near it now," she whispered, peering out for a moment, but only into indistinctness.

"Near where?" he asked, quite gravely.

"The factory. We are to live there, are we not?"

He parried the question. "You did not like it much when you were there last," he said.

"Oh, but it is different now."

"There is more heat, and noise, and smoke, and din than ever."

"We shall find some quiet corner for ourselves, I dare say," she whispered. "And yet," she added, earnestly, "it seems selfish to think of ourselves only; but I am to help you in your plans for the work-people, especially the girls, and, living among them almost, I shall have a better chance of winning them to more womanly ways."

"Here we are," was the answer.

The carriage could not, even under improved arrangements, draw up to the door. There was still a garden terrace with its stone steps, and above shone the dear old house, lights in every window. In the hall, where the door stood open to receive them, stood Jean at the head of the servants, who were already thanking their stars that her administration was to be so brief.

Old David was there, and Margery, and were not congenial; but they retired early. It was a happy evening, and the morrow was the dawn of a new day at Delaube.

Years have passed away. The population has marvellously increased in Burnside and Strathie. Nowhere in Scotland are the bairns better scholars, or the men and women better workers. Nowhere—thanks to wise, womanly influence—are more modest and maidenly lasses to be found, though they are independent and saucy enough, too; and nowhere do the people, young and old, go more persistently to the kirks, or find the doing so less irksome, though some thoughtless folk might make it appear to the contrary. The Rev. Dr. Grant is dead, taking dying as easily as he had taken living; and his son Archie fills the pulpit in his stead. He and Mr. Keith are great friends, and the younger man, as is meet, looks up to the older and greater. But the Rev. Archibald Grant is quite a star of the North, and if the Queen had patronised Scotland in these early days, he might have preached to Her Gracious Majesty. His sweet wife, Rose, is a great companion of Mrs. Haldane's, and they work together many a good work of social love and duty. Mrs. Grant loves and respects her daughter-in-law, though she sometimes objects to her proceedings; she has retired, with Sandie, to a newly-built and very pretty little schoolhouse, and Sandie is well content to remain with his mother, and to teach the rudiments. That he will never get beyond the rudiments in learning the ways of God he is now well assured, and with that, too, is content—no, not content, that would never describe any mental mood of his. His attitude is rather that of patience, at rare intervals brightening into hope.

As for Margery, concerning whom I am not quite sure that she is not the heroine of this story, she resisted all attempts to domesticate her. She would live alone at Oglivie Castle, the home of her childhood and her youth, though she filled a mere corner of the great gusty house; but she paid constant visits to Delaube, which were returned with interest; for David Haldane and his wife brought with them, year by year, an increasing number of visitors, to ramble, not unprotected, on the cliffs, and rumble everywhere through the old rooms, waking the sleeping echoes.

A rapidly-aging woman was Margery, with masses of strangely-coloured hair, silver-grey predominating over fiery red; a woman disinclined to the comforts of life, as far as she herself was concerned, who could not be persuaded to sit in an easy chair, or to don a graceful cap, or to relax herself in any way, either in mind or in body;—a harsh woman, but one whose higher qualities touched the sublime; and these loftier parts of her character stood out, to those who knew her then, like the lines of the mountains against the evening sky.

And the close of her life was neither loveless nor lonely. David Haldane and his wife had learnt to love and reverence her, and they taught their children to do the same. She would have had David give up the factory, and tack the name of Oglivie to his own. It was her solitary weakness—her clinging to the doomed race; a weakness closely allied with her strength: but he would not.

"I will neither quit my post nor change my name," he would say. "My work lies down at the mill; and it's higher work, to my thinking, than driving deer in the forest, or even leading soldiers to the fight, in most causes. The people at the mill are my people, as much as the followers of the feudal lord were his; and I am bound, just as he was, to stand by them, and not deliver them over to the oppressor. When the leaders of industry do this, they will be as great and as venerable as the lords of the land, whose greatness, in this respect, has passed away, though its shadow is over their descendants. As for a man's name, it matters very little what it is; but to change it, somehow, seems to argue a change within. Besides," he would add, with a smile, "I think a Haldane is as good as an Oglivie, any day, you know."

The end drew near to Margery, and no one knew it: no one knew that she felt great spasms of pain—premonitions of dissolution. It was a windy autumn day, tossing the clouds, the waves, the corn-sheaves—earth, and sky, and sea all motion, and change, and unrest. In a room of the castle—a room with a large bay window, looking out on the cliff and the sea—gathered a pretty family group. A fair young wife stood at the window, to watch her husband dismounting from his horse—a wife wise, and sweet, and gracious, beyond as well as in her home—"a perfect woman nobly planned," and free in all her movements to fulfil that plan. Around her played "the children"—David and baby Margaret; and at a little distance sat Margery, watching the group from her straight-backed chair, and knitting as for very life.

"That boy grows liker to his father every day," she said, in her old, abrupt voice.

His mother turned and glanced at him, her eyes yet smiling, from giving back his father's smile.

"He is wonderfully like him," she answered, laying a white hand on the head of David the third.

"But I am like Aunt Margery," said a small, clear voice; and a small, clear face, with a halo of bright red hair, hid itself in the knitter's lap, with an impulsiveness which sent the ball of worsted rolling over the floor. The boy ran and picked it up, to restore it to its owner, to whom he presented it, with a grace which told of a noble and gentle heart.

But she did not take it. One withered hand lay on little Margery's golden head; the other had dropped the knitting.

"Mother!" cried the boy, in a tone quite new to her ear, in its pity and terror. It was his first vision of the tragedy of life.

David Haldane entered the room, to find his wife clasping the lifeless woman, in whose lap the child's head still lay; and he led away the little ones, weeping at they scarce knew what, that his wife might weep upon his bosom for the loss of Margery Oglivie; at whose death a great inheritance passed to her eldest son.

THE END.

NATURE'S PARABLES.

NOT only is it by the preacher's voice
Our souls are taught the way
To gain the land, where citizens rejoice
In realms of endless day;

Sermons and sacramental signs there are Around us and above,
Whose mystic teachings, spreading wide and far,
Proclaim God's power and love.

Say, while thou lookest on some garden fair,
Shall the lost Eden be
Strange to thine inmost thoughts, or past compare
The land which thou wouldst see?

A golden corn-field opens to thy gaze,
And reapers toiling there:
Think of the harvest in the latter days—
The rest from sin and care.

Thou watchest long beside the broad sea-shore:
Think of the port for thee,
Where hurricane and tempest shall be o'er—
Where there is no more sea.

So when at close of day, the sun beneath
The western hills sinks down,
Think of the end, and that fair, beauteous wreath
Which all the good shall crown.

WM. CHATTERTON DIX.

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER I.

THE BEGINNING OF TROUBLES.

RAYMOND SYLVESTER had not spoken for more than an hour. He was standing leaning against the corner of the mantel-piece, and looking into the fire. That stately lady in the chair opposite, whose pale, proud features seem as if chiselled in marble, and whose white hands, shaded with lace ruffles, lie folded on her lap, is his mother. A short time ago, the lady's husband, the elder Raymond Sylvester, had died, and the Raymond whom we have just introduced to the reader, entered into possession of the estate.

The bare, bleak house, standing treeless and unsheltered on the bare, bleak common, is Raymond's. It is not a possession that any one would particularly covet. Outside, its very grandeur is gaunt and poverty-stricken. Inside, there are vast rooms with worm-eaten furniture and threadbare curtains.

(Drawn by B. BRADLEY.)

"A golden cornfield opens to thy gaze,
And reapers toiling there."—p. 456.

Poverty stares at you through the gaps that time has made, and that means have been wanting to replenish. The estate is cumbered with mortgages and payments of every kind. Its very life-blood is slowly draining away. And its owners know it, and the little world of Newbury knows it: but the hour of doom lingers: it has not yet come!

Raymond Sylvester is perhaps thinking whether it may not be possible to avert it. For he has a clear intellect, a resolute will, and youth withal on his side. At any rate, whatever his musings may be, the silence has been so profound, that when his mother breaks it, he starts. Yet she only asks the simplest question possible—

"You will remember to meet the train, Raymond?"

"Yes, mother, I should scarce be likely to forget it, and an only sister coming back after a year's absence."

Yet he did not smile, or look glad. The shadow of his musing rested like a cloud upon him. And perhaps that shadow made him say, a minute after, with a quick glance at his mother—

"She is a daughter of the house. She must bear what we bear."

He set his lips together, as he spoke, with a peculiar expression, denoting more sternness than is usual in so young a man. It was an expression often found on the countenance of Raymond Sylvester.

"Of course she must bear it, and she will!"

His mother made the remark. She had a clear, ringing voice—a voice that had something pitiless and unflinching about it.

And who ever knew Lady Sylvester to flinch from anything?

She is a grand woman, though all that is youthful about her has long passed away. A bleak, hard life like hers is apt to make the face wintry and bleak, like its own destiny. Yet her face has marvellously stood the wear and tear she must have had. Her figure is upright as when she had scarce seen sixteen summers, and was the belle of the whole county; her black hair is streaked with grey, but it is soft, glossy, and abundant; the fire of her dark eye is unquenched, and burns as bright as ever. Misfortune may steal a march upon her, and will do; and poverty may circumvent her, and will do; and the home may get barer, and the hangings more threadbare, and the very ground crumble from under her—but I think she will defy all these things, and never succumb, except as Cæsar did, when he sank down at the base of Pompey's pillar.

Her son is like her, every whit. He has the unquenchable light in his eye; he has the proud features, the unflinching voice, without an atom of relenting; he has the indomitable pride, that has been the curse of his race, and that has brought them into all this woe; he is a Sylvester to his heart's core.

His carriage is at the door, with its flaming lights, its crest, and its men in livery—(the Sylvesters never stir abroad without a world of pomp and ceremony)— and Raymond steps across the hall to set out on his journey.

He was stopped by one of the servants—an old servant, who had known Raymond ever since he was no higher than the table.

"If you please, sir"—he spoke timidly, and as if he knew that what he had to say would be distasteful—"some one is waiting to speak to you."

"Some one!—who?" asked Raymond, sternly.

His manner was habitually stern to every one.

"John Humphreys, sir."

"I cannot see him; I am going out."

"But, Mr. Raymond; don't be angry, sir," said the old man, in a deprecatory tone, "but he isn't willing to go away without speech of you. He says he has come on very urgent business."

Raymond frowned. The mouth looked so set and so iron in its expression, you would wonder, for the moment, how Raymond could ever have been thought handsome.

"Where is he—this man?" he asked, haughtily.

"In your study, sir. I took him in. I knew he would not go quietly away. I thought it best, sir."

A crimson flush suffused Raymond's countenance. Then the flush faded, and his features assumed their cold, chilling expression.

He did not make any comment, or, indeed, say another word. He walked on to the study and opened the door. Then he found himself face to face with John Humphreys.

"Now then," said Raymond Sylvester, seating himself in the chair by the fire, without, however, giving the slightest hint to John to be seated likewise, "what is your errand?"

Humphreys had been on foot all day, and, before he replied, he took a chair, and, planting it exactly opposite Raymond, sat down. Raymond bit his lip, and said nothing. These two men never met without some kind of passage-at-arms.

"You must know, sir, what I'm come about," said Humphreys, quietly.

He had a pleasant manly voice, and there was a great deal of firmness in it, too.

His mother used to boast that her John could hold his own with anybody.

"Anything fresh, pray?" said Raymond, haughtily.

There was a slight working of the features, as if he did not feel quite at his ease.

"No, sir, the old matter is not settled yet," replied John.

Raymond's face worked again. His restless fingers were inserted, as though by an involuntary movement, into a desk that stood on the table before him.

"If the thing I want is in that desk, sir, perhaps you would bring it out," said John Humphreys.

Raymond withdrew his fingers, as if he had been stung. His face flushed violently.

"You know what I mean, sir," continued John, in a plain, straightforward manner, that was characteristic of him. "Your father owed my father money."

Raymond started, as though the speech grated on his ear beyond endurance.

John's father mentioned in the same breath with the Sylvesters!

"Your father owed my father money," continued John. "It was honest money, too, sir, and hardly earned. Now, what I've come about is just this: my father being dead, Mr. Raymond, I've come into his belongings, and this debt along with 'em."

"If that is your business," replied Raymond, coldly, "it is easily settled, as far as I am concerned. You must apply to myself."

"So I have, sir, over and over again, but he's put me off one way or another. It's his trade, I suppose. Now, Mr. Raymond, I've just made up my mind not to be put off any longer; and I've come to tell you so, face to face, sir. That's my way!"

Raymond's cheek flushed, and there was the slight quiver about the resolute mouth. He knew this man had the mastery over him. He might shake him off once perhaps, and perhaps twice, but the end would come as surely as he sat in that chair, and was Raymond Sylvester.

He knew all about the matter, too, which was more than he chose to confess. There were times when the head of the proud Sylvester race had stooped to borrow of a tradesman; and there was an ugly thing called a bond lurking very near at hand; Raymond was aware of this, and he flinched. He loathed the thought of what his father had been driven to do, yet he was following, step by step, in his father's track. He would not abate a jot or tittle of the pomp and glory of the Sylvesters; not before the world he would not. Behind the scenes, there was coming quick upon them—ruin!

He raised his proud head, and looked the other man in the face. He had never been more like his mother. The proud flashing eyes, the stern cold features, the iron mouth, all were there. The other man met his look quietly, but without any symptom of giving way.

His face was kindly, honest, and genial; you liked it more and more. But in resolution, it was a match for Raymond's.

"I cannot hear anything further from you to-night," said Raymond, in a tone as though the strain upon his forbearance were hardly to be endured; "I am in haste. The carriage is waiting for me at the door."

He rose as he said it.

The word carriage jarred on John's ear.

"Ah, go your ways, sir! go your ways! ride, while them as you and yours have beggared have to walk on their bare feet—ay, and beg their bread!"

"If you are insolent I will have you turned out," said Raymond, in a tone of such extreme haughtiness that John was, for the moment, silenced.

In that moment he forgot that Raymond was, after a fashion, his prisoner; he let him glide out, and pass into the hall. A few minutes after, the carriage of the Sylvesters was making its way through the iron gates that stood open to afford it egress.

Then John started up as from a dream, and knew that his prisoner had escaped—for that time at least.

CHAPTER II.

THE OLD LOVE.

RAYMOND SYLVESTER leaned back on the soft cushions of the carriage. He was not of a luxurious temperament—far from it. His compact frame and eager, restless eye tell a different tale to that. He could have gone through any amount of hardship to attain a wished-for object; he could endure to the last extremity. But he had been born in the purple: it was threadbare and dilapidated, but, while a rag remained, he would wrap it reverentially about him. The carriage, the pair of handsome horses, the soft cushions, were parts and parcels of his status as a Sylvester.

The town to which he was going was no more than a mile off. He would be an hour too soon for the train, but he had business of his own, that would take him the best part of that hour. When the carriage reached a certain street, he pulled the check-string, then giving orders to the coachman, he alighted and dismissed the carriage.

Raymond now stood in the street alone.

It was an old-fashioned street, with gabled houses, whose projecting fronts nearly touched each other. From one of the houses you could almost have shaken hands with your opposite neighbour. Raymond walked down the street, and stopped before the door of a house. It was a moonlight night, but with clouds hurrying over the moon, and gusts of wind that swept by him and made a kind of moaning as they hurried down the street, only to come sweeping back again directly.

Raymond stood a moment before he rang the bell and raised the ponderous old-fashioned knocker. In that moment, he had reeled a little as though seized by a sudden illness, and he had laid hold of the old carved work of the porch to support himself. But he was well again directly, and he had rung and knocked.

The servant who opened the door admitted him as a thing of course. She did not speak, no more did Raymond. A delicate perfume, like that of rose-leaves, struck on the senses the moment the house was entered. There was a marble slab by the wall, and a vase upon it, which was filled with withered rose-leaves. The staircase was wide, with a richly-carved balustrade, and your eye rested on pictures, and here and there upon a statue of great rarity and beauty. Raymond looked at none of them; perhaps he had seen them so often that he did not need. He went up the staircase by himself; it was evident he knew where to go. He turned into a little room furnished with elegance, and even luxury. No one was there, but the fire blazed brightly and the lamp was burning. He planted himself on the hearthrug, his arms folded, and looked round.

Some one had been there just lately. There was a chair at the table, and there was some delicate piece of work lying about Raymond's eye fell upon it. It was something made of lace, exquisite and fragile. He took it up, and kissed it, and laid it down again.

His face had softened wonderfully the last few minutes. It was attractive now, beyond measure. The eye had all its beauty unalloyed by sternness. The mouth was tender. A tremulous light flickered over the proud features. If he had spoken, his voice would have been irresistibly sweet and alluring. But he did not speak, at least not till all this was gone.

For it passed like a dream!

There was a light step in the passage, so light it could scarcely be heard. Except by Raymond: he went forward to meet it.

I do not know whether she was handsome, critics never determined that; for it was a face that baffled them. The forehead was beautiful in its smooth serenity, and so were the clear brown eyes, and so were the ripples of shining hair, as luxuriant as could be. But the features were not regular, and if regularity was an absolute condition of beauty, Josephine Graham had it not. And some said her figure was not good; and others that nature had intended her for a beauty, and just missed the mark. And there were more opinions still, that it is not worth our while to mention: for no one ever had any kind of companionship, or friendship, or even casual intercourse with Josephine Graham, who did not think her the loveliest creature on earth. Raymond had thought so these six years, and had been telling her so likewise.

He went to meet her with extended hands. He was her lover, as you have, no doubt, found out. And more was the pity for it!

"Dearest Josephine!"

He could not help saying it, though he was come to do that which he could scarcely bear to think of. He had argued the point on all sides, and convinced his judgment, if not his conscience.

Her face brightened when she saw him. She was in deep and newly-made mourning. Her black dress made her look pale, and perhaps the confinement and fatigue of the sick chamber had helped to fade her cheek. It flushed now rosy and beautiful as ever.

"I am so glad to see you, Raymond!"

She had a clear, firm voice. The expression of her face denoted energy and a cheerful resolve to do what was right. She was in a perilous position too. The only relative she had in the world was dead, and she was left quite portionless. She had scarce enough to keep herself from actual necessity.

But there was her lover of six years; there was Raymond.

"I cannot leave my aunt; she has only me in the world."

Josephine had said this to Raymond, at the beginning of their engagement.

"When she is gone, my sweet one, then come to me."

This had been the burden of Raymond's song ever since. He had been a faithful lover, and a devoted one as well. Every day he had been seen in the street with its ancient gables: but he did not know then, what was current in the town by now—that the aunt of Josephine Graham had left her money to a stranger, and that Josephine was almost penniless.

"What poverty again! always poverty!"

He had said it in his desperate indignation, pacing up and down his room all night. He loved Josephine—loved her still, deeply and fervently—but he had thought she would be rich. What could he do? He had to build up the fortunes of the Sylvesters. With him, they would stand or fall. He could not work—Heaven forbid! no Sylvester ever had worked—and could he starve?

Why was he an inheritor of that gaunt ragged splendour? Why had not his glories come to him untarnished? Why could not the foundation-stone of the edifice have stood his time? Then he might have married her—this woman of his choice, of his affections, who had clung to him so long and so tenderly. What was to become of her? There is the abyss, down, down ever so deep! One step will send her into it; but she thinks that he is by her side. She does not mind, because of him—Raymond her lover!

Yet she had been going through an ordeal of her own, poor girl.

"I will tell him how poor I am," she had thought; "I will say, I can bring him nothing." She smiled as she thought it—such a glad, hopeful smile it was, too! "I know what he will say: he will say, 'I am rich enough for both!' And so he is, being one of the grand Sylvesters, and—"

The train of thought broke off in one of those rosy blushes that set Josephine's detractors at defiance; and a hundred tender little suggestions hovered about her. "It would be sweet to tell Raymond he was free; it would be just feeling of the link, and seeing how strong it was, and how indissoluble!"

When he had drawn his chair into its usual place, when his eyes were upon her in all their fascination, and he had been saying a few tender nothings, for he had not yet approached the dread thing yonder, then she began her tale.

She told him her exact position—a friendless girl and penniless. It would have been better had she held her peace, but she could not. "If he wished to be free——" her voice trembled, tears were in her eyes; the mere thought struck her to the heart.

She paused, for she was in haste that he should speak. There was an alternative, that she had put from her as a myth. She wanted, all at once, to be assured, to be comforted, to be taken to his arms; for he had been bound to her so long. He was all she had in the world!

When he was silent, a chill dread fell upon her. It was an awful moment for Josephine Graham!

"Josephine!"

There was all his old tenderness in the tone. He came close to her, and took her hand. "Josephine, there are periods in a man's history when Fate is very cruel to him, when nothing seems to satisfy her but the uttermost farthing!"

She trembled a little, and would have withdrawn her hand, but he held it fast.

Then he told her. He said that upon him had the woes of his race been entailed. He was poor. He had no means of subduing his fortune as some men had; the Sylvesters had been above that necessity from generations downwards. He did not know what their fate would be, it seemed to him as if he and his were being whirled onwards, towards an abyss from which there would be no escape.

And much more he said, and Josephine sat and listened.

She listened; her face pale, her very lips were white. She knew to what all this tended, and there was a womanly indignation stirring in her breast. He was going to forsake her. She read that, in plain characters. He to whom she had clung so tenderly, had loved so fondly. Yes! he would leave her because she was less richly dowered with this world's wealth than he had thought for. Well, then, be it so, and the proud tears welled from her eyes; for she was no feeble character, no love-sick girl this Josephine Graham!

For a few moments there was a sharp wrestling with her heart's anguish, ere she could command herself to speak; when she did speak she had found time to pity him. Had she seen within, I think she would have wept over him: for he was the victim of his race's pride and arrogance. This woman, so good, so beautiful, would have made the happiness of his life. All the better part of his nature clung to her. He loved her as he would never love again: yet was about to do violence to the common principles of honour and uprightness. He was going to cast a blight over her life, and his own. And for what? That the greatness of the Sylvesters might be sustained by the sacrifice of another victim!

She had withdrawn from him. She stood at a little distance, as though foreshadowing the weary space that had been put between them.

But she was quite calm and self-possessed, far more than he was.

For all the old passionate fondness welled up in the man's heart. He rose up wildly, unlike the calm, dignified Raymond Sylvester. He would have caught her to his heart but she would not. Oh, no! the time for that was over now, quite over!

She put him away, still calmly, but with an air of decision that made him feel as though his fate were in her hands, and not hers in his. And he felt, too, how incomparably she was his superior. As she stood, her clear, honest eye fixed upon him, he seemed, to himself, the veriest knave and coward that ever lived. He began to wonder whether he might not tear up the old rotten moorings, and plunge boldly, and at once, into the arena open to every man. Why should he not?—why keep up the tottering ruins of a system that must fall, and that speedily?

Let him work as other men have done, and earn a competence; and let him keep true to Josephine, and be blessed!

Ah, Raymond! it is too late for that. There is a sensitive chord in a woman's heart, and you have touched it. You have this night passed the Rubicon!

She told him that he was free. She gave him back his freedom without a sigh. There is a kind of fortitude in some women, that will not suffer, in these cases, either a sigh or a tear—not until the sufferer finds herself alone.

She said, then, that he was free; and she took a bracelet from her arm and a ring from her finger, and she gave them back to him. He would not take them; but she laid them before him with the same resolute air. She would not tamper with him, a single moment, or use any of her woman's weapons to drive him back to his allegiance. No! the world lay before her, bleak, and chill, and desolate; but be it so. She had scarce thought of that; and when she came to think, there was a better Guide than he was, and a more sure Protector close at hand, even a Divine one; and Josephine would lean on Him, as she had done from her earliest years; for Josephine was a Christian woman, and had a Christian's consolations.

She knew that the sooner this interview came to an end the better. In spite of her calmness, she felt stunned, and like one who has received a deadly wound, but will not falter while he is by who gave it. She wished to be alone, and she attempted to bid him farewell. She had almost broken down in the endeavour.

He had nearly broken down as well. But he was a Sylvester, and he was only doing what his race required of him. He must not bring a portionless bride to the decaying home: that would be adding beggary to ruin. He had been deceived into thinking that Josephine was an heiress, and it was well that the mistake was found out in time. On him lay all the burden; his single arm must avert the overhanging doom. The step was inevitable: his family's needs required that he should be a victim! As he thought so, he raised his head to look once more on Josephine; but she had moved softly away. She was gone!

As he went down the stairs, the fragrance of the withered rose-leaves fell upon his senses. It was like the memory of a precious thing departed!

(To be continued.)

THE FATHER'S HOUSE.

HE world is all our Father's house,
With fair things furnished well,
Wherein the children of his love
With gladsome hearts might dwell.

And all His good and precious things
He to our keeping gave
For liberal use, that each might live
A son, and not a slave.

And day by day, and year by year,
His purpose to fulfil,
Fresh tokens of his love are sent Alike to good and ill.

Our absent Father, in his love,
On us commandments laid
(Not grievous), and in all His house
But what would hurt forbade.

And chiefly to each other's care
He gave His children all,

That each might claim a watchful love,
But most the weak and small.

Alas! the children have forgot
Their Father's love and law,
And tokens of His presence see
No more with filial awe.

Their Father's precious things they put
To uses mean and vile:
Many are naked, sick, and poor,
And others feast the while.

Gifts of His bounteous love they take,
Nor share them as He willed;
Yea, many hunger in the house
With every blessing filled!

The strong despise the weak and small—
The law of love they spurn—
How would the Father find His house,
If now He should return?

ISA CRAIG.

"YOUNG GUY FAWKES."

FRED WILMORE was born on the 5th of November. What a lucky fellow! most boys will say. And so thought Fred, for every anniversary of his birthday there was a regular jollification in the town; and a large Guy, suspended from a gibbet, his pockets stuffed with squibs and crackers, was burned over an enormous bonfire, consisting of tar-barrels, waste, and straw, on the green in the centre of the town. Then there was no end of shouting, hurrahing, and letting off of fireworks in every direction, and spending the halfpence—which the boys had collected by carrying about an effigy of the Pope, or of Guy Fawkes; it might be whichever people chose to call it—they paid their half-pennies and they had their choice. It was generally tied to an old chair, and consisted of a ragged coat and trousers, stuffed with straw; with a mask, an old battered hat, a box of lucifers, and a pipe in its mouth.

Fred's birthday was always celebrated, by his family with all due joviality; his father, who was a grocer, giving a supper to his shopmen and apprentices, after partaking of which, they drank the health of "young Guy Fawkes," in steaming glasses of hot punch.

As the young gentleman grew older, a display of fireworks in the garden was added; and he was allowed to invite his schoolfellows to tea on the occasion. Mrs. Wilmore made a large plum-cake, and lots of oranges, almonds, and raisins, figs, and other good things were liberally distributed among the children assembled. So it is no wonder if Fred Wilmore's birthday was looked forward to and long remembered as a most glorious day.

Every succeeding year added to the splendour of Fred's very popular festival. But the return of his twelfth birthday was to excel all that had preceded it, for Jim Stevens, the new apprentice, had been three months before on trial to a maker of fireworks, and he had acquired, in that short space of time, much of the art and mystery of fires—red, blue, and green, of steel sparks, golden rains, blue lights, and bangs; and he and Fred, and Bill the second son, had for some weeks been employed with cartridge-paper, rosin, paste, charcoal, and gunpowder, making wonderful things in a shed at the bottom of the garden. However, Fred, although strictly forbidden, could not resist the temptation of taking in a squib or two, and letting them off out of the bedroom window now and then; but as neither obedience nor truthfulness was in the list of his virtues, he stoutly denied any knowledge of the matter when the sulphurous smell of the room the next morning, or the report of the previous night, had led to a suspicion of what he had been about.

"It only wants a week to the fifth," said he one night to Bill, when he was preparing to light a squib at the candle; "won't it be jolly? We've got lots of rockets, and Jim's going to show us how to make a Jack-in-the-box with a mine, and he's to make a Chinese tree with a bang. Won't it be jolly, I say?"

"But father said we were not to have a mine, because the fire flies about so when it's let off, you know."

"Stuff and nonsense! that's all bosh! he won't know anything about it till it goes off."

"I wish you wouldn't have it, nor yet let off squibs out of the bedroom window," said Bill; "it's so dangerous."

"Don't you be a sneak, like Tom Heartwell, or else I'll serve you out, as I mean to do him—a cowardly fellow, afraid to let off a cracker last year."

"But his father forbade him; he disapproves of fireworks, you know."

Yes, an old canting humbug! And he's trying to prevent them having a bonfire on the green this year. I hate him, and all of them! I'm glad father wouldn't lend him our horse the other day when he wanted it. Father said it was lame; wasn't that a good 'un? Why, the horse was no more lame than I am. I dare say they'll all be on their knees, and old Heartwell will be droning out a prayer, when we are in the height of our fun next Wednesday."

It was very true that Mr. Heartwell, whose garden adjoined that of Mr. Wilmore, did not approve of the popular mode of celebrating "Guy Fawkes Day," as it is called. Though a staunch Protestant, and viewing the cowardly attempt to blow up the Houses of Parliament as it deserved, he did not consider that promoting a scene of drunkenness and revelry, or letting off combustibles to endanger life and property, was a proper way of remembering it. And being possessed of some influence in the town, he had prevailed on the authorities to prevent the usual display.

Nothing could be more auspicious than the weather when the day arrived—crisp, frosty, but clear; the paths sparkled with rime, and the trees looked feathery in the hoar-frost.

About twenty boys, some accompanied by their sisters, met in Mrs. Wilmore's parlour, where tea, with muffins and crumpets, plum-cake, and other popular et-cæteras, was served to them. All was chatter and animation.

"How nasty it is of old Heartwell to prevent them having a bonfire on the green this year," said Ben Bluster, whose father kept a beer-shop. "My father says he'd knock him down for two farthings."

"Serve him right, a cantankerous old villain," growled Mr. Wilmore.

"Never mind, father," said Fred, "we've got a famous lot of staves and waste to burn to-night; we'll light the old chap to bed, won't we, father?"

All laughed at this sally; but many a true word is spoken in jest. When the tea was ended, the young people played at games till seven o'clock, when the fireworks were to begin. In the meanwhile, Jim Stevens had been busy building up the bonfire, and suspending over it a Guy, in the regular orthodox style, with his pockets stuffed with fireworks. He had fastened the Catherine-wheels to a fence, with calking-pins given him by Sally, the maid-of-all-work, stuck the rocket sticks into the ground, arranged the Roman-candle battery, and made everything complete; and now they all sallied into the garden.

Just at this juncture Mr. Heartwell desired to speak with Mr. Wilmore over the garden wall, which was low.

"I would advise you not to have that bonfire lighted," said he; "for the wind is rising, and it blows towards your house: it might carry sparks on to the roof, and do much mischief."

Now this was disinterested advice, as Mr. Heartwell's dwelling-house was separated by a large garden from Mr. Wilmore's. But Mr. Wilmore had no mind to be advised by anybody, especially not by such a canting hypocrite, as he called Mr. Heartwell; so he answered that he knew what he was about, and wanted no advice of anybody.

Seeing it was useless to remonstrate, Mr. Heartwell left him. So the bonfire was lighted, and blazed away merrily, to the boys' intense satisfaction, and they shouted—

"Holloa, boys! holloa, boys!
Make the bells ring;
Holloa, boys! holloa, boys!
God save the Queen!"

Then there was popping of squibs and crackers; and though the wind was certainly getting up, no mischief had happened yet, and they laughed at the "old croaker" Heartwell's predictions; whose son Tom was not invited. "He'd be frightened to let off a squib," said Fred, who was valiantly assisting Jim, in firing a Chinese tree.

"But I say, Jim, here's the Jack-in-the-box; where shall we put that?"

"Oh, I don't know, I'm sure," said Jim; "out of the guv'nor's sight, any how."

"I'll fasten it to that pear-tree in the corner."

"Isn't it rayther too near the house?" returned Jim.

"You shut up; it'll do no harm."

Fred always persisted in contradiction: so do many boys: but it is a bad habit.

Well, the rockets, and the Catherine-wheels, and all the rest were let off, greatly to the praise and triumph of Jim Stevens and of Fred, and to the delight of the boys within the garden, and of those without, who were mounted on the top of the wall, and joined their shouts with the rest, when Guy blew up with a tremendous and repeated banging, from the fireworks with which his pockets were stuffed.

"Now, Jim," said Fred, "I shall let off the Jack-in-the-box."

"Don't!" replied Jim, "it's too nigh the house."

"No, it isn't; there's plenty of distance." So saying, Fred ran off with a match, and applied it to the slow paper; but whether Jim's skill did not extend so far as a Jack-in-the-box, or from some other cause, it is impossible to say; but instead of going off properly, it exploded all at once, sending a stream of blue fire, several feet in length, towards the house, and scattering sparks and squibs in all directions. Some of them entered the parlour window, which had been left open, and ignited a quantity of loose papers which lay on a table; the flames communicated quickly to the window-curtains, and to some household linen, which Mrs. Wilmore had brought down to repair, and in an incredibly short time the whole room was in a blaze. Mr. Wilmore, Jim, and the shopmen ran for buckets of water; but very little could be obtained, as the frost was hard, and it was frozen in the pipes. All was consternation, where so much merriment had just before prevailed.

It happened, as Fred had predicted, that Mr. Heartwell and his family, were engaged in family worship, and he had prayed earnestly for the preservation of his neighbour from all danger. He was just concluding, when the whole family was startled by a loud explosion, and a noise of children screaming at the back. Going into the garden, they found all the children in a state of great terror, trying to get over the wall, which the bigger boys had already climbed. By means of a step-ladder, the rest were assisted over and taken into Mrs. Heartwell's parlour. Mr. Heartwell and his son Tom, a tall boy of fourteen, went out to see what could be done. But as the flames had now got possession of all the lower part of the premises, the parish engine being useless for want of water, Mr. Heartwell busied himself in getting out chests of tea, and other valuable goods, the fire not having yet caught the shop. In the meanwhile Mrs. Heartwell was trying to persuade Mrs. Wilmore to go into her house; but the latter stood in a trance of horror, gazing at the burning pile. She was roused, however, by Sally who came screaming, "Oh, missus! the baby—the baby!"

"Where is it?" cried many voices at once.

"Up there!" said Sally, pointing to a second-floor window.

A ladder was brought, but who would venture to ascend? Men looked at each other and at the seething furnace below, and were silent.

"Oh! save my baby—save my baby!" shrieked the distracted mother. But no one answered the appeal.

Its father and Mr. Heartwell were on the other side of the house, and heard her not. But Tom Heartwell did, and made his way to the ladder, which he ascended till he reached the window. It was fastened. In a moment he dashed his hand through the glass, undid the fastening, opened the window, and stood within the room. It was filled with smoke, and in the darkness he was groping his way towards the bed, when a jet of flame shooting through the floor, showed him at once the extreme peril of the situation, and the child quietly sleeping in its cot.

What an age it seemed to the agonised mothers, after the resolute boy disappeared, before he again came to the window, and with the infant fastened to him with a small sheet from the cot, began to descend the ladder! In breathless silence stood the awe-struck crowd; but when he placed the babe in its mother's arms, a shout long and loud rent the air, and there was a contention who should shake hands with brave Tom Heartwell. Mrs. Wilmore could only utter, "God reward you, brave boy!" His mother's tearful eyes spoke volumes of love and thankfulness to God.

As the roof had now fallen in, and the premises were completely gutted, Mr. Heartwell took poor Wilmore home with him, where Mrs. Wilmore and the children already were. They were made as comfortable as the circumstances would permit.

Mr. Heartwell's kindness did not end here. He lent Mr. Wilmore a sum of money, by means of which, and with the stock which was saved, he was enabled to take another house and shop, and begin business again, though in a smaller way.

Time brought former prosperity, and more than former happiness. Mr. Wilmore became in many respects a changed man. He often, in after years, used to say, that the conduct of the Heartwell family on that eventful night had convinced him of the value of true religion; and that it is good both for this world and for that which is to come. M. W.

ANSWER TO ACROSTIC ON PAGE 448.

Initials: "Go in peace."—Luke vii. 50. Finals: "Sin no more."—John viii. 11.

1. G allowS	Esth. v. 14; vii. 10.
2. O mri I	1 Kings xvi. 30.
3. I nN	Luke x. 34.
4. N aiN	Luke vii. 11.
5. P haraoh-NechO	Jer. xlv. 2.
6. E lohiM	Gen. ii. 4.
7. A bednegO	Dan. i. 12.
8. C omforteR	John xiv. 16.
9. E vE	Gen. iii. 6.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

1. Whence was Saul's body stolen by friends at night?
 2. Where against Israel did Bashan fight?
 3. The name the Amorites to Hermon gave.
 4. The land where Jephthah fled, his life to save.
 5. A town which Baasha began to build.
 6. The land where Israel's ships with gold were filled.
 7. What tribe the first of all was captive brought?
 8. Whose son with Shallum in Samaria fought?
 9. Who among David's thirty had command?
 10. Whose son brought succour unto David's band?
 11. A town whence David brought the shields of gold.
 12. Who first among the singers was enrolled?
 13. The month in which God's house was sanctified.
 14. What giant's brother Israel defied?
 15. Who the doorkeeper of the ark was made?
 16. One who came not to Adonijah's aid.
 17. Whose son a warning Nehemiah brought,
- Which the courageous prophet set at nought?

Though many foes encompass round,
Yet lean thou on the Lord;
Press onward firmly to the goal,
For great is thy reward.

THE BIVVER

— Saturday, April 11, 1868. —

(Drawn by GEORGE THOMAS.)

“‘You have had your answer,’ I said.”—p. 467.

AUNT PHOEBE'S STORY.

BY K. S. MACQUOID.

JESSIE BEEVOR stood leaning against the dresser in her aunt's cottage, with a very decided frown on her fair, pretty face, a face that seemed as if a smile would fit it better; a cheerful, happy countenance, with sunny hair, a broad, low forehead, and sweet brown eyes. There was a singular likeness between the petulant girl of eighteen, and the delicate woman of forty, who while she went on washing up her teacups, stole a look every now and then at Jessie, only it seemed that Phoebe Hawtreys beauty must have always had more of refinement in it. Strangers who caught a glimpse of the remarkable face, bending over her flowers at the window, asked who lived in the little corner cottage in West Acre Lane, and looked surprised to hear it was only Phoebe, the carpenter's daughter. The carpenter was dead, and his wife too. His eldest daughter had married Ned Beever, the blacksmith of Shireburn, and Phoebe, the youngest, had just enough to live on by herself in the corner cottage with the honeysuckle over the porch. She did clear-starching for those of the neighbouring gentry not rich enough to keep a laundry, to gain a little surplus to help her poorer neighbours with, rather than from need.

"What ails ye, child?" she said, when the silence had lasted a little longer.

"You know"—the rosy cheeks flushed scarlet, and the bright eyes filled full of hot angry tears—"Aunt Phoebe, I thought I'd get comfort from you; I saw mother telling you all about it last night; it's shameful! she says Paul has six strings to his bow!" She burst out crying.

"Jessie"—the girl looked up and wiped her eyes—"it's because ye want to go to Anster Fair with Paul Lewin, isn't it?"

Jessie nodded—she was still sobbing.

"Do you want to go to the fair with Paul, lass, because ye love him, or that ye're proud of being seen with such a tall, fine young fellow?"

"I don't know," said Jessie.

"Would ye be content to bide at home if Paul might stay along with ye?"

"I should think not, indeed!" with a toss of the fair head.

Phoebe sighed.

"Don't!" said Jessie, petulantly: "Aunt, I'd never have come down if I'd not thought you'd have taken my part. I don't care much for Paul. Oh, aunt, I've heard you were always to be seen everywhere, why should I be buried out of sight? Mother says she wants me to get married; I shan't find a husband in the forge, and I don't want to be an old maid;" and then conscience-stricken Jessie looked at the sweet patient face, and the frown left her own.

"I beg your pardon, aunt dear;" and she held up her mouth to be kissed.

"Jessie, I've a mind to tell ye a story," said Phoebe, smiling, "would ye care to hear how it came about that I never married?"

"Mother says no one was good enough for you, because you were so pretty."

"It wasn't that, though I was vain enough, lass, at one time. Sit ye down, child, the story won't be over just in a minute." She drew her hand slowly over her face, and rested her chin in its palm.

"I was about your age, Jessie. I might have had the love of a good man. I'll call him Thomas, he's left the village, but I've no right to make the sorrow I gave him public. He hadn't spoken to me, but I knew what he meant. I thought myself far too good for him, but I liked to be joked about him. You know where grandfather used to live?"

Jessie nodded.

"Well, I was standing at the top of that broken flight of steps that leads into the lane under the big yew-trees: it was grandfather that shaped the trees round like an arch, they used to go straight across from side to side. Well, as I stood idling my time I saw some one coming up the lane; a tall, handsome young fellow with a bright sun-burnt face, there was something in his look that made me sure he was a sailor. He stopped and asked me to be so kind as to tell him the way to Bramley.

"I'd never seen any one so handsome, Jessie. No one ever spoke to me in such a worshipping way before. It seemed just like one of the stories I'd read, against mother's will, in a penny newspaper that I'd found round a parcel. I told him the way, and then he went on, though I stood watching him. He looked back often.

"I had been vain enough before, What I grew to be after this, Jessie, I should not tell you if I could. As it is, I'm talking of myself more than is good for me."

Phoebe sighed.

"One evening I'd been drinking tea with your mother. She'd not long been married, and she was anxious to see me as happy as she was herself. She'd asked Thomas to drink tea with us. My head was full of the handsome sailor, and I was cold and capricious all the evening."

"I must go now," I said to your mother; and I put on my bonnet. Thomas had gone with your father, to look at something in the yard. At the corner where the lane turns from the road, I found Thomas waiting. I tried to pass; but he stopped me.

"Phoebe, you must let me walk home with you this evening."

"It was still broad daylight, and he could see how unwilling I looked. He walked beside me, without speaking. His voice had sounded so firm and determined, that I had felt a little afraid of him.

"Presently he began again. 'Phoebe, you know quite well what I have to say; you have known it a long time. Maybe I ought to have spoken sooner; but I felt uncertain, I feel so still. Will you be my wife?'

"For an instant I felt a soft pity for Thomas; he saw this, no doubt, in my face. We were in the lane quite alone, and he took my hand and drew it under his arm.

"This brought my pride back; I pulled my hand away.

"'You behave very strangely,' I said, in a scornful tone; 'I must love the person I marry, and I never could love you.'

"I walked up the lane fast, but he overtook me.

"'I was blundering,' he said, humbly; 'I ought to have asked leave to win you; I do ask it now, Phœbe.'

"There was such a sad earnestness in his voice; but before I could answer, I heard speaking close by. I looked up. Looking over the hedge I saw my father and the stranger who had asked the way to Bramley.

"I seemed to grow mad with impatience.

"'You have had your answer,' I said; 'I never say no when I mean yes.'

"I did not look at him; I was at the foot of the steps, full of shy, fluttering vanity.

"'This is my daughter Phœbe, Mr. Stacey,' said father.

"Mr. Stacey never said a word about having seen me before; he'd come from London to look for country lodgings. Mother said there were none to be had in Shireburn; however, he'd got the soft side of father, and he found him a lodging at Pratt's that same evening.

"By the time I'd been an hour with Charles Stacey, I knew I liked Thomas best, and yet I fought against the feeling, it pleased my vanity more to be with one than with the other. Thomas never offered to take me anywhere, but Mr. Stacey was always finding out some amusement for me. Mother interfered as much as she could, but I would not listen. At last some of the gossips spoke to father. He came into the garden one day quite angered.

"'Phœbe,' he said, 'go indoors; I've a word to say to Mr. Stacey.'

"I loved Stacey now, Jessie, with all the heart I had to love any one, and he was always talking about his love for me; but he had not asked me to marry him, and I sat in the kitchen trembling, for I thought father was going to be rude, and that perhaps I should never see Stacey again.

"To my surprise they both came in smiling.

"Father took hold of my hand. 'There she is, my lad,' he said, 'and when you come home from next voyage, she shall be yours altogether, if she likes.'

"Stacey kissed me, and so did father, and then I ran away to my room and cried. I was happy, but it seemed to me that my consent was taken too much for granted.

"At supper I said this to father. Stacey had gone away early.

"Father pushed up his glasses, and looked first at me, then at mother.

"'From what I hear,' he said, 'you've been wrong-headed and wilful, Phœbe. Your name has got coupled with Stacey's. You know best whether you wish to marry him; but he shall marry you, or I'll know the reason why.'

"I thought father unkind; but I wanted to be Charles's wife, so I did not take this scolding to heart. When I met Stacey the next afternoon, I thought him grave and quiet.

"'So you could not trust me,' he said; 'my love would be just as true, Phœbe, without a promise.'

"'I said nothing to father, Charles, and you've made me no promise.'

"'That's true,' he said; and then we walked on. But that was a very silent walk, Jessie—it was up Oak Lane, where the road has been hollowed out, and the great tree-roots hang in all manner of twisted shapes on each side. I remember the rabbits came out of their holes, and scrambled across the path in front of us.

"I came home less happy than usual. However, the next few days were as bright as ever; Charles had to join his ship at the week's end, and so we made the most of them. Mother seemed to have grown fond of him now, and she never tried to keep me at home.

"He went, and I fretted till I grew ill—ill and thin and weak. You've been wondering what had become of Thomas all this while. I suppose I tell things as they seemed to me at the time, and Thomas kept out of sight, so I never thought about him. Mother pitied me, but after a bit she got tired of my idle ways. I'd stop up late looking at the moon, and fancying I saw all manner of things in her; and then lie a-bed o' mornings till my head ached.

"'Phœbe,' she said one day, 'when you were born, I thought you'd be a blessing to me; but I've lived to doubt that.'

"Her voice had a sad touch in it that set my heart quivering; I put my arms round her. 'I'll do better,' I said; 'you'll see I will, mother.'

"Well, I did; I fought as hard as I could; but my love grew every day; it seemed as if I cared only for what put me in mind of Stacey. I'd got one letter from him, and I used to read that over till I knew it by heart, and then still I read it to see the writing.

"Sometimes I saw Thomas, but he never spoke to me.

"The year passed over. One day—a bright summer day like this, Jessie—I mind now how the white roses were all in their beauty; mother and I had brought our needlework, and were sitting in the doorway, and father sat on the garden bench spelling a newspaper he'd got from the 'Fox'—it was some days old, and he read us out bits of news I'd heard already.

"'Hallo, Phœbe,' he called out, 'here's news.'

"I was looking over his shoulder in an instant. He pointed out the place with his finger, but the lines all danced about; it was a minute or so before I read that the Niger—that was Stacey's ship—was safe at Portsmouth.

"My heart on a sudden fell like lead, Jessie, from the joy which had lifted it up. Stacey must have been home a good week, and he had neither come to Shireburn nor written to me.

"But father seemed not to have heeded this; he gave me a kiss, and said he supposed he must have a new coat for the wedding; and then he took up the paper and was going back to the 'Fox' with it.

"'Just let me look once more,' I said.

"Father stroked my hair as I stooped down to read.

"'Goldilocks,' said he. When I was little, Jessie, I got the name from the flower you mind in the fir-wood.

"Somehow, I shrank into myself; it seemed as if the glory and pride of my hair and of my good looks was taken away.

"I suppose I looked strange standing so still there—under the yew-trees—just where father left me. Ah, yes, and I was thinking too, just where Stacey had left me on that sunshiny morning a year ago.

"'What is it, child?' mother said.

"'I'm dazed like, it's come so sudden;' and I made an excuse to go indoors.

"A week passed on, and no word from Stacey. And what made his silence harder to bear was the village talk, Jessie. Father had gone to the village that day full of his news; and I was questioned and wished joy, till I hardly knew how to keep a calm face in answer; my heart felt as if it must break. It seemed to me he might be dead, left behind in the great sea, and I should never—never have the love I had so longed for.

"Mother got anxious too; I knew it by the tender, pitiful way she spoke; but she was timid, was mother, and she shrank from open speaking.

"When the week's end came, I had got desperate. Mother and I were in the kitchen; I was doing up one of her caps; the lace stuck to my fingers, and I couldn't make two flutings alike. I scorched it badly at last, and I set down the gauffering-iron, and burst out crying. Then mother spoke in a sudden, new way to me, a way which took me back, lass, to times when I used to bring her home cowslip posies from the meadows.

"'Leave work, Jessie darling; come and sit ye down by mother, and tell what ails ye.' And there I was sitting on my little stool at her knee hiding my face in her lap. She let me sob on, and then she whispered—

"'Ye want to know the rights o' this, lass, and so do I; I'm thinking of going to London.'

"I left off sobbing in wonder. Mother, who had never been farther than Guildford in her life!—mother, who rarely ventured to set up an opinion of her own against father or me.

"'Yes, dear; one is going up to-morrow as 'ull take charge o' yer mother, Phœbe, and bring her back safe; one who's always been true to me and mine, lass.'

"I did not care to guess: I was too much interested.

"'I'll make all right with father,' she whispered. It seemed to me she kissed the words into my cheek. 'I know where to go. I'll not come home, lass, without news.' I put my arms close round her; I seemed to have twice the mother I had had before.

"She was off before six next-morning. She wouldn't let me go even to the turn of the lane with her.

"The two days that came after were so long, Jessie; I worked harder than I'd done in life before, so as to make them go—but they wouldn't—till I was so weary I was fain to sit down on the top of the steps, and watch the gold light change into crimson, while the sun set behind the oak-trees up yonder. On a sudden they seemed on fire, as if the sun himself was shining blood-red through their leaves, and then the crimson grew duller and duller. It had changed to grey when I saw mother coming up the lane. She was out of breath with walking, and I couldn't get a word out. I took her bundle and followed her up the steps.

"Father was in the village, and I sat mother in his chair, and pulled off her bonnet and shawl, and fetched her cap and apron, and got her a cup of tea.

"Her face spoke she had no good news, and I daredn't ask.

"'Phœbe, I've nought to tell ye;' she was half-crying with vexation. 'I've broke my word to ye, darling, but it warn't fault of mine.'

"And then I heard how she'd seen Stacey's cousin, Mrs. Green, a well-to-do person she said. Stacey had come home in the Niger, but he'd only stayed two days in London, and had gone back to Portsmouth. Mother stopped here, and looked at me. But the sudden joy of hearing that he was alive and in England swept away my fears.

"'Did you hear how he looked, mother dear?'

"I'd poured out a cup of tea for her; instead of answering me, she turned away and drank it. I wanted to see her face, and I thought she'd never raise it from her teacup.

"'Look here, Phœbe'—she didn't look at me, she began to play with her teaspoon; 'don't be angry, but I'm doubting if Stacey's all we thought him. One went to London with me, lass, who'll bring us news from Portsmouth to-morrow.'

"A sudden new light came to me.

"Mother, if you've sent Thomas to spy out Stacey's actions, he'll bring ye false news; I'll not believe a word.'

"It was wicked and ungrateful, too, after mother's great kindness. Ah, my lass, if you could know how every sharp word you've given your mother 'ull stick when she's gone from you, maybe ye'd not be so ready with 'em.

"I hardly spoke to mother these two days; it seemed to me she'd done a wrong to Stacey.

"What right had we to judge him? No doubt he had business at Portsmouth, and was waiting to end it, so as not to leave me again; and suppose he should find Thomas out, it would seem as if I had set a spy to watch him. I was mad with anger.

"Next evening came, but not Thomas. The morning after, I'd gone down to Pratt's shop for mother; as I passed our window, coming in, I heard voices. Father was always in the workshop at that time o' day. I went cold and hot, Jessie, something told me my fate was come on me.

"I walked into the kitchen boldly, but I knew my cheeks were white, and my head swam round and round.

"Thomas and I looked at each other, but he only spoke to mother.

"I'll go, Mrs. Hawtrey. You'll tell her best alone.'

"Jessie, it was as if the Evil One got loose in me. I flamed up scarlet. I could have struck Thomas.

"You mean fellow!" I said, 'to bring a false tale here of an honest man than yourself, and then not to have courage to stand by it.'

"Thomas looked at me, deep down into my eyes, till I could not bear the firm, strong gaze of him. I'd often thought him manful and sturdy, but I'd never feared him as his look made me fear him now, and yet he spoke tenderer than mother even.

"My poor girl, I'll tell you the tale if you wish. It's your sorrow, Phoebe, I can't face.'

"Tell away," I said, as hard as a stone.

"Did he think I would show my sorrow before him?

"I grew cold while I listened. My lover—my Charles, as I called him—was married a fortnight past to a girl he'd promised himself to before he ever saw me; and worse than that, there was more than one that claimed him—girls he'd made believe he loved.

"Something in the quiet, pitiful way he told it stamped it into my heart for truth, but I struggled still.

"I'll not believe you. Mother, don't believe this false tale; who's to prove it?"

"Thomas looked at my mother. The tears were running down her cheeks.

"Go your ways, my lad," she said, softly. 'She'll thank you some day.'

"She did not mean me to hear; but my ears were always quick, lass. I ran after Thomas.

"Don't think it," I said, in my passion. 'Once I thought you a good man, though I did not love you; now I know you for the coward you are, and I despise you.'

"He went away. When I went back in the kitchen, I saw mother held a letter in her hand.

"Take it to yourself, my poor lamb, and read it.' And then it seemed as if the kitchen went round with me, as I stood in it alone with Stacey's letter."

Phoebe paused and pulled an old letter out of her pocket. "Last night, Jessie, your mother told me about you and Paul, and I promised her that if it was only for vanity and not for love you were so set on being with him, I'd tell you my sorrow from beginning to end. I keep this letter to correct myself with, lass. By God's blessing, it may serve your turn too." She put it into the girl's hands, and Jessie read:—

DEAR PHOEBE, — The bearer of this says you won't believe I'm married unless I send you word myself. I follow his wishes in writing this, though I believe you are far too sensible to care. As you yourself said, there never was a promise betwixt us, and I knew you felt that our little flirtation was only meant to last for our mutual amusement. But I hope you will consider me, and allow me to sign myself, your sincere friend,

CHARLES STACEY.

Jessie's tears dropped fast as she gave her aunt the letter.

"Didn't Thomas come back?" she said, presently.

Phoebe shook her head; there was a half-sob in her voice as she answered—

"Never again, child. He went next day from Shireburn. I've heard he's been over twice, but each time I've been away. I'd like to ask his pardon, Jessie, but it may be we two shall never meet again."

She spoke solemnly, and the girl felt abashed.

She went up to her aunt and kissed her. "I'll do better," she whispered. "Mother had warned me about Paul, and still I didn't mind; but I will mind her now, Aunt Phoebe."

THE SEARCH FOR DR. LIVINGSTONE.—I.

BY H. W. BATES, ASSISTANT-SECRETARY TO THE ROYAL GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.

Our newest maps of the continent of Africa, a few degrees south of the equator, may be seen the representation of a large lake, extending parallel to the eastern coast, and about 360 miles distant from it. This is Lake Nyassa, discovered in 1859 by Dr. Livingstone, and known previously to that time only from the vaguest native rumours as the "Lake of the Maravi." It is a vast inland sea of sweet water, about 240 miles in length, from north to south, and from 20 to 60 miles in width. Its waters are of enormous depth, in some places nearly unfathomable, and have the deep-blue colour of the ocean. The shores are bold, and the country around is mountainous and richly clothed with tropical vegetation. At short distances are found picturesque bays and snug harbours, fringed with sandy beaches. It abounds in fish, and the banks, at the time of Dr. Livingstone's first visit, swarmed with negro population.

It is to this interior water, scarcely yet won from the domain of fable, that a brave little party, in a steel boat, hurriedly constructed in one of our dockyards, has just paid a flying visit, in search of tidings of our greatest African explorer, reported as having been cruelly massacred on its shores. We have been so much accustomed to long delays, fevers, and difficulties of travel in Central Africa, that the return of the Search Expedition in so short a time—about seven months since it left England—and, moreover, successful in its mission, has taken us all by surprise.

Before giving a narrative of the proceedings of the expedition, which we are able to do from authentic sources, it will be necessary to explain the previous movements of Livingstone, and the position of the localities which have become so interesting in connection with the fate of our great traveller and philanthropist.

When Dr. Livingstone left England, in August, 1865, to prepare in Bombay for his third great expedition into the interior of Africa, his object was more purely geographical than had been the case in his previous explorations, although his ulterior aim, as expressed in one of his letters, was still, as before, the amelioration of the condition of the negro tribes. He had quitted the Zambesi, on the withdrawal of the Government expedition, early in 1864, disappointed in his hopes of laying open a portion of that fine region to the blessings of lawful commerce and Christian civilisation, and returned to England with the fixed purpose of remaining only so long as required to arrange the means for again visiting Africa to carry out his cherished objects. The Council of the Geographical Society were at that time desirous of ascertaining the true extent of the great lakes of the African interior, so imperfectly made known by Burton, Speke, Livingstone himself, and Baker; and to find Livingstone disengaged was an opportunity not to be lost. An arrangement was soon made, into which the Government so far entered as to restore to Livingstone his title of consul; and thus our great African traveller departed on his new mission of exploration. His instructions, as stated by Sir Roderick Murchison, were to enter tropical Africa from the eastern coast, and examine the northern end of Lake Nyassa, and the southern end of Lake Tanganyika, so as to ascertain the true watershed, or division of the waters, of Central Africa. If Livingstone, after completing this arduous geographical task—an object great and difficult enough in itself for one journey—found the road open towards the north, the hope was expressed that he might pass from Tanganyika to Baker's Lake, Albert Nyanza, and so descend viâ the Nile to the Mediterranean.

The expedition, as we have stated, was organised in Bombay, in the winter of 1865-6, and in February it was on its way to the African coast—first to Zanzibar, where the Sultan gave the frankest assistance in carrying out its objects, and next to the mouth of the Rovuma River, a stream visited by Livingstone in his former expedition, which enters the Indian Ocean nearly in a line with the northern end of Lake Nyassa. Dr. Livingstone was the only white man of the party. The most trustworthy of his followers were seven or eight young Christian Africans, who had been educated at the Sharanpoor Mission, near Bombay, under the Rev. Mr. Price. Besides these, the Bombay Government lent a small detachment of sepoy marines, with their havildar or corporal; and a gang of nine porters were obtained from Johanna, one of the Comoro Islands, the head man of whom, named Moosa, had been with Livingstone for about two years in the previous Zambesi expedition. For beasts of burthen, besides camels, a small number of buffaloes were taken, the Doctor believing it probable that these animals might not be subject to the attacks of the tsetse-fly, which were so fatal to the native oxen. In taking animals to carry his baggage, Livingstone wished to be as independent as possible of the native porters, whose caprices and exactions are the cause of three-fourths of the delays and annoyances of an African traveller.

An Arab dhow landed the party, in the month of April, at Mikindany, a snug bay about twenty miles to the north of the Rovuma River. At this place, as well as most others on the thinly-peopled eastern coast, between Zanzibar and Mozambique, several Arab slave-traders have their establishments, and wield an influence over the corrupted semi-dependent negro tribes for some distance towards the interior, the country forming a portion of the territory of the Sultan of Zanzibar. In spite of the discouraging reports of these Arabs, Livingstone pushed his way by land towards the Rovuma, and afterwards, on reaching the river, travelled along its northern bank, through dense forests, where a way had to be cleared by the tomahawks of the Makonde negroes hired by the Doctor for the purpose. The route lay over table-land, which rises to a height of 400 to 600 feet on both sides of the Rovuma.

After several days' toilsome march, the party arrived at Ngomano, or, as the word signifies, "the confluence;" being the point where the Rovuma bifurcates, one branch, the Loendi, coming from the south-west, and the other, the Rovuma proper, from the north-west. At this place, under the protection of a friendly and intelligent negro chief named Matumora, Livingstone remained some time, and wrote a letter home, dated May 18th, 1866.

This letter is the last direct news the civilised world has received from our great English traveller, for he soon after penetrated deeper into the vast unknown interior, and little more than native hearsay accounts have come to hand. It is well known, however, that he reached in safety a place called Mataka, eleven days' journey from the junction of the Rovuma, and that he there dismissed his sepoy attendants (eleven in number), except the havildar, who remained faithful to his chief, and wrote a second despatch home; but this document never reached its destination, and it is supposed that it was intentionally withheld or destroyed by the Arab trader who had charge of it. The sepoys, who had proved a useless encumbrance to Livingstone, arrived safely at Zanzibar, giving a loose account of the places they had visited, and in course of time they were sent home to Bombay. The cargo animals of the expedition had by this time all died, and Livingstone continued forward, accompanied by his eight or nine faithful civilised Africans and his body of Johanna porters. From Mataka he may be said to have entered the portals of the unknown, mysterious African interior, and—they closed behind him.

The next news we had of Livingstone, seven months afterwards, was that he had been murdered, with four of his faithful African body-guard, by a marauding band of Mazite Zulus—a remorseless, warlike section of Caffres, who have migrated into this region—at a place situated about forty miles to the north-west of Lake Nyassa. This unwelcome intelligence was brought to the consul at Zanzibar, in December, 1866, by the eight Johanna porters and their head-man Moosa; and so circumstantial was the description of the massacre by Moosa, that no doubt was left on the minds of Dr. Seward, the acting consul, and Dr. Kirk, the vice-consul, who himself had been with Livingstone in 1859 and 1861 on Lake Nyassa, that the story was true. The despatch of Dr. Seward to Lord Stanley was worded as follows:—

Zanzibar, December 10th, 1866.

MY LORD,—I send you the saddest news. Dr. Livingstone, in his despatch from Ngomano, informed your lordship that he stood "on the threshold of the unexplored." Yet, as if that which should betide him had already thrown its shadow, he added, "It is best to say little of the future."

My lord, if the report of some fugitives from his party be true, this brave and good man has "crossed the threshold of the unexplored"—he has confronted the future, and will never return.

He was slain, so it is alleged, during a sudden and unprovoked encounter with those very Zulus of whom he says, in his despatch, that they had laid waste the country round about him, and had "swept away the food from above and in the ground." With an escort reduced to twenty by desertion, death, and dismissals, he had traversed, as I believe, that terra incognita between the confluence of the Loendi and Rovuma rivers at Ngomano, and the eastern or north-eastern littoral of Lake Nyassa; had crossed the lake at some point, as yet unascertained; had reached Mapunda, on its western shores, and was pushing west or north-west into dangerous ground, when a band of implacable Mazite savages stopped the way. They were armed with shield, broad-bladed spears, and axes. With Livingstone there were nine or ten muskets; his Johanna men were resting with their loads far in the rear. The Mazite instantly came on to fight; there was no parley, no avoidance of the combat, they came on with a rush, with war-cries and rattling on their shields their spears. As Livingstone and his party raised their pieces, their onset was for a moment checked, but only for a moment. Livingstone fired, and two Zulus were shot dead; his boys fired too, but their fire was harmless; he was in the act of reloading when three Mazite leapt upon him through the smoke. There was no resistance—there could be none—and one cruel axe-cut from behind put him out of life. He fell, and when he fell, his terror-stricken escort fled, hunted by the Mazite. One, at least, of the fugitives escaped; and he, the eye-witness, it is who tells the tale—Ali Moosa, chief of his escort of porters.

The party had left the western shores of Nyassa about five days. They were traversing a flat country broken by small hills and abundantly wooded. Indeed, the scene of the tragedy would appear to have been an open forest-glade. Livingstone, as usual, led the way, his nine or ten unpractised musketeers at his heels. Ali Moosa had nearly come up with these, having left his own Johanna men resting with their loads far in the rear. Suddenly he heard Livingstone warn the boys that the Mazite were coming; the boys in turn beckoned Moosa to press forward. Moosa saw the crowd here and there between the trees. He had just gained the party, and sunk down behind a tree to deliver his own fire, when his leader fell. Moosa fled for his life along the path he had come, meeting his Johanna men, who threw down their loads, and in a body rushed off into the deeper forest. However, at sunset, they in great fear left their forest refuge and got back to the place where they hoped to find their baggage. It was gone, and then with increasing dread they crept to where the slain traveller lay. Near him, in front, lay the grim Zulus who were killed under his sure aim; here and there lay scattered some four dead fugitives of the expedition. That one blow had killed him outright, he had no other wound but this terrible gash; it must have gone, from their description, through the neck and spine up to the throat in front, and it had nearly decapitated him. Death came mercifully in its suddenness, for David Livingstone was "ever ready." They found him stripped only of his upper clothing, for the Mazite had respected him when dead. They dug with some stakes a shallow grave, and hid from the starlight the stricken temple of a grand spirit; the body of an apostle of freedom, whose martyrdom should make sacred the shores of that sea which his labours made known to us, and which, now baptised with his life's blood, men should henceforth know as "Lake Livingstone."

The Johanna men made the best of their way back to Mapunda, not venturing near any village or station; they lost themselves in the jungle, and were fourteen days on the way. At Mapunda they witnessed the death of the havildar of sepoy, and were deprived of their weapons by the chief. Here they joined an Arab slave caravan, re-crossed the Nyassa, and made for Quiloa, the great slave outlet on the Zanzibar coast.

It will be gratifying to the many and true friends of Dr. Livingstone to learn that, when on his sad end being known, the British flag was lowered at this consulate, the French, American, and Hanseatic flags were at once flown half-mast high, the consuls paying a spontaneous tribute to his memory—an example shortly followed by all the foreign vessels in the harbour. The Sultan's flag was also lowered.

G. EDWIN SEWARD.

Such was the story related by the Johanna men to our consul and vice-consul, and a more flagrant example of African unveracity could not be cited. Except the names of the places and the order of their position on the line of march, the whole narrative has been now proved, by the Search Expedition to be an audacious falsehood. Not only is the story of the massacre a pure invention, but Moosa appears to have misled Dr. Kirk with regard to the locality of it, or in reality, the place where he deserted his master; for instead of being near the north end of Lake Nyassa, it turns out to have been near the south end, or 300 miles in a contrary direction. When the despatches of the consul and vice-consul, who held out no hope that the story might be untrue arrived in England, in March, 1867, it is known that there were some persons high in authority, who entirely disbelieved the account; but they saw no reason to doubt that the line of march was substantially correct, and thought that Livingstone, after the desertion of his porters, continued journeying towards the southern end of Tanganyika Lake, having settled the position of the northern end of Nyassa, according to his instructions. But we must now proceed to the narrative of Mr. Young's Search Expedition, which has cleared up much that was before uncertain, although Livingstone's whereabouts at the present time still remains a mystery.

The principal disbeliever in the Johanna men's story—and the disbelievers formed a small minority—was, fortunately, Sir Roderick Murchison, President of the Royal Geographical Society, who was in the position of being able to influence the Government to equip an expedition to Lake Nyassa, and set at rest all doubts on the matter. As Livingstone was supposed to have marched nearly due west from the mouth of the Rovuma to the northern end of the lake, it was at first thought that a small party, lightly equipped, might reach the spot by land, following Livingstone's own track; but we English are a seafaring nation and lovers of water, and it being known that there was water communication, by way of the Zambesi and Shiré rivers, all the way to the head of Lake Nyassa, to within a few miles of the scene of the reported massacre, it was resolved to send a small party in a boat along that route. A worthy leader of such an enterprise was soon found in Mr. E. D. Young, a superior warrant-officer in the English navy, who had been with Livingstone two years on the former Zambesi expedition—was acquainted with the natives on the rivers, and, moreover, loved dearly his noble-hearted chief. He knew well, also, the Johanna man Moosa, and had his reasons for believing his story to be entirely false. Mr. Young, when sent for, willingly accepted the post offered to him, and, being limited in forming his party to three persons out of some eighty persons who volunteered their services, chose Mr. Henry Faulkner, a young gentleman who had had experience in tropical climates, as his second in command; Mr. Reid, an intelligent shipwright of Glasgow, who had also formerly been with Livingstone, as mechanic; and Mr. Buckley, a seaman, whose duty it would be to direct the negro crew. The naval authorities ordered a steel boat to be built, of the dimensions proposed by Mr. Young, and so rapidly were the preparations pushed forward, that the expedition was able to leave England by the Cape mail steamer on the 11th of June last.

The boat was built in the navy-yard at Chatham, and formed of a large number of separate pieces for facility of land carriage, none of which was to weigh more than fifty pounds. It had two masts and sails, and was large enough to accommodate twenty-five persons, with their arms, luggage, and a quantity of goods wherewith to pay the wages of the negro crews and to purchase provisions. It was built in sections, to enable it to be carried by land past the cataracts of the river Shiré, which interrupt for a distance of more than fifty miles the navigation of that fine river, and so present an insurmountable obstacle to direct communication by water with Lake Nyassa. It is necessary to explain here that the Shiré issues as a broad, navigable stream from the southern end of Lake Nyassa, and, after a course from north to south of about 280 miles, enters the great Zambesi, not far from its mouth in the Indian Ocean. Mr. Young with his companions, his boat, and his luggage, were to be landed by an English man-of-war in the desolate mangrove swamps at the mouth of the Zambesi, and were then to make their way as best they could to the head of Lake Nyassa—a distance, by river and lake, of no less than 660 miles. The climate was known to be dangerous to Europeans, for Mr. Young himself had assisted at the burial of many a noble fellow—members of Livingstone's former expedition, or of the Universities' Mission, on the shores of the streams. War and mistrust, famine and pestilence, chiefly caused by the slave-hunting incursions of half-caste Portuguese and Arabs, created perennial disorder in the regions to be traversed; but the brave little search party heeded none of these dangers, and their leader especially kept his one object steadily in view, confident of success.

(Drawn by M. ELLEN EDWARDS.)

"At last a maid with a wand of flame Passed by the greenwood tree"—p. 476.

(To be continued.)

RELIGION IN THE HOME.

BY THE REV. W. B. MACKENZIE, M.A., INCUMBENT OF ST. JAMES'S, HOLLOWAY.

HOME DISCIPLINE.

HERE are critical periods in every one's lifetime, when things assume a new aspect, and the character and habits become permanently changed. Communities, too, undergo observable changes. These are not now brought about by the parade of military greatness, or the decrees of legislation, but by the spread of sound knowledge, the cultivation of social virtue, and the growth of religious principles. It is admitted on all hands that the present is a critical period, like the turn of the tide, in the development of our national character. The marvellous prosperity of the last few years—checked just now only for a short time, as we trust—has immensely multiplied our social advantages and given a new impulse to men's minds; while national education, every day becoming more urgent and appreciated, is placing agencies of power within the reach of all; and the wider dissemination of legislative privilege cannot fail to stimulate the aspirations of the people.

It is seriously questioned, however, whether the religion of the age is keeping pace with its social progress. I am aware that it is not easy to form a sound conclusion upon a subject so sacred and interior; but signs are not wanting which betray a spirit of widespread alienation from the public observances of religion, while sentiments and practices gain ready acceptance which are hostile to the truth and spirit of the Bible.

To what quarter, then, can we look for the deeper growth of Scripture knowledge, and the pervading influence of personal religion? Not to the erection of new churches and chapels merely, from which multitudes of all ranks either absent themselves altogether, or avowedly disparage public religious instruction as unequal to the demands of the age. National education, too, however widely extended or religiously administered, can but indirectly influence the grown-up population; nor can we expect that religious literature will ever become aggressive enough to control the ever-active agencies of evil, and mould the national character after the mind of Christ.

Our best hopes are in promoting religion in the home. If its blessings can be introduced into the home circle, and the atmosphere of our households made fragrant with its refreshing truths and virtues; if the duties of the Fifth Commandment, to which reference was made in the former paper, be carried out, and the harmonies of a Christian household known and appreciated, then we might cherish the hopes of a bright future, where social virtue would keep pace with national prosperity, and "truth and justice, religion and piety, would be established among us for all generations."

But how is religion to be introduced into the home, and when can it be brought in with the best hope of success? To this there can be only one answer: It must begin at the beginning. If the "honourable estate" which originates the home be "taken in hand unadvisedly, lightly," and not "reverently, discreetly, advisedly, soberly, and in the fear of God," as the Church wisely prescribes for an event so permanent and sacred, no one can be surprised if the seeds of thoughtlessness and folly should yield a harvest of wretched disappointment, which must be embittered every year by fresh aggravations.

It is said that marriage is a lottery, and that no one can tell beforehand what the one party or the other may turn out. It matters not whether this sentiment owes its origin to the unhappy victims of inconsiderate passion, or to cynical celibates who purposely disparage the "vow and covenant" of "holy wedlock," and stand contemptuously aloof from its sacred obligations; the contrary is, in most cases, the undeniable truth, that marriage is no lottery, but a step deliberately taken, of which the consequences "for better or for worse" may be reasonably foreseen. What people turn out to be when surrounded with the responsibilities of married life, is only the fuller development of what they were before they entered upon it. The marriage state possesses no mysterious power to transform the character of either party. The smiles and sunshine of bridal seasons create no permanent element in which future years are to be spent. A man's habits and sentiments, which have already fixed themselves and made him what he is, will inevitably reappear in his new home, and give their colouring to its condition and prospects. Experience lends its sanction to the maxim, that they who stand highest in the esteem and endearments of their own family are best fitted to enter upon the sacred duties of married life. The habits of home life may be regarded as a tolerably safe and easy test of character. It would keep many a young woman from entering upon a perilous career for which no amount of future regret can make amends, to remember that he is likely to prove the best husband who secured a high position for himself in the affectionate esteem of his father's house; and in making his selection of a companion for life, if in that great event he shall possess the wise discernment to choose one whose sterling virtues already adorn her home and augment its happiness, he is not likely to be disappointed if he transfer personal accomplishments like these to flourish in a still happier and more congenial soil.

That home is unquestionably formed under the brightest auspices in which both parents are religious. There may possibly be some religion, where the husband feels no sympathy, and only "minds earthly things." Religion may find entrance into a home where even the wife makes no effort to promote it, but seeks rather to imbue her household with adverse influences. Still, there can be no healthy religious growth in any home unless both parents daily contribute to its diligent cultivation. It is a tender plant—not the indigenous growth of this sinful, ungenial world—and can only be preserved in any heart by "giving all diligence," and "walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord." No mere form without the reality is of any value. A hasty observer may be deceived by the plausible appearances of home religion, just as an inexperienced touch may mistake the precise character of the pulse; but the finger of a skilful practitioner will easily ascertain the true state of things: conditions which another would overlook, are clear indications to him of the presence of disease with which he must skilfully grapple. It is not difficult to discover the religion of parents by the condition of their household; where it is healthy and vigorous, it will show itself in the equal, regular, steady pulsations throughout the family; whereas any defect or irregularity in their religious life, will be indicated by intermittent, feverish feebleness in the religious conduct of children and servants.

The father, obviously, occupies the position of greatest responsibility for good or for evil. His character will, to a great extent, mould or mar the character of the household. No other example can take such hold, no other power can make itself so strongly and observably felt. It is supremely important, therefore, that the religious element in him should be genuine and real. Anything assumed, or merely exhibited occasionally in seasons of excitement, but not dwelling abidingly in the heart, has no influence upon the home circle, nor can it permanently continue. A man's religion is seen at home just as it is, and is set down at its true value. He may deceive others, and even himself; but he cannot succeed in deceiving his own household. Nor is any discovery so baneful and discouraging to young and ardent minds, as the insincerity of their father's religion. On the other hand, if it be genuine and sincere, and every day's observation adds to their conviction that it is genuine, though by no means perfect, it is appreciated with an ever-increasing thankfulness, while it is welcome and refreshing as the "healthful dew" to their spiritual growth, and yields strength and encouragement to them who "daily endeavour themselves to follow the example" of a father so endearingly honoured and cheerfully obeyed.

Side by side with the religious influence of the father, and in some respects still stronger, is the personal religion of the mother. It may be less demonstrative in its operation, but more continuous. The father's presence is much withdrawn from the home circle, and his energies are necessarily spent upon other things. This inevitable lack of service is supplied by the mother, to whom her loved and loving household is the scene of daily and ever-recurring anxieties. For some years, combining the duties of parent and teacher, the sharer of their little sorrows, and the source of numberless daily enjoyments, she is ever among them, the first at their bedside, at the break of day, to hear the morning hymn, and prompt the glad thanksgiving to their "Father in heaven," and their last companion in the evening, teaching them to pray for forgiving mercy and preserving care.

A home begun in this way is formed after a model so wise and holy, and united by endearments so firm and sacred, "binding the hearts of the parents to the children, and the hearts of children to the parents," while parents and children are alike united in bonds of holy relationship to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the One Family in Him, may look forward with assured confidence that the chequered and uncertain future can bring no real harm to them.

Such parents may gather their children around a dying bed, in the confident persuasion of their safety and abiding welfare. They have sought, by godly example, by Scripture teaching, and all other appliances of Christian agency, to plant the seeds of saving knowledge in their hearts, and watered them by prayer with and for their children, and when they must leave them to pursue life's journey alone, they can commit them to the guardian care of their heavenly Father, in the assurance that He will keep them from the evils of the world, and enable them to "lead the rest of their life according to this beginning," that "steadfast in faith, joyful in hope, and rooted in charity," they may withstand the assaults of coming temptation, and "so pass the waves of this troublesome world, that finally they may come to His everlasting kingdom."

UNDER THE GREENWOOD TREE.

DREAMED a dream of a summer's day,
Under the greenwood tree,—
O lady mine, I pray divine
My vision unto me.
The stream flowed rippling at my feet,
The wind moved in the trees;
I saw many a bird, but no voice I heard
Of stream, or bird, or breeze.

A wizard came and touched mine ear,
Under the greenwood tree;
Then all around I heard the sound
Of wondrous melody.
Linnet and lark, and babbling wave,
And the sportive summer breeze
Shaking out song, as he moved along,
From the rustling leaves of trees.

Then I poured my soul in a flood of song,
Under the greenwood tree;
I could not fain but sing the strain,
In my spirit's ecstasy.
But that mystic chant no language spoke—
'Twas like speechless song of birds;
Nor shaped my tongue the sounds it flung:
'Twas music without words.

At last a maid with a wand of flame
Passed by the greenwood tree,
And she touched my heart till I felt the smart
That pierced it painfully;
Then my song broke out in sweet sad words,
To speak them I may not dare—
Ah! lady tell, what meant that spell
Or who was the maiden fair?

J. F. WALLER.

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER III.

ALICE.

AM very glad to see you again; very glad, indeed!"

"Thank you, Miss Alice, I am sure the old place will be all the better, to my way of thinking, now you are come back."

She was standing on the platform. Her hands were in her sable muff, and a tippet of sable fell almost to her feet. She wore a hat with a long black feather, and her veil was thrown back, and the wind was blowing in her face. She was like the Sylvesters. She had the same cast of features as they had. She had the clear complexion, the full, dark eye of her race; and her eye had all the fire that theirs had.

But there was something different about her, too. She was speaking to the old coachman, who, as he boasted, had lived in the family eight-and-forty years. Not a single Sylvester had ever unbent to him save Miss Alice. The old man thought his young mistress was a very model of perfection: and perhaps he was not the only one who thought so.

"She seems to know that, after all, we are flesh and blood," he would say. "New, my lady and the rest of 'em haven't happened to find that out yet. Maybe they will some of these days."

Alice Sylvester had found it out, and I will just, in a few words, tell the reader how. Some years ago Alice heard a sermon. No matter where, or under what circumstances. I wish simply to relate that she heard it.

Her heart had been very proud and lifted up when the sermon began. She sat there, among the great ones, in her sweeping silks and jewels—the Sylvesters could always afford these—in the flush of youth and beauty, with an imperious smile upon her face, Alice had sat and listened.

It was a sermon on humility; not a barren discourse, full of trite sayings, and the old well-known assertions. He who preached had no need to take up with these; he had something better to say. He told his hearers of One who had alone been humble. None other had; for humility does not grow on earth. That One had been Divine. And he brought out a simple history, grand in its simplicity, and very touching; and he told it. It was the history of Christ!

Then the imperious smile faded; then the proud knees bowed; then the heart softened: things that take place not unfrequently when the preacher is true to his great mission, and displays it, and it only, to the eyes of a sin-stricken world. From that hour Alice Sylvester became humble!

We do not dwell on this episode in her life, momentous as it was: the subject is too solemn. But we mention it, to show of what source came her humility, and of what mettle it was made.

She was young still—very young; all the freshness and gladness of youth was upon her. We cannot help but wonder what her fate will be!

She was standing on the platform, speaking to the old man, whose eyes were gladdened by the sight of her, when a figure came hurriedly up. She sprang forward eagerly, "Raymond, dearest Raymond!"

"Alice!" and he stooped down to kiss her; "come here, child," drawing her away. "How is it that I find my sister in conversation with a servant?" He spoke coldly, and as if he were displeased: and he spoke with an air of authority, too.

Alice laughed softly. "Are we so proud yet, Raymond?" said she, looking up at him.

"Not proud, Alice; but we should know our true position."

They had gone into the waiting-room, which was empty, but where a great fire was blazing. Alice threw her muff on the table, and stood by the fire, her hands clasped. "What is our position, Raymond—better, or worse, than it used to be?"

A touch of sarcasm was in her eye as she said it. You could see by the curve of the mouth she was as resolute as he was.

"You will soon answer that question for yourself, Alice."

He spoke in the old, bitter tone she knew so well. She knew it all, this girl of eighteen—the shifts, the evasions, the ceaseless dodging with evils, that gathered thick and threatening on every hand. The putting from them, steadily, God's law of labour; the splendid poverty, the tottering fabric accepted instead, and clung to. Yes! Alice knew it all. She had gone from it; she was now come back to it—to nothing else! Her hands tightened in their clasp as she stood a moment, her eyes cast down. Then she took up her muff, and said, in a quick, sharp tone, "Come, Raymond, I am longing to see my mother."

"Why, that is Alice Sylvester's voice! Now, who would have thought it? And Mr. Raymond as well. I beg pardon—Mr. Sylvester, now," and here was a slight sigh of condolence. "How delighted I am; how do you both do?"

And a voluminous lady, dressed with great splendour in satins and ermine, came rustling in.

"How do you both do? Alice come home, I suppose. Well, of course, I ought to have known. And I did know, but really my poor head forgets everything. I'm in such a whirl, you know, dear," addressing Alice, who had drawn back with the nearest approach she could make to the Sylvester hauteur. "The house is fuller than full!"

"There is every excuse, I am sure," said Alice, with a freezing smile, and moving slowly towards the door.

"Stay, Alice; you are in too great a hurry. We can, perhaps, be of some service to Mrs. Brooklyn," said Raymond, who had displayed far more attention and forbearance than his sister.

"No service, thank you; my servants are here. I came to meet dear old Sir Hugh. He sent me word he should reach Newbury by the nine train. Shockingly late for an unprotected widow to be out," and Mrs. Brooklyn gave a little sigh; "but dear Sir Hugh is such a terrible invalid, and so devotedly fond of me, and will be in such raptures to be met, and I have had such millions of things to do in the town, that really I thought—— But there; Alice wants to see her mamma, so you had better go."

"I have not seen mamma for a year," said Alice, quietly.

"Then pray go. I do not want anybody; I shall make myself quite comfortable;" and she settled herself, with all her ermines and velvets, in the most capacious chair she could find. "I am dying with impatience to see you go!"

"If that is the case, the sooner I am gone the better," said Alice, with a little of the Sylvester ring in her voice. And go she did, before Raymond; for Raymond, inscrutable as it seemed, lingered some minutes.

"Raymond, how can you endure to be civil to that odious woman?" cried Alice, impatiently, when he had taken his seat beside her.

"Because I am a gentleman, and because she is a lady," replied Raymond, shortly.

"A lady! Now, Raymond, you are more acute than I am; I had not discovered that fact."

"At all events, she is a woman of fortune and of position; and one of our best neighbours, Alice. As such you must accept her, please."

"One can't account for antipathies, I suppose, any more than sympathies," said Alice; "but that woman always makes me shudder."

Raymond did not answer. One of the fastenings of the window required his immediate attention.

"She is so pretentious, and so——"

"Now, Alice, where is your charity?"

"Left behind, I suppose," said she, with a short laugh. "At all events, we had better change the subject. You have not told me half I want to know about mamma."

"What do you want to know?"

"Everything—how she is, how she looks," cried Alice, impulsively. "You must feel how earnestly I have wished to be with her again."

"That was very good of you, dear Alice. Mamma is just the same as usual."

"And quite settled and happy?"

She turned and looked at him as she spoke. Yes, there was a striking likeness between the brother and the sister; nothing could be more so.

"Settled and happy," repeated Raymond, as if mechanically.

"Yes; those old troubles, are they gone? I thought they might have been by this time."

Raymond shook his head.

"But better, Raymond, surely better? Time must have done something."

She spoke eagerly; her beautiful face was flushed. "Time does nothing, Alice. What can he do in a case like ours?"

"Why not, Raymond? why not?"

"Because"—and he spoke slowly and with bitterness—"there are certain things, Alice, that never stop. Their nature is to progress. Decay is one; ruin is one; and the doom of the Sylvesters is another!"

She gave a little shudder. A blank, dreary look came into the face that had been so bright and so hopeful. She did not answer; she drew her wrappers round her, and shrank into a corner. He did not speak either, and the carriage rolled on in silence.

As they neared the great house, standing bleak on the common, another carriage whirled past them. It did not go so fast, but that a face, surmounted by nodding plumes, showed itself at the window—a face all radiant with smiles of recognition. Alice did not move from her corner. Raymond bowed with stately politeness. It was Mrs. Brooklyn, of Brooklyn Hall.

CHAPTER IV.

GOING BEFORE THE WIND.

"AND I don't care who hears me say it; and you know it yourself at the bottom of your heart; you're just fit to hold up your head with anybody!"

"I don't dispute it, mother, seeing I'm nigh on six feet two," replied John Humphreys, composedly.

"Then why don't you set more store by yourself, John?" replied the old woman, who did not in the least understand the sarcasm.

"I don't think I'm amiss for that either, mother."

"Yes, you are, John. You're that humble, you'd let people tread on you, if it wasn't for me!"

His mother was a very little woman, and John was half a giant. He just glanced at her as she made this remark, and shrugged his shoulders.

"John, I will have my say, and then I've done. I'm not one of those who go nagging on for ever. What I do maintain is, that a lad like you might have the pick of the village if he liked, instead of which——"

"And so I have had the pick of the village, mother."

"Instead of which—oh, bless my life! how head-long young people are now-a-days!" cried Mrs. Humphreys, lifting up her hands—"instead of which, you've just gone and married the first girl that offered."

"Rachel did not offer; and I'm not married," said John, laughing.

"No, you are not; that's the only good thing about it!"

John bit his lip. "Mother," said he, the crimson flush getting deeper, "we need not go over the ground again. I love Rachel. I have loved her for this ten years. There is not such a girl to be found in the whole county, I don't care where you look for her. She is God-fearing; she is thrifty; she is industrious. She has been the best of daughters, the best of sisters, and I could stake my life she'll make the best of wives. And my wife she shall be, God willing, before another month is over!"

"Humph!" replied the old woman. "It's all very fine; you've fallen in love, and there's no arguing with you. But what I look at is, here's Rachel without a penny."

"So much the better, mother. She is a treasure!"

"No; it is not so much the better," cried the old woman, irritably; "it's so much the worse; when there's Selina Fowler, at the 'White Lion,' with a hundred——"

"Mother, I cannot bear it," said John, stamping his foot; "if you mention that girl's name again I shall fairly take to my heels!"

"She is not a girl," replied the old woman, disdainfully; "she is a young lady, who wears a silk gown of an afternoon, and has her hair in a—what d'ye call it?—as big as anybody's and sits in the parlour and plays on the piano, and knows French—she does, John; you needn't look as if you didn't believe it."

"I do believe it, mother: and I believe, too, that she's much too fine a lady for plain John Humphreys, who does not know one tune from another, and can't speak a word beyond his mother tongue, Heaven bless it! But hark! there's some one at the door."

He got up, and stepped into the little brick passage. There was a sound of the front door being unbolted, and a few minutes after John came in again.

"Mother, I've got a gentleman on business in the parlour, so please don't wait supper."

"Yes, I shall wait supper; and what is he come about?" said the old woman, rather peevishly.

But John had gone back to the parlour.

There was no fire, and the little barely-furnished room looked very cold and dismal. A candle stood on the table that threw a feeble light around. But John liked to transact business privately, and without the interference of his mother: for his mother, good soul, had a heart better than her head, and she teased him now and then past endurance.

His visitor, a burly man with a compact frame, and a keen eye that peered at you from under bushy eyebrows, had taken his seat on one side of the table. John sat down on the other.

"Well, Mr. Humphreys, I think this business of ours would be all the better for settling," began the burly man.

"So it would, Mr. Isaacs, no doubt," replied John. "And I've been thinking——"

"You need not tell me what you've been thinking, because, you see, thinking has gone on long enough," interrupted the burly man. "Now I'm for acting—I am."

"What do you propose?" asked John, quietly.

"Well, that you was off, or on, I'm not particular which, Mr. Humphreys. I've got another customer for my farm."

"Indeed!" said John with some anxiety.

"Yes, a good un too, as is ready with his money."

John was silent. So was the burly man for a few minutes.

"Who is he?" asked John, at length.

"That's neither here nor there. I tell you he's mad after the farm; he's got his lawyer, and they'd have clapped me up there and then, if they could."

"Would they?" said John, absently. He felt, as he afterwards confessed, "a bit bothered."

"Yes, indeed, they would. Them's the chaps to do business. But I've held off till to-morrow morning. I'd hard work to do it; but I thought of you."

"I am sure I'm obliged to you," replied John, still slowly, and speaking like a man who wishes to gain time; "but it seems, for all that, as if I were not ready to give you an answer."

"Then you give it up," said the other, rising.

"Oh, no I don't! Sit down, Mr. Isaacs. I would not give it up on any account."

"You'd be silly if you did. It's the nicest, snuggest, best bit of land you'd ever have the chance of meeting with in your life, John Humphreys."

"I know it," said John, laconically.

"Why don't you buy it then? The old man left you a tidy bit of money. Everybody knows that."

"Yes, he did; but, you see, somehow, that money hasn't come to hand as it should," said John, in a dubious tone.

"Why hasn't it?"

"You see," said John, glancing round and lowering his voice, "there's part of it I can't, for the life of me, get in."

"Not get in—from where?"

"It's been borrowed," returned John, cautiously.

"And have you got a proper bond?"

"Yes—oh, yes!"

"Well, then, nothing is easier. Any effects?"

"I should think there are," said John, indignantly.

"Easier still. Put the people in the court; they'd pay fast enough."

"I don't know, I'm sure," said John, dubiously; "they are not quite so easy to manage as you think."

"You are sure the bond is legal?"

"Oh, yes!"

"And effects?"

"Oh, yes! I told you so."

"Well, then, perhaps you could sell your bond?"

John shook his head.

"Oh, very well. I don't profess to understand your private affairs, Mr. Humphreys. At any rate, I see one thing plainly. You give up the farm;" and he laid hold of his hat, which stood on the table beside him.

"Pray don't be in a hurry!" exclaimed John. "I am really most anxious to have the farm, if I only knew how."

"How! nothing is more simple. Get your money."

"I could not do that, immediately," replied John, unlocking a desk.

"Very well; borrow, and let your bond be security."

"That is my bond," said John, producing it as if in sheer desperation.

The burly man pounced upon it as a hawk might upon a sparrow.

"Sylvester! Why, you never mean to tell me——"

"I do," cried John, impatiently. "The old man borrowed of my father."

"Ah! they are on their last legs; and when the building's coming down they are glad of who will to prop it up. Still, the bond's safe enough," and he turned it over and over, and held it so near the candle, John almost fancied it smoked. "Safe as a church!"

"You think so?"

"Oh, yes, there's a deal to be got through yet; and even if the crash came, I think there would be no risk of losing it all. Have you dunned them well?"

"As well as I know how," said John, laughing.

"Well, now you have made a clean breast of it, I know what I'm about. I should not mind lending you a few hundreds myself on that bond."

"You?"

"Yes, me."

"I am sure you are very good," said John, his spirits rising.

"Yes. I know your heart's set on the farm—and you are a neighbour, and one likes to oblige one's friends. Besides, there's a tidy house on the farm that will suit you under present circumstances," said the burly man, trying to be jocose.

John's honest cheek crimsoned a little. He knew the burly man was alluding to his intended marriage with Rachel.

"And the other customer is a stranger; and, between ourselves, I would quite as soon he didn't have it," said Mr. Isaacs, nodding his head confidentially.

"Then perhaps you would wait?" said John, eagerly, and catching at a straw.

"No! I won't! I won't wait any longer. I want to get the concern off my hands. I'll sell it to one or other of you before to-morrow's out."

John sighed as if in despair.

"I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll accommodate you if you're inclined to take the offer. Come, it's a capital offer; I shan't make it again."

John had a fit of serious perplexity. What was he to do? The farm was just what he wanted—it would set him up in fact, as Mr. Isaacs observed; and if he accepted the offer of accommodation, it would be only a temporary matter. The mere working of the farm would pay the debt, for the land was excellent, and in capital order. Besides, he would get the money from the Sylvesters, even if he proceeded to extremities. And as Mr. Isaacs said, the bond was safe as a church.

There was an old saying which rang in John's ears, "He who goes a borrowing, goes a sorrowing;" but John did not think the saying applied to him—and perhaps it did not. He was young, energetic, industrious; and this chance let slip, he might wait a long time before another presented itself.

At any rate, the two men did not part without, as Mr. Isaacs observed, business having been done in a satisfactory manner.

The farm belonged to John Humphreys; and as for the Sylvesters, he had made up his mind to proceed to extremities!

(To be continued.)

THE PUNISHMENT.

MISS TUPPER was going away to India. She had been teacher in the Hilldown school for many years, and when it was known she would soon leave, the grief of her pupils was very great; for, from the eldest to the youngest, they all loved her dearly.

It had been proposed by the girls of the upper school, to club together and buy a keepsake for her. Each brought her money, and handed it over to the eldest scholar. When the children of the lower school heard of this good idea, they contributed, and the eldest among them was chosen to act as manager.

Monday was the day fixed for the presentation of the upper school, Tuesday for the lower. On Wednesday they were all to meet at Miss Tupper's house for the last time before her leaving.

Monday passed off grandly; and Miss Tupper smiled kindly through her tears, when she read the pretty letter of gratitude and good wishes which accompanied the handsome inkstand.

The little girls were busy in their room, preparing for the next day. There came the question, who should present their gift? a few said the youngest; but the greater number were for the eldest, Martha Ryder, the manager. She readily undertook the charge.

There was only one other matter to settle, and that was, what would be said when the present should be handed to Miss Tupper.

They disputed over it some time, when Martha said, "I am getting quite cross at the silly things you are talking about. Why can't you leave it to me?"

Now that would not do, for each little girl thought she had a right to help in the speech-making. Their voices were getting louder and louder; the smiles had faded, leaving only a cloud on the before happy faces.

"Please stop talking," said quiet little Ellen Ryle. "I am sure it is not right to get angry over good Miss Tupper's present; she would rather not have one, if we quarrel over it."

But the talking went on till it was time to leave; they tried to make it up, but Martha would not, and went away grumbling. They all declared they had never seen her so cross before.

On Tuesday Miss Tupper was invited into the schoolroom. She took the chair she saw intended for her, the children drew their forms up and closed about her.

They sat quite still, waiting for the sound of the bell from the next room, a sign for them all to rise, and Martha to enter with the pretty workbasket, which formed their offering of love and respect. They sat still a long time, when Ellen Ryle timidly rose, opened the door and looked in. There was no Martha, and the basket was gone! Inquiries were soon made; Martha had been seen by the elder girls leaving the room, apparently very quietly; but as soon as she was a little distance away, she ran as fast as possible. They said she had nothing in her hands.

The children cried sadly when Ellen came back, they were obliged to tell their kind friend all about what they were going to do, and also of the disagreement.

Miss Tupper took them all home to her house; she talked kindly to them, and at last they seemed to have almost forgotten their trouble, and joined in the games she arranged for them; and when eight o'clock came, the time for separating, they wondered very much how they could have been so happy after their great disappointment.

"Good-bye, dear children," said Miss Tupper; "you will come to-morrow with the other girls, and I hope we shall see Martha, and know what has caused this mistake."

After tea on Wednesday, Miss Tupper gave her scholars an interesting account of the workers she was going to join in India; and showed them pictures of the house she would live in, and the school. Games of different kinds were kept up till near leave-taking, then each girl was presented with a book, as a keepsake, and also two ornaments for their schoolrooms.

Teacher and pupils were just going to say good-bye for the last time, when a woman hastily entered, and asked to see Miss Tupper.

"Please, ma'am, will you come with me? my little girl is raving as if she would go mad. She says this is the last time she can see you; she begged me to bring you back at once."

Miss Tupper followed Mrs. Ryder—for she it was—into Martha's room. There lay the poor girl, in the greatest distress. She said she could not let her teacher leave without owning her fault, and asking whether she could be forgiven. She told how she had hidden the present, and run away to the fields to think over the disappointment the girls would have, and how well it would serve them right; but when she saw them coming home, talking so happily of the pleasant evening they had spent at Miss Tupper's house, she felt much more jealous and angry, because she had no satisfaction. They had not felt as she meant they should, and it seemed to her as if she had been the sufferer. She could not sleep all night, the bitter feeling of revenge was getting stronger and stronger. "They shall feel it," she said.

Next day her head burned; she felt sick, and was obliged to go to bed. While lying there, she thought how to-morrow Miss Tupper would be gone, and hot tears ran down her cheeks, the bad feelings grew weaker and weaker; but her trouble was increasing with the knowledge of her wrong-doing.

That evening, Miss Tupper did all she could to soothe her; and in the morning the girls called and gave their free forgiveness. Poor Martha did not feel herself on a happy equality with them for some time; but those who have truly forgiven, gradually forget, and in the course of time, no one remembered the affair but Martha herself; and she thanked God for the lesson.

M. E. W.

THE GUY R

— Saturday, April 18, 1868. —

(Drawn by G. J. PINWELL.)

"The golden coin began to pour over the edge of his turban."—p. 432.

THE GOLDEN MELON.

BY WILLIAM DUTHIE, AUTHOR OF "A TRAMP'S WALLET," ETC.

ON the great square of Cairo lay Zenoab the porter, resting his head upon his basket. He had been rudely awakened from slumber.

"What a delicious dream!" he murmured to himself.

"Come, friend Zenoab!" shouted a loud voice in his ear. "It is time. Get up, man; to work."

"I have had a dream fit for a sultan," answered the drowsy porter. "Let me alone, Aminash."

"Will thy dream fill thy pocket, drone?" demanded his companion. "Get up! Come with me to the bazaar."

"I have no heart to work. If my dream had only been true! I thought I was an emir."

"Take thy basket, and come with me: a rich merchant from Damascus will fill it for thee, so long as thou canst stand or carry—that will be better than dreaming."

"Leave me alone," replied Zenoab, curling himself up on the stones. "Oh, for the end of my dream!"

"Sleep then, lazy dog!" cried the angry Aminash, as he turned away; "I will find a better comrade."

Zenoab took no heed of these parting words, but buried his face in his hands. He pondered over his vision of greatness and wealth. Presently, as he lay deeply occupied in thought, a light hand was laid upon his shoulder, and a deep, rich voice bade him rise up.

"Load thy basket with these water-melons," said the voice.

Zenoab reluctantly obeyed, and saw before him a broad-shouldered man, with a swarthy visage and a white beard. He was attired in a superb fashion. For a moment the disturbed sleeper hesitated, but only for a moment; then he knelt upon the ground, and filled his basket with the fruit which lay close at his hand. The dark man motioned the porter to follow him. Zenoab, awed by his looks, obeyed without a word, and was soon tracing the footsteps of his new master through the narrow streets of the city. Never had he carried a burden with such ease. He tripped lightly under the load; for full as his basket was of large, ripe fruit, he scarcely felt its weight.

"If all water-melons were like these," soliloquised Zenoab, "I should never grow tired. It is the heavy burdens that kill me, and make me so fond of sleeping."

Presently his new master stopped before a gate, through which they were admitted by the porter who watched within, into a stone courtyard.

"Empty thy basket on the ground," said the dark man, in a deep, solemn voice; "choose one for thyself, and depart."

This was not the reward for which Zenoab had laboured; but the voice of the speaker struck upon his heart with an authority which seemed beyond dispute. He placed the melons on the stones without a word, made his choice, and with a salaam departed.

Placing the melon in the hollow of his arm, Zenoab grasped his basket with the other hand, and made by the nearest way for home. Soon, however, a strange phenomenon attracted his attention. The melon was growing heavier as he walked! At first he doubted whether this effect was not produced by the weariness of his arm; but so rapidly and so intolerably did the weight of the melon increase, that he was soon forced to abandon this idea.

"Great is Allah!" exclaimed the astonished melon-bearer. "Is this the fruit of God or of the Evil One?"

Unable any longer to support the weight, he let the melon fall to the ground. It struck the earth with a splitting sound, and parting into two, there poured from it a heap of golden coin!

Zenoab stood for a while gazing at the treasure in speechless amazement; then dropping cautiously upon one knee, he stretched forth his hand and touched it with his fingers. It was real solid gold! Once assured of this fact, he burst into the most extravagant exclamations of joy. He chuckled, he crowed, and finally, sitting upon the ground, began to count the rich prize into his turban. His hand trembled as he did so; the unexpected sight of so much wealth bewildered him, and he feared lest he should suddenly find it a delusion.

Grasping his turban with both hands, he again started forward, leaving his basket behind him. He looked neither to the right nor to the left, but held his direct course homewards. Again the same miracle seemed about to repeat itself. He felt his turban rapidly increasing in weight, so that it threatened soon to bear him to the earth.

The eyes of Zenoab glistened as he thought of the treasure which was growing in his hands, and he looked eagerly about for some place in which to unburden himself. He felt that it was impossible he could reach his own poor habitation.

He had chosen an unfrequented road, and now saw before him a mansion, which had been despoiled by the officers of the state, and left tenantless. Its solitary situation and shattered appearance made it a timely retreat in his extremity. Here he could deposit his strangely-acquired riches, for the present at least, and it might possibly afford him a hiding-place in the future. He thrust open the door, closed it carefully behind him, and made for the innermost apartments of the house. As he reached the central hall, the weight of his treasure became greater than he could bear. The golden coin began to pour over the edge of his turban; and at length he dropped on one knee upon the ground, scattering his yellow stream before him.

Never before had his eyes been feasted by such a sight. Each coin seemed to smile in his face; the brightness of the gold dazzled him. Careless or forgetful of further precaution, Zenoab threw himself upon the ground, intent upon gathering his treasure together. The smile of avarice shone in his face; the chuckle of uncontrolled joy sounded in his throat. Pile after pile he laid the coins together as he counted them; pile after pile they increased before his eyes. Every single piece grew into a heap. He was surrounded by a glittering mass. His heart leapt within him; he knew not how to contain himself. A thousand visions of pleasure gleamed through his mind; unlimited power seemed within his grasp. He clasped his hands together in the excess of his delight. The tears of joy rolled down his burning cheeks.

The floor was hidden by the treasure; momentarily it increased in height around him. Now it was at his waist; and still it rose and rose like the flowing tide. Now he was immersed in the flood up to his armpits; and all around him shone a yellow, glistening sea of gold. Zenoab strove to raise himself, but could not move a limb. He laboured with his hands to heap up the metallic stream on either side. In vain! His strength forsook him, and the gold pressed like a stone against his breast.

Then a panic seized upon his heart. A deadly pallor overspread his face; the smile passed from his lips; the chuckle of gladness died in his throat. The golden flood would overwhelm him! he should be drowned beneath its waves! His eyes started from their sockets, and glared with the intensest fear. His throat swelled with the almost vain attempt to breathe; his teeth ground themselves together in agony. Now the gold was at his lips! The hot beads of horror stood upon his forehead; he uttered one piercing shriek of despair, and—awoke!

There was a solemn stillness around, for the night had closed in. Zenoab was lying upon his back with the basket upon his breast, his limbs cramped and chilled by the night air. He rose slowly to his feet; he grasped his basket with one hand, pulled his turban over his face with the other, and slunk sullenly homeward, brooding upon the day he had lost.

Zenoab was heavy indeed at heart; for had he not wasted the hours in dreaming of good fortune, while he had idly neglected the opportunity of securing it?

FOLLOWING CHRIST.

WHEN we think of all that our Lord's sacrifice bought for us, and for a whole benighted world, he and his life seem to tower up into a grandeur and a vastness which forbid any attempt to follow them. The character of Christ is then felt to be a thing by itself—unique, solitary, awful in its superhuman loneliness.

But when we turn to the story of our Lord's incarnation, and honestly ponder it, and then trace from step to step his most human life and deeds, we feel more and more that he to whom we could not climb, has stooped down to us—has taken real flesh and blood, a real man's hopes and fears, loves and wraths, desires and shrinkings. The way to realise, to enjoy, and to be stirred by the doctrine of the incarnation, is not to pore over its great results alone, in which the Godhead had an equal share, but to look at Christ's life and actions, until the Spirit which wrought in him passes into us, and makes us like him.

And when we turn to the Epistles, there are countless verses which show the deep conviction felt by his first followers, that to be like him is not a mere dream, beautiful but never to be fulfilled; nay, but a duty laid upon the youngest, weakest Christian; a duty to be wrought out by labour and watchful effort, but one for which heavenly grace and help are offered, and in which the obedient, faithful disciple shall not fail. "Christ also suffered for us, leaving you an example that ye should follow his steps." "Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus." "He that saith he abideth in him, ought himself also so to walk even as he walked." "Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ." "Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ loved the Church." "We all, beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image."

Indeed, if the duty of our Lord on earth had been simply to pay the price of our liberty, merely to suffer in our stead, then we can find no fitness in his presence at the wedding of Cana, or the supper of Levi or Zaccheus. One who came for no end but to agonise, would hardly have come eating and drinking, taking his share in all innocent joys, keenly alive to the beauty of the lily and the redness of morning and evening skies. We cannot but think that in that case his three-and-thirty years might have been cut down to as many days. But our Lord had more to do than we can force into a single doctrine: Jesus of Nazareth died that we might live. True, but he also lived that we might know how to live; that we might see what men, women, and children ought to be, and how the most humble and quiet lives may be consecrated; that we might learn how deep is the lie which calls trades and occupations worldly, and time dozed or dreamed away in seclusion, a religious life.

Have you noticed how carefully our Lord's life is recorded in the best way to be a useful example for us? Nothing is more certain than that two people who watch any one whom they respect will see in him different qualities. Each dwells upon what impresses himself; each lets much slip with which he cannot fully sympathise. So a single Gospel could have been inspired to tell us what Christ did and suffered to redeem us: but no one man, nor two, however their eyes might be sharpened by love and reverence, could have recorded all those little actions, more eloquent than words, which make us know how Jesus felt, and help us to feel whether we are like him or unlike. The stooping down to write upon the ground when a sinful woman shrank from holy eyes, the looking around him, as grieved at the hardness of wicked hearts, the sigh for the deaf and dumb, the tears by the tomb of Lazarus—it needed four observers to catch and preserve these beautiful details, and four have accordingly written each what struck him most.

Rightly to understand this would help us much in studying the Gospels to real profit. Do not fancy you have drained them of the water of life, when their doctrines are all learned and confessed. Read them to discover Christ's motives, and the rules he acted upon,—why he forsook one city and went to another,—healed one man and left others uncured,—kept one in doubt, as if unwilling to be gracious, and offered a blessing to others before they asked it; why he was silent before the high priest, and ready at first to answer Pilate. And when you have understood each fact, ask yourself what lesson it teaches for guidance in the events of daily life. Perplexities are sure to come. Men are sometimes ready to do God's will, yet not quite clear what the will of the Lord is; there are times when we fear that anger may be unchristian, and yet over-gentleness may give encouragement to sin; or, when the surrender of a point may nourish injustice and rudeness, and yet to stand upon our rights may seem to clash with the letter of a command. Then, the best guide we can have, the best commentary upon Christ's words and precepts are his own deeds, rightly and clearly digested, carefully weighed, and prayerfully, reverently applied as examples for the matter in hand.

Christ took a part in life which was plainly meant by the wisdom of God to fit him for an example to us all. Few people see how strange it is, that classes which differ widely from each other should be able to take the same Man for a perfect and sufficient guide.

The duty of all children is very much alike; it is marked for them—it consists in obedience and in learning: and little as we know of Christ's childhood, we know that he increased in wisdom and was subject to his parents. But how vastly do things change, when we turn to men of riper years! Look at the greatest, and those who have blessed their fellows most. One is a good pattern for the soldier, another for the statesman, a third for the student or the clergyman. But the soldier cannot imitate the politician, nor the man of science, nor the divine; for each has a department of his own, and their rules of action must not be confounded. Yet all people, and all occupations, find in the carpenter's Son a perfect example, an all-satisfying leader. He wrought cures, but no man thinks of him chiefly as a physician; his work was to glorify God and be witness to the truth, yet we find very little in him that can be called peculiar to the clergyman. His calmness before the priestly mob is such as any soldier might envy, and he gave his life for the sheep; yet already he had shown the civic duty of self-preservation, by walking no more in Jewry, because they sought to kill him. He, and he alone, joined the fire, the zeal, the burning indignation of a reformer, to the gentle, tender lovingkindness of a woman. Indeed, he is the sole character in history whom men can thoroughly venerate, while women can safely take him for a model.

Again, Christ had within his human character the cure for most opposite and contrasted evils of the mind. Some men are ready enough to approve deeds of charity, and are benevolent and humane, who nevertheless can see little or no importance in things which bear no fruit in time, loving only the virtues which the world calls practical. Christ rebukes them, both by saying, "Consider the lilies, the fowls," and also by such deep, unearthly doctrine as, "I and the Father are one," and, "No man hath ascended up to heaven but he that came down from heaven." In these he tells us that true religion has not only a world of toil and conquest, but also a world of sentiment, feeling, meditation—a world of thought. Others are tempted chiefly to dream away their time in reverie and introspection, and so forget their active duties: to them Christ's example speaks, trumpet-tongued, of going about doing good, and of finishing the Father's work. Some men are by nature soft, ready to yield up to the first assault everything they are set to guard, unwilling to reprove sin, except in tones which seem like uncertainty—which are seldom likely to impress the criminal: they read of Christ being angry, and of Christ upbraiding cities. Others—and how much more numerous are they!—are too ready to assert what is called their dignity, and to stand up for their right, far less because it is right, than because it is theirs: and they read that "when Christ was reviled, he reviled not again; when he suffered, he threatened not."

Thus every man finds what he wants given in our Lord; and to know him is the remedy for all the errors, the foibles, and the sins of the fallen race of Adam. And so Christ is doing, not one work, but two, in every soul which he has redeemed. He is interceding for all shortcomings before the throne, and covering all sins with blood; and also he is delivering from the sin itself by the power, the attraction, of that holy character, which is stamped more and more deeply, day by day, on every regenerated heart. You cannot be forgiven without looking to him; you cannot see him, and not love him; you cannot love him, and not long and pray to be made like him; you cannot pray for that grand blessing, and be sent unheard away.

All this ought to stir us up to more industry and holy watchfulness in searching the character of Christ. "Consider the Apostle and High Priest of your profession." There are ten thousand beauties in his life which we have not explored, which no man, perhaps, has ever yet explored. But each new grace we learn and acquire, is an instrument by which more may be obtained; for "unto him that hath shall be given." Just as the man of capital finds it easier than the poor man does to gain yet more wealth—just as he who has recovered some little energy after illness, finds it easier now to regain his perfect soundness—just as no after-learning is half so tiresome as the first rules of any science, so, if we be diligent and trustful, our early glimpses of the mind of Christ may lead us on and on, until we can search by the Spirit the deep things of God.

The Christian's blessed privilege is never to rest, never to think he has no more worlds to conquer. His spirit-stirring rule is that of Paul: "Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect. I count not myself to have apprehended: but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

What other calling bestows its richest prizes upon all who merit them? One man of science stumbles on a discovery, and is famous; but scores of his equals live and die unnoticed. One soldier strikes a fortunate blow, and nations ring with applause; yet ten thousand others that same day were shot down to nameless and promiscuous graves. But the Christian—the unlearned, unnoticed, poor, mean Christian—no man can take his crown without his leave; not man nor devil can tear one leaf out of that book of life and immortal glory wherein his name is written; not all the force of hell can prevent him from becoming nobler, holier, and more blessed for every day that breaks, until, as Christ was, so is he in this world.

It is a dangerous sign, then, if we are not gaining—if, perhaps, we are losing ground. A follower of Christ more querulous, discontented, morose, unhappy—more grasping, sensuous, earthly—more cold and unsympathetic, more tremulous, fearful, unbelieving, and unprayerful to-day than twelve months ago!

Believe it not. Those are not the regions into which the shining footsteps of Jesus lead any soul of man. All who draw near to him, find in him a gentle power, a winning influence, a silent, ceaseless attraction, by which he renews souls, and leads them in the paths of righteousness. They become like him; and although his life was externally so painful and so sad, they find a sweetness in his bitter cup, far beyond all the gross and satiating luxuries of earth. Love is never so tender and so true as when it is a recognised emblem of Christ's love to us. Self-indulgence is never half so blissful, as that self-denial which resembles Christ's, while it comforts his brethren or advances his cause. And let none gainsay this final assertion: life at its happiest knows no such rapturous hour as that in which the likeness of servant and Master is complete, and one for whom Christ laid down his life, consents in turn to lay down his life for the brethren.

THE GUARDS' INSTITUTE.

BY AN ARMY CHAPLAIN.

IF the reader has ever passed along the Vauxhall Bridge Road, he may have observed two large buildings at the end of Francis Street, and felt a passing desire to know what they were. The one which is free from all attempts at architectural ornament, and resembles a deserted manufactory, is the Model Lodging-house for the married men of the Guards, one of the most useful institutions connected with the army in London. The idea of such an institution originated with Albert the Good, and it will remain for generations to come a standing proof of the interest he felt in the welfare of the British soldier. There are two classes of married men in the army: the Model Lodging-house is intended for the benefit of those who are married with leave. Eight men of every company are allowed to marry, and are entitled to certain privileges, such as rations and lodging-money. When a man wishes to marry, he has his name inserted in the list of intending Benedicts, which is kept at the orderly-room, and waits till a vacancy occurs. Sometimes—often, we fear—he becomes impatient, and marries without leave, thus entailing much suffering on himself and his wife. Such marriages are never recognised in the regiment, though the officers often alleviate the sufferings of those who are the victims of this system.

There are obvious reasons why these unauthorised marriages should not be recognised or encouraged in the army, but much has been done of late years to improve the condition and add to the comfort of soldiers in the Guards who have married with leave. The great difficulty has been to provide them with suitable lodgings, which cannot be procured for the government allowance of fourpence a-day. In London and at Windsor, the married soldier often pays double this amount for the privilege of living in a wretched room which an artisan would scorn to occupy. Most of the married sergeants are provided with quarters in barracks, and have no ground of complaint; but until within a very recent period, married privates had to provide themselves with lodgings wherever they could find them. They were thus often driven to localities occupied by the most vicious part of the population, and their families were exposed to the vitiating influences of such a neighbourhood.

To obviate this evil, the Prince Consort proposed the erection of model lodging-houses for married soldiers, and the idea was warmly embraced by Sydney Herbert, who was then Secretary of State for War. The building in the Vauxhall Road was the first Model Lodging-house erected under their auspices. It provides accommodation for seventy married soldiers, who are selected in equal proportions from the different battalions of the Coldstreams, Grenadiers, and Scots Fusilier Guards. Each married couple enjoy almost as much privacy as if they occupied a private house; they have two rooms, with a separate entrance from the gallery which runs along each storey; they have all the comforts of a home. The strictest discipline is maintained, without interfering with the lawful enjoyments of the different inmates, who are on their best behaviour, because any misconduct would lead to the forfeiture of a privilege which is appreciated and valued by all. It is proposed to increase the number of these useful institutions until accommodation has been provided for all soldiers married with leave. The want of funds has hitherto prevented this idea from being carried into effect.

Attached to the Model Lodging-house is a school for the education of the children who are too young to attend the regimental school in barracks. The Guards' Industrial School is carried on in a separate building; it was opened a few years ago, and is supported by voluntary subscriptions. It is intended for the industrial training of girls from ten to fifteen years of age, so as to fit them for being useful servants when they leave the institution. All these girls are the daughters of married soldiers in the Guards, and the education they receive has a practical bearing on the duties of the position they are destined to occupy in future life. The number is limited, owing to the want of funds; and the admission of a girl to the advantages of this institution is intended to be a reward of good conduct on the part of the parents.

The Guards' Institute is opposite to the Model Lodging-house, and is a far more pretentious building than its plain neighbour. It is in the Veneto-Italian style, and consists of a basement and three storeys. On ascending a flight of steps, we find ourselves in the entrance-hall on the ground floor. On the right is a coffee-room for the privates; on the left, a billiard-room and coffee-room for the non-commissioned officers. The whole of the second floor is occupied by the lecture and concert room, which is 100 feet in length and 50 feet in breadth; the height from the floor to the open roof, which is constructed of varnished deal in a highly ornamented style, is 28 feet. It is a noble room, and no one can survey its ample dimensions and chaste ornamentation, without a feeling of admiration.

This building is intended to afford the soldier every lawful enjoyment he may require, and thus lessen the temptation of frequenting those haunts of dissipation so ruinous to his soul and his body. The soldier is eminently a social being, but the barrack-room is little adapted for the expression of his social tendencies, and he has long felt the want of some place, where he could enjoy the society of a comrade, free from the restraints of military discipline and the polluting influences of an ordinary tap-room. A chaplain can speak from sad experience of the temptations to which soldiers are exposed in a city so vast and with a population so numerous as London, of the wretchedness, the disease and the premature death that ensue from yielding to those temptations. While he believes that nothing but the living power of God's grace in the heart can enable a young soldier or civilian altogether to overcome those temptations, he hails with satisfaction every attempt to diminish or weaken them by providing healthy recreation and innocent amusement.

Drunkenness, the soldier's besetting sin, is effectually excluded, for no spirits are allowed to be sold. Every other kind of refreshment is provided, of excellent quality and at a reasonable rate.

There are reading-rooms, supplied with useful publications and different kinds of games; there is a library, and all presents of suitable books will be thankfully received; there are billiard-rooms and bowling-alleys; everything, in short, which a soldier's club should possess. It is open from ten a.m. till twelve o'clock at night, except on Sundays, when it is closed during the hours of service, and none of the usual games are allowed.

This Institution owes its existence to the generous interest which the officers of the Guards feel in the welfare of their men. "The worse man the better soldier" has ceased to be an axiom in military circles: on the contrary, it is believed that the best men will always be the best soldiers; and this belief is expressed in the efforts that are being daily made for the religious and social improvement of the defenders of our country. Hitherto our soldiers have been looked upon as the pariahs of social life; and the way to make men bad is to treat them as if they were bad. Little good can be expected from Nazareth, if it is believed that no good can come from Nazareth. When the soldier finds that others respect him, he will begin to respect himself. Here in this Institute he is treated with a degree of confidence which must elevate him in his own esteem, and is not likely to be abused. The internal management and discipline are placed in his own hands and under his own control; he is treated as a responsible being, and he feels his responsibility.

A series of lectures has been delivered during the winter, in the large concert-room on the second storey, which has been crowded by large and attentive audiences of non-commissioned officers and privates. There is a lecture every Saturday at six o'clock p.m., which occupies an hour; then follows a concert, in which the men themselves are the performers. The officers usually lecture on some professional subject, illustrated with diagrams, and adapted to the intelligence of a popular audience.

The benefits of this Institute are not confined to the brigade of Guards; they are extended to all soldiers who may be stationed in London. The terms of admission are very reasonable, the rates of subscription, which are paid in advance on the first of every month, are as follows:—sergeants, sixpence; corporals, fivepence; privates, fourpence. The Institute is not expected to be self-supporting at first; but it may gradually become so, when soldiers have been weaned from their usual haunts, and taught to appreciate its advantages. It would be unreasonable to expect that an immediate change will be effected in the habits of all: there is, and always will be, a certain class who mistake licence for liberty, and profligacy for enjoyment. While these may keep aloof, it is certain that it will supply a want which has long been felt among the better class of soldiers in the metropolis, and afford a place of refuge to the young recruit when he might otherwise be enticed, in his loneliness, to form less innocent associations.

An effort has also been made in this Institute to redeem the soldier from those habits of idleness, which are more the result of necessity than of choice. A room is set apart for those men who were artisans before they entered the army, and they are supplied with the necessary tools for pursuing their several callings. Young soldiers also, who wish to learn a trade, are provided with the necessary means of instruction, as is done in the French army. It is to be hoped that many soldiers will thus become better citizens when they leave the army, than they were before they entered it; and we believe that this is often the case.

The Guards' Institute has cost £16,000; the Government gave £3,000; the officers subscribed £4,000; one gallant gentleman—whose name we must not divulge—gave £1,000. No better proof could be given of the interest which the officers take in the welfare of the men, or of the sacrifices they willingly make in their behalf. Such acts of generosity strengthen the attachment which ought to subsist among all ranks in the army, and bind our soldiers together by a feeling of Christian sympathy and mutual respect. The soldier is in a moral, and a religious sense, a different being from what he once was; his spiritual and his temporal wants are carefully attended to: everything is done to increase his comfort and add to his respectability. Such efforts are not made in vain; many reckless, profligate lads become reformed men in the army, and like good soldiers of Jesus Christ, are prepared to endure all hardness for his sake.

ENTERING INTO LIFE.

DRAW back the curtain, Amy, let in the light on my pillow;
How it streams through the boughs of the drooping, tremulous willow!
What a glorious morning! Afar how it floods the sea;
Thank God for his blessed sunshine!—how gracious he is to me!

He giveth me all good things, not one hath His hand withholden;
He touches these last, last hours of my life, and makes them golden,
Writing in letters of gold, the closing lines of the tale,
Gilding each step of the way that leads me "within the veil."

For I shall leave you happy. The hand that you clasp to-morrow	Mine is the better lot—but, Amy, why are you sighing?
Hath been severed from yours for years of parting and sorrow.	God will bless you in living, as He will bless me in dying.
Waiting, watching, and hoping, your life seemed wearing away,	What has the world for me?—you have known my story, dear;
But now, thank God! I shall live to look on your wedding-day.	Have we not shared our sorrows for many a weary year?
All the old dull patience, the look that is born of waiting,	How I clung to him, sister—ay, and trusted him blindly!
How it shaded your face! But now the cloud is abating:	Bore with his unjust words, and ever answered him kindly;
Younger by many years you look when you smile or speak,	Last, I fought with my love, and slew it in bitter pain:
And the girlish bloom comes back with the roundness to your cheek.	For love, believe me, Amy, must either slay or be slain.
Two new lives will begin to-morrow (the hours are flying)—	Then the heavenly love filled up the place of the human;
Yours the new life of living, and mine the new life of dying;	Many an aching void in the poor weak heart of woman
Each will go to her place (our paths are diverging wide)—	Has been satisfied thus; and into these wounds of mine
Yours will be with your husband, and mine at the Saviour's side.	Jesus, the Blessed Healer, hath poured His oil and wine.
Yours is the human love—the passionate, feverish anguish;	This was years ago;—but the spirit of retrospection
Mine is the love of God which never can change or languish:	Shows in this morning's light the grave of my first affection;
Yours are the orange-blossoms, that fade ere the sun goes down;	Covered over by flowers, the place looks calm and fair,
Mine are the victor's palm and the glorious golden crown!	And I have reared the Cross for a holy headstone there.
Yours are the worldly cares, the ceaseless coming and going;	Yes, I am very happy. Look, Amy, the glittering ocean
Mine the unbroken rest, with no more ebbing and flowing:	Flashes the sunshine back from its myriad waves in motion;
Yours is a home of earth, with its firelight's fitful glow;	Think of the glassy sea, that is bound by no earthly shore,
Mine are the "many mansions" Christ entered long ago	And think of the glad new life that is mine for evermore.

SARAH DOUDNEY.

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER V.

THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

JOSEPHINE was in her room. The fire had burnt low, and the cold, frosty air had begun to creep in, and the curtains were not drawn. She did not ring to have her fire replenished, though she was shivering. She took up a shawl that lay upon the bed, and wrapping herself in it, sat down before the dying embers. She sat in a crouching attitude; her head bent down, her arms folded, as if to keep her shawl more tightly round her. She was deadly cold. Her face had a blank, stunned expression. Sometimes she shivered violently, and her teeth chattered.

When she had sat thus half an hour, she started up. A step was on the stairs. Whether she thought he had come back, I know not; but she stepped out, wrapped up as she was, and went to the room where he had been. He was not there: he never would be there again. It was the servant she had heard, bringing up the tea.

The girl glanced round the room, evidently expecting to see Raymond. She had brought up the tray, set for two. There was Josephine's cup, and Raymond's.

"Mr. Sylvester is gone, then?" said the girl.

"Yes, he is gone," replied Josephine, calmly.

She put her hand to her head by a quick movement; but she did not go back to her room. It was better here than there—it was warmer: for the sensation of deadly cold that came creeping over her was scarcely to be borne. Her head was hot enough—her temples throbbed painfully; but elsewhere no amount of artificial heat could warm her.

W. THOMAS. S.

(Drawn by F. W. LAWSON.)

"Draw back the curtain, Amy, let in the light on my pillow."—p. 487.

She stood by the fire a few minutes, looking blankly at Raymond's empty chair. Once a foot-step stopping a moment in the street, caused her to put on that look of distressing expectation. But the step went on again: it was not Raymond's.

All this time, she had not shed a single tear. Josephine's tears never lay very near; and if they had, this burning pain would have dried them up. A flood of tears is a healing balm to such a grief as hers was. But she could not weep: else it had been better for her.

In a short time, the servant came back again.

"If you please, Miss Graham, Rachel has come."

Josephine started; her thoughts were far away from Rachel.

"She wishes to see you very particular," continued the girl, as she stood at the door.

"Let her come up. I will see her," replied Josephine.

Rachel was the mistress of an infant-school in the town. She was an orphan, and Josephine had been mainly instrumental in getting her the situation. Indeed, she was an especial favourite with Josephine.

Rachel, then, was coming: and in a few minutes there appeared a tidy, compact, pleasing-looking woman, in a close bonnet, almost like that of a Quakeress, and a comfortable woollen shawl pinned neatly across;—a woman with a quick eye, and a cheerful voice, and a general air of "faculty," about her—that was Rachel.

"If you are not engaged to night, Miss Graham, and I might speak with you a few minutes," she began.

"I am not engaged. Sit down, Rachel. It is a long way for you to come," said Josephine, in a dull, strange voice.

"Oh, no, I don't think it long," replied Rachel, cheerily. "When the heart is light, ma'am, the way always seem short."

"Yes, when the heart is light," repeated Josephine.

Rachel looked at her, and then at the tea things on the table.

"I see you are expecting company, Miss Graham, so I won't hinder you long. I came to speak about giving up the place, you were so kind as to get for me. I am sure I shall always be very grateful to you."

"You need not speak of that, Rachel; I was glad to do what I could."

"I am afraid you are not well, to-night, ma'am," said Rachel, in a tone of concern.

"I have a headache, that is all."

"And there is nothing worse than that, ma'am. However, I will not detain you long. I wanted to tell you, as you kindly take such an interest in me, that—that I am going to be married."

"To John Humphreys, of course?"

"Well, yes, ma'am;" and Rachel blushed a little.

"I am sure I wish you happiness," said Josephine, kindly.

"Thank you, ma'am, I am sure of that, as far as one can be, in this world. John has been courting me now, near on ten years, and we are both getting on in life. He says he is not willing to go on in this way any longer, and he's taken a farm, and means to get settled."

Josephine did not answer; she had drawn her chair close to the fire.

"I've offered him, many times, to be free," continued Rachel, with a little air of proud affection, "because I'm a poor girl, and have nothing but what I work for; and his mother never took to me, and kept saying he might have done better. But John"—and her honest eyes suffused with tears—"O! he soon set my heart at rest on that score! You are a grand lady, ma'am, and I am just poor Rachel Hunt; but you know—don't you, ma'am?—how sweet it is to have those you love, faithful and true!"

Josephine did not speak for a moment; then she said, in a voice that sounded cold and hard, after the full, warm tones of Rachel's, "And what are you going to do about the school?"

Rachel dried her eyes quickly. She thought she had gone too far, in daring to institute a comparison between herself and Miss Graham. She made haste to come down from her elevation. "I should be glad to give it up as soon as I could; and I have a friend who could take it, if the ladies and gentlemen on the committee were willing. There is a meeting on Wednesday, and I thought if you would kindly speak to Mr. Sylvester—"

Her eye fell on the second cup and saucer; it evidently ran in her head, that Mr. Sylvester was coming.

Josephine saw the glance; she was deadly pale, and then the hot flush came into her cheeks. Her eyes had a strange heavy look, quite unnatural to her.

"I am sure you are not well, ma'am. Perhaps when Mr. Sylvester comes—"

"He is not coming!"

There was a sharp edge to her voice; the words were wrung from her with a kind of wail. When she had said them, she turned away her face.

Rachel was a shrewd woman, and had had some deep experiences of human life. She read, as in a book, what had happened. In the light of her new knowledge, or, rather, suspicion, she could understand the meaning of the flushed cheek, the heavy eye, the abstracted manner, the unnatural voice. It was well known that Josephine's aunt had made a second will, which disinherited her niece; that the large property, which should have been Josephine's, had been kept from her, in a heartless and capricious manner; and that from an heiress, Josephine would, as the world said, become a beggar. But what was Raymond doing—her lover of seven years, or more?

"John would have clung to me all the closer," thought Rachel; and then she looked again at Josephine.

It was clear to her that Raymond had proved faithless. Her heart was full of pity. It might not be so, but one thing was apparent to her: Josephine was ill, and too much absorbed and preoccupied to attend to her. She would not intrude her own affairs, just then; she would go away, and seek the advice she wanted somewhere else—not of Raymond Sylvester; she had begun already to shudder at his very name.

As she went along the hall, loud bursts of laughter came up the kitchen steps; the servants were holding a carousal of their own. It was high life below stairs. Their late mistress had a large, overgrown establishment, that, during her long illness, had got full of abuses. Josephine, in vain, attempted to redress them, and it had been one of her daily trials. Now, the establishment was on the eve of being broken up, and its abuses had become rampant. Rachel paused. The utter desolation of Miss Graham's position occurred to her. Miss Graham was an orphan; she had no relative in the world now her aunt was dead. What was to become of her, should she be ill?—and ill she would be, Rachel saw that plainly. Yes!—again those bursts of laughter; those symptoms of careless hilarity. Rachel knew how it was; she knew the servants of the household—not one would show any pity or kindness to Miss Graham!

"They say she aint got a penny to bless herself with!" said an unfeeling voice, which jarred on Rachel's ear. She had thought what to do before, now she made up her mind; she would not leave Miss Graham in the hands of servants.

She stepped quickly back; she took off her close-fitting bonnet and shawl, and left them down-stairs. Then you saw her to more advantage. You saw the well-shaped head, with the smooth hair neatly braided; the pleasant sensible face, and compact figure, and you thought that John Humphreys had made a wise choice; that he was right, and his mother wrong.

She went back to the room, where she had left Miss Graham. She found her there still. Oh! how glad Rachel was that she had come back. Josephine was sitting in the same attitude, but she had grown more listless; her hands hung down, her heavy head, with its dull languid eyes, seemed scarce able to support itself. There are instances in life when our principles of common humanity are at stake, and this was one. Rachel went up to her; tears were in her kind eyes. Her tread was noiseless, like that of one well used to the sick chamber. The tone of her voice was full of respectful sympathy.

"Dear Miss Graham, I shall stay with you to-night."

She spoke decidedly, and she put her cool hand on poor Josephine's burning forehead.

Josephine looked up to her. Josephine had never been proud, and if she had, here was a crisis, when all earthly things had failed her, and she was thrown entirely on the tender mercies of another.

Happy for her that other was Rachel!

"I know I am very ill, Rachel," she said, in a strange drowsy voice; "what am I to do?"

"Nothing, dear Miss Graham. I shall take you to your room, come!"

Josephine rose. She could hardly stand. The room whirled round; strange shapes and strange noises beset her; she felt slipping down some precipice into an unknown depth below. Consciousness was going from her, and she struggled hard to hold it. When she knew her struggles would be in vain, she said to Rachel, in a tone as though the words were forced from her, and each word cost her an untold agony—

"Rachel, promise me one thing: whatever may happen to me, do not send for Mr. Sylvester!"

CHAPTER VI.

HAROLD BLAKE.

"HERE'S Newbury! cheer up, my little man! there's an end of your troubles now!"

"I don't know that there is an end, Harold; it seems to me there is only a beginning," replied a peevish voice.

"You must not think that, Charley; look at the best side of things, that's my motto," replied Harold, cheerfully.

He was some years older than Charley, and had the most sensible, honest face you ever met with. He was powerfully made, for a young man, had broad shoulders, and a famous chest, and was finely built, and in the fulness of health and physical energy. Not so his brother Charley. There was something pathetic in the way in which the white-faced, emaciated boy nestled nearer, and nearer, to his stalwart brother, as if for protection from this rough world. For father and mother were both dead. This event had not happened long, as you might guess from the deep mourning-band that circled the hat of each.

"It's never the best for me," continued Charley, in the same peevish voice; "I, that am always ill, and have been used to such care. Why, the jolting of the train has half killed me, to say nothing of the cold."

Harold turned quickly to his brother, to see if the railway rug and all the other wrappers were as well arranged as they could be. Nothing more could be done in this respect, thanks to his care. He himself had no wrappers, nothing but his great-coat. "And enough, too," he had said, gaily; "seeing that I am as hard as nails!"

"Charley, those lights are Newbury," said he, pointing from the window; "we shall be all right, when we get there."

"And where shall we go to, Harold? we don't know a soul. Nothing can be more desolate than our position."

"Oh, yes, it could! Don't take that idea into your head, Charley, it's quite a wrong one. I might have been delicate, like you, instead of being a kind of modern Hercules, ready to play at football with Fortune, and drive her about, just where I like."

"But you will have to work, Harold, like a common man," said Charley, resting his pale cheek against his brother's shoulder.

"And all the better for me. Work! I should think I shall work!"

The energy of his tone amounted almost to fierceness. A minute after, he had put his arm round his brother.

"Never trouble your head about me, Charley; if everybody was as well able to take care of themselves as I am, the world would be better off than it is. And I'll take care of you, too, my little man, or I'll know the reason why."

A shrill whistle, and the train came slowly to a halt in the station-yard at Newbury. As soon as was practicable, Harold sprang out on to the platform.

"You stay there a minute, Charley, while I look for the luggage."

Away Harold strode, and was lost in the crowd in no time. Charley's white face peered mournfully from the window; it was a ghostly face, seen in that uncertain light. A porter came up to him.

"Going on, sir?" and his hand was on the door.

"Oh, no!" almost shrieked Charley; "I am going to get out. I am waiting till my brother has got the luggage right."

"The train only stops a few minutes; you had best get out, sir."

He spoke to him respectfully, for Charley was dressed like a gentleman, and was in a first-class carriage.

"I cannot get out, I am lame," cried Charley, in a tone of distress. "I wish Harold would come."

"Let me help you, sir;" and the man set down a box he was carrying.

"Oh, no! please don't touch me;" and Charley shrank back in terror. "No one can lift me but Harold! Oh! what am I to do, if Harold does not come?"

"Here's Harold, safe enough!" said a well-known, cheery voice. "What a little fidget you are, Charley! Now, then, come to me." There was a softness and tenderness in his tone, as he said it, that was almost motherly. "I've got a cab, and all things are right as a trivet! There, my poor little lad, there!" and he took him in his athletic arms, wrappers and all, and carried him across the platform, with no more effort than if he had been an infant. Yet Charley was a lad of eighteen, too.

The porter stood looking after him; indeed, he followed to see the end. Another porter was in attendance, so there was no need for his services. But he saw Charley put into the cab, and Harold get in after him, and then he walked slowly back.

"Whoever that young man is, he is a capital fellow!" said the porter to himself: and the porter was not far from wrong, either.

"I am so tired, Harold," said Charley, when the cab moved on; "my bones ache, and my head aches. I think the journey has about killed me."

"Oh, no! you will be better soon, Charley. I have found a first-rate inn, the man said, and every comfort; we'll have such a fire, and such a tea, Charley! I don't know how you feel, I am as hungry as a hunter!"

"I can't bear the thought of going to an inn," said Charley, in a complaining voice; "we have never been used——" And the voice broke down with a little quiver.

"Never mind, Charley, what we have been used to; it will never do to be always thinking of that. We must think of things that will nerve us up, and make us brave."

"I can't help thinking, Harold; of course it is the worst for me. My poor mother used to——"

"Charley, dear," and he turned quickly round, "please don't speak of—of her just now," and his own voice faltered; "you see, I have a tolerable load on my broad shoulders, and I can bear it, but not if we go back to that, Charley;" and for a moment the fine manly face, full as it was of courage and energy, was turned away, and a tear—yea, many tears—trickled down it.

But he recovered, very soon, and the tears were gone ere Charley had time to see them. Besides, Charley was, as usual, too much absorbed in his own griefs, to take much notice of the griefs of others.

"Here we are," said Harold, as the cab stopped; "and a very comfortable-looking place it is, too. Now, I'll just go and speak to the landlady, and then fetch you in."

"Don't be long, Harold, and I dare say the fire will have to be lighted," said Charley, shivering.

Harold was gone before he finished speaking; but in an incredibly short time Harold was come back again.

"Is there a fire, Harold?"

"Will be, in the twinkling of an eye, dear. Now, then."

"I thought how it would be," grumbled Charley, as his brother was carrying him up-stairs; "our miseries and discomforts were sure to begin the moment we got here. What a wretched room, and how dreadfully cold!" added he, the grumbling tone getting more vehement as Harold laid him down on the sofa. "I never can bear this!"

"You won't have to bear it many minutes, dear. There, let me wrap you up well, and then I'll take the fire in hand myself. It's a capital grate, and a hod full of coal. Coal is cheap in these parts, I find."

And Harold applied himself with great zeal to making what he called a first-rate fire. All the time he was doing it he was trying—but, alas! not with the same success—to raise his brother's spirits.

"Tea is coming up directly—I told the landlady to make it strong; and there's a splendid ham, and cold chicken, and a loaf and butter. On my word we shall fare like princes, Charley."

"I don't think I can eat anything," moaned Charley, in a dismal voice.

"Oh, yes, you can; when you see it, your appetite will come in a trice. There's a fire for you! Now I'm going to wheel the sofa up, and then I'll draw the curtains as snug as snug. Don't I understand the art of making ourselves comfortable?"

"Comfortable—in an inn!" grumbled Charley, from the sofa.

A knock at the door, and a rather slatternly servant came in, bearing a tray with the tea things upon it. She had a cloth under her arm, which she spread over the table; and having completed these few arrangements, she departed for the rest of the good cheer ordered by Harold.

While she was gone Charley began again.

"Harold, what are we come to now? Did you see how dirty she was? Her apron——"

"Never mind her apron, dear. Come, the tea is capital, and smoking hot; and here's the ham and the chicken, first-rate!"

"I am sure I can't touch a morsel, it's so very miserable!" said Charley, beginning to cry.

"Oh, yes, you will! Here is the tea, with your three lumps in, and what fault can you find with this ham? Why, Charley, we are quite in luck!" and he cut all the most delicate slices he could find in the chicken to set before his brother.

Charley did not take any notice at first; he cried a little, and then sat with a face of the most utter discontent and misery. But he was really hungry, say what he might, and the ham and chicken looked very tempting. Soon he began to pick a bit with the end of his fork, and this led to his drawing his plate a little nearer, and beginning steadily to eat—not, however, that his face relaxed, or that he said a cheerful word of any kind: all the cheerfulness must come from Harold.

Harold, however he had boasted of his appetite, did not seem to enjoy his meal half so much as Charley. In fact, it was to keep up appearances that he prevailed on himself to touch a morsel. His mind was too much preoccupied. The whole burden of life was on him. He must have been very tired, though he did not say so; the amount of fatigue he had gone through, the last few days, was enough to tax a frame powerful even as his own. But he made no complaint. Harold never did. In fact, his day's work was not over yet.

When the slatternly maid had removed the tea things, Harold said, "Now, Charley, I am going to tuck you up on the sofa, and you are to have a nice sleep until I come back.

"Are you going to leave me, Harold?"

"For an hour or so I am, just to look round the town."

"That's like you, Harold! So inconsiderate! Of course I am to be left in this strange inn by myself."

The word inconsiderate jarred on Harold's ear. A look of annoyance showed itself a moment, but it quickly disappeared, and he said, gently, "The woman of the house will look after you, dear, and I am forced to go; we must find some lodgings."

"Oh, yes, of course there are the lodgings," replied Charley, somewhat pacified. "Be sure you have nice lodgings, Harold; I can't live in little rooms, and there must be a cheerful look-out. I am so much indoors, you know; and I shall want a bath-chair, and a boy to draw me, Harold; I can't live without going out."

Harold could not answer. He put on his hat and went down-stairs. He said a few words to the landlady about Charley; and he spoke so cheerily, and went out so briskly, that the woman observed to her husband, "If he aint got a light heart, I wonder who has!"

A light heart! Oh, good woman, never was any one so deceived as you are, touching that matter. Harold's was an aching heart—a heart full of anxiety, and had been this long time.

"Everything depends on me," he thought, as he strode along the streets. "I don't care for myself a jot; I could do anyhow. But there's the lad!"

Again he strode away: he was not striding at random, he had a definite errand, and was going to a definite locality. The landlady had told him of some lodgings, and he was anxious to obtain them. The expense of the inn could not be encountered, more than that one night.

The lodgings were not all he could wish, far from it, and he went a weary round, seeking in vain for a better home to which he might take Charley. Better homes there were, and plenty of them, but they would not suit his purse, and he retraced his steps.

"No," thought he, and a vein of bitterness ran in his thoughts, "I have seen enough of that. Small as our means are, we will keep within them: I would, if I had to starve."

He engaged the rooms, and turned his steps towards the inn. He was very tired now; his face looked haggard, and his eyes heavy. But weary and footsore as he was, he tried to call up a smile, as he went back to Charley.

Charley was asleep on the sofa, the candle had burnt low, and the embers in the grate threw a flickering and uncertain light on the pallid, worn face of the sick boy. Harold stood and looked, and the tears rose to his eyes unbidden, and, for the moment, unchecked. There lay the knot of all his difficulties. This it was which would give to poverty her most bitter sting, which would make the least privation deadly. This sick, helpless brother, whom he must shelter from every blast, and not let the very winds blow upon too roughly. He loved him with a devotion that was heroic. He had been the darling son of the dear mother who was gone, he had been his father's idol; nothing was spared that could be lavished on Charley. He had never known any atmosphere, but the calm, loving one of home. And now! Harold's strong frame gave a kind of shudder. Now! out on the bleak world with only Harold.

Only Harold! Well, that was not so bad, by any means, as it might be. There is a sufficiency about Harold, a power of reducing circumstances to his control, that is encouraging. In the struggle that is coming, it is not unlikely he may come off victorious.

While we think so, Charley wakes, with a wild, wondering expression that is very touching.

"Harold! Harold! Where are we? I have been dreaming of my mother!"

(To be continued.)

THE CHILDREN AND THE "DEATH-WATCH."

NURSE, it's really very strange, I can't make it out; there's a watch going near my bed at night, but I can't find it anywhere. Cary has looked under the bedstead, and into the two old-fashioned watch-pockets; and I have pushed my biggest pin into the bolster everywhere: but I can't find anything. It's so odd."

Such was the speech of little Lilly Fraser to her nurse, Mrs. Stubbes, who replied, "Watch! Lilly dear! what do you mean? Watch, child!—what was it like? When did you hear it? Oh! but, Lilly, I remember now, Mr. Fraser won't like me to talk about such things. Dear me—dear me! I'm so sorry!"

"What's the matter, nurse?" said Lilly; "papa likes you to tell me all that's good, and you know I was eight years old last Friday, and Aunt Jane said girls of that age could learn so much. And oh, nurse! it was on Friday night I first heard that strange watch ticking. Cary said that Grandpapa Williams had perhaps given me a pretty little watch for a birthday present, and, to surprise me, had got you to sew it up in the bolster to puzzle us."

"Friday night was it, Miss Lilly, you heard that dreadful tick?" said Mrs. Stubbes, in a tone and with a look which puzzled poor Lilly, who exclaimed, "Nurse dear, what makes you look so frightened? Do you think it's a watch somebody has stolen and hidden in our bed; and perhaps the police will come and take me and Cary away to prison? Oh! nurse, you must come and find the watch; I wish I'd never heard it. But it would keep ticking, and then it would stop all of a sudden, and begin again like a watch all in a flurry, or, as Cary said, like a baby-watch that hadn't learnt its lesson right."

"Oh, Lilly, Lilly! I wish you had never said a word about that awful ticking. Ah! I know what it means; but I mustn't tell: your papa would be so angry."

This mystery on the part of the nurse, of course, excited Lilly's curiosity, and at this moment Cary, a younger sister, ran in, crying out with a childish glee, "Oh, Lilly, I've told papa about the watch we hear at night, and he did laugh so; I can't make it out. But he really says he can find the watch, and then it shall be yours, Lilly, for you heard it first on your birthday; but you'll let me look at it sometimes, won't you?"

Cary stopped, partly because she had no more to say, and partly because of nurse's serious and Lilly's puzzled look. Lilly's turn now came.

"Cary dear, it's very strange; nurse says it isn't a watch, it's some dreadful thing."

This was quite enough for the excitable Cary, who, rushing to nurse, caught hold of her dress, crying out, "Oh, do tell us what it is. I'll never sleep there again, that I won't. Oh, nurse, what is it?"

Mrs. Stubbes now felt she had gone too far in her silly chatter: too late she tried to hush the fears her stupidity had raised.

"Well, then; but don't be afraid," began the nurse, with a solemn look. "That ticking you heard is the death-watch."

"Dear me!" broke in Cary, "does Death carry a watch with him? But why does he come to our nice little room?"

"Hush, Cary!" said nurse! "don't ask such questions. It's not a watch at all, but something that comes to a house when somebody is about to die."

"Oh, I wish we had never heard it. Is any one about to die, nurse?—and why did papa laugh?" interrupted Lilly, clinging to nurse; Cary getting very pale.

"Oh, Lilly, your papa is very clever, and he does not believe in such things; but I do. Three times have I heard it, and something bad always came." Such was the answer of the silly woman, who had been often cautioned by Mr. Fraser against telling superstitious tales to the children.

Both the little girls now cried out, "Do tell us what happened, nurse, after you heard the ticking."

"Well, my dears," answered Mrs. Stubbes, "I wish you hadn't asked me anything about the ticking; but I suppose you must be told now. It was on a first of May, about eleven o'clock at night, many years ago, when I was a little girl, that my ears first heard the sound, and before Christmas, that very year, my poor grandfather died. He were eighty-three year old, Miss Lilly—that he were."

"Well, but, nurse," broke in Lilly, "wouldn't so old a man have died if there had been no ticking at all?"

"Ah, miss, that's a hard question, I shouldn't like to answer," was the sage reply of the woman, who went on by adding: "and the second time was a hot night in July, when I was employed to wait on poor dear Dr. Trundle, who kept his bed seven years and a half from the rheumatics. Well, he died about four months after the ticking. His sister, Miss Trundle was obstinate like, and she would have it that I had only heard the doctor's big watch a-ticking: but I know better. Then the last time I heard it was just before Simon Soundy, the parish clerk, tumbled into the mill-pool of a dark night, and was drowned. So that ticking arn't to be laughed at. But you mustn't be frightened; perhaps the sound won't come again. Besides, I'll let you have the kitten in your room to-night; the ticking doesn't come when a kitten's near."

Night came: the little girls kissed, and were kissed, keeping with great difficulty from telling papa about the "watch." The little things really liked Mrs. Stubbes, and did not wish to draw a scolding upon her. To bed they were snugly put, and nurse was quite full of pleasant stories, being now really desirous of quieting the children's fears. Tioby had quite a luxurious bed made up on an armchair, and nurse left, bidding them "go to sleep, and not wake till the morning."

About an hour had passed; Mr. and Mrs. Fraser were just finishing their evening game at chess, the gentleman having for the third time cried, "Check, my dear," and was beholding with quiet satisfaction the approaching mate. Louisa, "our eldest," aged sixteen, was fixing the last strip of beadwork to a most elaborate lamp-stand, intended for a charitable bazaar next week. Fred, rejoicing in the age of fourteen, had just triumphantly extracted the value of x from a strangely confused mass of letters and figures, to which he had reduced what his tutor called a problem in simple equations. All this, we say, was being done, when the whole party were startled by a scream, from the landing-place near the children's bedroom. This was followed by a scream, number two, from a stronger voice. Nor were words wanting to the concert: "Papa!" and "Mamma!" were clearly heard amidst the din, the whole being strangely varied by a shrill and squealing outcry from some enraged creature.

The mother had but just time to open the door, when in dashed Cary, screaming out a double mystery: "The watch! the watch has come! Oh, my foot! my foot!"

Lilly followed in full cry, "Oh, papa! it won't go away; and Tibby's killed!—oh, papa!"

Nurse rushing in, added to the perplexity by exclaiming, "Oh, sir! I told them not to be frightened—I did indeed."

Cary was soon safe in Louisa's lap, and Lilly found a harbour in mamma's arms. Then the whole story was soon told; Lilly being the chief orator, Cary the prompter, and nurse giving animation to the whole by repeated ejaculations of "Oh, dear! who'd have thought it?"

Perhaps we had better let Lilly tell her own story. "Oh, papa! that ticking you so laughed at came again to-night. Cary and I both heard it go 'tick—tick—tick!'"

"Yes, just like this," broke in Cary, and tapped her little finger three times on the table in imitation of the sound.

"Oh, yes," replied Lilly, "and then it stopped a bit, then went on again. We caught up kitty and put her on our bed; but the 'tick' did not mind Tibby one bit, and went on louder. Then Cary screamed, and I screamed—we couldn't help it, and we tried to run out of the room; and Cary trod on Tibby's tail in the dark, and then Tibby scratched her foot so, and that made Cary cry the more, of course; and I fell down upon kitty, and she did cry out so, and then we got the door open. Oh, papa! that ticking frightens us all: do stop it."

Lilly's story explained the outcries which had so startled the family, and even accounted for the sounds of anger sent forth by the insulted kitten.

Mr. Fraser saw at a glance that nurse had been telling the children one of those superstitious fibs in which ignorance ever delights. However, it was no time for scolding, and he determined to explain the whole matter at once. Beckoning to Lilly, he said, "Come here, and I'll tell you all about that ticking. You shall laugh about it yourself to-morrow."

"And you'll tell nurse, too, won't you, papa?" added Cary, who saw Mrs. Stubbes standing by the door, with a look made up of fear, anger, and sulkiness.

"Oh, yes," replied the father, "nurse must try to understand the difference between a goblin and a harmless insect."

"Insect—insect! why, surely no little creature, with wings all covered with scarlet and gold, made such a ticking," cried Cary, with uplifted hands.

"Oh, certainly not, little romantic," answered Mr. Fraser; "not a word did I say about gold and scarlet; but, I tell little Miss Cary that the ticking which so frightened some people was made by a small insect. It is a sort of second cousin to a beetle, for it belongs to that family."

At this point Lilly must needs interrupt. "Oh, papa, is the creature like those horrid blackbeetles in the kitchen?"

"Lilly must remember that some beetles are most beautiful insects, and this ticking beetle is nothing like those black ones that so worry cook."

Papa having thus far satisfied Lilly, proceeded by saying, "This insect has a sort of a horn on the head, and raising himself on his hind-legs, he brings his hard head down with all its might against some bit of timber in the wall, and this stroke sounds something like the ticking of a watch."

"But why," cried Cary, "is the creature so fond of knocking its head against things?"

"Quite right, Cary, to ask that question," said Mr. Fraser; "you shall hear. It is the gentleman-beetle which makes the noise, and it is a call to some female not far off. So you see the ticking is really the beetle's mode of making love."

At this the whole party laughed merrily, Lilly exclaiming with vehemence. "What silly children we were, to be frightened by a poor little beetle calling his wife! Oh, I do hope it will tick again."

Fred now put in his query: "I wonder if we could catch one; I should like to see it."

"Oh, yes—yes! can we catch one, papa?" cried both Lilly and Cary in the same breath.

"That might, perhaps, be managed; if we called in Sam Cox to cut open the old wainscot of your bedroom to-morrow, we might find the beetle in some dark corner; but then you'll not hear the sound again."

The morning came; Lilly and Cary could scarcely take breakfast—so great was their excitement; and Fred was constantly wondering "how the death-watch would feel when fairly caught and put into spirits of wine, to preserve him."

Sam Cox at last arrived, with hammers, saws, and chisels. It seems Sam had often seen what he called "the queer little insect," and became a great man in the eyes of the children by the freedom with which he described the creature. Even nurse began to be perplexed. Sam's opinion that "the ticking creature mightn't be found after all, they get into such very queer holes," heightened, if possible, the curiosity of the children, and gave a little comfort to Mrs. Stubbes.

However, Cox began his cutting and boring very quietly at the part whence the "ticking" had come, and soon a long piece of wainscot was removed, and all the inside most carefully scanned.

"Lots of old holes in this timber; impossible to say which is the beetle's drawing-room," said Cox, who now began to tap the timber smartly with his hammer in various parts; holding in the other hand a basin with a piece of paper over the bottom, on which the beetle was to be tumbled, if caught. Nothing was seen for some time except two or three huge spiders, which darted off as if they feared hanging for fly-murder.

"I've got him at last," said Cox, holding out the basin before Mr. Fraser's face; "he was just running from that hole to get away," cried the carpenter, pointing to a beam full of worm-holes. Sixteen eyes were turned upon a tiny, stone-coloured insect in the basin. How quietly it lay there? Had Cox killed it in his hurry? Was that little frightened insect really the creature which could scare grown-up people out of their senses? Yes, there it was in the bottom of the basin, lying motionless.

"Them beetles be rare clever! He's a shamming dead; but I'll touch him. Now see!" So said the carpenter, who gave the insect a sudden push with the end of a chisel. The creature resented this rudeness, by indignantly darting half way up the side of the paper. At this nurse gave a faintish scream, which was, however, almost drowned in the shouts of the children, and the hurrah of Fred, who evidently thought the beetle had performed a praiseworthy feat.

"Now look closely at it, all of you," said Mr. Fraser; "it's not often this singular insect is seen. Nurse, you come close and watch the little harmless beetle, that has frightened a stout woman like you."

The basin was put upon the table, and the insect being again perfectly quiet, Mr. Fraser, holding a large magnifying-glass over the creature, went on with his description.

"See the sort of helmet on the insect's head, and that bone-like knob on the forehead; that's what it beats the ground with, and so produces the 'ticking.'"

At this point Mr. Fraser held up his finger. All looked, and he went on:

"I want great silence in the room. You see the insect is standing on a sheet of note-paper. I saw it move a moment ago; I'm almost certain it struck the paper with its head and gave a tick. There, there! listen all."

Sure enough, the little creature was seen to move its body up and down with wonderful rapidity, and amidst the deep stillness was heard the successive tick—tick—tick—tick. Nurse, in amazement, gazed at the insect through the magnifying-glass. Lilly and Cary kept their eyes fixed on the startled face of Mrs. Stubbes, and their ears open to the strange sounds. The ticks stopped, but all were silent, and in about a minute came seven or eight more "tickings," when the insect ceased, as if in despair of getting an answer from some absent friend.

"Now look at the beetle, and listen," said papa. "I'll imitate the beat by tapping the head of this pin against the table. Sometimes these beetles will answer such taps, thinking they come from a companion."

Hereupon he tried his skill at imitating the beats of the death-watch. Perhaps the imitation was badly done, or perhaps its perfection puzzled even the beetle; no sound came in return. "Tick—tick—tick," said Mr. Fraser's pin. Four times was it tried, but in two or three seconds after he had ceased the last series of taps, there came from the paper in the basin a rapid run of "tickings." Papa held up the pin to show he was not tapping; there was no mistake—the beetle had answered its human questioner. Three times did Mr. Fraser tap with the pin, and twice did the insect answer by ticks as vigorous as ever. Even Cox was surprised.

"I never," said that learned carpenter, "seed one do so much ticking afore. He's a merry one, sir."

The death-watch had for ever lost its terrors in that family; it had actually become a pet.

"Oh, papa," said Cary, "do give that clever beetle some crumbs of bread, or find out what it likes to eat; we must keep it alive till Cousin Susan comes up from the country next week."

Mr. Fraser promised to do his best.

The beetle was repeatedly visited in its prison, the tickings were often heard, and Cary hoped, to the horror of nurse, that "papa would find a nice family of little ticking beetles in the box, that would be so nice!"

Did Cousin Susan see the beetle? did she hear it perform in good style? Alas! no; the provoking beetle died the fifth day after its capture, to the sorrow of all save Mrs. Stubbes. Her superstition about the death-watch had been rudely shaken, and it was some consolation to the poor woman when she remarked to herself, "They may say what they likes, but them tickings foretells a death, for the creature itself died—ah!"

It was voted by all that the beetle should be preserved in a phial filled with spirits of wine. This was done, and to this day "the ticking beetle," or, as the learned call it, Anobium tessellatum, may be seen on a shelf in Mr. Fraser's study. Even nurse has been known to bring in "friends from the country," to see the dead death-watch. The sum of the whole matter was, that Lilly and Cary never listened again to superstitious stories about animals: even nurse has begun to doubt. Tibby was caressed for a whole week in compensation for the bruising of his tail; Sam Cox got half a day's pleasant work; the whole family enjoyed the excitement of hunting and capturing the death-watch, and Mr. Fraser has added one specimen to his natural history collection.

THE QUIVER

— Saturday, April 25, 1868. —

(Drawn by J. D. WATSON.)

"I saw the pale face which had been with me in my dreams."—p. 498.

OVER THE HORN.

IT was a festival-day at Lutzenhausen. All the little town had turned out in its gayest attire; the children decked with the brightest-coloured ribbons and such flowers as the barren neighbourhood provided; the matrons arrayed in handsome robes, which had been heirlooms in their families from generation to generation; the young men, their more sober garb relieved by a gaudy necktie, and even the old men adorned with more cheerful apparel than ordinary, Lutzenhausen afforded a pretty sight to the visitor on that day. The little town with its picturesque-fashioned houses, partly nestled under the shadows of the great mountains, which rose out of sight into the clouds, and partly, and as though timidly, stretching away from the projecting sides of the mountains towards the bright, green, healthy plain on which the whole population were now enjoying their holiday.

Upon such a scene of beauty and happiness there appeared a weary and anxious-looking young man. He was travelling to Aschaffenhach, and was desirous of a guide to conduct him over the Lutzenhorn. We did not see many visitors at Lutzenhausen; it lay out of the usual route of tourists, and its beauties were unknown, except by the few who set aside the popular guides, and struck out a line of travel for themselves; and accordingly we had no regular guides in our neighbourhood. Indeed, I was the only young man who had ever undertaken such an office, and I was much chagrined when the stranger requested me, to whom he had been directed, to accompany him over the Horn. That festival-day had been fixed for my betrothal to Lisette, the beauty who eclipsed the many pretty maidens of our quiet abode. I answered that I could not go to-day, but would go to-morrow.

No, he replied, to-morrow would not do. His mother lay ill—dying, he believed, at Aschaffenhach, and he must make all haste to be in time, at least to receive her blessing and to close her eyes.

Lisette was standing by as he spoke, and I saw the tears start into her eyes as she heard the young man's mournful words.

"Josef," she said to me, "our betrothal is to be performed immediately, and cannot take more than a few minutes. Couldn't you then go with this young man across the mountain? there is no danger, or I would not urge you to go, and you know you are so clever," she added, with a winning smile.

Her tears and her words only served to make me angry. Why should she plead the young man's cause, and send me away on the day of our betrothal? Had she taken a fancy to the youth's sad face? So I determined that nothing should induce me to go, and replied with considerable warmth, that I had no intention of leaving Lutzenhausen that day for all the women in Christendom.

The traveller did not seem to notice my ill-humour, but merely asked me to point out the safest and quickest route for him to take. This I did, but with ill grace enough.

Our betrothal was a melancholy affair. Lisette was low-spirited, and I had by no means recovered my temper, and besides this, I was irritated by the uneasy feeling which reproached me for my unkindness, my cruelty to the young stranger.

Two or three weeks had passed away, and with it much of the uneasiness which I felt on the stranger's behalf. At intervals, however, the sense of guilt stole over me. One morning when I was experiencing this depressing sensation, a party of ladies and gentlemen arrived, and wished me to become their escort over the Lutzenhorn, as far as Aschaffenhach. A strange, wild, and fearful thrill of pleasure shot through me at the prospect, and I eagerly agreed to go.

We started, and rapidly passing over the intervening plain, began the ascent. The party with which I went were in high spirits, they had never visited such beauties before, and the mountain scenery was quite a novelty to them. Often and often they paused in the ascent to take a survey of the landscape spread below—a gentle decline to the table-land we had left, but steep and rugged precipices on either hand, leading down to yawning chasms filled with blocks of ice, which sparkled in the sunshine. At length I was compelled to remonstrate at the frequent delays, and to point out that we had a long distance to travel before night-fall. After two or three hours' perseverance we reached the summit. Lutzenhausen was lost to view. We seemed to have risen above all that is earthly, for all around us there appeared nothing but snowy peaks and clouds, scarcely distinguishable from the mountains. There was nothing to interest the company in this strange massing of clouds and snow, so we speedily began to descend. After we had proceeded about half a mile, a bird flew across our path, and settled on a rock some hundred yards below our feet. From the uneven motion of the bird's flight, it was clear that it was wounded and exhausted. One of the young ladies of the company expressed her wish to have the poor thing. To reach the rock beneath us was an easy matter for one accustomed to the mountains as I was, and I quickly descended; but as I put out my hand to capture the fluttering creature, I uttered a sharp cry, for there, a few yards below my feet, I saw, half covered by the snow, the pale face which had been with me in my dreams and wakeful reveries since the festival-day. With an effort I controlled my agitation, for I remembered the party who were looking down upon me from the footpath. I signalled to them for one of them to come and help me. A young man joined me, and together we raised the frozen and bruised body: with difficulty we conveyed it to the footpath. The task I think would have been impossible, but I felt a supernatural strength within me.

We laid the young man's lifeless form upon one of the mules, and with saddened steps continued our progress.

The sun was just about setting when we reached the few cottages which formed the suburbs of Aschaffenhach. As we approached these I noticed a neatly-attired but sickly-faced old woman sitting before her door. She was watching the sunset. The sun was resting on the summits of the snowy slopes which spread before her face, and looked like a golden shield on the arm of a warrior clad in silver mail. The old woman turned her head when she heard our approaching footsteps; with the quickness of her sex she perceived the motionless form we bore, and with the curiosity of her sex she was quickly at my side, pouring forth her inquiries. They suddenly ceased, a deathlike paleness suffused itself over her countenance, she flung her arms aloft, and with a piercing shriek fell upon the dead body.

We disengaged her grasp, and carried her into the cottage, and, after her, we brought in the body of her son. Nothing could equal the kindness of the ladies of our party, and while they sought to restore the unhappy mother, the gentlemen removed the corpse to a room up-stairs. I ran into the town for a physician. After calling at house after house, I discovered a medical man and brought him to the cottage. For form's sake, he saw the body up-stairs. He judged, from my description of the place and position in which I found him, that the young man must have been overtaken by the darkness, and have missed his footing and fell. A wound on his forehead showed that he had struck against some stone in his fall, probably the rock on which the bird rested. Under the advice of the physician, and the care of the young ladies, the poor mother soon recovered her consciousness, but only to show unmistakable symptoms of a dangerous illness. The doctor judged that there was but little hope for a woman at her age. His judgment was soon verified; within twenty-four hours the poor woman had ceased to breathe. The party I had escorted left it to me to see to the burial of the mother and son, and the gentleman who appeared to have the direction of the party, pressed me to accept money to defray the expenses. This I declined; I felt that I alone must bear all the cost.

I provided a decent funeral; I followed them to the grave; I stood by till the last shovelful of earth was laid on and patted down, and then I turned away. But where should I go? I felt the curse of Cain; I was a murderer—a double murderer. Should I deliver myself up to justice? I discussed the point. Undoubtedly, a guide refusing to escort a person over the mountains was punishable, and would be held responsible for all the misfortunes which followed his refusal. I might be acquitted, as I was not a regularly-authorised guide; but my moral guilt was the same.

While musing thus with myself, I had been unconsciously making my way through the town of Aschaffenhach, and on the road towards the Lutzenhorn. It was about midday, and the sun was brightly shining. Everything around looked joyous and innocent. It seemed to me as though all the world was happy and pure except myself.

As I pursued the path towards Lutzenhausen, with an indefinite idea of either surrendering myself as a criminal, or taking leave of my home for ever, I heard a cry as of some one lost among the hills. I stopped and listened. The cry was repeated. There could be no doubt that there was a traveller in my neighbourhood who had gone astray. I shouted in answer to the cry. My hallo was returned. I rushed on in the direction of the shout, and at length perceived the head and shoulders of a man some yards from the beaten track. I quickly discovered that he had slipped into a pit, which had been covered with a thin coating of ice, and was now suspended at the mouth of a cavern of unknown depth. I made my way down to him, flung a rope towards him, and bade him bind it round his body. He vainly endeavoured to do this with one hand. He could not use both hands without losing his support, and being precipitated into the yawning cavern. There was only one thing to be done; it was risking my own life, but it gave me exquisite pleasure to know that I was doing so. I approached him, treading softly on the creaking and slippery ice. My carefulness was not for my own safety; of that I was reckless. I leaned forward and seized him by the hands, and drew him from the hole. The ice burst and starred under the strain, but remained firm till we raised our feet in the last step and placed them on the hard pathway; then it shivered, and went roaring in huge sheets into the valley below, and revealed numberless gaping pitfalls.

The stranger was loud in his protestations of gratitude, but I paid them little heed, and only replied that if he were going on to Lutzenhausen, he had better make haste and walk with me.

We pursued our course very rapidly, and we had just gained the highest point of the mountain, when my companion broke silence, and said—

"I think I have seen you before."

I replied that I didn't think it likely, as I seldom went from my own town.

"Yes," said he, "but, if I mistake not, I have seen you in your own town. You live at Lutzenhausen, don't you?"

"Yes," I said.

"Well," said he, "didn't you refuse to conduct a young man over this Lutzenhorn some three weeks ago?"

I gave no answer, but I sat down on a stone just at hand. I felt giddy and sick. What business had this fellow whose life I had saved, to bring my guilt to remembrance? Was he an officer of justice?

"What's the matter with you?" he said; "are you ill?"

"No, not ill," I said.

"You are the man I meant, are you not? I'm desperately warm with the pace we have been walking at," he continued, unrolling the muffler which half concealed his face.

As his face became revealed from under the folds of the muffler, I grew fascinated; but when his whole visage came into view, I thought I saw a ghost.

"The curse of Cain!" I screamed, "the curse of Cain! My punishment is greater than I can bear!"

He tried to pacify me, and at length I understood that it was no ghost that stood before me, but the same young man whom I refused to guide over the horn on the day of the festival. He was not killed by a fall and buried in the snow, but had safely reached his mother's cottage, had seen her peacefully expire, and was now returning home. Who the young man was whom we had found in the snow I could not tell, nor could my companion; indeed, I hardly cared to inquire; I only felt a deep, inexpressible gratitude to God for his goodness. I had suffered punishment, a well-deserved punishment, for my cruelty; but I had learnt a lesson which I have never forgotten. God grant I never may!

I remember nothing of our further journey. My companion chatted away, and I listened mechanically: my mind was reposing in grateful trust on my Maker's love.

I have little more to tell. I was soon married to my Lisette. Lutzerhausen has risen to greater importance since then. Visitors have learnt its beauties, and we have now a pretty little hotel, which is well stocked with company during the summer months. I have a share in the management of this hotel; but the chief management is in the hands of my sister's husband, whose life I risked, and whose life I saved. W. B. C.

SEEING CHRIST.

HERE is a kind of palsy of the mind, which prevents almost every man from having any real or vivid conception of what is very far off in space, or remote in time, or unlike anything he is accustomed to. The tendency of the imagination is to run in grooves, and whatever lies on one side of them is virtually outside its reach. There are names familiar to us all that are really nothing but names to us. Which of us, reading about Julius Cæsar, makes for himself any mental picture of that bald-headed man with the eagle's beak, who swooped upon the four quarters of the world? Which of us, not having seen the Alps, paints for himself any image of those awful gorges or soaring peaks, of the eternal snows that are sometimes ghastlier than the face of death, and sometimes purer in hue than the rose's bloom? Which of us, reading of the fearful tempests which swept a few months since over the Eastern and the Western Indies, realised them as vividly as he would some little storm that levelled a tree in his own garden, or stripped a few slates off his own roof?

The fact is, our imagination is asleep, and requires to be roused by something close to itself, whether that thing be great or small. Cæsar is far more real, once we have been in a ruin that he built, or have handled a medal that he struck. A letter from a near friend would make the hurricane more real to us than the best description of the ablest newspaper correspondent.

Now this same drowsiness is one of the great dangers of the soul. Eternity and God are so far out of the beaten tracks of most men's experience, that when they hear the words, no definite ideas are put before the mind, any more than if a wind went past.

Few people deliberately defy God; few people choose to serve the devil rather than Christ; few people say plainly to themselves, "I will stake heaven or hell upon the chance of a calm and thoughtful death-bed, in which to find peace with my Maker." Representations like these are pulpit rhetoric, perfectly fair as endeavours to show men what they are virtually, though unconsciously about, yet very dangerous if they make men fancy that such open and desperate wickedness is their chief peril. The true peril is that our easy, quiet, matter-of-fact life should seem to us the only one. Drifting down the stream of years (which is so fluent, yielding, and translucent), how many thousands forget that there is underneath it a firm and solid substance, in which our anchor ought to be fastened for eternity!

Therefore, much of God's Book is taken up with efforts, not to instruct, but to startle and arouse the mind out of its torpor. The tremendous imagery of Isaiah does not give the intellect any new convictions of the Infinite, the Omnipotent, the All-wise; but it does force in the old conviction upon sluggish and dormant sensibilities. For the same reason we are continually reminded of our own personal concern in Bible truths, in the fall, in redemption, and in judgment.

And it is partly, no doubt, on this account, to help us in bringing close to ourselves the story of Christ, that we are reminded of the truth that "every eye shall see him." Who does not know that? Yet who does not acknowledge, by a slight mental start, perhaps by a mental shiver, that it is well to have the knowledge driven home?

Jesus Christ has not passed off the stage of this world for ever. The day is coming when human eyes, in the flesh, shall see the pierced hands and feet, and the visage that was marred so sadly. No stone so ponderous, no grave so deep, as to prevent us from looking up at that great revelation. Of course, it will be night in some places, and men will be sleeping as they slept last night, all unconscious of the thief below. In others it will be broad daylight, and men will be going about their tasks or their amusements—cheating or helping, blessing or cursing one another, exactly as men have done to-day. Dawn and twilight will be calling some to their tasks, and sending others to repose—when all shall hear at once the voice of the archangel and the trump of God! "As the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west, so shall the coming of the Son of Man be."

Think what it will be like to stand, each in turn, full in front of that gracious Friend, or of that frowning Judge, and hear the sentence that has no limit nor any appeal!

There are hard and grinding men, who have no better idea of this world than that it is a place for making money; men in whom all that is godlike and pure has so utterly dried up, that if they met Jesus in the streets without his crown they would certainly see no reason to look at him again—"no beauty that they should desire him;" men who are possibly not dishonest, but honest only because honesty, upon the whole, pays—because it is "the best policy;" men who never put a guinea on a collecting-plate, but only in subscription lists, which get printed—and who like an Established Church simply because its endowments save them a good deal of money; men who count their workmen, not as so many souls, but so many hands, and grind them down to the lowest penny at which skill and industry will stay with them; men to whom the glory of art and the beauty of nature appeal as vainly as the love of God in Jesus Christ our Lord.

They shall have to look into the pure, intolerable eyes of Him who thought life more than meat, the body more than raiment; who held a mountain lily to be a grander sight than the costly robes of Solomon, and a sparrow sinking to the ground not unworthy of the eyes of God. How shall degraded, grasping selfishness, in which soul and spirit have become the dull drudges of a broad grasping hand and cunning plotting brain, submit to the gaze of Him who, having given all else, at last gave himself to die, who lived on earth only to dispense blessing, and now liveth to intercede for sinners!

What is thought good policy now, will change its aspect then. In that same hour will all their thoughts perish. Yet such eyes shall have to see Him. So shall they also that pierced Him; and they that crucify Him afresh in the person of his weakest child. The scoffer and the persecutor, after asking where is the promise of his coming, shall be woefully well able to answer themselves; and having staked all upon one deadly cast, shall see too plainly that Christ was a reality, and they have lost the game. His gentleness was a matter of pity and of scorn once, but there will be no such emotion then. Men who never cried for mercy, will then cry to anything rather than to him—to the rocks and the hills, rather than that meek and lowly One, who stretched out his hands so long in vain to their stiffnecked rebellion.

It is an awful thought, that licentious and profligate men shall see Christ. I know nothing so hateful and repulsive—no, not in disease—as the change that sin of this kind works upon faces that were once fair. Degraded, bloated, animal, the show of their faces doth testify against them; and we cannot doubt that this change is but a sickly and faint reflection of that sadder, darker, more hateful change, that bedims the spirit like an eclipse, that tarnishes it like rust, that eats it away like leprosy. And this appalling change is open to the gaze of Him who is of purer eyes than to behold them, in whose ear their very prayers are an abomination.

Ah! what sadder sight is anywhere than the sight of a young man, who ought to be full of gracious and generous impulses—of the wild freshness of morning, of the dew of youth, going steadily and surely down in the scale of being, becoming selfish, hateful, demoralised, cynical before his time? It is enough to make one shudder, and I think the malignity of Satan has wrought no other change so vile.

And these poor creatures will have to look at Christ! at "the fairest among ten thousand, and the altogether lovely." Of course, they shall not see him in any deep or worthy sense; for all they who (purged by grace from mortal defilement) can bear to see him as he is, shall by that very vision be made like him. Only the pure in heart can see God, or look upon "the King in his beauty." Yet their eyes shall see him, frowning and terrible; and it is not from devils or hell, but from the crowning horror of the anger that rests upon the face of him that sits upon the throne, that Nature, in her dying agonies will be invoked to save them—the wrath of the Lamb!

The idle and the frivolous shall see Him. They who tell you that, if they do no good, they do no harm; they who insist upon it that they have no influence, and never ask why have they none; these shall not have then to do with people only a step above themselves in earnestness; their Judge will be one who marvelled that his parents suspected him, at twelve years old, of other occupation than the Father's business,—who held it better than meat and drink to finish that work; and who gave the world fair notice that he would not hear of any man hiding one single talent in a napkin.

The self-deceived will be brought into contact with a test that allows no more deception. Some there are who think they never saw Christ in want of anything—meat, or drink, or clothes, or solace. When they see him, they shall perceive a close resemblance, a brotherly likeness, to some poor wretch whom they neglected, in hunger, thirst, nakedness, or shame and solitude. Christ is, in very deed, passed by, at least as often as he is rejected; and wounded by inhumanity and want of sympathy as deeply as by ungodliness and want of faith. But how bitter a thing to look into his face expecting welcome, and receive only repulse, and the words of denial, "Ye did it not to me!"

So will it be with others who went further still, and did exactly what these left undone. Men may not only serve the body but the soul of their brother, and yet neglect their own. Some have worked miracles in Christ's name, and cast out devils, and he has eaten and drunk in their streets, to whose confident and familiar address he will return a chilling denial before the Father and the angels.

Leaders in family prayer, friends of the mission and the ragged-school, teachers in Sunday-schools and visitors of districts—is it of you that such a warning has been spoken? It will be a terrible thing to see Christ upon the throne, to all who have not seen and loved him on the cross or before the mercy seat.

There are drooping and discouraged souls whom the Lord loveth, that will be almost as much surprised that day. Many a one has real trust in Christ, and yet goes under a cloud lest he is not trusting him enough. Bunyan's picture of Mr. Ready-to-halt, or poor Little-faith, getting on toward heaven, but robbed of his money by Mis-trust, and forced to beg his tearful way, might have been drawn to-day as well as in the time of the Puritans. Many people will not believe that they are going to heaven until they see their Master, and understand how sadly we all under-rate his love, and grace, and charity.

Loving souls, the very intensity of whose affection makes them feel how far their love is beneath His deserving, their labour unworthy of his acceptance,—physically nervous and despondent souls, in whom the morbid body has power to becloud the spirit, as the vapours of the earth obscure the shining of the sun—they have a glad surprise before them, when his face beams an eternal welcome to his most timid children, and his pierced hand wipes away for ever the furrow of tears that were too frequent and too hot.

The persecuted and down-trodden, who in the battle of life staggered under the fury of Satan's buffeting, whose path was over thorns and briars—they shall see Him for whom they longed and watched, and the peace of God, which guarded (kept) their hearts and minds, shall spread over the whole worn nature and exhausted frame, and they shall sing, "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us: this is the Lord; we have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation."

All His people shall see Him that day, and feel that if there were no other heaven, that beatific vision would be enough for their eternity—all their salvation and all their desire.

We shall see Him. If it be in anguish, the bitterness of that sorrow will turn all our past joys to gall and wormwood, and poison the very fountains of a life which will yet remain with us for ever, but over which sun and stars shall for ever have gone down. If it be in joy, all troubles will be forgotten in that rapture; and all tears we ever shed, all prayers that ascended up with groaning, all losses that rent the fibres of the heart, will but swell the flood of that great tide of happiness, sparkling and free, and fathomless, that comes up and up in the hearts of the redeemed for evermore.

MISSING LETTERS.

IN THE POCKET.—THE ADMIRAL'S LETTER.—THE LOOKING-GLASS.—THE WILL.

WHAT gentleman or lady, living at ease, or with "nothing else to do," will write a history of missing letters? Fun, rage, comedy, tragedy, and even farce would, in turns, be exhibited as the results of wrong deliveries or non-deliveries. Even that awful and mysterious being—the philosopher—would receive some fresh illustrations of the strange tricks played by memory and imagination in "the department of letters." With what a serene and ineffable satisfaction would "the gentlemen of the Post-office" peruse such a record of the blunders committed by that suspicious and loud-tongued Leviathan—the public! We deeply grieve over our present inability to undertake so impressive a history, but hope that the four cases hereafter described may stimulate others to enter upon the work.

Are any of our readers philosophers? There can be but one answer to such an inquiry, and we, therefore, ask them to ponder the following question:—Have they ever had a most vivid impression that something has been done by themselves, only a few hours before, which it afterwards turns out has not been done at all? Such readers, recollecting their amazement on discovering the delusion, will be specially prepared to consider the first and second of the following cases. Others may have their interest deepened by reflecting that similar mistakes may be made by themselves.

Our first instance may be entitled

IN THE POCKET.

Mr. O., the postmaster of a town in the North of England, was informed by a gentleman, Mr. F., that a most important letter, recently posted by himself, had not been delivered. The postmaster, of course, held the ancient creed of all genuine officials, that the public is always in the wrong. With this time-honoured belief influencing his views, he began to note down the complainant's answers to various questions. Mr. O. soon began, in spite of his prejudices, to suspect that, this time at least, the office had really been caught tripping. The gentleman before him was clerk to a large firm in the town, a business man, and a strict observer of all commercial rules. When had the letter been posted? The date was given with exactness, as, indeed, it well might be, only two days having passed since Mr. F. had posted it himself.

It now remained for the Post-office to trace out the irregular course which the document appeared to have taken. One question more was put: "How did Mr. F. know the letter had not been received?"

That was soon answered by the business-like clerk. He had received information that very morning from the person to whom the missing letter had been addressed. Like a steady matter-of-fact man, he had brought his friend's note with him; "You shall see it," said the clear-headed Mr. F., and instantly pulled the epistle from his pocket.

What in the name of common sense is this? In bringing out his correspondent's communication, Mr. F. had actually drawn, from the same pocket, the very letter respecting which he had made such anxious inquiries, and which he had solemnly declared had been posted by himself two evenings before! There was the provoking letter in the hand of the astonished clerk, properly directed and stamped, but unposted.

The postmaster looked with the calmness of pity on another instance of human weakness. But how looked our clerk? What unuttered speculations of impish agency at work perplexed his heart? We do not feel justified in dragging forth to public gaze the private thoughts or confidential communications of Mr. F. It was a day of triumph at the Post-office. The story ran through all the departments, and duly appeared in a report of the Postmaster-General. The public was doubtless expected to form for itself the following practical rule: "Before complaining about a missing letter, feel in your pockets."

THE ADMIRAL'S LETTER.

"Very odd, and very shameful; the world's becoming a pack of thieves!" muttered a gallant old admiral, as he entered the post-office in high dudgeon. He angrily inquired about the non-delivery of a letter containing a money-order. He had posted the letter himself; that "I can swear," was the emphatic declaration; and he boldly added, "I will swear it, if needs be, before five hundred magistrates!"

The offer was large and liberal, but the Post-office, not seeing what additional validity the presence of the "five hundred" would confer, did not procure the attendance of these respectable gentlemen.

It was soon ascertained that the money-order had not been cashed; the thief had not, therefore, increased his fortune by the crime. The admiral insisted that the letter had been stolen by the Post-office servants; though his grumbling at length softened down into, "It's too bad, too bad altogether."

Neither letter nor money-order could be traced; but as payment of the original order had been stopped, a duplicate was granted, and the admiral's wrath slowly sunk into a fitful kind of slumber. It was, however, pretty clear that he looked suspiciously at every postman who passed, as if saying, "One of those very fellows may have grinned over the contents of an admiral's letter." No punishment less than the nine-tailed cat would suffice for such a crime. Such was the state of the old gentleman's feelings as he folded up the fresh order, and opened his purse to place the document safely among his bank-notes.

It is very difficult, indeed, for degenerate mortals of the nineteenth century to imagine the feelings of that fascinating lady, Miss Pandora, when she discovered the contents of her wonderful casket; perhaps it is not easier to depict the looks of the admiral when he opened his purse. There, snugly lying in loving proximity to a bank-note, was the very order about which he had raised such a storm. He would have deposed on oath "before five hundred" that he had done three things—written the letter, enclosed the order, and posted both. Yet the whole was a delusion! He had not even written the letter, to the posting of which he had so vehemently deposed.

When the admiral had recovered from his amazement, he hastened to the post-office. The gentleman in attendance expected another torrent of, "It's too bad, too bad altogether," but received, instead, a shower of apologies, ending with, "It is the most extraordinary thing, sir, that ever happened in my life." The whole story was then told to the astonished official.

Philosophers, physicians, and barristers may well ponder over so singular a case of mental delusion, happening to a sane man, and to a public officer, who had filled difficult and responsible stations. Both the above cases show the mischief which may sometimes arise from relying solely on the testimony of one witness, however honest.

THE LOOKING-GLASS.

Our third and fourth cases illustrate no mental irregularities, but are simply examples of the annoying results of what are called "accidents." In truth, these "accidents" have much to answer for; at one time filling pages of history with mourning and woe; at another, perplexing a family, and turning a house topsy-turvy.

An excited lady called at the post-office in the town of P., and informed the postmaster, in the curtest and sharpest words, that she had posted a letter containing a Bank of England note at his office, directed to a person residing at No. —, in R. Street, Clerkenwell, London, and that the said letter had never been delivered. The lady's anger had risen with every sentence, until, at the close, it had reached the point marked on the emotional thermometer as "fever-heat, feminine." In fact, she boldly charged the officials with "robbery." The postmaster's calmness only irritated her the more, and his proper inquiry, "What was the value of the note?" was met by ironical laughter, and by the spiteful remark, that he could not possibly need such information. Had Job been the postmaster at P. on that day, it may well be gravely doubted whether even his patriarchal mind could have quietly borne such an imputation. The P. postmaster stood the tempest with reasonable coolness, and even heroically ventured to reason with the indignant dame, but to little purpose; she had made up her mind to the uncomfortable conclusion, that "all were robbers."

The Post-office put into action all its means of detection, but with no results; letter and bank-note were untraceable. Nearly nine months passed, and the irritating incident was taking its place among forgotten things, when the whole affair was revived.

Readers will oblige us by entering the house in R. Street, Clerkenwell, to which the unlucky letter had been directed. We see at a glance what is going on: a work abhorred by men—whether bachelors or husbands—but the highest delight of many women. A general "clean out" is in full operation, and the scrubbing-brush and broom everywhere triumphant. One wall over the fireplace cannot be properly cleaned, unless a large looking-glass is removed. There was, as Mrs. Picket, the charwoman, remarked, "a nice lot o' dust" behind the glass, of course; but there was something more exciting. When the mirror was removed, a letter, grimy with dust and cobwebs, fell upon the mantelpiece. Being taken up by the mistress of the house, she at once recognised it as the letter which ought to have been received by her nine months before. It was instantly opened, and there, sure enough, was the bank-note carefully folded up inside the letter.

The cleaning was suspended, children, servants, charwoman, and "missus" formed a grand deliberative council on the discovery. Mrs. Picket's emotions were summed up in the exclamation, "Lor, now! who'd a-thought o' that bank-note a-bein' there, an' I'd been in this very spot so often?" The general feeling was expressed in the question, "How could it have come there?" No answer was given to this; but "missus" suddenly turned to Betty the housemaid, exclaiming, "Why, Betty, this letter must have come here when my aunt, Mrs. Morrison, was staying in the house, and we were all at Margate—all but you; don't you recollect anything about it?"

Betty was, to use her own striking epithet, "flabbergasted" at this query; but she was equal to the emergency, and began to "turn over the thing in her mind." The result of her turning over may be seen in her remark:

"Well, ma'am, it's very odd, but I does recollect now a letter was stuck just there by Mrs. Morrison"—(Betty illustrated the point by putting her dusty finger on the wall)—"just there, ma'am; but I thought it was Mrs. Morrison's, and when I heard you, ma'am, a-making sich a stir about a letter, I didn't dream—lor! how should I?—that it could be that letter. You may depend on it, ma'am, that it slipped down atween the wall and the glass, and there it must ha' been ever since that rumpus with the Post-office. Well, who'd a thought of sich a thing?"

Betty was right in her guess, as was soon ascertained from Mrs. Morrison, who had stuck the letter over the mantel, between the looking-glass and the wall, where she naturally supposed it must be seen by the niece on her return.

The sender of the bank-note being immediately informed of the strange discovery, wrote a full account to the post-office at P., with many apologies for the charges so angrily made.

Thus was the mystery cleared up, after nine months; but it is plain that as many years might have elapsed without a discovery, had the looking-glass remained unmoved.

(Drawn by F. W. LAWSON.)

"But I must worship from afar
The marble brow, the blushing cheek."—p. 506.

THE WILL.

"Are you really sure, Roberts, that you posted that will?" was the question put by Mr. David Elton, the head-partner in a solicitors' firm, to his clerk.

"As sure as I'm alive, sir; I remember reading the address to the Probate-office at E. just before posting the packet," was the answer.

"It's really most mysterious," said Mr. Elton; "the people at the Probate-office are ready to swear they never received it; the Post-office can discover no trace of it. It's terribly annoying, for there's no copy of the will. What are we to do?"

Every imaginable step was taken to recover the document, but in vain. The Post-office was as perplexed as the solicitor. An experienced official was employed to investigate the matter; but not the least clue could be obtained. It was, as one remarked, "an aggravating affair." The legatees were enraged, the executors paralysed, the attorneys perplexed, and the Post-office confounded. While the exasperation was at its height, the attorneys boldly declared the Post-office agents must have stolen the will, and the Post-office replied by expressing their firm belief that the clerk had never posted the packet.

At the end of five months the will came to the light, in a manner which made every one concerned in the matter look rather foolish, as a child might have suggested the solution. A house in F. Street had for above five months bore the announcement, "To Let." Every day the mansion seemed as if imploring all respectable passers-by to take pity upon its desolate condition. At length a tenant was found, and the house seemed to grow young again under renovating processes; cupboards were flung open, rooms swept, and a frightful panic produced among the patriarchal spiders which had evidently regarded the place as their fee-simple. A large letter-box, fixed in the front door was opened, and a long envelope carefully fastened became visible. The workman rubbed off a thick layer of black dust, and then read the direction to the Probate-office of the town. When carried there, it was found to contain the long-lost will. The question, "How did it get into that letter-box?" was soon answered.

It appeared that the house in F. Street had been formerly used by the Probate-office, which, however, had been removed to another street, about a week before Mr. Elton's clerk posted the will. This removal was perfectly well known to the ordinary postman of the district; but he was off duty on the morning for the delivery of the packet. The supernumerary employed in his stead, being ignorant of the change, and the old letter-box having been left open, the unsuspecting postman dropped the will into the box. When the hue and cry was raised, the man declared that he duly posted the letter at the Probate-office. It is, however, very singular that the probability of such a mistake should never have occurred to the people at the Probate-office, or to the Post-office authorities, who must have been aware of the employment of a supernumerary on the morning specified.

"All's well that ends well," and each of the above cases was ultimately explained without serious damage to any party. But many similar incidents must have happened without ever receiving a solution. In each of the above four cases, the explanation seems simple enough. The first two are the most perplexing, disclosing some strange disturbance of the memory; but the latter two represent a numerous class of "accidents," and are more connected with our every-day life. All, however, force one conclusion upon us—that on each side of life's routine pathway lie a thousand hidden pitfalls and concealed traps. We may name them "lapses," and call them "accidents," but there they lie in grim shadow nevertheless.

FROM AFAR.

WERT thou but the moon that gilds

My lowly cot on summer eves,

And I the happy stream that sings

Beneath the forest leaves:

O joy, to gaze upon thy face—

Thy face that all my thoughts beguile;

O bliss, to hold within my heart

The beauty of thy smile.

Or were I but the lightsome breeze

That wantons through the groves of May,

And thou the rose beside my door

That scents the op'ning day:

O happy lot, to pause and woo,

To breathe love's music in thine ear;

O dream, to kiss from beaming eyes

The bright and hallowed tear.

Ah! Mary, could I rise to thee,

Or were a lowlier station thine,

The simple flower within the glade,

I might have called thee mine;—

I might have clasped thee to my breast,

Hung raptured on thy faintest breath;

I might have known the thrill divine

That only dies with death.

But I must worship from afar

The marble brow, the blushing cheek—

Must hide beneath the light of smiles

The love I may not speak.

Yet, Mary, in the years to come

Perchance 'twill soothe my dark despair,

Amid the ruins love hath made,

To find thine image there.

MATTHIAS BARR.

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER VII.

THE MASTER AND THE MEN.

MR. MAPLESON—or rather Josiah Mapleson, Esq., as all his letters were directed—was the owner of a silk-mill near to the town of Newbury. The mill had been a profitable concern, and was so still, in spite of the times being rather unsettled. Mr. Mapleson had made a good fortune out of it, and was thinking of retiring. But though he had thought about it a long time, he had not taken a single step in that direction. People said he was wedded to the business, and so perhaps he was. At all events, he was wedded to nothing else. He lived a solitary life down at the least fashionable end of Newbury, and had neither wife nor child to solace his declining years. He was a hard man, though strictly a just one; and he was a hard master, his men said, and the bond between the employer and employed was not altogether of the friendly nature it should be. The morning after Harold Blake's arrival in Newbury, Mr. Mapleson was in his office in Tower Street. He was sitting at his desk, to which he had just given a hard rap, as he uttered the words—

"I have more than half a mind to send you both to prison!"

The speech was hurled defiantly at two men who stood opposite the desk. They were working men, and not very easy ones to deal with, it should seem.

"And what might that be for, sir?" asked the elder of the men. He had a long, thin face, with a pair of hungry, rather wolfish-looking eyes. He held his cap, between his hands, with a kind of clutch that tightened as Mr. Mapleson spoke.

"What for!—for insubordination, Richard Fanan; and for cheating your master out of his time."

The thin man laughed a hollow laugh.

"Them must be precious sharp as would cheat you out of anything, Mr. Mapleson," said he.

"So they must; and I mean they should," replied Mr. Mapleson, shortly.

He was a wiry man, with a keen eye like a hawk. Nothing ever went by him, as his men used to say, "He'd stop to pick up a pin!"

"Now then," said Mr. Mapleson, "I have no time to waste in arguing the matter. I threatened what I'd do, and I'll do it. When I engaged you, it was by the day, and I'll pay by the day. If you choose to go off drinking from Monday till Wednesday, you can't expect me to pay for that."

"We wasn't drinking, sir; we're teetotals."

"Do you expect me to believe you, Richard Fanan?"

"You can do as you please about that, sir. It don't alter the fact," said Richard, sullenly.

"At any rate, I won't employ either of you any longer; and I won't pay for work you have not done. Here's the money due to you."

"I won't take it, sir, unless you pay the week," said Richard.

"Nor I," said the other man. "What Richard says, I'll stick by."

"Very well. There the money lies, and will lie, for five minutes; after that, it goes into my cash-box, and not a glint of it will either of you see again."

"I don't care, sir; if you choose to cheat us poor men out of our wages, you must," said Richard who seemed to be spokesman. "And if you turn us adrift, in the dead winter, when we've wives and children to keep, I suppose you must. But mark my words, sir—there's a day of reckoning coming, and happen, sooner than you expect!"

"Days of reckoning are of little consequence to me, my man. My accounts are clear enough. I wish yours might be the same."

"Thank ye, sir," said Fanan.

"And now the five minutes have gone. Will you take the money, or not?"

"We will not, sir." Both men spoke at once this time.

Mr. Mapleson took up the little heap of gold and silver, and swept it into his desk. Then he said—

"As there is nothing further to say, or to do, I wish you good morning."

"Good day to you, sir; and may you never repent this morning's work," said Fanan: "it runs strangely in my head that you will."

Mr. Mapleson laughed. It was a cutting, derisive laugh, and with it ringing in their ears, the men went out of the office.

"Precious rascals, both of them, and a good ridance," said Mr. Mapleson to himself. "That fellow Fanan will get into prison some day, if he does not mind. Well, what is the matter now?" This was to a young subordinate who opened the door.

"Nothing is the matter, sir; only a gentleman wishes to see you."

Mr. Mapleson took the card offered to him, and read it—"Mr. Harold Blake. Ah, I knew his father well—an old friend of mine. Show the gentleman in, Wilson."

A minute after, in walked Harold. Mr. Mapleson rose, and shook hands with great cordiality.

"I am very glad to see you, Mr. Blake—an unexpected pleasure."

Harold returned the shake of the hand heartily.

"I believe I am speaking to an old friend of my father?" said he.

"Yes, you are: we were at school together. Bless you! I knew him as intimately as if he had been my brother. I lost sight of him, in after life, and——"

Mr. Mapleson glanced dubiously at Harold's mourning apparel.

Harold was silent a moment; so was Mr. Mapleson. "My father is dead," said Harold, at length, in a firm voice.

"Dear me! I am sorry to hear it, on my word I am," said Mr. Mapleson, in a tone of real feeling.

Both were again silent.

"And your mother?" asked Mr. Mapleson, fearfully.

"She is dead, too."

It was hard work to keep firm this time, and Harold's face showed it.

"I am sure I am very sorry," repeated Mr. Mapleson. "Poor fellow, are you quite alone then?"

"No, I have Charley."

"Charley! who is he?"

My poor crippled brother; he had a hurt when he was a child, and he has never been able to walk."

"Dear me! and you two are alone in the world. Well, it is very sad! Are you come here on a visit?"

"No; I am come in search of employment."

"Employment! why, are you serious?" and Mr. Mapleson's face expressed the utmost astonishment.

"Yes, employment; that Charley and I may live."

"But, my dear fellow, what has become of your patrimony? Surely your father, who was a flourishing merchant when I heard of him last—surely he left you enough to prevent that necessity?"

Harold was silent. A few vivid memories rose up before him that moment—a home full of luxury and extravagance, a wasteful, pretentious establishment, such as could not be kept up, without a fortune to back it; Harold remembered this, and was silent.

"Well, well," said Mr. Mapleson, good-naturedly, "of course, reverses are incident to the lot of the best of us. I am afraid your father found it so, and I am sorry. But was there nothing left?"

Harold shook his head. He had not told Mr. Mapleson that a fortune did come to him, but that he forebore to touch it. With it he had satisfied every one of his father's creditors—yea, every single one!

"Ah, it is a sad case, at your age too, when young men like naturally to enjoy themselves. And what are you intending to do?"

"To work!"

No pen can give the least idea of the word, as it issued from the lips of Harold Blake.

Mr. Mapleson had risen, and was standing with his hands in his pockets, keenly surveying Harold. He liked both his looks and his sentiments amazingly.

"And now, Mr. Blake, just tell me what made you come to me?"

"Because you were my father's friend, and because I hoped you would employ me," replied Harold.

"You are quite in earnest then?"

"I should think I am!"

Harold had a quick, impetuous way of speaking. Besides, poor Charley's face seemed to rise up, that minute, before him.

Mr. Mapleson had not seen Charley; but an idea had occurred to him. Harold was a comparative stranger to him; but Mr. Mapleson was a shrewd judge of character, and he did not think it likely he could be deceived in that clear, open face, and frank manner. And he had known Harold's father, when they two were just at Harold's age. He wanted a man, as he said to himself, about the grounds, a man young, vigorous, energetic, and not afraid to work. It was scarce a position for a gentleman; but still it was worth mentioning.

"I am glad you did come to me, Mr. Blake. I am in want of an overseer, to pay the men and look after them sharply. I want some one who will do his duty by me, and not stir up insubordination."

"Insubordination!" said Harold, in a tone of surprise.

"Yes; the men have had their minds poisoned by a fellow, whom I have turned off this very morning. They are in a rather unsettled state, and it may be ugly work dealing with them some of these days. Are you firm, Harold Blake?"

"I think so," replied Harold, smiling.

"You look firm; there is a line about your mouth that I like the curve of. Are you practical?"

"I hope so," replied Harold, smiling again.

"And not afraid of work?"

"No!"

The no came out with a volume of sound that delighted Mr. Mapleson.

"Very well, you shall come and try; I am without an overseer at all, now. By-the-way, Harold Blake, you ought to get into a profession; if you are only the overseer in a silk-mill, the élite of Newbury will take no notice of you."

Harold laughed. "I shall not trouble about that," he said.

"But really, a profession would be the right thing. Don't you think so?"

"Mr. Mapleson," said Harold, calmly, "I will do what Providence puts into my hands first of all, and let alone the profession."

"That's right. Why, you seem to me to be right all ways, Harold Blake!"

Harold smiled. Then he began to ask a few questions about the opening just made for him. It was rather an arduous employment, and certainly not what he had been used to. He would have to be on the premises early and late, and the remuneration was not very liberal. But Harold could not afford to be fastidious, or to waste time. Besides, this engagement, if faithfully executed, might lead to another. At all events, he would do his best.

"And be sure you hold hard, Harold Blake!" said Mr. Mapleson; "be sure you hold hard!"

For the rest, Harold's new friend was very kind to him, and even invited him to dinner; but this Harold declined. Indeed, all along he was puzzled to know how he could leave Charley the whole (or nearly so) of the day. It seemed very sad, the straits they had come into, these two orphans, alone in the world.

"Except that every man may make his own fortune, or else mend it," thought Harold, as he strode home; "and that's what, with God's help, I mean to do!"

CHAPTER VIII.

THE SYLVESTERS AT HOME.

THE Sylvesters dined at eight o'clock precisely. There were but three of them, to sit down in the vast dining-room that would have accommodated fifty with ease, and had done, in the days that were past. All round the room hung family portraits, looking grim and ghostly, in their ancient lustreless frames. The threadbare curtains were closely drawn, and the chandelier lighted over head. Nothing was cheerful in the gloomy room, save the gas.

The cloth was laid, and there was a fraction of the old family plate, with the crest of the Sylvesters engraved upon it, making a show as usual. And there was the butler, with the snowy napkin on his arm, waiting for the family to come to table. They came almost directly; the door was thrown open by another attendant, and in they walked. Lady Sylvester leaned on Raymond's arm, and Alice walked beside. The three were wonderfully alike—the mother and her children.

Dinner passed over slowly and pompously. Conversation was kept up on indifferent topics; but there was something laboured about it. When it was ended, and the proper time had come, the ladies rose and retired, leaving Raymond ostensibly at his wine.

He had drunk several glasses, though he was an abstemious man. There seemed a feverish restlessness about him. He had been preoccupied, and almost inattentive. The relief seemed unbounded when he found himself alone.

He pushed the wine from him with an impatient gesture. He stretched his arms on the table, and leaned his head upon them. He uttered a stifled groan. In the silence it seemed to be echoed back from every corner; from the ghostly pictures on the walls, from the drear nothingness around him!

For he was thinking of Josephine! He had never ceased to think of her since they parted. Josephine! his heart clung to her! his very life seemed bound up with hers! He could not bear this agony: it would sap his very being!

He would go back to her. And he rose, his face illumined with hope. He would tell her how he suffered! He would bind up the broken threads. He would gather her to his heart again. He would go forth and toil for her. He would fling aside his pride, his prejudice. He would be a new man, and live another life. All for Josephine!

But there were the Sylvesters; grim and ghostly they glare at him from the walls. Who is to support the fabric, if he lets it slip? On him all things depend! A portionless bride! The wind, as it moans round the old house, seems to repeat the words in a mocking cadence—A portionless bride! Poverty on the heels of poverty!

No; it cannot be. The sacrifice has been required of him, and he has made it; he will not go back, or flinch, though he die for it: it is the way with the Sylvesters. Raymond had been a hero had his cause been just.

He sat down again, haggard, white, and trembling. Josephine lies on her bed of unconsciousness. When she wakes to reason and reality, her suffering will not be like this.

He has not told his mother, or his sister either; but it is time he did. The Sylvesters have no secrets from each other. They are bound with a threefold cord. Their mutual love, and the clanship which subsists between them, is the best feature in their character.

He means to tell his mother, this very night. He cannot bear his grief alone. It is for their sakes—he means to say. And he will show no weakness, or irresolution. These are attributes that do not belong to his race.

With this resolve he rises. He has had enough of solitude, and the bitter wrestling with his own thoughts. He tosses off another glass of wine, and steps briskly out.

The drawing-room is smaller, and far less dreary than the apartment he has left. By the fire sits his august mother, in her robe of crape, and lace ruffler. Alice is on a low stool at her mother's feet. Her mother's hand rests lovingly on her head.

Mother and daughter are rejoicing in their reunion.

When Raymond entered, Alice looked up at him. Her face was full of calm happiness. She was at home again. She had by her the two beings dearest to her on earth: and she did not seem to care for aught else.

Raymond stood by the fire looking at her, or rather at them.

"It is for their sakes," he thought; "for theirs only!"

He did not introduce the subject at once. Indeed, at one time he thought he should never introduce it at all. It is astonishing how hard he found it to mention the once dear and familiar name of Josephine!

The first few days of Alice's return were intended to be exceptional ones. She had been staying abroad with a relative—at a home where the grinding cares, that harassed the Sylvesters, were unknown. And just in the flush of happiness, at reunion with her mother and her brother, it was thought the skeleton in the house might be forgotten. But it was scarce possible to be unconscious long of its existence.

"Tell me everything, dear mother," Alice had been saying. "You and Raymond look sadly careworn and anxious. Do not keep any secret back from me, mother."

"There is nothing new to tell, Alice. It is the old, old story," replied Lady Sylvester, with a touch of sadness in her voice.

"But, mother, I am come back so full of energy and of resource! I do not mean tamely to sit down, and suffer in miserable ease."

Her face flushed as she said it, and the resolute will of the Sylvesters rose dominant in every feature.

"Silly child! what can you do?"

"Mother, I can work!"

Lady Sylvester laughed. The words sounded chimerical as the philosopher's stone.

"Raymond will marry soon, mother; and then we two will not live in this splendid poverty. We will give it up—and be honest and independent."

"Alice, you talk very wildly." It was Raymond who spoke. "And you never were a true Sylvester, or you would not hint at giving up your birthright."

"My birthright! Ah, Raymond, God never gives us such a one as this is!" said Alice, mournfully.

"Mother," continued Raymond, "and Alice too, I have something to tell you. You may have guessed it. It relates to these ruined fortunes of ours. I had better name it, and then let the subject rest in silence."

His voice died sadly away. It had a sharp, bitter tone in it. He was standing opposite his mother; but he turned his face from her as he spoke.

"What is it, Raymond?" said Lady Sylvester, anxiously.

Her whole heart was bound up in her children.

"Mother, you have heard of—of Josephine?"

Here his voice softened into tenderness.

Lady Sylvester paused a moment. When she spoke, it was to say coldly, and without sympathy, "I have heard that she is left portionless; that her aunt's will was an unjust one. Do you mean this, Raymond?"

"I do, mother."

"Have you seen her since?" It was Alice who spoke, warmly and impulsively.

There was a working of the proud, handsome features; then he said, "Yes, I have."

"Oh, that is right; I am glad you have seen her!" and she came and put her arm in that of her brother: it was a gesture that expressed sympathy. "I am glad you have seen her," repeated she.

Raymond was looking at his mother, not at Alice. Lady Sylvester had not spoken. She was sitting in her most erect and dignified attitude.

No love had ever been lost between Lady Sylvester and Josephine Graham.

"She is not thorough-bred. The Grahams are a mixed kind of race," had said Lady Sylvester.

"Shall I ever persuade that proud, cold woman into loving me?" had mused Josephine.

So, when Lady Sylvester heard that Josephine was portionless, she held her peace.

It was a chilling, blank silence, telling more than words would have done.

Alice's face was full of sympathy and interest. But, then, Alice was in many respects, as her brother said, no true Sylvester; and Alice had always loved Josephine.

She was planning how, on the morrow, she would go to her, and throw her arms round her, and say, "Never mind, Josephine—my sister Josephine, you are coming to us!"

She wondered Raymond did not speak. She was oppressed by the cold, blank silence that had set in. She did not like the two rigid faces that were on either side of her. Still, it had never occurred to her that Josephine would be sacrificed. There was "honour bright," she thought, amongst her kith and kin, even in their ruin.

Lady Sylvester was the first to break the silence.

"It is sad news, Raymond—this that we have heard," said she, in a cold, measured tone.

"For Josephine, mother?" interrupted Alice, eagerly, and as if thrusting some idea from her. "Very sad for Josephine."

"You must excuse a mother's partiality, Alice," said Lady Sylvester, still coldly: "I was thinking of Raymond."

Alice turned to her brother. Some word, she thought, should have sped from his lips hurriedly, and with eagerness. That word should have been like a bulwark to defend Josephine. But it came not.

Then she withdrew her arm, and went a few paces from him. It was a gesture as significant as the other. It said plainly as words could speak, "You are not what I thought you were, Raymond!"

Lady Sylvester spoke again. "We live in disastrous times, my children. Our house has fallen to decay. We can scarce guess what our future will be. They who are falling want a prop, Raymond. A portionless bride is no happy prospect for a Sylvester."

Raymond was silent. An eager look from Alice—a look of passionate entreaty; but it fell to the ground, Raymond saw it not.

"You have pledged your word, my son, to this—this marriage," continued Lady Sylvester; "and you cannot draw back—no, you cannot."

She added the words with an evident reluctance. Alice would have burst out vehemently; but she was checked by her brother. Raymond was about to reply.

"Mother, of two evils, I have tried to choose the least. My love for Josephine"—here his voice trembled—"has not blinded me to the fact of my true position"—here his voice became calm, collected, and strong. "If I marry under these altered circumstances, I see but one alternative. You will be deprived of the support which, as a son of this ruined house, I should be able to afford you. You would, in fact, be lost to me, and I to you. Our interests would be divided, and not one single advantage would result to you from the step I had taken. Mother, I have thought of these things, again and again." He paused, and pressed his hand to his forehead.

Alice was at his side again. She thought, now, it was a passing cloud—the result of their sad and harassing position. She could have staked her life on his fidelity to Josephine.

"Well, Raymond?" said his mother, anxiously. His mother's thoughts were running in quite another groove.

"Mother," and he gave a slight shudder, "I have done it for your sake, and for the sake of Alice. I have given up Josephine!"

He brought out the words slowly and deliberately. His voice had a grating sound. Alice withdrew again, and stood some paces from him. Her face was pale and stern. Her heart had given one bound, and then seemed to die within her.

"What! given up Josephine?"

She did not pity him now. No, let him suffer what he might. He sat down, and hid his face in his hands. He was fairly overcome, and trembled from head to foot. She had never seen him so before, and perhaps, never would again. But indignation had driven out every feeling of compassion.

Lady Sylvester rose, and crossed over to where Raymond sat. She stooped down and kissed him. She was his mother, and would take him to her arms, let him have done what he might. In this case, it seemed as if he had but returned to his allegiance.

"Mother, do not kiss him! He is a traitor!"

She said it in a tone so sharp and shrill, that they both started. It was scarcely like the sweet, musical voice of Alice Sylvester.

"He should but have loved her all the more: he should have brought her to us; we would have cherished her. Union would have been strength."

Lady Sylvester threw a glance of displeasure at her daughter.

"We do not want those who need cherishing, Alice. Heaven knows there is little enough for ourselves! Look round on the bare walls, and convince yourself of this. The Sylvesters need building up, and strengthening; and union is strength; but not union with poverty. Raymond has been wise, and loyal to his house;" and she stooped again, and kissed him.

"But," and Alice came near, too, in her eagerness, and her garments touched him as he sat—"but does no one think of Josephine, and of her fate—abandoned, friendless, alone?"

He bowed lower. She was glad to see it. Dishonour, she thought, threatened to tarnish the crest of the Sylvesters. She hoped he would relent; that the secret agony he felt would compel him to return to Josephine.

But she was mistaken. When he raised his head, she could see in every feature, the indomitable will that would hold suffering at bay. She knew, then, that there would be no relenting; that he had rent himself away from Josephine for ever!

It was terrible to think so. Alice was young, and her heart tender. She could not harden herself as they did; she could not be so merciless. Heaven help her, coming of such a race!

She went to her room; it was cold and fireless, and the stormy wind tore away in the old chimney. She wrapped herself in her shawl, and paced up and down—an impulsive, generous, loving creature, condemned to witness a scene of cruelty and wrong—condemned to see a heart, young and loving as her own, go down a wreck! And through the storm-wind outside, and the still louder storm within, there seemed to echo the ceaseless question—

"Josephine! what of Josephine?"

(To be continued.)

THE BLACKBERRY GATHERING.

GROUP of schoolboys stood waiting for a companion to make his appearance, discussing in glowing language the beauty of some blackberry-hedges which they had planned to visit on their way to school, and grumbling at the delay caused by the non-appearance of their friend.

"Oh! here he is," at length exclaimed one, as a boy about fourteen rushed out of a neighbouring house.

"Now, Harry, be sure you go straight off to Carr's at once," they heard his father say, as he closed the door after him; and then they saw that Harry held a note in his hand.

"I say, old fellow, it's too bad to keep us waiting all this time," exclaimed two or three, as he joined them.

"I wish you hadn't waited," said Harry, petulantly, "for I've got to go round to Carr's, the farriers, with this note."

"Oh, you can't go this morning, Martin; Carr's place is quite the other way, and if we don't get them blackberries this morning, they'll all be spoiled. I don't suppose that note is so particular—is it?"

"It's for Carr to send and fetch two of the horses that have cast their shoes. One of them belongs to the stage-coach, you know, and so it will be wanted in the afternoon," answered Harry.

"Oh, well, you can run down with that in the dinner-hour, just as well as going all that way now; so stuff it in your pocket, and let's go on, or the birds will have eaten the ripest blackberries."

"But father told me to be sure and take this note," debated Harry, as they came to the point where the two roads met—one leading to the famous blackberry-bushes, and the other round to the village where the blacksmith's forge was situated.

Harry stood here for a minute or two, balancing the note in his hand, and pondering whether he should go on to the blacksmith's, or postpone it until the dinner-hour came round. The school was some distance from home, but not far from the village; and as he always took his dinner, it would be easy to run down then and deliver the note, he thought, and he might enjoy the fun of getting the blackberries with his companions. He did not mean to be disobedient, but he had got into the habit of putting off doing things at the time he was desired to do them, and had hitherto escaped detection, so that the fault was one he thought little of now.

"Come, Martin, don't stand there like a stuck pig," shouted one of his companions; "either come on with us at once, or say you don't mean to come, and trot off with that bothering note. Bother the horses casting their shoes just now!" he added.

Harry decided to go with them, and thrusting the note into his pocket, turned up the lane.

The blackberries were very abundant, and just ripe, so that they had quite a feast at the expense of a few scratches. But the food, delicious as that was, was not enjoyed half so much as the fun—the eager scrambling up the dewy banks, and reaching, stretching, balancing their bodies to reach the highest branches, where the ripest fruit grew. Harry joined in the laughing, and seemed the merriest of them all, but in truth, he was far from feeling as gay and light-hearted as he seemed. The note that he had in his pocket weighed heavily upon his spirits, and he wished now that he had not come after the blackberries; but it was too late now. The clock struck nine before they thought it could be half-past eight, and then they were still some distance from school. They scampered off at once, but prayers were over before they got there, and they were ordered to remain half-an-hour after the others had left, as a punishment. It was past one o'clock before Harry reached the blacksmith's, to deliver his note, and then he heard to his consternation that the man had gone out.

"He waited about till a little agone twelve, to see if any jobs comed in," said his wife, "and when they didn't he went off to his brother, t'other side o' Farnley."

"Could I fetch him back," said Harry? "for two of the horses have cast their shoes, and they must be done before the coach comes up this afternoon."

"Ah, you're Mr. Martin's lad then. But why didn't you bring the note afore? I doubt whether you'll catch the old man, for he's a stout walker, is my John."

"Oh, I'll run and overtake him," said Harry; and scarcely heeding the woman's directions, delivered in her slow country speech, he burst away and took the road towards Farnley. A dread fear had come over him, how or why, he could not tell, but he felt he must fly on to find the man, and get the horses shod before the coach came by.

A mile, two miles, nearly three miles he ran, scarcely pausing to take breath, the haunting fear growing upon him each moment and urging him onward. At last he was obliged to sit down upon the grass and rest, for he was well-nigh exhausted. But not many minutes did he stay, only long enough to shed a few bitter tears, and wish that he had taken the note at the time he was sent, and then he hurried on, not pausing again until he had reached the place he was in search of. But, alas! Carr was not there, he had gone on to the next village; and, glancing at the clock, Harry saw that it was just three, and therefore too late to get the horse shod before half-past. As he retraced his steps, he tried to reason himself out of the terrible fear that had taken such hold upon him. His father had several other horses, he thought, that could be used instead of the shoeless one, and he tried to whistle and think no more about it, as he sauntered leisurely through the green lane, wondering what his father and schoolmaster would say to this escapade.

At the end of the lane rose a long, steep hill; and as Harry began slowly to ascend it, the mysterious fear again reasserted its power over him. But he had not gone far when, to his infinite relief, he heard the sound of wheels; and the next moment, the lumbering, heavy-laden stage-coach loomed in sight. They must have changed horses by this time, he knew; and as it came nearer, he saw that a young white one had taken the place of the other.

"Oh, they'll gain by that," he said, half aloud—all his fears vanishing in a moment; "at least half an hour will be saved as 'Tops' is leader;" and he stood still to watch the approach of the vehicle.

It certainly did come down the hill at a rapid rate, and he could see that the coachman had hard work to hold in the restive "Tops." The passengers, too, seemed somewhat anxious; and, looking more narrowly at these, he descried his father among those outside. But before he could begin to wonder what business could take his father in that direction, the coach gave a violent lurch; and the next minute—oh! horror of horrors—it lay upon its side in the road.

What happened next, Harry did not know; but he found himself in the ditch, supporting his father's head; while the guard stood by and told the doctor, who had been fetched, the cause of the accident—having a fresh horse, unused to the work, which, being restive, had at length urged on the others, and overturned the coach. How Harry sickened as he heard it, and looked down at the pale, unconscious face of his father. How heavy, how bitter his punishment was, as he sat there in the ditch thinking that all this mischief had been caused through his fault!

But he was roused from his bitter self-upbraidings by the men coming to carry his father to a cottage close by, where the doctor would set his leg, which it had been discovered, was broken. Harry followed at a little distance, anxious, yet fearing to enter, lest his father should be dead. On his way, he heard that several others had been slightly injured, but none so seriously as his father. This was a little relief to his mind, but who can picture his misery, when he heard soon afterwards that he was not expected to live?

For many weeks Mr. Martin hovered between life and death; but at length, to the surprise of all, he began to recover; and then, for the first time, he heard of the blackberry gathering which had been the cause of the accident. But there was no need to talk to Harry about it now; he had suffered too deeply ever to forget it; ah! and had profited by this severe lesson. Mr. Martin had often had serious misgivings before; for Harry, though merry and light-hearted, was gradually growing selfish, caring only for his own pleasure or convenience; but now this was all changed, his son was becoming a thoughtful, generous boy; and as years rolled on, he thanked God for that "blackberry gathering."

THE BUIVER

— Saturday, May 2, 1868. —

ST. PATRICK'S CATHEDRAL, DUBLIN.

ST. PATRICK.—DEAN SWIFT.

PERHAPS we shall rank as "heretics," if we hint a doubt whether St. Patrick did really preach to the pagan Irish on the very site where this cathedral now stands. Shall we also dare to suggest that, perhaps, he did not baptise his converts at the well formerly seen near the base of the church-tower? Some persons declare that St. Patrick could not have foreseen the kind of neighbourhood which would grow up round his cathedral. A church may have "Vanity Fair" very near its walls, but a cathedral in Rag Fair may seem, to "respectable people," as ill-placed as a palace in Puddle Dock. Strangers may be pardoned for regretting that a pile upon which £150,000 have just been expended should be surrounded by "slop-shops;" others, however, may think that a position among the poor is the very place for a missionary cathedral.

An ancient church may have stood on the site of the present from the time of St. Patrick, but "the college of priests" which afterwards became a cathedral was erected outside the city walls by John Comyn, the first Anglo-Norman Archbishop of Dublin, about the year 1190, and was dedicated to St. Patrick on March 17th in the next year.

The Danes had, however, previously established a bishopric of their own, dependent on Canterbury, in the monastic church of the Holy Trinity. The diocese was raised to an archbishopric in the year 1152, and the old monastic church became the cathedral of Christ Church at the Reformation. It was here that the English liturgy was first read on Easter Sunday, 1550.

Thus, from the exclusiveness of the old Danish colony on the one hand, and the liberality of Archbishop Comyn, we have two churches ranking as cathedrals in the same city. A statute of 1834 has decreed the reduction of the two deans to one, by enacting that at the death of the Dean of Christ Church the Dean of St. Patrick should become Dean of Christ Church; and thus the two deaneries have become one.

The appearance of St. Patrick's Cathedral is not remarkable for beauty or grandeur. It wants that richness of sculptured tracery, and diversity of light and shade, which so often convert a mass of grey stone into a poem. The tower presents none of those marvels of cunning work which photographers travel long distances to copy, and over which artists ponder with lingering joy. We need scarcely remind our readers that the whole pile has been lately restored, at the vast outlay of about £150,000. This was not the result of a great national subscription, nor was it the grant of some rich corporation, nor the fruit of a vote snatched after a hot debate in Parliament, but the liberal donation of a citizen of Dublin. Time was, and that not long ago, when the roof of the nave was left in a half-ruinous state for twenty-five years; being, during all that period, upheld by scaffolding. Mr. (now Sir) B. L. Guinness having expended about £150,000 in the restoration of the pile, and in clearing away many surrounding nuisances, had the satisfaction of seeing the renovated cathedral re-opened, on Friday, the 24th of February, 1865. It had been originally supposed that the whole work might be accomplished for £80,000; but no subsequent extension of the cost was allowed to suspend the due completion of the whole plan. There has been a thorough conscientiousness in both work and materials, from the Tullamore limestone which replaced the decayed Caen stone, to the renewed stalls and banners of the knights of St. Patrick.

Have we nothing to say about St. Patrick, from whom the cathedral was named? Yes, much more than our space will allow us to express; but we dare not omit all notice of so renowned a saint. St. Patrick was probably born in Scotland, about the year 372, and came to Ireland as a missionary in 432, having, however, been preceded by other Christian teachers, either from the ancient British or Gallic Church.

St. Patrick is generally supposed to be buried at Downpatrick, near the cathedral. But this does not pass unchallenged. The once magnificent Abbey of Glastonbury not only claimed Joseph of Arimathea as her founder, and the famous Dunstan for her pupil and abbot, but also the grave of St. Patrick. Let not Downpatrick fear, antiquaries assure us that the Patrick buried at Glastonbury is not the serpent-vanquisher of Ireland, but his tutor, who bore the same name, and is known as "Patrick, senior." We trust this explanation will be perfectly satisfactory to our friends at Glastonbury, Downpatrick, and Dublin.

Perhaps to some minds St. Patrick's Cathedral is more suggestive of the witty and political Dean Swift, than of the old Celtic missionary. As the visitor gazes alternately on the black and white marble tablets, the former the monument of the dean, the latter of "Stella," he will recall some passages from the strange life of this most singular of deans. A cathedral dignitary who has left eighteen volumes for the enlightenment of the world, and of whom many lives have been written, ought now to be well understood. But Dean Swift is a mystery still.

A simple outline of his life is soon given, but a satisfactory estimate of his character is a more difficult work. Jonathan Swift was born in the house No. 7, Hoey's Court, Castle Street, Dublin, on the 30th of November, 1667, seven months after the death of his father, the steward of the King's Inns. Young Swift obtained his degree at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1685, with some difficulty, his recklessness and insubordination having involved him in difficulties with the university authorities. Four years after, we find him acting as secretary to the retired statesmen, Sir William Temple, at whose residence, Moor Park, near Farnham, Surrey, he not only often met, William III., but became first the tutor and then the lover of Esther Johnson, better known as "Stella" (the star). Swift's age was double that of Stella, but he was clever and she was pretty, and the prospect was not without a certain brightness. Swift took orders in 1694, but soon gave up the living of Kilroot, and returned to Sir William Temple, with whom he lived until the death of the literary politician, in 1698. Stella's lover had a legacy from Sir William Temple, and received from Lord Berkeley the rectory of Agher, with the vicarages of Laracor and Rathbeggan, worth together about £230, and the prebend of Dunbavin, conferred in 1700, gave him an income of £400 a-year. Of course, now he married Stella? Swift was not in such a hurry; the lady was but nineteen, and she of course could wait. Besides, there was "another lady" in the case, a Miss Jane Waryng, to whom Swift had offered marriage. The maiden at first said "no," then changed her mind and hinted "yes." Of course the gentleman did not retaliate by a negative, but drew up such a picture of a perfect wife that the damsel was fairly frightened off. This did not clear the way for Stella's wedding; but matters were arranged in a singular way, not exactly Irish or English. Stella now nineteen, and having a small fortune, took up her abode in Ireland, near Swift's vicarage of Laracor. A Mrs. Dingley had accompanied the young lady from England, and the practice was for both ladies to live in the vicarage house, during the master's frequent absences in England, and to return to their own lodgings on his return.

Stella's lover was becoming a great man, the pet political writer of the Whigs, and the associate of such men as Addison, Pope, Steele and Lord Somers. Visions of a bishopric began to rise before the Vicar of Laracor. In 1704 the "Tale of a Tub" startled some and enraged others. The keen satire delighted the clubs and the wits, but justly vexed the grave and the sincere. The Church-of-England man objected to his portrait in "Martin," the Presbyterian deemed "Jack" a libel on himself, and the Roman Catholic resented the character of "Peter" as an unpardonable insult. Some thoughtful men even suggested their suspicions that the anonymous writer must be an infidel; and this has been more than hinted by Thackeray.

Perhaps, after all, the mitre might have come to Stella's lover, but for the vengeful feeling of one insulted woman. The Duchess of Somerset had red hair. Swift, in one of his wild freaks of satire, ridiculed the delicate tints of the lady's locks, calling them "carrots." The duchess was a pet of Queen Anne, and her supplications aided in stopping Swift's advance to a bishopric. Lord Oxford implored Swift to accept the deanery of St. Patrick's, Dublin. The irritated satirist sullenly assented, and the Vicar of Laracor became a dean in the year 1713.

The year 1723 was remarkable for the sudden elevation of the dean to the topmost height of popularity in Ireland. An order had been given to coin Irish farthings and halfpence to the amount of £108,000. The right of coining being allotted to a Mr. William Wood, the Irish Parliament denounced the scheme. One man now raised a tempest. Letters, signed "W. B. Drapier," were suddenly published, as if from a "draper," written with so much fire and well-directed invective, that all Ireland was lashed into fury, and none would use the abhorred coinage. When W. B. Drapier was found to be the dean, none dared prosecute, and he became for a time the greatest man in Ireland. The "Drapier's Head" was seen everywhere; the inns exhibited it on their signboards, gentlemen on medals, and ladies on their pocket-handkerchiefs.

In 1726 the dean published the famous "Gulliver's Travels," one of the finest pieces of English composition and vigorous, trenchant sarcasm that our literature contains.

The death of Stella, in the fifty-third year of her age, suspended for a while Swift's political warfare. The retrospect was dark. At the age of sixteen the pretty, dark-eyed girl had regarded him as her future husband. He rose into fame and obtained affluence; but Stella's life ended with every hope unaccountably disappointed. Swift's habit of disguising his emotions by a mask of irony renders it impossible to estimate his feelings towards Stella. A lock of her hair was enclosed by him in paper, and he wrote on the packet, "Only a woman's hair." Was this the perfection of irony, to hide the agony of love?

The closing years of Swift's life cannot be called happy. His old literary and political friends died one after another, deafness cut off the once brilliant talker from society, and strange fits of giddiness gradually affected his mind. Often in the morning did he pray that he might not outlive the day; and he would take leave of friends, saying, "I hope I shall never see you again."

At length the end came—on Saturday, the 19th of October, 1745. The great Jacobite rebellion was at that hour shaking the land, but neither sound nor sight of the political storm reached him who a few years before would have joined with exulting cry in the tumult of the fight. His death re-kindled the old enthusiasm of his countrymen. The body lay in a sort of state in the hall of his house, and multitudes flocked to gaze for the last time on that stern, still countenance, and to touch the snow-white locks. His nurse, Mrs. Barnard, was forced to keep a close watch, lest the visitors should appropriate every lock of the deceased dean's hair as keepsakes. He was buried, October 22nd, according to his own directions, three days after death, on the south side of the great aisle of St. Patrick's.

What estimate does the reader form of Swift?

Most women will thoroughly hate him for his conduct to Stella; the politician will hint his suspicions, and the Christian will probably doubt whether the restoration of a weekly communion at St. Patrick's, was quite a set-off for a life passed in ridiculing men and deceiving women. The moralist will gladly remember the private charities of the dean; but he cannot overlook that domineering insolence which insulted all to whom he was opposed.

Then on what does the fame of Swift stand? On intellect: a keen, vehement, proud, and defiant mind stands before us in Dean Swift. We may call him a mocker, if we please; but the mockery is of no common order. Sarcasm and irony are combined, and the bitter sneer is mingled with provoking laughter. Then mark his style: no cloud of words, no poetic elevation, but that clear, decisive speech used by one too keenly intent on the idea to think of fine writing. Each word is a good fit to each thought; no loose verbiage, like draggling robes, stops the rapid progress of the ideas. The verdict of Addison, that Swift "was the greatest genius of his age," will not be questioned even by those who hate him as a man and despise him as a dean. "Would you have liked to live with him?" is the test proposed by Thackeray. Probably most will answer, "No;" but they will also recall the names of other world-famous men who were most pleasing when seen from a cautious distance.

Nevertheless, with all his faults, and with all his puzzling peculiarities, Dean Swift's name is "writ large" on the literary roll, and no educated man can enter St. Patrick's without being reminded of the strange cleric who preached a tame morality from the pulpit, and poured out his invectives from the press.

Dean Swift shows us the national mind and heart distracted by political jealousies and religious bigotry. May we hope that the late noble and munificent restoration of St. Patrick's is a type of the country's restoration to order, justice, and happiness? Then the bells of this ancient Irish church shall remind us of the lines—

"Ring out the thousand years of war, Ring in the thousand years of peace."

W. D

A WORD UPON RESERVED BLESSINGS.

BY THE REV. W. M. STATHAM.

WHAT is a very touching question which the defrauded Esau asks of his father Isaac: "Hast thou not reserved a blessing for me?" There is no reader of that history but must have felt a tender pity for Esau, and a contempt for Jacob's mean dodgery and deceit. But superficial judgments are often wrong, and we need to read further on in the history to discover that Jacob's jugglery did not deprive Esau of ultimate good. "It shall come to pass when thou shalt have the dominion, that thou shalt break his yoke from off thy neck"—a most remarkable sentence, a fact in history which elucidates the dealings of Providence. Trial and sorrow came indeed to Esau, yet only meanwhile. So far as God's judgment is concerned—behold how wise it is. Who could wish a nobler victory than that of Esau? When Jacob lifted up his eyes, and saw in the grey distance Esau coming with his four hundred men, what a rush came over Jacob's heart—what a tremor filled his conscience—how seven times he bowed himself to the ground—how he brought the drove of cattle as an offering to his injured brother Esau, who ran to meet him, fell on his neck, kissed him, and wept, saying, "I have enough, my brother; keep that thou hast unto thyself"—a right noble victory this! a victory well won; a blessing reserved, but very real and precious!

Those who study the philosophy of religious history, see that running through all there is the self-punishing power of sin and the self-rewarding power of virtue—a law so uniform and excellent, that it works itself out in all circumstances and conditions of life, giving grace and beauty to the history of the faithful, and clothing with conscious shame the character of the truckler with truth. Man has chiefly to fear himself. No Jacob can ultimately harm him, the deceit of another will not damn his soul. The words, "When thou shalt have the dominion," remind us that truth cannot ever be kept beneath the feet of tyranny, and that there is a beautiful equity in all the ways and dealings of God. We may not always be able to trace the mysterious path of the providence of God, but it is always wise. Our vision is limited, we only know in part; but what we see, however limited, helps us to believe in the general purpose of the Great Ruler of all. This is not the place to enter into the philosophical discussion of certain modern schools of thought, but we cannot help feeling the force of what one of England's greatest thinkers says on this subject: "Language has no meaning for the words just, merciful, benevolent, save that in which we predicate them of our fellow-creatures; and unless that is what we intend to express by them, we have no business to apply the words. If, in affirming them of God, we do not mean to affirm these very qualities, differing only as greater in degree, we are neither philosophically nor morally entitled to affirm them at all." From our own justice-point, then, we cannot conceive of injustice in God, we cannot think of him as making Esau's whole future miserable through the trickery of another. "All his works are done in truth;" "just and right is he;" and one of the ways in which this is historically manifest is included in the suggestive question, "Hast thou not reserved a blessing for me?"

Reserved blessings! This, then, is the theme of this brief paper. We see human history full of events and circumstances which awaken our wonder and surprise; but we do not see, as our Father in heaven does, the end from the beginning; and no mystery in life must make us play at dice with principles in theology, or discredit the precious fact that God is not only Love, but Wisdom and Justice, too.

Christian faith should ever rest on the outworking of the Divine purpose. I say rest—"rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for him." Nothing so weakens and distracts us as the bemoaning our present condition. Perhaps we have not what we wish; perhaps we have lost what we loved. We, too, Esau-like in love or inheritance, have been deceived by others. Perhaps, with all our faults and sins, no conscious error of our own has mingled with this special trial. Amid the many frailties incidental to our character, we may not be able to link our personality with this weary, heavy anxiety, or grief. Well, God's purposes will ripen fast, and they must be good. To see these Hebrews enjoying the restful, fruitful land of Canaan, going up to their temple, with its glorious services, with exceeding joy, you could scarcely think that but a few years ago their fathers were wearing the gyves and fetters of slavery, and that now they are about becoming the most notable people on the face of the earth. Blessings in reserve, you see! The good land which the Lord had promised to their fathers. To see that aged Joseph, so restful, and honoured, and calm, you would scarcely think that it could be he whose youth had in it so much of wrong, the cruelty of the brothers, and the confinement of the prison-house. To see the enthroned David, wearing the insignia of royalty in Jerusalem, you can scarcely connect him with the harp-playing shepherd-boy amid the lonely hills of Judea, who was afterwards so persecuted in the court of Saul, now not only a monarch, but monarch over such a people, and the inspired writer of our Psalms. No, and the same may be said of Moses and Daniel. We must never "judge the Lord by feeble sense, but trust him for his grace." Nothing is too hard for him. Amid clouds, and rain, and storm, he has blessings in reserve.

Christian faith will further remember that all blessings are bestowments; they are not the natural inheritance of any of us. Sin has forfeited them all. We have no right to argue they ought to come, or to say with impatience, When will they come? It is in this sense that many of our ideas of right run wild. Show me your supposed title to any blessing; I can show you a thousand flaws in any such title you may have to the gifts of God. Energy, endurance, enterprise, zeal, sinew, spirit, strength, what are all these, when Esau and Jacob are both born in sin, subject to the curse, and without any claim at all, save as they plead the infinite mercy of God in Christ? To resolve Providence into the sustaining of natural rights, is the most serious trifling, as it altogether ignores the great fact, that we are debtors in everything to the favour of God. Life itself, so precious and so pleasant, is but a gift; its duties and relationships, involving schemes and enterprises so full of interest, is but a scene of merciful probation. With those who ignore this, we can have no argument, because it lies at the foundation of all just views of life. Whilst admitting this most fully, we need not, however, think for a moment that God has altered his nature, that he will prosper eventually tyranny or wrong, or allow the deceit of Jacob to work his weal. No! we shall find him in all things "a just God and a Saviour."

Christian faith sees that blessings are not always what they seem. The true test of the bread is in the eating! Jacob's mind for a long time had not been easy, and there is nothing so utterly unbearable as the continually fretting and chafing of thought which comes from loss of self-respect.

In the prospect of meeting Esau, Jacob says, "I will appease him with the present that goeth before me, and afterward I will see his face." Oh! how those deceits had rankled in his mind, disturbing his duties by day, and his dreams by night. If he had injured Esau, how much more had he injured himself! He had certainly prospered outwardly—he had passed over Jordan and become two bands; but for all that, there had gone with him everywhere the memory of deceit, treachery, and wrong. How we might have envied him on that fair morning, when he went in unto Isaac to gain the blessing; but we learn that the gain of outward prosperity is not the all in all for which man should seek. If true biographies were common, we should read beneath so called lives of successful men, many stories of humiliation, forgetfulness of their own kith and kin, the remembrances which pained them in after years, of illicit bargains, unjust competitions, and unlawful alliances. Men cannot wash or wear these out; the mark abides in the linen of character. You, dear reader, have perhaps, often envied those who would willingly have exchanged their palace for your cottage. You have often sighed for the golden apple which another has been devouring; you have not seen the bitter ashes which have met the teeth of the eager eater. True, indeed, it is, that curses so called are not always what they seem, nor are blessings either. We must look beyond the present moment of life to the after outworking of habit and character, to see what blessing means. Solomon's youth was beautiful; his age—alas! alas! David's youth was a scene of trial; his age—oh, how glorious! The motto for life should be—Wait. Let blessings be understood better than they sometimes are. "Better is a little with righteousness than great revenues without right." "The getting of treasures by a lying tongue is a vanity tossed to and fro of them that seek death." "Let not thine heart envy sinners: but be thou in the fear of the Lord all the day long."

Christian faith believes that the reserved blessing may be hidden in the present loss.

How many a beautiful flower is hidden in a prickly seed! How many a time have we all had reason to remember the words, "Be not desirous of his dainties: for they are deceitful meat;" that is, the penalty is hidden in the luxury. So, too, on the other side, has not the light affliction worked out a weight of glory even on earth? Yes, the grain ripens best because it was dropped into a soil that had been well ploughed and harrowed. The Arabs have a solemn and suggestive proverb: "The blessings of the evil geni are curses;" whilst, on the other hand, we have ours: "Sorrows are often angels in disguise." We cannot, I know, always be in the mood to feel that there is a blessing reserved in some seasons of trial. In the celebrated "Memoirs of Margaret Fuller" there occurs this sentence: "I have little faith in the paternal love which I need, so ruthless or so negligent seems the government of the earth." Such darkness often for a season oppresses human spirits. We cannot expect to see love's inscription written on the cross just when we are bearing it. We must wait for clearer light, assured that God is light, and that in him is no darkness at all. The boon will come when, softened by tribulation, made meeker by endurance, and with a faith tested in the furnace, our very character will show in itself the reward of trial even here. Reserved blessings! What blessings can equal the rich rewards within us—the joy unspeakable and full of glory of the Christian life!

Christian faith revels and rejoices in the reserved inheritance of the saints. Reserved! "I go to prepare a place for you," said Christ. If we can use analogy in such a high matter as the future life, we may surely remember how often we have found in the little futures of this earthly life, scenes that have surpassed our best expectations. We little knew what hidden beauties existed in some of the scenes of Nature. We little knew that there were such sweet joys in the coming friendship, and such sensations of surprise and joy in the enclosures of human thought we had not reached. We are constantly finding what seemed the hard, half-dreaded future melt into the glad and pleasant present time. If life were indeed to be what we think it in our darker days, it would be a valley of Baca indeed; but we find that new turns in the road take us out of the valley, and new hills take us above the mists. The reserved blessings of this life are, to my mind, something very wonderful: blessings to a family springing from one least thought of in childhood—the flower springing up in the most untended path; and out of the eater coming forth meat. Let such analogies teach us that there is a reserve adapted to all the faculties of our immortal nature. There will be blessings ever in reserve; we shall enter upon a life full of restful happiness, and full of continued enterprise and discovery. We know how in this world we are ever finding some fresh surprise; how, to our eager hearts, there is always something to live for. There is not weariness enough even in fourscore years of life to make us wish to quit this world. We love it still, and assuredly the same Lord who made and redeemed us, and has prepared a place for us, will have reserved joys in store throughout the measureless enduring of eternity.

Permit me, dear reader, in closing this brief paper, to suggest when night comes with its weeping, that the horizon is yet reddening with a morning of joy, and that for all the faithful there is a heaven of reserved blessedness in store, whose beauty "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard." The fact that our very constitution is evidently made for something ever in the future, not only suggests our immortality, but inasmuch as all life is provided for as its seasons and eras come, we feel confident that the same Lord over all will adapt the future world to our ever-growing knowledge and our ever-deepening bliss.

THE EXPLORATION OF PALESTINE.

BY CHARLES BOUTELL, M.A.

CHAPTER I.

FOREMOST place amongst the many great and remarkable enterprises that have been undertaken by England, in our own times, must be assigned by common consent to the exploration of Palestine. It is, indeed, extraordinary that this should be a work that still remains to be accomplished: but, at the same time, it must be regarded as a subject for the most cordial congratulation, that this all-important work should have been kept in store until it would be certain to be taken in hand in the right spirit, and conducted with becoming care, reverence, and energy. At length the time for this exploration has come; and the right men have appeared, both to direct it and to carry it practically into effect.

It was in the year 1864 that an English lady, Miss Burdett Coutts, "whose very name," as the Dean of Westminster has happily said, "is identified with acts of munificence," entertained the truly philanthropic purpose of providing for the inhabitants of the Jerusalem of to-day a suitable supply of pure water. After a careful consideration of this proposal, it was determined, by the advice of persons of the greatest experience and the highest authority, that in order to obtain the desired water-supply and to secure its permanence, it would be necessary, as a preliminary procedure, that a complete and accurate survey of Jerusalem should be made. In order to accomplish this object the sum of £500 was contributed by Miss Burdett Coutts. The work was entrusted, under the authority of the Secretary of State for War, to Captain Wilson, of the Royal Engineers, and that able officer, acting under the general orders of Colonel Sir Henry James, the director of the Ordnance Survey, and well seconded by Lieutenant Anderson of the same corps, with a working party consisting of one sergeant, two corporals, and two sappers, all of the Royal Engineers, left England for Palestine on the 12th of September, 1864. The expedition reached Jerusalem on the 3rd of October following. Their work having been accomplished with the most gratifying success, the two officers with their men embarked again at Jaffa on the 16th of June, 1865; and on the 10th of the next month, without any casualty, and also without having suffered much from sickness, they all returned to England.

Thus has been accomplished a survey of the Holy City and its immediate neighbourhood, with all the accuracy and detail of the Ordnance Survey of our own country. And a plan, admirably engraved from drawings executed on a scale sufficiently large to convey clearly even the minutest details, has been published, with various illustrative sketches; and accompanied also with a collection of photographs, all of them equally interesting and valuable, that were taken, while the survey was in progress, by Sergeant McDonald, who, as Sir Henry James has put it on record, "is both a very good surveyor and a very good photographer."

It must be added that, during his eight months' stay in Palestine, Captain Wilson was also able to complete a second important survey, in order to determine accurately the difference of level between the Mediterranean and the Dead Sea. The cost of this work—of which I propose in a succeeding chapter to give a careful description with illustrations—was provided for by the Royal Society and the Royal Geographical Society, who felt the value of a suggestion that had been made to them, that they should not neglect to avail themselves of the presence of a party of English Ordnance Surveyors in Palestine. And, further, in compliance with the desire of the Syrian Improvement Committee, and at their cost, and in consequence of the great discrepancy between the levels given by different civil engineers, Captain Wilson's party determined the true levels from the Pools of Solomon to Jerusalem, and carefully investigated the ancient as well as the modern system for supplying the city with water from those vast reservoirs.

The extreme scientific interest inseparable from such a survey of Jerusalem as this—the first and only work of the kind that ever had been contemplated since the days of those ancient masters of surveying, the Romans—would naturally and necessarily suggest a grand effort for the equally searching, minute, accurate, and systematic investigation of the entire country. Nor would such a suggestion be restricted to the most perfect survey that would be possible of the whole region that may be entitled "Palestine." With a survey would be associated a thorough exploration. Not the present face of the country only, but also whatever relics of past ages may yet linger beneath (in many instances, probably, deep beneath) the existing surface, at once protected from injury or destruction, and obscured from sight by a covering of accumulated earth or shattered ruins, invite the researches of explorers; and all must be included, without a single exception, in the magnificent enterprise of the "Exploration of Palestine." The survey of Jerusalem, accomplished by a small party of surveyors in the space of eight months, and supported by the private liberality of a single individual, has shown what may be done, on a comparatively small scale, by ability and earnestness combined with tact, temper, and opportunity, without arousing the opposition of the authorities or inhabitants; and the results of this survey give every possible encouragement to those who may assume the more arduous duties and the graver responsibilities of a comprehensive and, it is to be hoped, an exhaustive exploration.

Thus, in the first instance suggested by the munificent project of an Englishwoman, and the suggestion confirmed by the success of what may be regarded as a truly splendid experiment, an association has been formed in England for the exploration of Palestine.

This society lost no time in giving conclusive proof that it was thoroughly in earnest. Even before the return of Captain Wilson's party in October, 1865, the society had completed its organisation, and had prepared and issued, as its claim for sympathy and support, a plan of its intended operations. And as early as December in the same year, Captain Wilson, again in company with Lieutenant Anderson, was sent out by the society, with the view of making such a general survey of the whole of Palestine as would enable the managing committee to fix on particular spots for future more searching investigation; and also to collect in all quarters whatever special information would be consistent with the general aim of the society, and would throw light upon any points particularly specified for inquiry, investigation, and research in the society's first programme.

This expedition, the first sent out by the new society, was constantly and actively employed in various parts of Palestine from December, 1865, to May, 1866. It did good service, both in what was actually accomplished by it, and also in preparing the way for future more extensive operations, and in contributing to their success.

The original plan or programme of the Exploration Society set forth, that it had been resolved to raise a fund which should be applied to the purposes of investigating the Holy Land, by employing competent persons to examine the following points:—

1. Archæology.—Jerusalem alone would furnish an ample, rich, varied, and truly important field in this department. What is above ground, the recent Ordnance Survey has described, recorded, and made known; but of what might be lying beneath the present surface scarcely anything had been discovered before the formation of the Exploration Society. And yet in deep and multifarious interest, and in profound and heart-stirring associations, what place is there on the surface of the whole earth that can compare with the long-buried Jerusalem of the past? The real extent and true character of the Temple enclosure; the sepulchre of the Saviour; the tombs of the kings on Mount Zion; the course and ancient aspect of the Tyropeon valley; the spring and conduit of Hezekiah, and the whole of the ancient system of aqueducts; the sites of the fortress of Antonia, and of the towers Hippicus and Psephinus; the palace of Herod; the ancient walls of the city; Ophel; the Pool of Bethesda; and many other familiar names, all have to be sought for by excavation; and it is not too much to anticipate that every foot in depth of the "sixty feet of rubbish" on which the modern city stands, will yield precious information relating to some one or other of them.

Then, again, beyond the Holy City, the country from north to south—"from Dan to Beersheba"—abounds in sites and remains that promise abundantly to repay examination. Foremost among these are the site of Capernaum, Nazareth, and the various sites and remains that are near the Lake of Genesareth, Mount Gerizim—possibly the "Moriah" of Abraham's sacrifice, certainly the holy place of the Samaritans, containing the "twelve stones" which they allege to have been brought up by the Israelites from the bed of the Jordan at the time when they first crossed over its channel. Samaria, with the traditional tombs of John the Baptist and others, and with the extensive remains of Herod's edifices; also, deeply buried, possibly, relics of much earlier historic ages: Jezreel, the capital of Ahab and Jezebel; the valley of Shechem, the earliest settlement of Jacob in the promised land, with his well and the tomb of Joseph; Hebron, the most venerable of the monumental sanctuaries of Palestine; the Roman cities and ports along the sea-coast: Cæsarea of St. Paul and Herod; Antipatris; the mounds and other remains of Jiljilieh, probably the Gilgal so famous in the sacred annals, which in the days of Elijah and Elisha contained the great college of the prophets; the fortress and palace of Herod at Jebel Fureidis; Bethshean, one of the most ancient cities of Palestine, with remarkable remains of Roman, and probably also of much earlier date; the mounds in Jericho; the tombs, probably including that of Joshua, at Tibneh; the numerous remains in the valley of the Jordan; the great Assyrian mound near Damascus; and the great series of unexplored mounds and ruins, with the numerous important sites that lie to the east of the Jordan—every one worthy of careful examination, and all of them certain to contribute to the grand store of Scriptural knowledge and illustration to be obtained—and, be it remembered, to be obtained only—by the thorough exploration of Palestine.

2. Manners and Customs.—It has been well said, that the outward form and complexion of the events described in the narratives of the Sacred

“Two women grinding at a mill.”—See “THE EXPLORATION OF PALESTINE,” p. 522.

(From a photograph taken on the spot.)

Scriptures, and much of the significance of their records, must remain more or less obscure so long as we are without an accurate knowledge, as well of the manners, dress, usages, and modes of life of the inhabitants of the Holy Land, as of the face of the landscape, the climate of the country, and its natural productions. Even to a casual traveller in Palestine the Bible becomes in its form, and, therefore, to some (possibly even to a very great) extent in its substance, a new book; or, at any rate, a light, unseen before, springs up amidst the congenial scenery and the familiar associations (different in so many material respects from those of the Western world) of its own land, which illuminates, with a brilliancy peculiar to itself, every page of the sacred volume. The exact accuracy and the graphic fidelity with which minute incidents are introduced, casually, perhaps, or by way of incidental illustration, then are for the first time fully appreciated, and their true value understood, and the incidents themselves then at once grow up into dignity and importance, when every detail is seen to be unconsciously reflected in the existing life of the present inhabitants of the land. Many an allusion, or comparison, also, which previously had little, if any, significance, or had lain unnoticed, starts into prominence, and bears an unexpected—and a more valuable because unexpected—testimony, throwing a bright light over a whole passage.

Now, it is not to be expected, for many reasons, that the modes of life and the manners of the ancient Israelites will be revealed to us by any discovery of their works of art, whether for monumental or other purposes, in the same fulness that those of the Assyrians and Egyptians have been. Still, information and illustration of much value cannot fail to be obtained on these most interesting points through the work of exploration. Such, and so tenacious, however, is the unchangeableness of the East, that in very many circumstances of every-day life—those little things, more especially, which are so richly stored with characteristic illustration—the modes of life and manners of the present inhabitants of Palestine, if not identical with those of the ancients, are very closely assimilated to them. For example, the explorers last sent by the society to carry on their noble work in Palestine, had their attention accidentally attracted to a group, which very happily confirmed the judicious determination of the committee to include manners and customs within the range of their exploration. It was a common, a most common incident of daily life that they saw—two women, seated on the ground, grinding at a mill, preparing the supply needed for the day, as had been the custom with their race through unnumbered generations. They could see in their work nothing beyond their habitual process of providing for a constantly recurring demand—one of the simplest of their domestic employments; but the strangers from the West were able to discern in that busy group precisely one of those most expressive illustrations of the “Book,” which they had come to seek in the “land” and amongst its inhabitants. Immediately they remembered the words—“Two women shall be grinding at the mill; the one shall be taken, and the other left” (Matt. xxiv. 41; also Luke xvii. 35); and, here before their eyes, in this present Jerusalem, this same occupation was still of daily recurrence; and still, as of old, it showed the closest and most intimate external alliance and companionship between those who were engaged in it. All who heard the Divine Speaker, upwards of eighteen centuries ago, would understand instinctively the full force of His illustration; they saw, every day of their lives, and very many times repeated, the very same incident—two women grinding at the mill; and the sound of the grinding was heard continually in every village throughout the land; and now His words are brought home with fresh and more vivid impressiveness to ourselves, through the existence of exactly the same ancient usage on the very spot where it was daily enacted in the presence of the Saviour and his apostles. The explorers, in the discharge of one of the duties entrusted to them, carefully photographed the group, having added another figure—in himself also sufficiently characteristic of life in Palestine at the present day—to give completeness to their picture. The annexed engraving is a faithful reproduction of this photograph.

It must be kept in remembrance, however, while “two women” may yet be seen thus to “grind at the mill” in Jerusalem and elsewhere in Palestine, that many of the ancient and peculiar customs of the country are gradually, and in some instances rapidly, vanishing before the fast-rising tide of Western manners and European influences, so that at no distant period the exact meaning of many things which correspond with statements and records in the Bible, will have passed away.

3. Topography.—Here, as in the other departments to be assigned to the explorers, much yet remains to be accomplished. Of the coast-line of Palestine we have an accurate map founded on our own Admiralty charts. But we still are in want of a survey which, as we advance inland, would give with equal accuracy the principal points throughout the country, and thus would enable the intermediate spots and the smaller places to be filled in with comparative ease and certainty.

4. Geology; and 5. Natural Sciences: Zoology, Botany, Physical Geography, Climate, Meteorology.—Of the geology we are almost in total ignorance of every detail: and yet Palestine is geologically one of the most remarkable regions—perhaps, it may be said to be the most remarkable region on the surface of the globe. In like manner, our knowledge of the natural sciences in connection with the Holy Land, resembles our knowledge of its archæology and topography in being lamentably imperfect. Had the same intelligence, earnestness, and perseverance been devoted to investigations upon all these points in the Holy Land which have been applied to various other countries, all of them interesting in a high degree in themselves, and yet none of them in any way connected with the Bible or competent to illustrate its pages, but little would have remained for the Exploration Society beyond the completion of a great work: As it is, but little more than the commencement of the great work of exploration has as yet been achieved; so that the society has to send out explorers who will include within their researches, not only the entire range of the archæology and topography of the Holy Land, but also its cedars and olive-trees, its lilies and roses, its lions and foxes, eagles and ravens.

It will be my plan, in carrying on these notices of the Exploration of Palestine, always to adhere closely to the narratives of the explorers, which have been placed in my hands by the authorities of the Exploration Society expressly for that purpose. My object is to place before the readers of THE QUIVER a plain, faithful, and complete account of the great work that has been so well commenced in the Holy Land—a work in which I do not hesitate to assume that every reader of this journal, being also a student and a lover of the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, is personally interested. As the work proceeds, and as fresh discoveries are made, I am promised the new reports and narratives as from time to time they come from the explorers, with their sketches and photographs; and thus, by a free use of these original materials, aided by the engraver, I can confidently undertake to provide an uninterrupted description of the progress of the exploration.

BEYOND THE BAR.

R EAD a poem yester-eve,
 'Twas written o'er the sea;
 I gazed upon a pictured truth
 Which since hath haunted me.

'Twas written by no mortal hand,
 Nor stayed by painter's grasp,
 But oft of Nature's book will Thought
 Unfix the golden clasp.

And read most wondrous things therein,
 Of all Truth shows sublime—
 The vast, unknown Eternity—
 The grand old school of Time.

I saw where late the tide had swept Into a deep, calm bay;
 A few forgotten wavelets now
 'Twixt sandy ridges lay.

Yet mighty rush and solemn roll,
 And snow-white surf afar,
 And one broad stretch of boundless blue
 Spake tide beyond the bar.

And I knew its giant pulsings soon
 Would seek a short-lived rest;
 That it would flow, and ebb again,
 Over the bay's deep breast.

O heart! that yearnest evermore
 For something earth hath not—
 For tides of joy beyond thyself,
 Come, ponder on this spot.

'Tis not alone when all the springs
 Of human hope run dry,

And stars, once mirror'd in thy deep,
 Are hidden in the sky;

Not then alone that longings rise
 For love that cannot change,
 Whose tide, that knoweth ebb nor flow,
 May fill thy widest range:

But when the swell of earthly joy
 Hath reached a noble height,
 And ev'ry good and perfect gift
 Shows beautiful and bright;

When all the gladdest thoughts of time,
 Its themes of olden song,
 Its pleasant hopes and mem'ries dear,
 Upon the spirit throng;

They are but some imprison'd waves
 'Twixt many a ridge of sand,
 To that great Love, whose ocean-burst
 Brings life-pearls to Time's strand.

The bay is bleak without its tide;
 The soul more bleak and chill
 Without that Life, whose waves alone
 Its myriad needs can fill.

And, oh! when pained for present dearth
 And passing needs of life,
 The faithless heart remembers not
 The issue of its strife—

Then, Saviour, let thy love be near,
 Not gazed on from afar;
 And grant us still, from Time's low shore,
 To look beyond the bar.

A. BOND.

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEERDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER IX.

RACHEL HAS AN IDEA OF COMFORT.

BLESS their hearts! I shall be sorry to leave them, after all!"

It was Rachel who spoke; and Rachel had been standing at the door of the schoolhouse, watching the last little tottler out of sight.

Rachel dearly loved children; and children never failed to love her in return. Scarce an infant, however fractious, but would come to Rachel's arms in a minute. Among the little ones committed to her care, Rachel's tact, and skill, and gentleness shone supreme. She was so bright and cheerful—so patient, so clever. As the committee had said, on the veritable Wednesday, when they had met to choose a successor, "We may have another mistress, not another Rachel."

Rachel, then, was standing at the door of the schoolhouse; but it was too cold to stand there long. A cutting blast came sweeping by, and made her shiver. She went in, and shut the door. The school-room looked bare and deserted; but Rachel did not stay in it. She locked the door, with a key that hung by the wall, put up the shutters, and then, bade it good-bye, for that night at least.

There were two little rooms behind, where Rachel lived—where a fire was burning brightly, and the kettle singing away merrily, and where Rachel was going to have her tea. Nothing could be pleasanter, or more home-like, than Rachel's snug dwelling. There was an air of refinement about it, too. There were books on a shelf, there were pictures, and some other slight adornments, just to prove that Rachel had a few tastes, she had found leisure to cultivate. She moved about her room, with a brisk, cheerful air, characteristic of Rachel. Her tea was made in no time; but before she sat down to it, she opened the door of another room, and, candle in hand, went in. A soft bloom came upon her cheek, as she lifted the lid of a box, and looked into it. Something lay shrouded in tissue-paper, but which speedily turned out to be a bonnet. It was her wedding-bonnet, and she drew it out, and turned it round, and looked at it on all sides, and put it back again. And then, something else had to be looked at. The wedding-gown, that was lurking not far from the bonnet. It was a gown of some soft, warm material; the colour, silver-grey. Then, there was the shawl; but she did not look at that. Perhaps she thought she had seen enough, for she closed the box, shut the drawer, and went away to have her tea. Her tea was all ready in the little metal pot that stood on the hob. It was bitter cold, and she drew the table close to the fire, and sat down.

Her face had its usual serene, happy expression; but she was not quite herself, either. She had fits of musing, as she sat down to her solitary meal. For a long time, the cup stood before her untasted, and her head rested on her hand, and her eyes were fixed musingly on the glowing cinders in the grate. Then she roused herself, as if ashamed of her waste of time, and drank her tea hastily. She had scarce drunk it, before a knock came at the door. Rachel set down her cup, a bright glow in her cheek. She knew who it was. It could be no one but John Humphreys!

With her candle in her hand, she went across the empty schoolroom to unlock the door. Yes, there he was, standing outside, with the great snow-flakes descending upon him; for it had begun to snow since Rachel had stood to watch the children home.

"Well, Rachel! here I am again!" said the cheery voice of John.

"I see, John! Come in; how cold it is!" replied Rachel, with a little shiver.

"Ah, so it is, to those who mind such things! I don't. Here, let me fasten the door, Rachel."

She gave him the key, and a minute after, he had strode behind her into the little room. Here he planted himself in front of the fire, standing with his back to it.

"I say, Rachel! you know what comfort is; don't you?"

"I hope I do, John."

"Every place, where you are looks nice," continued John, staring round as if he had never seen the room before; though every spot on the carpet, or flower in the paper, was familiar to him.

"Will you have some tea, John?" asked Rachel, smiling.

"No, thank you; I have had my tea."

Rachel got up, and began quietly to put away the tea things. John sat down, and watched her. He was very fond of watching her move about, and would often sit silent, his eyes fixed upon her, for a length of time.

"We need not always be gabbling, Rachel!" he used to say.

When she had put everything away, she swept her hearth, and brightened up the lamp, and drew the curtains closer. Then she brought out her sewing, and sat down to work, looking, as John observed, the very picture of comfort.

"I tell you what, Rachel," he broke out by saying, "we two shall be the happiest couple in England!"

She looked up at him with a smile.

"I hope so, John."

There was no romance about Rachel. She was the most matter-of-fact person that ever lived.

"And when is it to be, Rachel?"

To this question Rachel made no immediate answer. Indeed, it seemed rather to embarrass her.

"Now I've got the farm, it's time we brought things to a conclusion, Rachel. Pray is the bonnet ready?"

"Yes," said Rachel, in rather a hesitating manner.

"And the gown?"

Rachel nodded assent; but she did not look quite comfortable, either.

"That's capital! We'll be asked in church next Sunday."

Rachel laid down her work.

"John, dear," said she, looking at him with her honest eyes, "I am so afraid——"

"Afraid of what, Rachel?"

"Afraid that you have done wrong, by buying that farm—that is, until you had the money to pay for it."

"But I have the money."

"What! has Mr. Sylvester paid you?"

"He will do—there is no doubt of that, because I mean to make him. In the interval, Mr. Isaacs has been good enough to accommodate me."

"That is, he has lent you the money."

"If you like to put it so, he has."

"And you pay him interest for it."

"Till I get my own, I do; but it will not be long first. Don't perplex your dear little mind, Rachel, about things that are not in your province. We men have to manage all the business matters."

"It only troubles me on this wise," replied Rachel, thoughtfully: "I don't understand business, as you say; but I understand this: we shall have to begin the world in debt."

"Oh, this sort of thing is not considered in the light of a debt," returned John, carelessly; "besides, I am going to put the screw on, and get back my money."

"I wonder if they will pay you," said Rachel, anxiously. "I have a bad opinion of those Sylvesters."

"So have I; and so has every one. But I mean to pay them a visit to-morrow. If Mr. Raymond keeps out of my road, I will see his mother. I am determined I will!"

"Oh, John! that proud, stately Lady Sylvester; how shall you get on with her?"

"As easily as possible. I shall just say to her, Madam, or my lady, whichever is proper, I am come for my money, and I shall be obliged if you will give it to me."

"Oh, John!" and Rachel laughed, "she will order you out of the house."

"I don't care! I shan't go. Never do you trouble, Rachel; I am a match for the whole of them!" said John, stoutly.

Rachel looked at him admiringly. She had no doubt he could do all that was in the power of man to accomplish. But she had a little fear at the bottom of her heart, too.

"I have never owed sixpence in my life," thought she, "and now to begin in debt!"

It was an odious word, and it poisoned Rachel's peace. She made a futile effort to persuade her lover to wait until the Sylvester affair was settled. But however confident John professed to feel that it would be settled, he was not disposed to act on the conviction. Indeed, he was resolute to do nothing of the kind. The banns, he said, should be put up the very next Sunday. He did not stay long, after he had pronounced this final decision. He said a few loving words, and he insisted on having the gown and the bonnet shown to him; and then he went away in excellent spirits, and full of hope for the future.

Poor John!

When he was gone, Rachel sat a few minutes before the fire, in a fit of musing; then, as the clock gave warning, she started. She had almost forgotten, for the moment, what she had to do.

She got up, put on her bonnet and shawl, extinguished the light, and let herself out into the street. It had become a fearful night. The snow was whirled round and round, by the bleak, whistling wind. It was a wind that searched you through and through; but Rachel did not heed it. She hurried on till she reached the narrow street with the projecting houses. Before one of these houses she stopped, and went up a back entrance. She was going to see Miss Graham.

CHAPTER X.

HE CAN SCARCE BE HAPPY!

RACHEL was quite at home in the house; she needed no one to announce her; she stepped up the broad antique staircase, and tapped at the door of Josephine's room.

Things had got worse, rather than better, as far as the disorder and confusion went. Rachel's correct eye and ear had been shocked considerably, in the course of this little episode in her history. All the time that Josephine lay unconscious, riot and extravagance had prevailed below stairs, and there had been no one to check it. The trustee appointed by Josephine's late aunt had refused to act, or rather was incapacitated by ill-health from so doing. The heir himself was absent, and no tidings had been heard from him. There was no doubt that the present state of things would soon terminate, but while it lasted it was grievous in the extreme. But for Rachel's care and nursing, Josephine would have been positively lost.

Josephine was better now; the period of extreme illness had been struggled through; the shock to the constitution, as the doctor called it, had been withstood bravely by youth and natural vigour. She had risen from her bed of sickness, and to some feeble extent, come forth again.

She was sitting in the room she usually occupied, and where Raymond had left her. She had her music, her books, her pictures, about her as usual, and, to a casual observer, there was no change, save in herself. Those who knew better, would see that these things were held by the frail tenure of days, or of hours; that there was but a step between Josephine and the bleak world outside.

She sat pillowed up in her chair. Her face and figure were wasted almost to a shadow. She had leaned back, and her eyes were closed as if she slept. One thin hand rested on a book in her lap: it was her Bible.

Rachel entered softly, but it woke the invalid in a moment. She started up, and her face assumed that wild, wistful look, which had all along been so distrekking. Rachel went up to her. She had laid aside her shawl and bonnet. It was a habit of hers, however short the time she had to stay.

"A bonnet looks comfortless in a sick room," was one of Rachel's maxims.

She came up to Josephine, and spoke gently to her, and began to smoothen the pillows. The wild, wistful look went out of the poor girl's face, but another came almost as painful—a look of patient, passive suffering, and she laid her head back with a sigh.

"You have had a nice sleep," said Rachel, cheerfully; "I am sure you are better."

Josephine looked at her a few moments, without speaking; then she said, with a kind of effort, "Yes, I am better."

"We shall have you quite strong, some of these days," continued Rachel, in the same cheery voice; "why, you begin to look like yourself already!"

"Sit down, Rachel; I want to talk to you. It snows, does it not?"

"It does snow, but that will make it all the warmer by-and-by," replied Rachel.

"I am afraid it is a sad night for you to come through. You take a great deal of trouble about me."

"Don't think that, for a minute, Miss Graham, please," returned Rachel, quickly. "You took twice as much trouble for me, and I have never felt more hearty and brisk in my life, than since I have been nursing you."

"Rachel," said Josephine, after a moment's pause, "just give me that letter, will you?"

The letter lay upon the table, and as Rachel handed it, a thought thrilled through her mind, with vivid interest. Might it be from Mr. Sylvester?

Ah, no, Rachel! no letter will ever come from that quarter again!

Josephine opened the letter, and read it without speaking; not for the first time, or the second, did she read it; for it concerned her nearly.

"I have heard from the solicitor to Mr. Heatherly, the gentleman whom my aunt has made her heir," said Josephine, in a firm voice. "He says he is coming down to take the management of things during his client's absence. I expect he will be here in a day or two."

"So soon as that?" said Rachel, surprised, and a little frightened, for the crisis in Josephine's history was very near at hand.

"Yes, and he politely wishes me to leave. In fact, he has written to tell me so."

Tears of hot indignation sprang to Rachel's eyes; but she did not speak. It was a settled principle with her, not to inflame the wounds that injustice had opened up. Josephine folded up the letter and put it away.

Her calmness and patience made it all the more difficult for Rachel to restrain her feelings.

"I wanted to see you, Rachel, very much indeed. I know I have caused you a great deal of trouble; but will you render me one more piece of service?"

"I should think I will!" replied Rachel, struggling to keep back her emotion.

"I shall go away from here, as soon as I have found a place to shelter in. Will you look out for me Rachel, and choose a small, inexpensive room somewhere, so that I need not feel absolutely homeless?"

"In Newbury?" asked Rachel, quickly.

"In Newbury. I have thought it over, and there are reasons why I should prefer to remain here. I am not equal to a journey, and it would be worse for me to be flung among strangers. Here I am known, and have some friends."

"You have!" said Rachel, fervently.

"So that, on the whole, I shall not leave at present. When I get stronger, I may feel braver;" and a tear fell on the thin hands that were folded in her lap.

Rachel struggled hard again; she could have cried like a child.

"I will do it, certainly, Miss Graham," said she at length; "and I know of a place that will suit you—quite a nice comfortable place, and a good look out too," continued she, regaining her cheerfulness, for it would never, do, as she said afterwards, to give up. "You would be well taken care of there, I am sure."

"Thank you, Rachel; but are the rooms expensive?" asked Josephine, anxiously.

"Oh, no; the woman of the house would be glad to let them for a trifle."

"Then will you engage them, Rachel, at once? I should feel so much happier!"

"I will engage them, this very night," said Rachel, stoutly.

"Thank you. And, Rachel, there is another thing: a little, a very little, of the furniture is mine."

"Of course that will be your own now," said Rachel, joyfully; "and very nice it will be, and make your rooms look beautiful. I will see to all that, Miss Graham."

"You are very good, Rachel; I shall never repay all your kindness."

"Oh, yes you will, if you get well again; and, dear Miss Graham, it is such a fortunate thing that I am going to—to live in that nice house in the fields. It is only a short walk from your new home, and I shall always be at hand, to look after you."

"When do you go, Rachel?"

"In a few weeks; but there will be plenty of time to get you nicely settled first."

"I shall be glad to go away from here," said Josephine, wearily, and leaning back in her chair.

"Now you are getting tired, Miss Graham, and you must not talk any more. I have been very inconsiderate, not to stop you before," said Rachel, in a tone of self-reproach.

"Then you will engage the rooms for me Rachel?"

"Certainly I will; and I will see that they are put to rights, and made as nice as possible. Good night, dear Miss Graham."

"Good night, Rachel, and God bless you!"

"God bless her, and pity her too!" said Rachel, fervently, as she found herself in the street, sobbing with all her might. "If ever there was a sadder lot than another, it is hers, poor thing!"

(To be continued.)

TOMMY AND HIS BROOM.

THE snow had been falling all night, and in the morning London was covered with a white mantle, its ugly roofs and smoke-blackened buildings shining with snow-flakes and fringed with icicles.

Even the squalor and dirt of the little court on which Tommy's eyes looked this wintry morning, were quite hidden by the beauties of the snow, for there was such a grace in the fantastic manner in which the flakes had chosen to drift and arrange themselves, that even deformity was turned into loveliness. But Tommy, as he gazed with delight at the scene before him, by no means regarded it from the ornamental point of view. At eight years old circumstances had made him strictly utilitarian, and to his eyes the snow appeared as a providence, filling his little heart with hope and strong ambition. Not of snowballing, nor of sliding, nor of any similar sports was this ambition born; it had a far more practical source in Tommy's bosom. It was not that he by any means disliked such things, but that life had grown far too grave a matter for them to have room in his mind. No, Tommy had something else to think of! and, hurrying on his small amount of clothing, he roused his mother, who had fallen asleep, after a weary night of watching.

It may be as well to state that the establishment, in which lived our hero, his mother, his sick father, and his two little sisters, was of the very narrowest dimensions, consisting only of a small, very small room, one-third of which might fairly be said to belong to the great family bread-winner, a mangle.

"Mother," said Tommy, creeping gently up to her side, "oh, there is such a beautiful lot of snow!"

But snow to Mrs. Solly was only another vexation added to her life, already too full of troubles; it was bad for the mangling trade, bad for her consumptive husband's cough, and, therefore, bad for her prospects of getting out again to char, since, whilst he remained so ill she could not leave him, and if she could not leave him, who was to feed them all?

"Is there, child?" she answered, with a heavy heart. "Well, we can't help it; but if this hard weather lasts, God knows what will become of us. There isn't a handful of coal for the fire to-day, even."

"Never you mind, mother," said Tommy, in all the vigour of hope, for already the child had learnt the art of consoling and strengthening others; "I'm going to take the broom and sweep some doorsteps, and you see if I don't bring home a pocketful of money. There are so many doorsteps, you know, and they'll all want sweeping, so I shall be sure to get plenty of work."

"But you're not big enough," suggested his mother, dubiously.

"See if I'm not!" cried Tommy, with pride.

"But the broom is so bad, and we haven't a spade, and if we had, you couldn't manage to use it."

This objection sounded a little more forcible, and Tommy, fetching the broom out of the corner, surveyed it with scrutinising eyes.

"It isn't so very stumpy," he said, hopefully, for nothing could damp his ardour; "and the people will be sure to lend me a spade."

"But," continued Mrs. Solly, half-willing and half reluctant, "your boots are all in holes, and you'll get your feet so wet. Every one will say it is a shame, and that I ought to have kept you at home."

"They don't know anything about it, or they wouldn't," replied Tommy, resolutely bent on his project. "I like wet feet, and they never hurt me. What are we to do if I don't earn some money?"

This argument being unanswerable, after eating a hearty breakfast off a slice of the last loaf, Tommy departed in high faith and confidence, shouldering his broom bravely.

It was a very stumpy old broom, but Tommy believed in it notwithstanding, and it seemed to him that only to appear on the field was to conquer it. Lustily he shouted as he went up and down the first street that possessed doorways of sufficient importance to require sweeping, "Want your doorway done?" and was very much surprised that no responsive call answered his own. Besides this totally unexpected lack of demand for door-sweepers, Tommy encountered another obstacle quite as unforeseen, and more threatening to his future prospects. The supply was over-abundant, and competition was rife in the market. Little boys and big boys, little girls and great girls, men with spades and shovels and magnificent brooms were shouting, "Want your doorway done?" quite as vigorously as Tommy. A new trade was suddenly born of the snow, and it seemed to the child as if the whole world had embraced it. Why, there were as many sweepers as there were doors to sweep almost! and then most of them had much better tools to work with than his stumpy broom, besides finding strength in union by banding together in twos and threes. Poor Tommy, as he waded perseveringly on, felt himself gradually growing smaller and smaller amongst his many competitors, and by degrees his cheery cry dwindled down to a very flat key indeed. Disappointment in his little heart was rapidly turning to despair, when a happy thought struck him, for he was a boy of resources, and strong of purpose. He would go to those houses from which he was in the habit of fetching mangling, and where he was a known and respected character. Briskly he turned his steps in the direction of the nearest, hope winging his feet.

"Want your doorway done?" he inquired, eagerly, of the servant who answered the bell.

"What will you do it for?" she asked, smiling, for Tommy was a favourite of hers.

"Do it cheap—do it for twopence!"

"Very well; you may do it."

After borrowing a spade, Tommy, delighted at his success, set himself bravely to work to shovel away the snow. It must be confessed that the spade being as big as himself, he laboured under difficulties. But what matters difficulty to a resolute spirit? Tommy worked away with a will, and was making, in his own eyes, considerable progress, when the door behind him suddenly opened, and a sharp voice said—

"Why, Jane, how could you be so foolish as to set that chit of a child to work? Here, my dear, take this, and go home; your mother ought to know better than to send you out such a morning as this!"

The spade was taken out of one hand, a penny put in the other, and the door closed before Tommy could speak a word.

Then, no longer shouldering his broom, but trailing it behind him, he turned away, crestfallen and ashamed. That most dreary and hopeless of all feelings, disbelief in one's self, was creeping into his heart; and not shouting his trade-question, but silent and subdued, Tommy went upon his way sorrowing. Was he really not fitted for the high career he had chosen? Was he destined to return home, a baffled hero with an empty pocket? In one word, was he to be a bread-winner or not?

You must remember that this was no light question of personal ambition. At eight years old, Tommy had, by painful experience, attained to an acute knowledge of the value of a penny, of the amount of credit obtainable at the general dealer's, and of the necessity of the simple daily prayer his mother had taught him: "Give us this day our daily bread."

Half inclined to return home, half propelled by some undefined feeling that his failure was not complete, until every possible effort had been tried, he went on until he reached another of his clients, and, ringing the bell with timid fingers, asked meekly if he might sweep the steps.

"You sweep the steps!" cried the servant; "why, you're not half as big as your own broom."

Tommy turned away with two big tears in his eyes at this second stroke of fate, and was just shutting the gate behind him, when a sharp tap at the window arrested his steps, and, looking up, he saw the lady of the house beckoning him.

"Well, Tommy," she said, opening the door, "and what is it you want this morning? Is your father any better?"

"No, ma'am; he's a deal worse. If you please, I came to sweep the steps. I'm plenty big enough, I am indeed, ma'am. Mother hasn't any money, and I came out to earn some," he answered, in a mingled voice of protest, indignation, and entreaty, for Tommy, like the rest of the world, felt it very hard to have his powers so undervalued.

"Give him the shovel, Mary, and let him try. He'll do it well enough, I've no doubt, and every one must have a beginning."

So Tommy, his courage and hope again in the ascendant, a second time set to work, and although he found the task much more difficult than he had fancied, for the snow would persist in sticking to the stones, he contrived to do it with the utmost satisfaction to himself. This satisfaction was not without its drawbacks, for his rivals in the profession would not allow him to work in peace, but threw jeering remarks at Tommy as they passed.

"Don't shovel yourself away in the snow, young 'un." "I s'pose you'll have done by this time next winter."

These and such like observations our hero received with all the contempt they deserved, setting them down to jealousy. Two rosy little boys in scarlet frocks were looking on at him admiringly from the window, and every now and then Tommy spared time to look up and smile. He regarded them as mere babies, quite unlearned in the ways of life, which was, indeed, the truth, although their days numbered almost as many as his own. Very proudly, when his work was done, did he take back the shovel, and wait for his wages. Luck, which, after all, generally follows perseverance, and is not so much a thing of chance as we believe, now waited upon our hero. He was taken into the kitchen, dried, warmed, and fed, and had threepence given him for his labour. Never did a threepence look so charming in Tommy's eyes; for had he not earned it by the sweat of his brow? It represented—at least, that and the other penny together—a whole loaf of bread; and would not that be sufficient for the day?

But this was not all. At parting the lady gave him a plate of delicious meat for his father, and half-a-crown. Tommy's heart danced, and his eyes glistened with a gratitude his tongue could not express, and he scampered off as fast as his legs would take him through the snow to carry the joyful tidings to his mother, feeling a conquering hero indeed. How can it be told what that half-crown purchased? Delight for Tommy, coals for the fire, bread for the children, tea and butter for the sick man, and rest in the household for one day at least.

The snow came every day for a fortnight, and found them bread. To be sure, Tommy did not get half-a-crown every day, but he got something much better, a business connection and a strong fund of self-help for future occasions in life. The lady upon whose doorstep he had made his mark, took a kind interest in the boy, and procured him others to sweep, besides bestowing many kind words and many meals upon him.

As this is a true history, it must be confessed that when a thaw set in, and Tommy found his occupation gone, our hero cried. He would have liked a whole year of snow; but, being far too much a man of the world to give way to his weaknesses, he soon brushed away his tears and set bravely to work in another line of business—that of fetching and carrying for his mother's mangle. At present his whole soul is possessed with a secret ambition, and every halfpenny he gets on his own account is stowed safely away in a place known only to himself. He is heard to make many inquiries as to the price of spades and brooms, for Tommy is looking forward to opening next year's campaign with a spade that may do him honour, and a broom of unlimited powers.

THE QUIVER

— Saturday, May 9, 1868. —

(Drawn by JOHN GILBERT.)

"There is nothing ye deserve for your malefices but death,"—p. 533.

"EVIL MAY DAY."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MARY POWELL."

EVIL MAY DAY! How came it by such an evil name?—the sweetest day of all others? I tell you. Be quiet there, Diccon; leave off Nay, an' if ye will hear, I am ready to tell; hitting Hob. Madge, hush the babe asleep. Turn but on one condition only—that ye hold your peace and disturb not your sick mother while the dogs out, boys, or else keep 'em quiet. Not a word will you get from me till there's peace. Throw another billet on the fire. Now, then, are you all settled? Are you all going to be quiet? Now, then— Here comes Giles; make room for him, Kate. Giles, I'm going to tell a tale; a true one; wherein your father and I were concerned when we were lads. Now, then:

Kate, knowest thou why thou art called Kate? After Queen Katherine: not the present one, but the first; a goodly lady and a godly.

The king, at that time, was lovely in his person, and of sweet conditions. He had not fallen into flesh, as he hath done since. They say he has a machine now, to heave him up-stairs; but I don't believe all that's said—specially of kings and queens. At that time he was scarce an eagle's talon thick,—come, at all events, his waist was as slim as Nell's. Fine broad shoulders, too, you know; a well-opened eye, quick as a hawk's; short, thick, curly hair; a merry mouth, deep chest, and such an arm for a bow! A capital archer was King Hal.

He encouraged archery; he loved it: he made us all archers; he said it was the Englishman's proper weapon. You know Harold wasn't beaten till he got an arrow in his eye. William Rufus was slain with an arrow. Farther back still, King Saul's last battle was lost because he was sore wounded of the archers; wherefore one of the first things David did was to make the children of Judah learn the use of the bow: behold, it is written in the book of Jasher.

"Thought I was going to tell you a story?" Why, so I am. I'm coming to the beginning of it as fast as a horse can gallop. I've a notion, though, that I shall stop, perhaps in the most interesting part, if you interrupt me any more. (Kate, your mother wants something.)

On as fine a May morning as ever was—sky blue, grass green, hedges full of flowers and of singing birds—King Harry the Eighth, being young and full of joy, rose right early in the morning, and put on his clothes to go a-maying. And what were his clothes? They were of white satin; ay, and his knights, squires, and gentlemen were in white satin too, with embroidery, and gold chains, and plumage, just as if they were going to a grand wedding. And all the yeomen of the guard were in white sarcenet, with bows of various coloured ribbons round their black velvet caps.

As for the ladies, I cannot tell you how fine they were: they made me blink, like a flash of lightning, or the sun coming suddenly from behind a cloud, they were so dazzling; and whether their eyes or their jewels, or their gold and silver apparel were the brightest, I could not possibly determine.

Every man had his bow and arrows, and every man went to fetch a sprig of may to set in his cap. From the days of Crecy and Poitiers archery had been on the decline, in spite of compulsory edicts; but now, what all the king's horses and all the king's men had failed to effect, came to pass through the example of the young king himself, who was a capital Bowman. He founded the fraternity of St. George, who were to shoot at all manner of marks and butts, and all manner of fowls, in the city or out of it; and if any archer were so misfortunate as to shoot his comrade, he was not to be sued or apprehended for it, if so be he had called out, "Fire!" before he shot.

Well, on this May Day I am speaking of, we young citizens of every parish had met overnight to join in the celebration of it, had divided ourselves into companies, and repaired to the woods and groves about town, some to Hampstead, some to Highgate, to Greenwich, to Shooter's Hill, and so forth. My division went to Shooter's Hill, where we spent the entire night in cutting down green boughs and branches, to make a goodly bower, and in divers sports and pastimes. What mirth we made, to be sure! We were well victualled too, and had plenty of eating and drinking. My father, who was a stalwart man, in the flower of his age, just as I may be now, was to play Robin Hood, and right well he looked his part, with jerkin and hose of Lincoln green, wide buskins of buff, a bugle at his side, a quiver at his back, a feather in his cap, and a tall bow in his hand. You might have thought him the Earl of Huntingdon himself. At his back were two hundred archers, equipped like himself, and goodly to see, too, though he towered over them from the shoulders and upward.

To him comes the king—and oh!—was it not like King David coming to Araunah, both of them so kingly! You see, morning was just breaking, the sun flaming up from clouds of carnation and gold, the birds singing their hearts out, the air full of gossamer, the grass shining with May-dew (so good for the complexion, Kate!)

Robin Hood—that's my father—and his two hundred men, had drawn up in goodly array, as the king and queen, and lords and ladies came riding by. When King Harry saw Robin Hood, he slackened his pace, and seeing my father step forward, no whit abashed, but with fit deference, ye may depend, the king halted.

"What is it, good man?" quoth he.

Quoth my father—that's Robin Hood—"May it like your grace to see my men shoot?"

"Yea, verily," quoth the king.

Then Robin Hood gave a shrill whistle; and all his archers shot and loosed at once. He whistled again, and they all shot again; he whistled again, and they all shot again; and the whiz of so many arrows let flying at once made a great and strange noise, that mightily pleased the king. They all belonged to the king's guard.

Next, Robin Hood stepped forth, and said, "May it like your grace, and the queen's grace, to come into the greenwood and see how we archers live?"

"It liketh me well," said the king; and so said the queen, when he asked her if she would adventure herself among so many outlaws. Her answer was pretty, methinks—"If it pleaseth your grace, I am content." She spoke with a somewhat foreign accent. Ye may be sure we lads looked at her with all our eyes. She was little, with auburn hair under a white silken coif, edged with big pearls, and she rode a Spanish jennet. Behind her were eleven ladies, the fairest in the land, all mounted on ambling palfreys.

Then the archers wound their horns, and the whole troop accompanied the king's grace into the wood that lieth under Shooter's Hill. Here we had made an arbour of green boughs, and within it was a table covered with a fair white cloth, and set with flagons and trenchers and dishes; and smoking-hot venison, the outlaws were supposed to have killed, was set before the king.

And the king said, "Verily, this is a sumptuous breakfast!"

Said Robin Hood, "Sir, outlaws have only venison to their breakfast. We give you the best cheer we have."

Said the king, "Right so; I desire no better."

So they ate till they were sufficed, and made very merry; and then forth they fared, on their return to Greenwich, followed by crowds of people greatly solaced at the sight. And a pageant came forth to meet them, of a chariot drawn by five horses, with a fair lady seated on every horse.

Now, when we had seen the last of the king and his goodly equipage, we lads trooped in crowds, with much vociferation and rejoicing, to deck the great May-pole, which was drawn by forty yoke of oxen, each ox having his horns tipped with a nosegay of flowers. Men, women, and children accompanied us, laden with boughs and with flowers: the minstrels and morris-dancers went before; the hobby-horse, dragon, and salvage-men followed after. Ye never knew such frolicking in your life. It was sport!

That is to say, it was sport as long as they all kept their tempers. And why should not they, on May Day, of all the days in the year?

Well, if the Evil One found his way into the fairest May garden that ever was, where Eve herself was May queen, likely enow it was that he should come among us poor sinners. And if the fair ladies in the pageant embodied spring, vegetation, perfume, flower-blossoms, softening showers, and such like, I fear me that envy, hatred, malice, and mischief were among us disembodied, and seeking what evil they could set us on.

For, you see, a great many foreigners had settled down among us, with their wares and their handicrafts and their outlandish gibberish, that we Londoners could not abide; thinking with some reason that it was to our hindrance and impoverishment. Now, when a spite smoulders in the heart, it soon finds a cranny to creep out at. One of the morris-dancers was a French varlet, whose proper name was Dennis, though he chose to call himself Dennee. Being as lissom as the thinnest split whalebone, he cut his capers higher than the rest, and bounded like a shuttlecock. Whenever he came down again, it pleased Tom Fool to hit him a thwack with his lath sword, and cry, "Higher! higher!" which, at length, incensed Dennee, who sharply turned on him with—

"Vat for you say higher, higher? you von great big Tom Fool!"

"It takes a wise man to be a good fool," answers Tom, hitting him again; on which Dennee showed all his teeth, and chattered like a monkey. Moreover, he snatched Tom Fool's sword and shivered it in splinters, on which Tom, without hesitation, gave him a black eye. You should have heard the uproar there was. "Fight it out! a ring, my masters!" but all that was quickly put down by the elder and cooler heads, and what began in anger ended in peals of laughter. Dennee's anger did not end, though—it smouldered, and he cursed and felt for his knife. Howbeit, the festivity of the occasion was too much for him, and soon he was at his shuttlecock leaps again; while Tom Fool was hunting for a new sword.

"Was this evil May Day?" No, no; not it. I'm coming to it presently. I've just hinted at the heartburnings that were beginning to show themselves between the Londoners and the foreigners. Maybe there were dozens of such trivial quarrels between the two parties as that between Tom Fool and Dennee; and when one began to tell his fellow what a grudge he owed such and such a Frenchman, or Spaniard, or Dutchman, the other would say, "Ay, ay, I was served just such an ugly trick;" and so fomenting each other's wrath, instead of assuaging it, which was not the right thing, you know, boys.

Well, this feeling grew worse and worse; and I had my share of it, for it seemed to me that Dennee had a mind to be my sister Kate's sweetheart; else why should he always be offering her posies, and sweet things, and bone-carvings? In truth, he had a pretty turn that way; but she would none of his gauds, which ought to have satisfied me; but I was vexed because she would speak well of him.

The year ran its course, and May Day had nearly come round again, when, returning home one evening, I met Dennee hurrying along as if a mad dog were at his heels, carrying a bag with him. I said, "Whither so fast, Master Dennee?"

He said, "Alley, alley! Not you hinder me, I go far, far away."

"What!" said I, "are you going for good?"

"Wee, wee, wee! for very good, because you all is so bad. Bone swore!"

Well, I thought this strange, though I was not sorry to be quit of him.

Presently Giles, my fellow-apprentice, came up to me, shaking with laughter, and caught hold of my shoulder to steady himself.

"I've sent Dennee off with a flea in his ear," said he. "There's a rumour all over the city that the 'prentices are going to slay all the aliens; so I told him of it, and he's off."

"Belike you've done him a good turn then," said I; "but sure, the report hath no foundation?"

"I know not that," said Giles: "there's many a quarrel to be settled, and we owe them a spite."

"You! are you going to have a hand in it?"

"Why not? Will you join us?"

"No, I think not. I've no quarrel to pick with any, unless Dennee, and he's gone."

"Then, an you will not, mum's the word; but look out for something on May Day."

I mused in my mind what this might portend. However, just before the day came, every alderman received instructions to give orders personally to his ward, that no man should on any pretext whatsoever stir out of his house after nine o' the clock, but keep his doors shut and his family and servants within till nine o'clock the next morning.

As it happened, I was playing at bucklers with my fellow-'prentice in Cheap, when the alderman of our ward, a fussy old citizen, chanced to come by, just after hearing the proclamation, which we lads knew nothing of. Pushing through the knot of bystanders who were cheering us on, he cried aloud—

"Leave off! leave off, I say!"

"Why?" returns Giles, continuing his play.

"Dost defy me, knave? Here, constables, take them both to the Comptor."

"Let them if they dare!" cries Giles in a passion; and I, too, was incensed, and began to bawl—

"'Prentices! 'prentices! clubs! clubs!" on which swarms of lusty young fellows flung themselves over counters and bulkheads, and came trooping and whooping to the rescue, armed with whatever it might chance.

Mr. Alderman turned as red as a turkey-cock, and backed into a shop, through which he was let out by a back way into a bye-street and so escaped.

But not so soon was allayed the uproar he had excited. Remember, boys, it's easier to upset a skilnet of boiling water than to heal them that are scalded by it. Journeymen and their masters now swelled the throng of 'prentices; serving-men, watermen, and even courtiers. Giles and I, who had been laid hands on, were soon released. At St. Martin's Gate, we were met by good Sir Thomas More, who spread out his hands towards us, and cried—

"I exhort you all, my good people, to go home; for you are in danger of being called in question for this day's uproar."

But he might as well have bid the wind to change. People were now beginning to throw stones from St. Martin's, and one of them hit a sergeant-at-arms, one Nicholas Dennis, who, in a fury, shouted "Down with them!" Meanwhile, others, moved by evil-doers of the baser sort, were forcing the doors and windows of houses, and flinging the goods into the street.

A cry was now raised—"To the Frenchmen in Cornhill!" and a rush was made to that place, where was a French lodging-house. This was broken into and stripped, the terrified Frenchmen fleeing for their lives. The same thing occurred in various other quarters; in short, the doings of that Evil May Day (for the sack and pillage continued till three o'clock on May morning, amid inexpressible clamour and violence) were such that Giles and I slunk home ashamed, and were rather glad to be roughly handled by our master, and locked up in the dark on bread and water.

Meanwhile the lord mayor had seized and sent to prison upwards of three hundred, including women and young boys. Three days after, they were brought forth and tried at Guildhall; and John Lincoln and twelve others were sentenced to hanging. Oh, how our hearts were dismayed! How Giles and I bewailed ourselves in secret for having set this big stone a rolling that was to crush us all! for, on the 22nd of May, after we had remained three weeks in fearful jeopardy, the king came to Westminster Hall, with his grand lords, and the lord mayor and aldermen, and commanded that all the prisoners should be brought forth. Forth they all came, young and old, in lamentable case; dirty, torn, squalid, with pale faces smeared with tears, in their shirts, and with halters round their necks, four hundred men and boys, besides eleven women. Giles and I followed after them, shaking in our shoes, for all we were not in the scrape, because our own consciences condemned us.

Well, when they were all brought before the majesty of the king's presence, the cardinal rose, and with a terrible voice, charged the lord mayor and aldermen with gross negligence in not allaying sooner the outbreak. "And as for you, ye sinful people," said he, with a dreadful look at the prisoners, "there is nothing ye deserve for your malefices but death."

Then they all fell on their knees, and began wailing and weeping, that it was dreadful to hear and see; and cried they, "Mercy—mercy, gracious lord and king!—mercy!"

Then the Dukes of Norfolk, Suffolk, and the other great lords joined their supplications to those of the miserable caitiffs, and said to the king, "We beseech your grace, of your abundant mercy, to pardon them all, howbeit hanging would be but too good for them."

Then the king, after a pause, tempering the severity of his aspect, said, "Well, I will. I pardon ye all."

Thereupon, so mad with joy were the prisoners, that they plucked off their halters, and flung them right up to the roof.

Now, mark what Giles and I did. No sooner did we perceive the king's countenance change, than we slipped into a corner, whipped off everything but our shirts, put something about our necks for halters, and down on our bare knees with the rest! Thus we came in for our share when he cried, "I pardon ye all."

Ah! he was a good and merciful king then. It has been only by little and little that he has changed. He's a warning to you all, boys. He was as good as any of you, then. And for my part, I cannot help remembering the kindness of his youth, especially concerning that Evil May Day.

THE ART OF LIVING HAPPILY.

"He that hath it shall abide satisfied."—Prov. xix. 23.

THERE is an evil under the sun, and it is common among men; a universal disease, an inward complaint that sickens the heart and gnaws away slowly at the life; a kind of evil philosopher's stone which turns all that it touches into dross. It is called Unhappiness.

There was an ancient philosopher who had great riches and power besides his wisdom, and his wisdom was also great. He lived amid gorgeous luxuriance of everything that ingenuity could devise to please and gratify, and interested and amused himself with carrying on great and magnificent works. He had his fill of every earthly good, and his wisdom remained with him. Now, one would be ready to think that if anybody could be happy he must have been the man; but he was not the man. For, when he passed his enjoyments and labours under review, one touch of the stone wrung from him the disconsolate exclamation, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity!" The sorrow of his exclamation is touching, its bitterness is sublime, and its truth finds an echo in every heart. Who has not felt, in some pause of his career, and looking backwards and forwards, as if all were but "vanity and vexation of spirit," and there were no "profit under the sun?" It is the interpretation of the weary tick-tick, that falls through the years from the great clock-tower of Time. Day after day, year after year, century after century, the heavy pendulum swings backwards and forwards uttering its constant, monotonous, melancholy sound, "Vanity of vanities, vanity of vanities." Every one comes to learn its meaning sooner or later. It early disturbs the dream of youth; and beats with wearisome persistency in the ear of manhood. It is a painful sound. We cannot, indeed, long listen to it quietly, it would either stupefy or madden the brain. The toils and cares of the world, though in themselves often a burden, are quite as often a blessing, for their noise muffles the sound and prevents us being driven to distraction; they also keep men from taking to questionable modes of attaining the same end: hence the proverb, "The greatest want is the want of a want." Many strive to drown themselves in business or pleasure that they may not hear; and if regular cares do not come in course, a way is soon found out to make them; but it is impossible altogether to succeed in stopping the ears; there is always a confused, unpleasant sound, and at every cessation of their own din the old constant note comes out again distinctly, marching on with unvaried tread to death, judgment, eternity.

Who does not know the dull pain and depression of a headache, and the sharp agony and pang of toothache? Yet the malady of which we have been speaking—the heartache or mindache—is worse than them both; for it is deeper, more constant, and more incurable. This is a sore evil; and it has sometimes gone on to such an extent, and the consequent pain to such a height, that people have even committed self-destruction to get rid of it.

The domain of Nature has been ransacked and turned over and over again by pharmacopologists innumerable; and every now and then medicines of various kinds have made a noise in the world, till repeated experience has proved their worthlessness; patients have tried nostrums of every name and nature, but all in vain, or with very partial success; science and philosophy have lent their aid; but only to be baffled, both as to the character of the disease and the discovery of a cure.

"In vain, alas! is Nature's aid,
The work exceeds all human pow'r."

And conscious of their inability to grapple with such an evil, men have embodied the results of their philosophy in an aphorism, which carries but cold comfort to the sufferer: "What can't be cured must be endured."

Now, the existence of disease at all is an abnormal state of matters: and if an antidote cannot be found in one quarter, men naturally turn to another. But in this case, humanity is sadly at variance with its usual practice. It persists in seeking where the history and experience of all time past have declared that what it wants is not to be found. Each generation seems to think itself wiser than the last in the matter, and with modern skill and appliance again digs over the old ground, wondering like its predecessors that it cannot find as it proceeds; and when it has gone through the allotted space once, turning and digging it over again; until at length, with a blind persistency and dogged, semi-despair, the work grows into a sort of mania, like that of the Seeker, after the "great carbuncle."

If men had no knowledge or means of knowing anything else, the wonder would not be so great; but with "intimations of immortality" within, and a written revelation of the "way" without, and with no lack of instances of the beneficial effects of the course of treatment therein prescribed, that any—not to say the many—should still vainly clutch at the shadow while they let the substance go by, is a marvel without precedent, and can only be explained on the theory that their vision is distorted and turned into obliquity by some evil power.

Many times and oft has the experience of some been a living demonstration to others of the truth that

"'Tis religion that can give Sweetest pleasures while we live;
'Tis religion must supply
Solid comfort when we die."

And people in general partly believe the testimony, and fully intend to put it to the proof some day. And then they set off on the old track, to seek first those things which are needful for the body—and more if they can get it—forgetting that the great Teacher said, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." Is it any wonder then that the "inner man" feels in a miserable way, the result of improper or insufficient nourishment, when it is only supplied with the husks that go to support the outer, and a little of very diluted real food, accompanied with a vague occasional promise that it will get something better by-and-by?

Whatever may have been said to the contrary—and it is not much comparatively—that the Christian religion believed and acted on must prove a source of joy and happiness, admits of easy demonstration. Leaving altogether out of sight the truth that the man who devotes all his energies to the things of earth and time outrages the higher part of his nature, which in turn takes its revenge upon him by depriving him of the satisfaction which his pursuits might otherwise have afforded; leaving that out of sight, there is a conscience in man—though some, goaded by its accusing voice, have attempted to get quit of the discomfort by denying its existence, with what success is best known to themselves—there is a conscience within that pleads guilty, and guilt awakens fear, making existence, when men take time and think about it, little better than a continual misery, and turning the natural enjoyment of life into gall and worm-wood. Or granting that conscience may be deadened and the inward voice silenced; there still remain, as we have said, the "intimations of immortality," which must at least create doubt if not fear; and the vision of death, which will intrude, and thoughts of the uncertainty of the unknown darkness into which we must soon go, and which, for aught that one can tell, may be as the Bible says, must prove a bitter ingredient in the cup of life. Or, to take the lowest ground, the climax of sceptical content and hope, granting that the man congratulates himself on having managed to lay his great enemy, conscience, dead at his feet, and to erase from his being every trace of immortal existence, and reduced himself in every respect—except a little matter of intelligence more or less—to a level with the beasts that perish, there remains the uncertainty of life and the certainty of death, and that must often be a sore point with him. He may be weary enough of life, yet

"'Tis life, of which our nerves are scant,
'Tis life, deep life, for which we pant,
More life, and fuller, that we want;"

not death, from which all life shrinks with terror; nor the grave, with its horror of darkness, and worms, and corruption. He knows that he may die at any moment, that in course of a few years he must die—must leave all his business engagements, all his social enjoyments, all his pleasures, all his wealth and fame, if he have any, and become a loathsome carcase, to be buried out of sight and forgotten—left to crumble in rottenness and decay. He cannot always keep such thoughts at arm's-length, and they are enough to poison the strength of any life. What heart can one have for anything, whose goal for all hope and aspiration is the grave! You may as well expect the prisoner in the condemned cell to "laugh and grow fat"—the only difference is, that he is likely to die in a more shocking manner, and a little sooner, though even that is uncertain. Such a sepulchral outlook is ill-fitted to render life happy.

At the best, it may, perhaps, be regarded with stoical indifference; but very few can ever attain to such a negative sort of felicity as that, and he who can be happy in it is not in his sober senses.

On the other hand, true religion, not ignoring but confessing all these things to be great disturbers of our peace, and to which we are in bondage, at one grand stroke sweeps them all into oblivion, and sets us free. We are no longer left to mourn our inheritance of a few feet of earth—"this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and mortality shall be swallowed up of life." We are no longer left in doubt about the darkness of "the valley and the shadow of death;" "we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad." We are no longer left in helpless fear concerning the things that conscience speaks of—"being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." To those "who obey not the Gospel" the forebodings of conscience culminate in a "certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation." But to those who shape their lives according to its teaching, the dim vision of immortality that dwells in the spirit of man is opened and expanded into the reality of the "life everlasting," all radiant with "joy unspeakable and full of glory."

A living faith and simple trust in the home prepared for us by God, is the only real principle, and it is a powerful one, to counteract "human sadness" and dissatisfaction.

"Oh, happy retribution,
Short toil, eternal rest;
For mortals and for sinners
A mansion with the blest!"

A full belief in the truth that Christ has opened up a way of escape from condemnation by the sacrifice of himself, that it is the great joy of his great loving heart to bring us to heaven, and introduce us to all its fuller life of glory and delight, must of necessity make the present life happier. "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick;" but hope certain to be realised makes the heart strong and glad; and the hope of the heaven that awaits us is surely enough to fill any heart with joy.

"A hope so great and so divine May trials well endure."

If one has a plentiful share of this world's good, such a prospect will enable him to enjoy it the more; and if one's lot be hard, such a prospect will enable him to bear it the better. In bereavement, such a prospect will temper the anguish of separation by the forward look to the meeting in heaven. In trouble of every kind, such a prospect will enable us to say, with St. Paul, with more or less courage and patience according to the firmness of our faith: "Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." And in the hour of death such a prospect will rob the grisly monarch of his terrors, for "though our earthly house of this tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

All this is not mere theory and transcendental rhapsody; it is fact, and the consciousness of that has enabled many a one to "run with patience the race set before him," and in dissolution to exult as a conqueror, exclaiming with latest breath, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

But besides the prospect of heaven, the Christian has the present sympathy, and assistance, and comfort of God, through the Holy Spirit. While in this world, in the flesh, our Lord gave the universal invitation: "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." And he is the Unchangeable, now and for ever, both able and willing to fulfil his word. Where else can we go with the numberless evils under which we are helpless, but to him? His ear is ever open to the cry of his creatures, his eye sees all their wants, his heart yearns over their trials and temptations, and his ready sympathy "tempers the wind to the shorn lamb." The closer and more hearty our communion with him, the more we can realise this comfort. But often he leads the blind by a way which they know not; and then the thought that we are in his hand, and therefore safe, ought to be enough. "Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? hope thou in God: for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God."

There is something inexpressibly grand and glorious in the life which now is, viewed as a state of probation and preparation for that which is to come. Such an aspect and purpose sheds a stream of heavenly glory over man, and his little momentary concerns; and the thousand cares that tug day and night at the skirts of his garments are bathed in the holy light, and become part of the Father's discipline and education, to fit his child for the "inheritance which is incorruptible, undefiled, and which fadeth not away."

Thus true religion becomes "an anchor of the soul," in this mysterious and tempestuous existence of ours, and the only antidote for the bane of life, the cure for unhappiness. When we know, and are sure, that God is love, and that he makes all things work together for our good, the sting is taken out of earthly woe, its troubles may wound, but they will not poison the system. While the world invites men to satisfy themselves, by swallowing as much of it as they can before they die, Christianity tells them that satisfaction is not there, that the harder they try to find it, the bitterer will be their disappointment, and points them to a higher source, even God himself. "At his right hand is fulness of joy, and pleasures for evermore."

But are all true Christians happy? They are undoubtedly happier than they would be without any hope at all; and the fault is in themselves if they are not largely happy. It must be either from an imperfect apprehension of the whole truth of the Gospel, or a partial application of it to their own case, or a partial endeavour at conformity in the life, that the effect is only partial. We know that the full flood of happiness cannot visit us upon earth: we have neither capacity nor fitness to receive it; but there are foretastes more or less sweet to be found. We cannot expect too much of what Christianity promises; but it is possible under misapprehension to expect in a manner we have no warrant for, or that God sees not to be best for us, and even to expect what is not promised at all. It will not deliver its professors from the effects of their transgressions of natural law; nor from the common "ills that flesh is heir to," though by inculcating the practice of the virtues it does in a measure alleviate some of these. And besides the above-mentioned ills, there is always enough of the "old Adam" within, and temptation without, to disturb and embitter the most pious life. But by-and-by—and this is the comfort—these will all be left behind,

"And pains, and groans, and griefs, and fears,
And death itself shall die."

Yet those who love God shall live, and wave their palm of victory over death and hell, and wear the crown of glory, and reign with Christ for ever and ever.

Meanwhile let them rejoice in the prospect, and work for its fulfilment—and seek by frequent communion with God to have their hearts so opened, that both in their joys and sorrows they may be able to catch his sympathy and apprehend his guidance, and be the better prepared for entering into his rest.

Let them not despise things secular, but hail as auxiliaries every true reform, political, educational, moral, sanitary; every little helps, and some little help much. Yet amid the rabble rout of popular reformations, let not self-amendment be forgotten, but pressed into the foremost rank, and in the highest and truest sense of all. And the constant exercise of virtue and benevolence, and the consolations and hope of true religion, will bring the mind into a condition of sweetness and calm that is a perpetual source of enjoyment—for the calm mind, like still waters, reflects surrounding objects in their justest and truest proportions. A conscience at rest, and a calm mind anchored on the Unchangeable, will be a strong and sweet influence pervading the life, and constituting "the peace of God which passeth all understanding."

And while "the world of the ungodly" must go down to the grave sorrowing without hope, let those who have in their hearts the "larger hope" rejoice amid their sorrow; and for the joy set before them endure the cross, despising the shame, "quit themselves like men," and "fight the good fight of faith," till, crowned with victory, they enter into the joy of their Lord. J. H.

THE WARNING.

INTER, that old enchanter, quakes,
Hearing the cuckoo's magic word;
With fear the wrinkled wizard shakes,
For Heaven has sent the warning bird.

The shrouds of snow melt into flowers,
Through the dead leaves the primrose comes;

Between the sunny April showers

The swallows dart, the wild bee hums.

Then from the old king's loosening grasp

Expands a little ruffling wing;

And there flits out that gentle bird—

That rainbow-coloured bird—the Spring.

W. THORNBURY.

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XI.

AN INTERVIEW WITH LADY SYLVESTER.

ADY SYLVESTER was sitting in her usual place, by the drawing-room fire. It was after dinner; the time when she and Alice were alone. Alice was at the piano, playing soft little airs, more to herself than to her mother. For Lady Sylvester's eyes were closed, as if she were asleep.

She was not asleep; her active brain was busy working out problems that might have puzzled a statesman: but outwardly, all seemed peace and repose. The hands, with their lace ruffles, were calmly folded, as though nothing could be expected of them, just then; and the attitude was one of undisturbed tranquillity—tranquillity, however, that did not last long.

A tap at the door, and in came the butler.

(Drawn by E. M. WIMPERIS.)

"Between the sunny April showers
The swallows dart, the wild bee hums."—p. 536.

Lady Sylvester roused herself like one used to sudden surprises. Alice continued to play softly. Her whole soul was in the melody she was bringing forth from the old disused instrument. She did not notice the entrance of the butler.

"If you please, your ladyship," began the man, "I am very sorry, but John Humphreys is here."

"Well?" said Lady Sylvester, haughtily, as though the very existence of such an individual was unknown to her.

"He wishes to see Mr. Sylvester," continued the man, respectfully.

"Mr. Sylvester is not at home."

And the proud head was laid back again on the cushion. The old servant hesitated.

An initiated person might have detected an expression of uneasiness in the piercing eye of Lady Sylvester.

"He refuses to leave the house until he has seen your ladyship."

A sudden and deep silence. Alice's fingers stopped abruptly. The silence did not last many minutes.

"Tell him he must come again, when my son is at home."

This mandate proceeded from the lips of her ladyship. The butler retired, softly and respectfully. Alice rose, and came to her mother.

"Who is John Humphreys?" she asked.

"No one that you need know anything about, Alice."

"But is he," she came nearer, and spoke the words fearfully, "is he a creditor?"

Lady Sylvester had not time to answer. The butler had come back again.

"I am sorry to trouble your ladyship, but the man will not go."

Alice's face looked scared. Lady Sylvester was impassive and self-possessed as ever.

"Tell him I am coming."

He was waiting. At first he was afraid she would not come, and that, as he said afterwards, he should have to proceed to extremities. What those extremities were, he never mentioned, for he had no need to have recourse to them. Lady Sylvester was coming.

He rose, for he had sat down, his hat in his hand. He meant to be quite respectful, and behave as to a lady. He looked towards the door, and quietly bided his time.

When the door opened, and she came in—Lady Sylvester herself—John Humphreys was somewhat confounded. His task—good, simple-minded man—had seemed easy enough, a few minutes ago. The case was different now, in the actual presence of the woman he had demanded to see.

She swept by him, with her trailing robe, and sat down in the chair, where Raymond had once sat. Then she looked him, as he afterwards said, "through and through." By this time, he had recovered a little of his courage, for he had come on an important errand, and was not to be browbeaten by a woman.

She had not spoken, or made the slightest sign of recognition. Now, that he was standing before her, she addressed him for the first time.

"You have wished to see me; what have you to say?"

The sound of her voice struck a kind of chill into John. He paused ere he could reply.

"I am sorry to trouble your ladyship," he began, but she made a sign of impatience.

"Pass by that, if you please, John Humphreys."

"As your ladyship pleases. My errand is a very simple one, and straightforward as the day. I have come to ask for my money."

"And is it usual in these cases to demand it of ladies?" She said it a cutting tone, meant to be ironical.

"No, madam—my lady, I mean," interrupted John, hastily; "not unless, as in the present instance, the gentleman keeps out of the way."

A flush rose to the proud features. The eyes gave a keener flash; but she kept them fixed upon him. She meant that he should quail before them, but he did not.

"If, at any time, our house did you the honour of asking you a favour," said Lady Sylvester, "need you insult it by mistrust? What does your conduct mean, John Humphreys?"

"My lady, I never should have mistrusted," said John, again hastily, "if I had been paid in reasonable time. And my conduct means simply this: I want the money, and I will have it."

"If that is all you have to say," she replied, rising as though the interview were at an end, "I advise you to send in your claim to our solicitor; families, such as ours, do not choose to be troubled with paltry affairs like these." And she drew her shawl round her, as though intending to depart.

"Lady Sylvester," said John, firmly, "I do not mean to apply to your solicitor any more. I am tired of it. I mean to get the money by law."

She did not answer. She was moving towards the door, as grand, John said to Rachel, as any empress.

"I mean to get the money by law," continued he, in the same resolute voice; "so I advise your ladyship to take warning in time. When the first break comes in the walls, depend on it their doom is near!"

She looked back at him with a scornful smile, as though she defied him. John returned look for look, and as he did so, her ladyship passed out.

He had got nothing by his interview—Rachel said he never would; but he had advertised them what he meant to do.

"And now for law," said John Humphreys, as he walked briskly homeward; "now for law!"

CHAPTER XII.

WHAT RICHARD FANAN WAS ABOUT.

It was a little low room, with the furniture broken and battered, and the casement off the hinges, and the window stuffed with straw. It was as wretched a place as you could put your head in; but it was the home of Richard Fanan.

One thing, only, had a ray of cheerfulness about it. A huge fire blazed and crackled on the hearth. By the fire sat Richard and his colleagues. They were evil-looking men, with the same wolfish physiognomy that he had himself; and the meeting together, in this miserable haunt, was, to say the least of it, suspicious.

"Now, then," said Richard, looking round, "I suppose we are all here?"

"Yes, we are all here," replied the man whom the reader has seen before, in the presence of Mr. Mapleson.

"Now, our way seems to be pretty easy," said Richard. "We've got to act on the principle of intimidation. I'll tell you what Mr. Mapleson has done for us! He has screwed down our wages; he has made hard terms with us, as to the days we've worked for him; he's kept back our money, and he's turned us adrift in the dead of the winter. Just give a look at my place here, boys, and then say what sort of a master Josiah Mapleson has been!"

There was an inner room which opened out of the one where the men were sitting. In it, on the bare floor, crouched a wretched woman with an infant in her arms, and three ragged children nestling near to her, as though for warmth. It was Richard Fanan's wife, and if she dare have spoken, she would have proclaimed aloud, "No, Richard, it was not Josiah Mapleson, it was your other master, drink, that has brought you to this."

But she did not say it, poor creature! it would have been as much as her life was worth.

"I'll tell you what," said Richard, savagely, "we'll have it out of that fellow some of these days!"

"So we will; and the sooner the better," echoed his friends.

"There are two ways of dealing with him," continued Richard; "he's laid up with the gout, you know, and does not get to the mill. Now he's got a new man—a raw young fellow—it will be very easy work to manage. Bless you, why, he'll bend like a straw!"

"I'm not so sure of that," said Jem Carter, speaking very deliberately. "That young fellow, as you call him, has an old head on his shoulders; and he aint one to be put down either—I knows it!"

"Why, what do you know?" asked Richard, eyeing him contemptuously.

"I know I tried it on with him. I went up to the mill, and thinks I'll bully him into taking me on again; and I tells him it is the safest plan to knock under to us men a little, that he was one, and we was many, and so on."

"Well, what did he say?" asked Richard, impatiently.

"Say! he said, 'I'll tell you what, my man, if you were five hundred to one against me, and I was in the right, and you in the wrong, I would not give it up.' And he meant it too. You should have seen the look he gave me."

"You are such a coward, Jem Carter. Now, if it had been me——"

"You had better let it be you next time," sneered the other, "and see how you get on,"

"I do mean it should be me, Jem; I'm not one as shrinks from my duty," said Richard, with a strange misapplication of the word. "And I'll tell you what we'll do. We'll first pay Mr. Blake a visit when he don't just happen to expect us. And if he can't be brought to reason, why, then, I've another scheme in hand; a bold one, but we'll carry it through, lads! see if we don't!"

"What is it?" asked more voices than one.

Richard gave a suspicious glance round. Then he lowered his voice almost to a whisper. "We'll fire the mill!"

It was a desperate proposition; so bold, and so reckless, indeed, that it caused a momentary silence. Richard was carrying his colleagues further than they meant to go.

He saw the effect he had produced, for he was a sharp-witted man enough; but he knew also how to counteract it. Looking round he said—

"Now, them as are cowards had better just get up and go away; we don't want 'em here."

No one stirred. The word coward was an epithet which none seemed desirous of earning. Then Richard went on—

"I don't know as we shall need to do the thing, lads. I fancy when we've got that young fellow Blake into our clutches, he'll be glad to buy off at any cost."

A peculiar sound from Jem Carter, intended to express incredulity.

"He will, Jem—see if he don't! That mill is a lonely place, and I know he stops till last. He has his room there, and I've seen the light in it after every one has gone. He's looking over accounts maybe. Now, some of these nights we'll just step in upon him, and see what he's about."

"What shall you do, pray?" asked Jem, rather anxiously.

"Do! I shall just say to him, 'Now, Mr. Blake, or whatever your name happens to be, I'm a man of few words, and when I've said 'em, so much the worse for you if you don't do as I say. I want you to give us men back the wages your master cheated us out of; and I want you to promise that you'll take us on again—at our own terms, mind; not at yours. And if you'll do this, we'll go quietly home again, without ruffling a feather.' That's what I mean to say."

"And if he won't do it?"

"Then," and Richard threw an evil glance round, "then he had better look to it, that is all!"

A short silence followed these words; but on the whole the men were quite as desperate and as reckless as Richard. They were all of them out of work, and out at elbows, and they all bore a deadly grudge against Mr. Mapleson. In fact, when they had had a little time to digest the plan propounded, it seemed to have a terrible fascination for them. They were quite ready and willing to undertake the work cut out for them. The only one who secretly hesitated was Jem Carter. He was not quite so hardened as the rest, and he had a considerable amount of misgiving as to what Harold Blake would do. And if Harold Blake stood firm, then the consequences might be more important than he reckoned for. But Jem did not like to be thought a coward; and whatever his misgivings were, he kept them to himself. He professed himself in readiness to do whatever the leader of this dark little conspiracy desired.

It was then planned that the following night the six men should assemble near the mill, one by one, so as not to attract the least observation. When the workpeople issued forth prior to the mill being closed, the conspirators were to contrive to slip in. As each man was well versed in the inns and outs of the place, this would not be so very difficult. And once safe in the mill, the rest of the work would be easy. They would have to wait till all the stragglers were out of sight and hearing, and then they might begin as soon as they liked.

When all this was settled, the conclave broke up, and Richard Fanan's wife crept timidly back to the fire. Richard did not stay to bear her company, and this, alas! was no unusual thing. He and his associates betook themselves to the "Green Dragon," to make out, as he observed, the rest of the evening!

CHAPTER XIII.

DANGER, AND NO SIGNALS.

"I AM sure it is very wretched, being left all day by myself; you would not like it, Harold."

"I have to do many things I don't like, Charley," replied Harold, gently. "Besides, I am at home now," added he, putting a fresh lump of coal on the fire.

"Yes, at home now; but it's nearly eight o'clock, and I have not seen you since breakfast," said Charley, in a querulous tone. "I can't think why you need stay over hours at that nasty mill!"

"Because, my dear, the master is laid up with gout, that is why," said Harold, quietly.

"Yes; and I am to suffer—when poor mamma always said—"

"Hush, Charley! hush, my little man!" and he came and stroked the fair hair—almost like a girl's—that clustered over Charley's forehead; "we must not go back, dear: forward is our motto."

"Not mine though; I have nothing to look forward to, lying here all day by myself."

"Has not Mrs. Maynard been to sit with you?"

"Yes, a little while. Well, she did sit with me this afternoon; but one does not like to be dependent on one's landlady for society."

"I think Mrs. Maynard is a very good sort of woman, Charley—and is as kind to you as she can be."

"Yes, she is kind; but then she is not enough. I want a change of faces; and I want to get out, and see something of the town. What is there to look at from that window, but chimney tops?"

"You shall get out as soon as the weather changes," said Harold, in the soothing tone he was used to adopt to his querulous brother.

"But what is there for me to ride in? You won't let me have a carriage, and there are no Bath-chairs in this nasty horrid place!"

"I dare say I can borrow you a chair, or perhaps buy one, when the money comes in, Charley. In the meantime, dear, just try to be a little patient. Perhaps I ought not to say so, either," added Harold, looking at the frail, suffering form on the sofa, "for I am so strong myself, thank Heaven, and have never known an ache or pain in my life. There is no knowing what my patience would have been!" and he laughed cheerfully.

Yet Harold knew in his secret heart the reason of this incessant complaining. Poor Charley had no deep source of consolation to turn to, in his hour of need. His Bible was never read. He had no sweet thoughts of that eternal rest that remains to weary sufferers. He was dependent on the passing moment for comfort or for amusement.

Harold's character was of another stamp. He was well disciplined in the Christian life; and this was the foundation of his courage, his patience, his self-denial. He would fain have guided Charley into the same safe and narrow road. But it is not in man to change the worldly heart, and implant a new and spiritual life. Harold knew this, and he never failed to pray that God, in his own good time, would bring about this happy event.

Nothing could exceed his forbearance with his sick brother. When he came home at night, he devoted himself wholly to Charley; he read to him, he talked to him, he played chess with him—the game in which Charley took a special delight. He never rested from his labours till the weak, crippled form was carried into the adjoining room, and till the eyes were closed in sleep. Then, and not till then, had Harold a few minutes of his own.

He would spend them in reading or in writing. Sometimes he would sit, his head resting on his hand, and indulging in a momentary abstraction. And, at such intervals, he would open a little box, lined with crimson velvet, that lay upon the table. The box contained two portraits—the portrait of Harold's father, and of his mother.

He never looked at them without tears. Sometimes he would be so unmanned, that he would actually weep. He had loved them dearly, spite of their shortcomings. His father had been ill for many months, and Harold had the hope that he, and indeed both these dear ones, had found refuge in God; that they were taken home ere the evil days had come.

He never indulged himself in these musings. He must seek strength, not tamper with the elements of weakness. He must be brave, and fight the battle well! There was only himself to do it. If he fell, what would become of Charley?

He was up betimes the next morning. It was his practice to call in on his employer, as he went to the mill. Mr. Mapleson was confined to his room, and was likely to be for some time; consequently more fell on Harold's shoulders than was usual, or had been anticipated.

"But he does admirably! If I had searched the kingdom through, I could not have found a better overseer," Mr. Mapleson had said to his friends.

Harold was admitted to the sick room, where his employer was sitting in an easy chair, his foot carefully resting on cushions.

"A shame too, Mr. Blake, that I should have the gout," he said, in answer to Harold's inquiries; "I that am the most abstemious man in the world."

"Perhaps you have been too abstemious," said Harold.

"I think not; but you see, Mr. Blake, gout is hereditary in our family, and that's it. The children suffer for the parents."

A true saying in more senses than one; and Harold felt it so. His thoughts, for the moment, wandered, but he called them back.

"All is right, I suppose, as usual?" said Mr. Mapleson, recurring to business.

"Right, as far as I can judge," replied Harold; "and I am as vigilant, I hope, as most men."

"Workpeople pretty quiet?"

"Quite so. I hear no complaints, and things are going on, as far as I can see, in a satisfactory manner."

"You have heard no more of Jem Carter?"

"No," said Harold, with a smile.

"Or of that ruffianly fellow, Richard Fanan?"

"No."

"Ah! that's well. If ever they come on the premises again, they will find us one too many for them. I should think Richard has absconded, or else is in gaol."

"I know nothing about him," replied Harold.

"The less the better!" said Mr. Mapleson.

A short conversation on business matters, a few technicalities in which the reader will take no interest, and Harold took leave of his employer, and started off for the mill. The day was not different from any other day, as far as its duties were concerned. Of its risks Harold knew nothing. He was extremely busy. He had scarce time to run home and snatch his dinner. Charley was waiting for him, full of complaints as usual. He had nothing to do—nothing to amuse himself with. His eyes ached and he could not read. He wished Harold would stay with him, and not go back to the mill. It was a vain wish, but Harold spent a few moments, he could ill spare, in trying to soothe him. As he went downstairs, he said to the landlady—

"Can you sit with Charley this afternoon, Mrs. Maynard?"

"Indeed, and that I will," said the landlady, good-humouredly; "but it will be for your sake, Mr. Blake, and not for his. He is that fretting, and pining, and worretting, it's enough to wear the life out of you!"

Harold looked grave, and the good woman—with whom he was an especial favourite—began to recant.

"Never trouble yourself, Mr. Blake; I'll see to him, and I'm as good as my word. Poor little gentleman, he may well be fractious, lying there, day after day. But I'll see to him!"

Harold's face cleared up. Mrs. Maynard was a kind of benefactress to Harold.

He stayed at the mill, as usual, till all the workpeople were gone away. Nothing had happened during the afternoon to attract the least attention. When the workpeople were gone, he fastened all the doors, and went to the little room he occupied. At that especial moment, no one of the usual staff was in the mill, but himself. He had some business letters to send off by the post, and he sat down to write them. He was fully occupied in his work; it was a still night, and at this corner of the premises he was quiet, and scarce a sound fell upon his ear.

No warning advertised him of his danger, yet he was not alone. Six men with noiseless steps were stealing along the passage—six desperate men—intent on mischief.

What will become of Harold?

(To be continued.)

JOE'S JACKET POCKETS.

CHAPTER I.

"H-H-H!" says Joe, with a breath that an old tar, or an ancient cabby might have drawn; "ah-h-h! this is what I call jolly, now."

The morning is bright, and the air is clear, but to any half-starved or ill-clad being the intense rawness thereof must be terrible indeed. The hedges and trees are thickly encrusted with frost, and glisten like silver; on the ponds merry boys are sliding and tumbling about in all directions; a lively redbreast has perched himself on one of the silvery sprays, and is piping away with all his might. In short, it is a winter's morning, exceeding fair, and desperately cold. But with that cosy pea-jacket of his, and those comfortable pockets, Joe feels that he can bid defiance to the fiercest of weathers.

Now, while Joey is stamping along the hard ground, and whistling a rival lay against the robin hard by, we will give you an account of the jacket, and, more important still, the pockets.

You could not look at Joey's shining face and clean white collar, without being sure that he had a kind and careful mother to keep him in trim. It was his mother who gave him that jacket. "Oh," you say, "I see nothing remarkable in that." Well, perhaps not; but I will tell you under what circumstances she gave it him.

Joey's mother is a widow. Her husband was a seaman in Her Majesty's navy, and met his death in one of the actions of the Crimean war. But through some irregularity, which I cannot attempt to explain, the widow had no pension or relief; so Mrs. Meadows (that was her name) had to make her living with her needle. Both Meadows and his wife had seen better times, and had minds and tastes above the class with which they latterly had been obliged to associate; in proof of which I will ask you to accompany me to Widow Meadows's cottage.

The door opens at once into the room, which serves for "parlour, kitchen, and all," and close to the window sits an anxious but hopeful-looking body, who is stitching away with all her might. To those busy hands you have already traced the whiteness of Joe's collar and the neatness of his clothes. Some one else is standing there, and evidently waiting for something or somebody, but of him we will for the present take no notice.

On looking round, we find the room, small as it is, woefully bare of furniture; but in one corner we discover a goodly-sized bookcase well filled with volumes of most respectable appearance. To this Mrs. Meadows often glances with pride and satisfaction, for it reminds her of her clever husband, who, she thinks, was one of the most talented men the world ever saw; and it is also her ambition to bring up Joe the Second in the steps of his father, and to secure for him in his riper years the same bookcase with its treasury of knowledge. Since her husband's death she has had many a hard tussle with that wolf at the door—poverty. Chairs, and other small articles of furniture, have found their reluctant way to the broker's, hence the bare appearance of the dwelling. But the bookcase she has vowed to keep till the last, albeit it has had two or three narrow escapes, at times when needlework has been cheap or scarce, and the poor mother has been at a loss how to feed and clothe her three little ones. She has but recently gone through one of these pinching times, and from three weeks ago until to-day has not been able to meet her landlord's weekly demands for rent. A fortnight ago he fixed to-day as the furthest limit he would allow her credit for, and threatened that if she failed him then, he would be obliged to seize her furniture. The poor woman was much cast down on hearing this, but knowing that God will help those who help themselves, she made many appeals to her patrons, and obtained an unusual amount of profitable employment. At the end of the first week she found to her great joy that she would be able, with next week's work alone, to pay the rent which was due, and, having in hand a few surplus shillings, and seeing poor Joe shivering in the cold for want of a coat, she bought some cloth, and made him the jacket he now wears, with—at his own especial request—the two capacious pockets I have already mentioned, denying herself many little things of which she stood in great need.

Having obtained the much-desired pockets, Joey's next important business was the furnishing them with all the treasures he could obtain. And furnish them he did, with things in season and out of season. So long as he could fill these wonderful store-houses, which at present he valued far more than the one which his mother is keeping for him, his head might go empty enough. In an incredibly short time they began to puff up and to bulge out with properties of a very miscellaneous description. Into the corner of the one went a peg-top; into the corner of the other a pocket-knife, with a sadly mutilated blade, which had done its best upon stout hedge-stakes and upon the edges of Joey's desk at the village school. On these solid foundations rested sundry matters, such as a hank of string, a few brass buttons, a stout pop-gun, a mischievous-looking sling, by means of which Joey had broken a window-pane a few weeks ago, and for which his mother of course had to pay; and last, and most important of all, a dozen or two of marbles which he has been accumulating during the last few days. Now I must say that these marbles ought to weigh more heavily in his pocket than they do; for if Joey had been in his play as fair as the weather is this fine winter's morning, most of them would have been lying in other pockets than his. Joey has had some little experience in "taws and alleys," and his cupidity induces him to play with all the young novices he can get hold of. The other day he fell in with little Tom Robins, whose mother had just bought him a bagful of bran new marbles of all kinds and degrees, and proposed "Just one game, Tommy. Dare say I shall lose, though."

Crafty Joe! he had no intention of losing a single marble. Poor Tommy assented, and they soon were a pair of devoted little players, on their knees at "knuckle" and "holey." The little victim's bag gradually shrunk; repeated demands of one, two, and three combined to exhaust the exchequer upon which Tommy that morning had gazed with pride and hope.

Poor Tommy! he was a very small boy, yet not so much of a Lilliputian but he could see that Joe's method of playing was extremely one-sided, and once he ventured to deliver himself of that opinion. But Joey assumed an honest indignation, and was walking off the field with an air of injured innocence, when a tall boy stepped up and said—

"Now, Joe, none of that. I've watched you a good bit, and noticed that you didn't play fair."

"What has that got to do with you?" replied Joey, for he was what boys call "jolly cheeky."

"What has it got to do with me, you young scamp! Just this—I'm not going to see that little 'un cheated."

"How do you know I was cheating? and, what's more, it's no business of yours," said Joe, sullenly, as he edged slowly away.

"I'll teach you to know what business it is of mine," shouted the other, who had now become thoroughly angered, "so just you shell out quietly, or I'll very soon make you."

So saying, little Tommy's advocate made towards the young culprit with a view to hastening the transaction; but Joey took up a large stone from the road saying, "I'll pitch this at your shins if you come after me."

But the tall boy treated this as an empty threat, and made a spring towards Joe; not with any success, however, for down came the heavy stone upon one of his shins, which rendered him quite lame for some time; and so Joe took to his heels without a chance of being captured—for that day.

Joey has carried these ill-gotten treasures some two or three days, but they weigh heavily in his pocket; he has some remains of a conscience, too, and they lie rather unpleasantly on that. But what troubles him more than all is the prospect of falling in with the tall boy, who is sure, he thinks, to take his revenge. Although he has just exclaimed how jolly the walk is, he is not over bright about it mentally, for the reason I have just given you. The tall boy lives in that direction, and Joey would by no means walk in it, were he not bound on an errand for his mother. For this is the day for the paying of the rent, and the landlord came as punctually as the clock to take the money. He looked considerably mollified as the widow took out two pieces of gold, but said, "I am sorry to say, Mrs. Meadows, I have not enough silver with me to give you the change you require. Can you manage without it?"

"No, indeed," said Mrs. Meadows, "for this is all I have. But if you would not mind waiting a few minutes, I will send my son to get change for a sovereign."

"Thank you," said the landlord, "that will do. And let me see how sharp your little boy can be about it. I shall soon be in want of an active boy for my city office."

The widow brightened up a good deal on hearing this, and said, "Joey, dear, come here."

"Yes, mother." And the landlord saw a sharp-enough looking boy, with very bright and twinkling eyes.

"Take this sovereign," said his mother, "to Goody Jones, and say that I shall be much obliged to her if she will change this for me, in silver. Be sure to take care of it, for it is very valuable; don't put it in your pocket, but keep it in your hand all the way; and above all, make haste, and stop with none of your playmates."

"Very well, mother," said Joe, and off he went. By this time he is very nearly at Goody Jones's; and we shall soon see how he executes his errand.

CHAPTER II.

JOEY was already within sight of his destination, when he began to see signs of a coming storm; not a storm of snow, or hail, or thunder, or rain, but one which has a much more solemnising effect on the mind of an unthinking boy. The street he had just turned into was clear enough when he entered it, for he saw only another boy there besides himself; but this boy, as soon as he caught sight of Joe, darted into a doorway, from whence speedily issued the tall boy I have already introduced to my reader, and who was evidently anxious to reintroduce himself to the notice of Joey. In a very few minutes the tidings of Joe's arrival spread through the street, and out thronged a small army of boys to see the fun, and, if possible, to have a share in it. Joey saw himself hopelessly surrounded, and though he made a gallant dash for it, it was all of no use; he was being hemmed in closer and closer, and at last he felt himself in the firm grip of his old adversary.

Joey now prepared himself for the worst. He remembered the big stone, and had seen the intense pain the tall boy had suffered when struck by it. So when he received, as a sort of preliminary, a good shaking, he felt extremely frightened. "Oh! do, please let me go this time," he pleaded; "mother's sent me about something very particular—and the landlord's waiting—and I'm to go to Good Jones's for change—and I've got a lot of money to take care of—and——" All of which was very true; but as the tall boy had been waiting about for the captive the last two or three days, he didn't see the force of the appeal, so he said—

"Oh, yes, I've no doubt all the world is impatient to have you safe back again; but all the world will have to wait till I have got out of you all I mean to have."

And Joey trembled again. "But please let me off this time, and I'll give you my word I'll——"

"Not a bit of it." Another shake. "And you'll give me your word, will you, my young gentleman? Pretty word, indeed! Hark! you boys," continued the tall boy, turning to a crowd that had gathered close round them, "Master Joseph Meadows, a cheater of little boys, and filcher of marbles, informs me that he will give me his word."

Here all the boys laughed and danced about in triumphant chorus.

"Now, boys, how much should you say his word is worth?"

"Not worth a straw," said one.

"Worth about one hundred thousandth part of a farthing," said another, who had evidently "gone into fractions" at school.

"Not worth a kick," put in a slangy boy.

"Never mind that, though," said the tall boy; "but look you, young shaver; all I've got to say to you is this: in the first place you deserve a thorough licking for pitching that murderous stone at me; what have you to say against it?"

"I'll never do so any more," blubbered Joe, now thoroughly terrified out of his "cheekiness."

"And, in the second place, you ought not only to fork out this boy Tommy's marbles, but give up your own to him too."

"Oh, that aint fair at all!" protested Joe, for a moment forgetting his bodily fears in his alarm for the safety of his property.

"Bless me!" exclaimed the tall boy, derisively, "it seems that our young gentleman has very proper notions of what is right and fair towards himself. Now, as to the licking, I shall pass over that this time——"

"Oh!" exclaimed Joe, considerably relieved.

"But I'm determined not to let you go till you have given back to Tommy Robins here every marble you cheated him out of the other day. Now look sharp, and take them out of those bulging pockets of yours, and I'll let you go."

Joey let drop the sovereign into the pocket where his marbles lay, and, with a very rueful face, proceeded to drag out the heavy bagful of marbles; but as he did so, he noticed that in their anxiety to inspect the contents of this bag the boys had left a small gap on one side, through which he might possibly make an escape. So, making a sudden dart round, he got off clear, with the bag of marbles in his hand; but they were soon after him, and, overpowered by numbers, he was borne to the ground. In vain he writhed, and kicked, and shouted; he was held firmly down, and Tommy's marbles were restored to their rightful owner, who, poor, little, tender-hearted boy, was in tears at being the cause of such a contest and hubbub, and, had he dared, would have been glad to let the cheat keep his ill-gotten treasures, rather than this stir should be made about it; but the tall boy had taken up the matter, and, very properly, declared he would see the little victim righted.

After a farewell shout of triumph, the boys gradually dispersed, and allowed Joe to go the rest of his way. So on he went, grieving bitterly for the loss of the marbles, until he came to Goody Jones's, when, feeling in his pocket for the sovereign, he could not find it. The pocket was quickly cleared; out came the remnant of the marbles, the popgun, the string, and the pocket-knife, but no sovereign. He then turned his pocket inside out, and then he saw how the sovereign had disappeared. There was a hole in the corner just large enough for it to slip through. The weight of the marbles, and the sharp edges of the pocket-knife, had done this between them.

A new and sorer trouble now fell upon Joe. There was nothing for it now, but to go home and tell his mother of the misfortune. He stayed a few minutes, looking carefully over the scene of his late struggle, but could nowhere find it.

The landlord had become very impatient, and the widow was making many apologies, when Joey stole in, his jacket covered with dust from the road, and his face wearing a most forlorn expression.

"Why, what is the matter, Joey, dear?" asked his mother, with some alarm. "Have you got into any trouble?"

Poor Joe burst into tears. He was suffering for it now, for he was really fond of his mother. The hardest thing of all was to tell her he had lost the money, for he knew that she would be sorely grieved, and with reason, as so much had depended on that little piece of gold.

"Pray speak up at once, Joey," pursued the anxious mother. "What has happened? have you got the change?"

"No, mother, I haven't," said Joey, through his sobs. "I have lost the sovereign."

"Lost the sovereign!" echoed his mother. "Oh! my son, my son, what will become of us?"

But that was a question which Joe could not answer. As soon as the first excitement had subsided, he was minutely questioned about the whole circumstance, and then the poor mother learned what a deceitful as well as careless boy her son had become.

"And now, sir, what will you do?" asked Mrs. Meadows, with some anxiety, of the landlord.

"Do?" replied he, rather sternly, but yet sorrowfully, "I scarcely know what to do. I have made it a rule to fix a date, and never to go a day beyond it: I am always punctual in the payment of my debts, and that makes it necessary that others should be punctual with me. I am afraid that for my word's sake, I shall be obliged to send in the brokers; and the only likely thing I see in the place is that bookcase of yours."

"Oh, sir, if you could only spare that," said the widow, with tears in her eyes, "I will let anything else go—the table, the chairs—anything rather than the bookcase."

"Well, well," said the landlord, hurriedly turning away, for he began to be a little moved by the widow's grief, "don't fret about it; I will consider the matter, and let you know to-morrow. Whew! mind yourself, my little man!" suddenly exclaimed he as he stepped out at the door, for at that moment a little boy ran headlong against him, shouting at the top of his voice, "Where's Joey Meadows?"

"What's up now?" asked the landlord, as he turned in again after the little screamer.

"Why," said the little screamer, holding above his head something bright and yellow, "this is up. I found it just now."

The bright, yellow something, as my reader has already guessed, was the missing sovereign; but perhaps he has not found out the finder. It was little Tommy Robins.

So as far as that went, all came right again: but Joey never went to the city office. J.

KEY TO ENIGMA ON PAGE 464.

"Be strong in the Lord."—Eph. vi. 10.

1. B ethshan	2 Sam. xxxi. 12.
2. E drei	Deut. iii. 1.
3. S henir	Deut. iii. 9.
4. T ob	Judg. xi. 3.
5. R amah	1 Kings xv. 21.
6. O phir	1 Kings ix. 28.
7. N aphtali	2 Kings xv. 29.
8. G adi's	2 Kings xv. 14.
9. I smaiah	1 Chron. xii. 4.
10. N abash's	2 Sam. xvii. 27.
11. T ibhath	1 Chron. xviii. 8.
12. H eman	1 Chron. xv. 17.
13. E thanim	1 Kings viii. 2.
14. L ahmi	1 Chron. xx. 5.
15. O bed-edom	1 Chron. xv. 24.
16. R ei	1 Kings i. 8.
17. D elaiah's	Neh. vi. 10.

SCRIPTURE ACROSTIC.

A FALSE APOSTLE.

1. A host and kinsman of St. Paul's.
2. One who was struck dead on the spot.
3. The chief herdsman to a king.
4. A priest who was slain for assisting a king.
5. A king of Egypt who carried away the treasures of the Temple and of the king's house.

THE GUYVER

— Saturday, May 16, 1868. —

MR. E. D. YOUNG, LEADER OF THE LIVINGSTONE SEARCH EXPEDITION.

(From a Photograph, by permission of Messrs. Maull and Co., Piccadilly.)

THE SEARCH FOR DR. LIVINGSTONE.—II.

BY H. W. BATES, ASSISTANT-SECRETARY TO THE ROYAL GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.

MR. YOUNG'S party had a pleasant passage out to the Cape of Good Hope, and received there a warm welcome and much assistance from the authorities. Recruits were also obtained for the expedition, in the shape of two civilised negroes, natives of the region whither it was proceeding, and who were likely to be useful as interpreters on the Shiré and Lake Nyassa. One of the ships of war on the station, the Petrel, Commander Gordon, conveyed the party from the Cape, to the mouth of the Zambesi, and they made a pleasant and quick voyage—a distance of 1,300 miles in nine days and a half.

At the mouth of the Zambesi, the real work of the expedition began. It must be remembered that there is no town, native or civilised, at any of the navigable mouths of the river: the great stream, after flowing through 1,200 miles of varied country, discharges its waters into the Indian Ocean, in the midst of perfect solitude. A low line of land, some forty miles in length, covered with unwholesome mangrove swamps, and abounding in feline animals, antelopes, and baboons, is seen as a vessel approaches from seaward, and the numerous channels which intersect the loose sandy and muddy soil, are never the same for many years together.

The Portuguese town of Quilimane lies now sixty miles to the north of the present mouth. Mr. Young, who knew the entrance to the river well in 1860, was puzzled when the Petrel approached the old spot. The mouth, which was then used, called the "East Luabo," was no longer the same, an impassable sand-bank blocking up its entrance; the vessel had to beat about to find a new passage, which was at length found at the "Kongone" mouth. Here, an island which formerly existed, had been washed away during the last four or five years, and Kongone had become the navigable entrance to the interior waters.

Mr. Reid, with the assistance of the Petrel's crew, had by this time succeeded in putting the sections of the steel boat together; when launched, however, it leaked badly, through the ill-fitting joints; this was remedied after the voyage had begun, by filling the seams with putty, and running the boat full speed on a sand-bank, the sand and putty together thus forming a strong cement, and stopping the leaks.

The Petrel's boats and officers accompanied the party into the mouth of the river; there a number of negroes were fortunately met with on the banks, some of whom knew Young; they volunteered to man the steel boat and two other ship's boats, lent by the commodore at the Cape and Commander Gordon, to carry stores. No time was lost, and on the same evening the expedition departed, amidst the loud hurrahs of the boats' crews of the Petrel.

The Petrel, re-embarking its men, steamed away for the Cape, taking Young's request to the commodore, that a vessel might be sent to the Zambesi, on the 1st of December, to fetch him, on his successful return, which he so confidently looked forward to.

The long and dreary channels of the Zambesi delta, with their muddy banks and monotonous scenery—swampy plains covered with tall, rank grasses, diversified by clumps of trees—being passed, the steel launch and its attendant boats emerged on the broad reaches of the main river, which in some places is five miles broad, but full of shallows. Arrived at Shupanga, the first Portuguese town, they found it deserted. It now appeared that the tribe of Landeem Caffres described in Dr. Livingstone's last book, who had formerly been in the receipt of an annual subsidy from the Portuguese Government to induce them to keep quiet, had a few weeks previously revolted, owing to their pay being stopped, and at one fell swoop had driven the Portuguese settlers from all their establishments on the right bank of the river, killing a large number of soldiers and officers. At Sena, where Mr. Young arrived on the 6th of August, the townspeople had removed to the opposite bank, and were living in temporary huts. Mr. Young delivered there his letters of recommendation, and made an arrangement with the principal men, whereby they agreed to send him a large body of negro carriers to transport his boat past the cataracts of the Shiré, in the event of the expedition failing to obtain the required assistance on the spot.

The courageous little party, with a fresh crew, now made their way for the Shiré and Lake Nyassa. The lower part of the river, with its grassy plains abounding in elephants, was rapidly ascended by paddle and sail, and on the 17th of August they arrived at Chibisa, near which is the settlement of the Makololo, the faithful attendants of Dr. Livingstone, whom he left here, nineteen in number, when he left the country in 1863. These Makololo, in virtue of their superior energy and intelligence, had since acted as chiefs of the surrounding negroes, and at the present time have 2,000 or 3,000 subjects. Mr. Young, in undertaking the expedition, had calculated on the aid of these high-spirited Africans, who had great affection for Dr. Livingstone, and might be expected to be deeply moved on hearing that he was reported to be killed. The reception at the Makololo settlement was the turning-point of the expedition. If the memory of their old master was still cherished, and their will was good, they had the means, not only of furnishing negro carriers to transport the steel boat along the forty miles of rugged country past the cataracts, but of ensuring success by accompanying Mr. Young himself to the great lake.

The boats reached the settlement in the evening. As the negro paddlers, tired with their long day's work, slowly propelled the boats, Mr. Young descried a solitary Makololo warrior on the river-bank, eagerly and dubiously watching the approaching strangers, for they had many enemies in the country around. He was ready to give the alarm of war, should they turn out to be a gang of Portuguese slave-hunters; but his eye at length detecting the Union-jack flying from the mast-head of the steel boat, he jumped up in frantic excitement, and ran along the beach shouting, "Ingleza! Ingleza!" (the English! the English!) Young stood up in the boat, and shouted back the warm greeting, and in a few moments the hill-sides were black with crowds of excited negroes rushing about and proclaiming the news that the English, the friends of the negro, had arrived.

Mr. Young lost no time. On the following day he held a grand palaver with the chiefs, and stated his business. He was not mistaken in believing in the fidelity of the Makololo. They agreed to accompany him, and remain until the truth or falsehood of the story of the murder of their beloved master was ascertained. But there was a great difficulty to be overcome. The whole country east of the Upper Shiré was now invaded by those very Mazite Zulus of whom we have lately heard so much as the murderers of Livingstone. In immense numbers they had swept down, from their old haunts north-west of the lake, midway between Nyassa and the sea; had devastated the whole country west of Lake Shirwa, where Bishop Mackenzie had his mission station, and had now appeared on the eastern bank of the Shiré. Wherever they went they had slaughtered old and young, and plundered the villages and plantations of the agricultural negroes; for the Mazite never plant, nor pursue any regular industry; they subsist by plunder, and their strength and daring are such that the negro tribes, with their weak political organisation, are unable to withstand them. The Makololo, in courage and wariness, were a match for the Mazite; but it was a sore trial of their fidelity to ask them to leave their families and negro subjects in this dangerous position. The difficulty was met by their settling to leave five of their number behind, and Mr. Young supplying these defenders of the settlement with muskets and ammunition.

The foot of the cataracts was reached on the 19th of August. The country here is very rugged, almost mountainous, but well wooded, and the scenery of the river, where for about forty miles its bed is choked with colossal boulders, and a succession of magnificent falls occur, is grand in the extreme. The heat of the weather was overpowering, for the torrid sun of Africa poured down its rays, through a cloudless sky, into these deep-sheltered valleys, and nothing but incessant activity kept Mr. Young and his party in health. The steel boat was taken to pieces by Mr. Reid, and the negro carriers—160 in number—commenced the same day to transport the sections, suspended by strong cords to poles resting on the shoulders, up hill and down dale, over the wild country, along the western bank, towards the Upper Shiré.

The two ship's boats, with surplus stores, were left behind at the settlement.

It occupied four days and a half to reach the navigable waters beyond the falls. The boat was then again put together, and the party re-embarked; it now consisted of five Englishmen, four negroes, and fourteen Makololo. The river Shiré here flows for about sixty miles quite free of obstruction. As they travelled onward, the signs of war and disturbance became more and more alarming. The banks were crowded, in many places, with negro fugitives—chiefs and their people—all flying from the remorseless Zulus.

It was here that the first news of Livingstone was heard. It was to the effect that a white traveller, with an escort of armed negroes, about twelve months previously, had crossed the Shiré at Mapunda, near the lake, and had gone towards the west. Some further particulars were gathered, which left no doubt in Mr. Young's mind that the traveller was Livingstone. Moosa had told the consul at Zanzibar that Livingstone had crossed a narrow part of the lake to Kampunda, or Mapunda; and now, to his surprise, Mr. Young finds the crossing-place at the southern instead of the northern end of the lake. The prospects of the Search Expedition were considerably altered by this news, for it began to appear probable that the long and doubtful journey to the northern end of Nyassa would be unnecessary.

The wild alarm that was spread throughout this region by the Mazite, embarrassed the expedition at every step. A white-headed, venerable negro chief, who had been driven from his lands on the shores of Lake Shirwa, asked Mr. Young "when the Mazite would go back?"

"That I cannot tell you," was the natural reply.

The old chief, who looked upon the white strangers as superior beings, endowed with the gift of prophecy, as well as other great qualities, said—

"I cannot believe you. Have you not brought an iron ship from the sea, and carried her over the mountains? You white men know everything, and can do everything."

The Makololo became every day more restive, and Young was afraid that if proof were obtained of Livingstone's having passed in safety, at Mapunda, which the boat was now rapidly approaching, the Makololo would declare their engagement terminated, and insist on returning to their homes. But it was Young's object to trace Livingstone's actual route, and to obtain evidence of his safety beyond the point where the Johanna men deserted. To do this it was necessary to visit many places on the shores of the lake, and he therefore resolved to pass Mapunda without stopping.

On the 6th of September the steel boat emerged from the tranquil waters of the river into the broad Nyassa, and a grand prospect was opened to the gaze of the brave explorers. To the left extended a range of bold hills terminating in a lofty headland, called formerly by Livingstone Cape Maclear; to the right stretched a line of rocky coast with mountains in the background; before them lay a limitless expanse of water, agitated by a steady breeze blowing from the southward. The sails were spread to the welcome breeze, and the staunch little vessel bounded over the blue waters. The cool exhilarating breeze was welcome, after the sweltering heats of the Shiré valley.

As the day advanced, however, the breeze increased to a gale, although not a cloud obscured the blue, tropical sky. The Makololo, who make but poor sailors, became greatly terrified, and one by one slunk to the bottom of the boat. It was in vain that Young coaxed and threatened; they refused to stir, or help to bale out the water which now and then poured over the side, as the heavy seas were encountered. "If we are to die," they said, "we may as well die now." The violence of the wind and height of the waves kept increasing, and Mr. Young now became anxious. He steered the vessel straight for the land, in the hope of finding some harbour of refuge; but in this part of the eastern coast the shores were rocky and precipitous, and there was no help for it but to run before the gale, at some distance from the shore, to avoid the numerous reefs which lay off it, and on which the surf broke with great fury.

At length a snug little bay was reached. On going ashore, a hut was descried tenanted by a solitary negro. Fortunately, the negro was able to give very definite information about Livingstone. He described to Mr. Young his appearance, the number of his party, his instruments, and especially those with which he took observations for latitude and longitude, saying that "he had a little box containing white water, which would not wet the fingers when touched," meaning the mercury of the artificial horizon. Livingstone, it appears, had struck the eastern shore of the lake at this very spot, in marching south-west from the confluence of the Rovuma. The negro said Livingstone wanted to cross the lake to the western side, and had proceeded northward to the Arab slave-trading settlement, in order to obtain a passage in their dhow.

Re-embarking, Mr. Young sailed along the coast in search of the Arab trading-post, and found it the next day, pleasantly situated on the shores of a beautiful bay. The Arab in charge was civil and communicative. He confirmed fully the information given by the negro, and said that Livingstone had waited there several days in vain for the return of the dhow, which was detained on the opposite side, and that then he had left for the southward, intending to cross at Mapunda. Several small articles, including a Prayer-book, were given to Mr. Young, as having formerly belonged to Livingstone. The Arab settlement is about sixty miles from the southern end of the lake.

It was now necessary to send people into the interior, by land, in order to ascertain the exact route which Livingstone had taken, and also to learn whether the Johanna had retreated along the same line of march. The Makololo, fearless enough when on land, volunteered to go. The result, after a few days' delay, was thoroughly satisfactory; not only was Livingstone's route accurately fixed, but it was ascertained, beyond a doubt, that the Johanna men had passed that way, after deserting their master.

The search party, with their indomitable leader, now sailed across the lake, here fifty miles broad, for the purpose of reaching, as near as possible, the spot where the treacherous carriers deserted, and reported Livingstone as being killed. Mr. Young first visited a negro village, called Levave. He here found several men who stated they had assisted to carry Livingstone's baggage from one village to another. On careful inquiry, it was found that the places to which these men had accompanied our great traveller lay many days' march beyond the point where the Johanna men had deserted. Moreover, nobody here had heard of the Mazite having been in this part of the country at all. Coasting down the western shore, other villages were visited; similar accounts of Livingstone were received at all of them. At length the boat reached Marenga, a place which Moosa had described to the consul as the last of any note visited before the massacre occurred.

The chief of Marenga received Mr. Young with open arms, and entertained him with great hospitality. He had known Livingstone in 1861, and was, therefore, able to give very reliable information. He said our traveller had spent several days with him, about twelve months previously, and had then proceeded to the north-west; that the Johanna men had returned, without their loads, a few days afterwards, saying they were returning because their engagement with Livingstone had expired. When Young explained to him that our traveller had been reported as killed by the Mazite, within about twenty miles of Marenga, the old chief laughed outright, being greatly tickled at the absurdity of the report. He assured Young that had anything happened to Livingstone even a month's journey from Marenga, he would be sure to have heard of it. This statement is considered by those who know this part of Africa to be strictly true, for Marenga is a chief belonging to the great Babisa tribe, who are the traders and travellers of Central Eastern Africa. The unanimity of all the negroes who were questioned is considered conclusive in favour of Livingstone's safety, at any rate, in this part of his journey; for had anything sinister happened to him, rival tribes would have been eager to have informed Mr. Young's well-armed party of the guilt of their neighbours, in order that they might revenge themselves cheaply.

From Marenga the boat proceeded to Mapunda, and thus quitted the beautiful but stormy Nyassa. Full confirmation of the previous accounts were received at this village, and especially as far as concerned the Johanna men, who had passed through the place on their retreat to the coast, saying they had left Livingstone, but mentioning nothing about his having been killed.

The descent of the Shiré was accomplished with ease and pleasure. The Makololo found that their settlement had not been visited by the Mazite; in fact, the Mazite had retreated from the banks of the Shiré since the boat party had passed. Mr. Young and his companions frequently landed, and enjoyed much sport in elephant and hippopotamus shooting—a relaxation they had earned a right to by their bold and successful labours in the search now completed. They reached the mouth of the Zambesi, in good health, on the 11th of November, nineteen days earlier than the leader had calculated upon. On the 1st of December a ship of war, sent by the commodore of the station, arrived, and, recognising the signal hoisted by Mr. Young, sent a boat ashore, and embarked the party—boats and all—for the Cape and England.

Where Livingstone is now, and at what part of the African coast he will emerge from the interior of this mysterious continent, are matters of conjecture. It is sufficient, for the present, to have proved that he was not killed in the country where the Johanna men left him, and no other sinister report has reached us concerning him. On the contrary, news has been received of a white traveller having been seen on the western shores of Tanganyika, and of his having given letters to a native trader for the consul at Zanzibar, which letters have not yet come to hand. We have good reason for hoping that this as yet unknown traveller may be our noble Livingstone, and that he may live to reach England, and enchant us with the story of his most wonderful journey.

RELIGION IN THE HOME.

BY THE REV. W. B. MACKENZIE, M.A., INCUMBENT OF ST. JAMES'S, HOLLOWAY.

THE HAPPINESS OF HOME.

NOTWITHSTANDING our many faults, probably there is not a country in the world where the aggregate of social happiness is to be compared with ours: and all this grows out of the virtues of home life. A family is a nation in miniature. A nation is a large family; its social condition depends upon the homes that compose it. Imagine a neighbourhood where home virtues reign in every house, both the parents persons of eminent piety and goodness, and the "children honour their father and their mother," and servants "show all good fidelity," what an air of blessedness would distinguish that place! If the fathers were like Abraham, fearing God themselves, and commanding their children and households after them; and the mothers had Sarah's eminent graces without even her venial frailties; if the sons were young men of exemplary virtue, like Joseph, or Samuel, or Daniel, or Timothy; and the daughters as the sisters at Bethany whom Jesus loved, it is impossible to estimate the degree of pure and exalted happiness which such a community would attain. And why may not we? Home happiness is not one of those accidental privileges which fall into the lap we know not how. It is a thing that can be explained, and sought, and cultivated; it springs from seeds that must be planted, and watched over; it is susceptible of injuries which can be guarded against; it is liable to evils, which, like hot and poisonous blasts, wither all home happiness to the root. It is immensely important to know what elements are essential to home happiness, and what things tend to cherish, injure, and destroy it.

A family circle, when entire, is a little community, divine in its constitution and hedged about with sacredness, consisting of father, mother, children, and to some family circles, servants are introduced to share its duties and promote its interests and comforts. It is important to remember that the happiness of this circle is not dependent upon its external condition. A poor family may be just as happy as one that has riches at command. It has nothing to do with rank, or wealth, or luxury, or fame. People who possess these things may enjoy the happiness of home, but it is not these appendages that make home happy. Some rejoice to lay down the burden of official greatness, and retire with thankful satisfaction to the peacefulness of home; others are so bewildered by the glitter of the great world as to find the scenes and duties of home life dull and insipid. Be this as it may, these outward things are but the stamp on the gold, they are not the gold itself. A man's genuine value depends on what he is in himself, not what he seems to be before the world; he is not simply himself there; let me see him, not as clad in the robes of office, nor absorbed in the tumult of business; not as he appears in the brilliant circles of wealth, nor even in the assemblies of worship; but as he is at home by his own fireside—the husband, the father, mingling in the bosom of his own household; there it is you see the genuine character.

Home happiness, then, has to do with personal character. Each member of the household either augments, or diminishes it. The happiness of the whole is the aggregate of the individual happiness. One jarring string spoils the harmony. It grows out of the personal qualities of each. It is not the result of circumstances or social condition, but the manifestation of personal goodness. A home may become a very altered one. Time and years may make sad havoc; and sickness may spread its gloom over the home. Reverses may abridge its comforts, and sorrows still greater may invade their dwelling; but if its members all abide true and genuine and faithful, they may lose other things, but their united happiness survives. Home wears a soberer aspect, but it breathes the same spirit. Their cup of domestic happiness is as full, though it has some ingredients they never tasted before. They have less to love, but they love as truly,—less to give them joy, but more to inspire hope,—less that the world covets, but more that God values, approves, and blesses.

Happiness cannot be real and abiding in any home where there is no religion. The foundation must be laid in the personal faith and faithfulness of the father and mother. They must lead the way. We look with the gravest suspicion upon the future condition of a home where the religious element is wanting. But it must be genuine. There are homes professing godliness where there is not much happiness; and some are said to be happy homes where little or no regard is paid to religious duties. But we are not speaking of the condition of those homes where religion is just something added on, but where it is the life and ruling principle. A family that has only the form of godliness, will only have the show and semblance of happiness. Such persons reap just what they sowed. Nay, a man may be really religious; his sentiments, his experience, and his personal conduct may be those of a religious man, and yet, somehow, he may fail in the religious administration of his household. It may be owing, perhaps, to some defect in discipline, or teaching, or parental influence. Somehow or another, the seeds of irreligious disorder have been sown, and to his intense concern he sees the tares of domestic unhappiness rankly springing up even in his own household. On the other hand, a man of the world who has no religion may be gifted with such wisdom for the administration of a household—may have such just views of the world, and how to live in it—may rule his children with such discretion as to win their permanent esteem, and his house may become an example of united affection,—parents and children rejoicing in each other's comfort. But, after all, it is a house built upon the sand. It may stand securely in the bright seasons of health and prosperity; but the winds will blow, and the rains descend, and the floods beat vehemently against it; dark days will come when sorrows, temptations, and evils in ten thousand forms will try them to the uttermost,—when changes will break up their home, and those young people who have no faith, and no refuge to flee to, must brave life's ocean for themselves, not knowing how to steer or where to seek for real comfort; and can you wonder if their home happiness fails?

Nothing can ever secure a man's permanent happiness in this life but that which prepares him for the next. If we are to stand firm against the aggressive temptations which come more and more thickly as life goes on; if we are to have true rest and peace of mind, and the consciousness that sin is forgiven, and God is our Father in heaven; if we are to have a comfort that floods of sorrow cannot quench, and a hope that brightens into glory when death gathers gloomily around, then, for all this we must have the foundation laid where the Bible lays it, in that repentance towards God, and that faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, which ensures our true welfare here in this world, and makes us joint heirs with Christ in the life to come.

But something else is wanted. The happiness of home is a tender plant, which cannot be reared at all except with much anxious culture. May I whisper a word of counsel to the chief ruling powers of the household, that its growth and prosperity depends, in the first place, upon the mutual happiness of parents themselves? When God formed the Jewish nation he embodied all moral duties in two great and comprehensive laws—laws of love—love to God and love to man. When God united the first pair in marriage in Paradise, he comprehended all their duties likewise in two great laws, both again fulfilled in love; the one was to rule in love, the other to obey in love; love binding each to the other, only under different aspects, and so needful that any infringement of either damages the happiness of both. The love of the one is maintained by the love of the other. The one rules, but he rules by love; the other obeys, but she loves to obey. The one bears the heavier burden of life; the other multiplies its comforts. The one loves to spend her every day among home duties, and even home cares; the other loves to aid her duties with his counsels and sympathise with her anxieties. Both consult together, and labour and pray together too; what concerns the one is an equal care to the other; both travel on together amid the same joys and sorrows, the same interests and hopes, —companions in the same eventful journey, and heirs together of the grace of life.

Parents are the main contributors to the sum of domestic happiness, but children have their part to contribute as well. And if the mutual duties of parents are comprehended in that one great-law of love, the duties of children spring out of the great law of filial obedience. We are all ready to admit in theory that children are to obey their parents in all things; and yet young persons indulge their doubts whether this rule applies practically to themselves. Every day's experience attests the supreme wisdom of this law, and the rich blessings it brings to them who fulfil it. A family is placed under parental government, and wisely so placed. When children come into the world they have everything to learn, and to learn amid deceptions, evils, enemies of all kinds. Their parents have had already many years' experience and observation, seen many failures, and learnt many important lessons. They might explain to their children the results of their experience, and much they are ready to explain; but their details would be little understood, and leave obscure and faint impressions. But there is one thing they can do: they can tell their children in plain, direct terms what to do, and what to shun. They know the perils of life better than you do. They know the rocks that lie, sunk and rugged, beneath the smooth water, and the strong currents of evil against which they had to steer hard; they cannot always tell you why, or detail the process by which the danger comes; but this they can do, they can bid you turn the helm and put about the ship when they see you drifting in those perilous waters. It is very likely that you may not see the danger as they see it; but even if you do not, you will not regret having done as they bid you. Immediate, implicit, unquestioning obedience is just the wisest, as it is the hardest, of all the lessons that can be learnt in early life.

The Scriptures place filial obedience among the strongest safeguards and the most solid blessings of life. A few years ago a large tract in a northern county was desolated amid immense destruction of life and property by the embankment of a reservoir suddenly giving way. It was discovered that there was some slight defect near the foundation by which the water was oozing out, and widened the opening until the earthwork gave way in that terrible inundation. Filial disobedience is just such a beginning. It may commence in little things, and may never amount to any grave infractions; but, when this mischief comes into a family, materials are already there on which graver temptations will operate by-and-by. A successful attack has been made on the sacredness of home government,—a breach is made in the wall, and things will not remain as they are. Surrounded as young people are by the wicked and designing, no one can tell what may one day ensue when the stronghold of filial obedience has already given way. Parents are the protectors and guides which God has wisely appointed to guard the inexperience of early years. Many find out, but, to their lasting regret, when it is too late, the evils of casting off parental rule; whereas I never knew an instance in which young persons sustained any lasting injury by following too confidently the counsels and will of their parents.

There are other matters which tend to the happiness of home; they may seem of minor importance, but can never be disregarded without diminishing, in some serious degree, the comfort of the home circle. In fact, there is no place in which the power of little things is more felt and appreciated than at home; and the happiness of one's every-day life is made up mainly of little things. What interests a mere observer in watching a piece of complicated machinery is the ease and gentle gliding with which each movement is performed. But that perfect ease is the result of wise construction kept in order by continual attention and care. Home is a delicately constructed organisation. It is most important that every member of a household should bestow assiduous personal attention upon its welfare and comfort. It is easy to disturb the harmonious order of home. A little inadvertence may do it,—the indulgence of self-will at the cost of others' comfort,—the neglect of known rules,—the disregard of times, and hours, and home regulations,—the want of due care as to words, or looks, or tempers, slightly wrong at first, but which gain strength in time; these are the little evils which cast a shade over the bright aspect of home happiness,—rub off the bloom and beauty of our every-day enjoyment, which once disturbed is with difficulty recovered. And it is by the assiduous cultivation of these lesser virtues that home is made the scene of a felicity which is the emblem of a heavenly home, and preparation for its everlasting possession.

It has been ascertained that a large proportion of convicts are people who either had no homes or were unhappy there. A young man who makes such an entrance into the world begins life under unspeakable disadvantages. He has no past recollection to appeal to as the source of comfort under trouble, or defence against evil. No image of a loving father rises up to admonish him against dallying with temptation; no mother's smile recurs to his mind as he kneeled at her feet in prayer; no gentle sister ministered to his comfort; no meeting together morning and evening around the throne of grace to supplicate God's help or pardon for the day. Oh! that these papers may enrich young persons with such counsels as may protect them against the perils of coming years.

When I think of Abraham, and his household blessed in him; the blessing that Jacob brought on the home of Laban, and Joseph on the house of Potiphar; of Zacharias and Elisabeth; of the mothers of Pascal and Augustine, of Cowper and Baxter, and some of the best and most exemplary characters in our day, in Church and State, we have proof enough that the truth of the proverb holds good still—"He blesseth the habitation of the just." And if there be one place where home happiness is more important than another, it is in our great cities. Worn and wearied with the toils of business and tumult of the world, who can estimate the blessedness with which a Christian parent enters again upon the calm repose of home! But let us ever remember that if our home happiness is to be permanent and abiding, He whose presence alone secures true blessedness must dwell among us. Open your hearts and houses to Him that He may make his abode with you. And if He be there, He will alleviate your burdens; solace you in sorrow, and help in every trial; that, while you see in the unhappiness around that his "curse is upon the wicked," still do you find, to your ever-increasing thankfulness, that "He blesseth the habitation of the just."

THE CHILD'S EVENING PRAYER.

CHILDCOOD'S silvery notes arise,
Seeking through the evening air
Upward passage to the skies—
Hush! it is the evening prayer.
Softly through the clashing noise
Of a world of sin and care,
Penetrates the whispering voice
Of the infant's evening prayer.
Many an angel, flitting by,
Pauseth, as there meets his ear—
So unlike the sounds of earth—
The child of heaven's evening prayer,
And the legions of the prince
Of the power of the air,
Back recoiling, glare and wince,
Dare not stop the evening prayer.
Scathless passing every foe,
From all hindrances secure,

Clear, though lispingly and low,
Rings it through the ether pure,
Till it reaches highest heaven,
And the great Redeemer there—
All its earthliness forgiven—
Take the precious evening prayer.
For his holy name refines it,
Makes it sinless all and fair;
With his own petition joins it,
Pleads this childish evening prayer.
Sleeping till the night is over
On the Everlasting Arm,
Nought of evil hath the power
Jesus' little child to harm.
Eve by eve, as prayer ascendeth,
Morn by morn is heaven more near:
Till the little pilgrim blendeth
Praise in heaven with his prayer.

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XIV.

IN THE MILL.

HE room was not a large one. It was a three-cornered shape, and the fireplace was in the corner. On one side of the fireplace was the desk, at which Harold was seated. There was not much furniture in the room—just a chair or two, and an old-fashioned table with leaves that let up and down; and a hearthrug, very much worn, that lay before the fire, and did duty as a carpet.

Harold was writing by the light of a solitary gas-burner overhead. He was in haste to finish his letters, that he might get back to Charley. He had thought of something to take home, as a treat for the sick boy. Charley was very fond of oysters, and he should have some for supper. Harold would buy a score or two, and they would have a feast, he and his brother.

He had finished at last, and was putting the stamps on his letters, when he heard a queer, muffled sound, as though some one were advancing stealthily along the passage. The sound puzzled Harold; he thought no one was in the mill but himself. Indeed, he felt sure of this, as the keys were in his pocket. Could it be the wind, or the little waterfall that prattled

(Drawn by GEORGE H. THOMAS,)

W. THOMAS, Sc.

"Many an angel, flitting by,
Pauseth, as there meets his ear—
So unlike the sounds of earth—
The child of heaven's evening prayer."—p. 552.

yonder in the field near the mill? No! he heard the waterfall distinctly, and he heard the other noise as well.

It came creeping on, nearer and nearer. Now, it had reached the door. Harold was constitutionally brave—no one more so: but there are moments in the history of the bravest of us—when we scent danger—and it strikes a kind of chill into us. We are approaching we know not what. And so it was with Harold. His heart gave a curious flutter, as the sound stopped close behind the door.

Then the door began stealthily to be opened. The proceeding was stealthy altogether. There was something mysterious about it, and which gave to it its dangerous aspect. The door was pushed open, and there peered in the ill-omened face of Richard Fanan.

Harold had the letters in his hand. In the momentary surprise he dropped them; but he gathered them up again, still looking towards the door.

Other faces besides Richard's now came into view. Harold's quick eye ran over them in a second. He counted six—six desperate men; and he but one!

He knew that this visit boded no good. How came they there but by craft and subtlety? What was their errand? Ah! he could not answer that question. All he knew was, that he was a solitary man in that lonely place, and they were not friends, but foes.

When he saw them, and measured the extent of his peril, and had fairly solved the mystery, he became cool and collected. He stood facing them, his arms folded, his eye carefully noting every movement. When they had entered, all of them, and stood in a menacing attitude before him, he said, quite in his natural tone, without the slightest tremor, "Well, Richard Fanan, what did you want with me?"

His calm, intrepid manner, the absence of all fear or agitation, took Richard by surprise. He had not calculated on the power of resistance which met him.

"I wanted a word or two with you, Mr. Blake," he replied, after an awkward pause.

"As many as you like, provided you will not detain me long," said Harold, calmly.

"Mr. Blake," began Richard, "you must see, sir, that we are one too many for you. I'd advise you to listen to me, or it may happen to be the worse for you."

"I am listening," said Harold, quietly.

"Then, sir, I've this to say: in the first place, we don't mean to be trifled with. Them as have took the law in their own hands, are apt to be dangerous, Mr. Blake."

Harold inclined his head by way of assent.

"So that it will be best for you to comply with our wishes at once," said Richard, with a menacing glance.

"Perhaps you will inform me what those wishes are," replied Harold.

"I will, sir. You will please pay us the wages that Mr. Mapleson stopped, because we wasn't at the mill from Monday till Wednesday. You'll do that first, if you please."

"What, now?"

"Yes, now. You've got the cash-box somewhere or other; Mr. Mapleson always kept it here."

"He kept a cash-box here certainly," replied Harold, as self-possessed as if he had been asked to light a cigar; "but it's locked."

"You have the key, sir."

"No, I haven't; Mr. Mapleson has the key."

"We'll break it open then!" cried Richard, getting enraged, and his face dark with passion.

"You had better try," said Harold, coolly.

The box in question was kept in an iron safe, and Harold pointed to it. The men might as well have tried to pull down the heavens.

"Now, Mr. Blake," said Richard, who as usual was the spokesman, "you've baffled us once, and we'll take care you don't do it again. If we can't get the money, we'll get the other thing. You and the master play into each other's hands, sir. What one says, the other sticks by. We are starving men. No one will employ us. We are hunted from place to place. Now, I demand that Mr. Mapleson takes us on again, and gives us work!"

Harold was silent.

"Do you hear, Mr. Blake?" said Richard, in a threatening tone: "we demand that he takes us on again, and gives us work."

"He's afraid," said one of the men who stood close to Richard's elbow.

"No, I am not afraid," said Harold, firmly; "I was only astonished at your proposal—too much astonished, for the moment, to speak."

"Then you'll take us on," said Richard, quickly.

"My good man, I am not the master. How can I take you on?"

"You can bring it before the master, and force him to do it."

"I can bring it before the master," said Harold, in a tone of deliberation; "and it is not unlikely that I may; but as to forcing him to take you back again, that is another matter."

"Do you refuse?" threatened Richard.

And the men advanced a step nearer, so as to hem Harold in. He did not stir. He stood, his arms folded, his eye still, taking in every movement.

"I do refuse," he replied, in a voice as firm and clear as ever.

"Refuse?" echoed Richard.

"Yes; I do refuse," repeated Harold.

"Do you know what will happen to you, Mr. Blake, being in our power, and we six men, and you only one?"

"That I do not know, Richard; I only know, whatever the alternative was, I should act the same."

"May I ask your reason, sir?"

"Because I am in my employer's interest, and nothing would be more disastrous than for him to take back such men as you are."

Richard glared at him fiercely. It was a moment of real danger, and Harold knew it. In the few seconds of an awful silence that preceded the danger, Harold listened. But there was no sound, save the rippling of the waterfall in the field below. Not a single sound. No one was at hand to succour. All help lay far away!

He knew Richard had a weapon concealed in his bosom. He knew that he himself had none. Well, if it came to that, he would sell his life dearly! If it came to brute force, he must put out all the strength God had given him.

As for succumbing to these men, even for a moment, it never occurred to him.

Something glittered before his eyes; but he was on his guard. The arm that held it was struck up with a vigorous blow. A man lay stunned and senseless on the ground, and the weapon was Harold's. It was the work of a moment, and then he faced the other men, his eyes sparkling with excitement.

The man who had fallen was Richard Fanan.

"Now," said Harold, firmly, and addressing the rest of the men, "it strikes me, my friends, that you have been deluded by the fellow yonder, and that he has led you into a great deal of mischief. You see, this thing I hold in my hand is an ugly kind of weapon. It is a revolver, and I could shoot any of you down in a minute. But I would rather reason with you, and get you out of the trouble that Richard has brought upon you. Will you listen to me a couple of seconds?"

The men had been fairly taken aback by Harold's intrepidity. Like all such men, they were cowards at heart, and they began to see very clearly that the game was going against them. Indeed, to escape was getting the uppermost idea in their minds.

"Now," said Harold, "you men are liable to be clapped into prison for this night's work, and will be, unless you follow my advice. Go quietly home, every one of you, and instead of taking the law into your own hands again, just try to be sober and industrious. You have tried idleness and drink, now see what good honest work will do for you."

The men stared at him a few minutes, as if scarcely understanding what he said; then they stole away, one by one, the way they had come, and Harold saw them no more. As for Richard Fanan, he was given into custody, in the course of the next half hour, and carried off to goal.

CHAPTER XV.

JOHN'S THREAT.

LADIES who are desirous of making an INCOME, by Genteel Employment, at their own houses, are requested to apply to the Repository, No. 6, Gower Street Newbury. Liberal Prices, and Constant Employment guaranteed.

This advertisement was in the local paper, issued every week in Newbury.

Alice Sylvester's eye had been riveted upon it with intense interest. She had been reading the paper, from end to end, in an abstracted manner, scarcely caring what the news was about; but when she came to the advertisement she stopped. She read it over and over again, to herself, of course. Her mother was in the room, so was Raymond; but she would never have thought of reading it to them. Alice had an inner world of hopes, fears, and desires, into which they had never entered, and which they never dreamed of.

Employment—work—labour. The words sounded sweet in the ears of Alice—Sylvester though she was. Why should she not work? Why should she not, in the fulness of her youth, and health, and vigour, do something to repair the evils that had come upon them? She knew their debts were shameful! She had seen, only the other day, as she passed the head of the staircase, a wan, half-starved woman in the hall. She knew the woman was a sempstress, and she heard her say, that the grand ladies had brought her to ruin; that she had worked night and day for them, and they did not pay her. The agony of that moment was vivid in Alice's memory. In vain she had wept and prayed, in deep humiliation before God, for these the sins of her house. In vain, and reckless of the consequences, she had taken a bracelet from her arm, and, unperceived by any one, slipped it into the woman's hand. In vain, as far as her own suffering went, the sight of that woman's face she would never, never forget. Why should she not work?

"There," said Raymond, rising from the desk where he had been writing, and sweeping away Alice's train of thought as though it had been a cobweb—"there, so much for Mrs. Brooklyn, of Brooklyn Hall!"

"Have you written to her?" asked his mother.

"Yes, and said we will go."

"Raymond, how very distressing of you!" cried Alice, in a tone of annoyance; "I would so much rather have declined."

"But you are a minor, Alice, and must do what your lawful and natural guardians bid you," replied Raymond, playfully, and fastening down the envelope.

"Oh, mother! pray do not let us go," exclaimed Alice. "Considering the circumstances we are placed in——"

"It is imperative we should show ourselves in public," said Raymond, quickly.

"And considering that dear papa has only been——"

"My mother is not going," again interrupted Raymond, quickly; "only yourself and myself, Alice."

"That is bad enough, Raymond! In fact, nothing can be worse than Mrs. Brooklyn's grand gatherings, as she calls them. What with her lords, and ladies, and earls, and marquises, it is positively overwhelming."

"Mrs. Brooklyn moves in the best society," said Lady Sylvester, gravely.

"Which Alice abhors, and always did," added Raymond.

"I think we have no business with any society at all," replied Alice; "we ought rather to hide ourselves in obscurity." The remembrance of the wretched-looking sempstress, in the hall, gave a bitterness to her voice as she said it.

"You are quite wrong, Alice, and the most recreant kind of Sylvester that ever lived," cried Raymond, half playfully, half reproachfully. "If the world once suspects us, we are undone. Our policy is to keep it blindfold."

"But it does suspect us, it is not blindfold," returned Alice, again thinking of the woman who had worked night and day. "People are reminded daily of us, and how we have lived, and what we have done. Our very name will be a bye-word!"

"How are they reminded of us, Alice?" asked her mother.

"By what we owe them, mother," replied Alice, bitterly. And then, as her feelings were getting the mastery, she rose and quitted the room.

There was a silence when she was gone. Raymond came and stood by the fire, and looked thoughtfully and sorrowfully into it. The cloud never cleared away from this domestic circle: it hung suspended, night and day.

"Raymond," said Lady Sylvester, at length, "I did not mention it before Alice, poor girl, but a new disaster has happened to us. This letter came for you while you were out, and, as I guessed at its contents, I read it. John Humphreys threatens to put an execution in the house."

"The impudent rascal!" exclaimed Raymond, white and trembling.

"He does, to recover a sum of money lent by old Humphreys to my late dear husband; and if the payment is not made forthwith, we may expect the consequences."

"But he must be stopped! He shall not! he dare not!" cried Raymond, passionately.

Lady Sylvester sat erect in her chair. Her attitude was that of one who bids defiance to the world.

"I must see our solicitor, and at once. He must quash the proceeding—quash it altogether!" continued Raymond, vehemently.

"But how, Raymond, unless we pay this man? Is there anything for us to lay hands on, and get rid of him, once and for ever?"

"There is nothing but what we absolutely need to live upon, from day to day," replied Raymond, "and every inch of ground is mortgaged to its full value. What with interest, and compound interest, dear mother, the vessel is near to foundering!" added he with a melancholy smile.

"I see, Raymond, I see!" said his mother, sadly.

"I have done what I could," added Raymond, in a tone of despair; "I have sacrificed all; I have stuck by the old fabric till the last, and now—now this fellow will shiver it to ruins!"

"But you must do something, Raymond! You had better see Mr. Carlton at once; to-night if you could."

"He is gone to London, mother; I saw him starting off this afternoon. We can do nothing till to-morrow."

"Will he be home to-morrow?"

"Yes, and I will go to him. Not that it is of the least use. He can no more stop the leak than we can."

"But he might suggest something, Raymond.

Think, my son!—think of the alternative, an execution in the house! Why, it would be death to us!" And she rose up, and began to walk hurriedly about.

"Mother, dear mother!"—he went to her, and put his arm round her—"be composed, mother. If you fail, all fails."

"I shall not fail," and she turned her proud handsome face towards him. "I will stand my ground, while there is an inch for me stand upon!"

"That is right, mother, and so will I."

And the family retired to rest as usual, though in two instances, at least, the pillow was thickly strewn with thorns.

CHAPTER XVI.

JOSEPHINE ON THE WORLD.

RACHEL, though the most active little body in Newbury, found at this time quite enough to do. She had taken the rooms for Miss Graham, and very pretty rooms they were. Rachel had always an eye to cheerfulness and comfort. She liked the sunny side of things, and the house she had chosen, as Miss Graham's new home, was on the sunny side of the street. It was a street that ran quite out of Newbury into the country, and green fields could be seen in the distance, and walks had in the fresh country air in which Rachel herself so much delighted; for Rachel had been born and brought up in the country, and it was only one of the chances and reverses of life that had cast her into the midst of Newbury.

When the rooms were taken, Rachel's next business was to make them as pleasant as she could. All Josephine's possessions were conveyed there as speedily as possible, and with these materials Rachel effected quite a metamorphosis.

The pictures, some of them from Josephine's own pencil and brush, were hung round the room, to the banishment of certain family portraits which had stared at you, in vulgar complacency, from either side the fireplace. The mantelpiece was cleared of shepherds and shepherdesses in white china, and made to look quite another thing, with the few ornaments in more correct taste that were furnished from Josephine's store.

The little sofa was surprised into looking pretty, and even handsome, by the worked cushions and the anti-macassars that were placed upon it, and that abundantly concealed its defects. Then, when Josephine's chair stood by the fire, and a few books and other matters were dispersed about the room, the effect was so satisfactory, that Rachel stood a minute to contemplate it, her face beaming with delight. Then, having put a fresh supply of coals on the fire, to make it look cheerful at the right moment, and being quite sure nothing remained to be done, she put on her bonnet, and started off to fetch Josephine.

Josephine had all her clothes packed up, and the boxes stood corded in the hall. She herself was ready dressed, and sat waiting in the room up-stairs till Rachel should come for her.

She was still very weak and ill. Her face looked more wan and pallid than ever in her mourning bonnet, with the crape veil thrown back; and it was a critical moment, perhaps the most so, of any that had yet befallen her.

She was going from the home that had sheltered her so long, to a vexed, uncertain future. The ground had been rent from under her. She knew not whither these stormy waves would not toss her. Hers was a frail barque to be out on such a treacherous sea!

She was anxious to be gone. It was sad to sit here alone, amid this wreck and tribulation. The house was all in confusion. It was being put in order for the new arrival, and no one thought of Josephine.

Presently, the brisk step of Rachel was heard on the stairs—Rachel, the one true friend this deserted woman had in the world.

"And now, Miss Graham, all is ready, and the cab is at the door," said Rachel, cheerfully; "and here is the sun come out to shine upon you. Why, you must not give up!" for Josephine, almost for the first time, was weeping bitterly.

"Come, you will be better when you get away from here," said Rachel, her eyes brimming over; "and they are such pleasant rooms! Come, dear Miss Graham!"

Josephine rose, trembling, and her knees tottering. She was very feeble, and this trying moment was almost more than she could bear.

She had to lean on Rachel; and the two women went for the last time down the antique staircase.

The cab was standing at the door, and Josephine's packages had all been put in. Rachel assisted her to enter, and then was about to get outside, but Josephine stopped her.

"You must come with me, Rachel," whispered she, holding her tightly by the hand.

Rachel got in, and sat by her side. Josephine kept hold of her hand. At this time of utter need and wretchedness, there was no one on earth but Rachel to cling to! Neither of the women spoke. Josephine was still weeping, and Rachel held her peace: even she scarce knew what to say.

At length the cab stopped, and Rachel sprang out, as brisk as ever.

"Here we are, Miss Graham! I shall just take you in, and then I will see to the boxes. Never do you trouble about anything." And she hurried her into the little parlour. "Just sit down and rest, and I'll be back in a moment."

Back Rachel hurried; and in less time than could be believed the cab was rattling down the street again.

Rachel had not much more time to spare. The school opened at two, and she had not yet given up her duties; but she made the most of the half hour left to her. She had the boxes carried up-stairs, and then went back to Josephine.

Josephine was better now. She had put aside her bonnet, and the wrappers with which Rachel had muffled her up, to keep her from the cold; and she had taken a survey of all that Rachel had done for her.

When Rachel entered, Josephine spoke cheerfully, and like herself.

"How good you have been, Rachel! and what a nice home you have chosen for me!"

"I am so glad you like it," replied Rachel, in a tone of delight; "it is the pleasantest situation in all Newbury, to my way of thinking. Why, you will feel quite in the country here!"

This was the ultimatum of Rachel's ideas of bliss.

"And, dear Miss Graham," said Rachel, blushing a little, "if you look out of your bedroom window, you will see a red house in the distance. It is not more than two or three fields off; and that is where I am going to live."

"I am sure, Rachel, you deserve to be very happy."

"Happy!—oh, yes, I am sure to be happy;" and then she checked herself: she did not think it kind to parade her own happiness before Josephine.

While she had been speaking, she had wrapped up Josephine's shawl, and put the mufflers on one side. Then she said, "I am afraid I must run away. But you will be very comfortable, I am sure. Mrs. Green is the name of the woman of the house, and she will come and see what you want. Good-bye, dear Miss Graham."

"Are you obliged to go, Rachel?" asked Josephine, a sudden sense of dreariness coming over her.

"Yes, because of the school. But I shall look in again when the children are gone. This is the last month of the school," added Rachel, again blushing a little.

"Are you to be married so soon as that, Rachel?"

"John says so," replied Rachel, looking down: for John had been driving matters on at a fine rate!

When Rachel was gone, Josephine drew her chair to the fire, and sat down. She would have steadily to face her destiny, and to take counsel of herself what she would have to do. The temporary seclusion, occasioned by her illness, had passed; she had left her refuge behind her; there was no returning to it—no looking forward to that dearer home she had been led to expect would be hers. She was like a shipwrecked mariner, who had escaped only with his life!

Well, God had spared her life. She had been raised from the bed of sickness, and she must take up the thread, vexed and tangled as it was! She must go forward. What was she to do? She had a little money left of the allowance made her by her aunt. That allowance had stopped altogether, now; and when her purse was empty, how was it to be filled? That was a serious question to be answered.

"I must maintain myself—it is no disgrace," thought Josephine. "I must put my shoulder to the wheel, and work."

But how? Ah, there was the matter! She took up a paper that lay upon the table, and her eye ran over its contents, as if searching for something. Very soon it stopped—she had found what she wanted. It was the advertisement which had looked so tempting to the eyes of Alice Sylvester.

Josephine was no Sylvester; there were no barriers to fence her in; no grim ancestors to glare at her from their ancient frames. She need not sit in disgraceful ease, till the foundations broke up beneath her. No! Josephine might work, and receive the reward of labour; for in all labour there is profit.

What should she do? She understood the terms of the advertisement better than Alice did. She would work, and gladly. But for the immediate necessity of the case? Had she any little elegances, wrought by her own hands in happier times, and intended for a far different purpose, that she might sell?

"You must not be morbid, Josephine," said she to herself; "neither must you be proud. Neither must you hedge yourself about with restrictions. You have your bread to gain—yes, your very bread."

(To be continued.)

OLD SAWS IN NEW SETTINGS.

BY SIDNEY DARYL.

"Nothing venture, nothing win."

MONSIEUR BONHOMME sat in his counting-house, reading the letters he had received by the morning's post. Though the hands of the clock over his desk said that it wanted a quarter to nine, he had been working there more than an hour, and previously to that had taken his first breakfast, and made a lengthened tour of his garden, watering the flowers of which he was so proud, and spudding up the weeds he so loathed and hated in the fulness of his horticultural heart.

Besides being an early riser, he possessed an orderly and methodical mind, and whether it was his ledger and business books to be balanced, or his dinner-table to be arranged, or the weekly account with his washerwoman to be settled, everything in which he had an interest was conducted with the strictest regularity and accuracy.

Pierre Bonhomme was getting an old man. He and his father before him, had, between the two of them, lived and traded in the old house in the corner of the Place de la Bourse better than a hundred years, and the letters in which the name or style of the firm—"Bonhomme et Fils"—was painted over the tumble-down gate that led into the yard, were sadly illegible. Indeed, they might just as well have been obliterated altogether; first, because no one who did not possess lynx eyes could distinguish the characters; and secondly, because there was no "Fils" now: that is to say, Pierre's son was not in the business—in fact, he was very considerably above it—and though but a youngster of seventeen, prided himself on being one of the best-dressed and most fashionable dandies about Paris. It had been a great trouble to Papa Bonhomme, that his spoiled boy had shirked the business-collar he had sought to put around his neck. From the time when he had dandled his little Léon in his long clothes, the great idea of his life had been that the young gentleman should perpetuate the commercial glories of the honoured and well-known firm of "Bonhomme et Fils;" but he was doomed to disappointment, and found himself compelled to surrender all his cherished hopes.

I am sorry to have to record it of Master Léon, that he was far from being what he ought to have been; he had acquired a habit of spending money without thinking how hard it was to earn it: for Pierre Bonhomme had always kept his son's purse liberally supplied when at school in England. In tastes and ideas, he was exceedingly precocious, and when scarcely sixteen, had induced his father to allow him to leave school and come home; ostensibly to learn the routine of his business, but in reality to be a gentleman at ease.

With all his method and order, Pierre Bonhomme could refuse his son nothing, and so at the time of my story, we find Léon leading a wild and extravagant existence, and his father silently mourning the destruction of the castles in the air that in early days he had loved to build.

Next to his son, there was no person so dear to Pierre Bonhomme as Jacques Poucet, the orphan son of his dead sister, who, though but just sixteen, had made himself invaluable in his uncle's counting-house, by his anxiety to work hard, and learn the routine of business. Let it not be supposed that he was a sneak, or a schemer who was trying to advantage himself at the expense of his cousin. He possessed—what we would there were a little more of in this world—gratitude, and remembered affectionately how, when his mother died, a thoughtful hand had been stretched out to him, and rescued him from beggary. What little he had, he owed it all to his uncle Pierre, and he sought to the best of his power to pay fitting interest on the debt, by assiduity and attention to his duties. When Léon left school, and came to try what business life was like, Jacques did everything he could to give him an agreeable impression, and to engage his sympathy and confidence. But Léon—who for no reason at all had long entertained a prejudice against him—chilled him by the coldness with which he met all his advances, and treated him with as little courtesy as if he had been the humblest menial. And yet Jacques yearned from his heart to gain the affections of the son of his benefactor, but all in vain. Do what he would, be he ever so thoughtful, Léon stubbornly held aloof from him, and treated him with just the same contempt and hauteur, as he did the old housekeeper and the porter.

But I am forgetting, in this preliminary ramble, Monsieur Bonhomme in his counting-house reading his letters. There was a large number of them, and it took him some little time to make himself acquainted with their contents. When he got to the last, and was reading it, he seemed somewhat put out.

"Ah! this is too bad," he grumbled to himself. "Just as I was thinking of taking a day's holiday, comes this tiresome note, requiring me to proceed on important business to Marseilles."

And then he sighed a sigh such as only a hard-worked man who has been robbed of a chance of relaxation can breathe.

"I must go at once," he continued, folding up the unwelcome letter hastily, and looking at his watch; "I shall be just in time to catch the day express."

At that moment, a man came bustling in at the door.

"My dear Bonhomme," said the stranger, plumping down a small paper parcel upon the desk, "here are the four thousand francs due on our last account. I think you will find it all right; and as I can't wait any longer, good morning."

And with that, the unceremonious visitor disappeared as quickly as he had come.

"This is rather awkward," said Pierre, still talking to himself; "he couldn't have paid it at a more inconvenient time. I always take money to the bank myself, but if I want to catch the train, I mustn't think of doing that to-day. And then none of the clerks are here, and Jacques hasn't come in from his morning's walk."

Almost at the same moment, Léon appeared at the door. There was a strange look about him, which I may as well at once say was due to his having been playing cards the previous night, and losing more than he was able to pay. I say than he was able to pay because, foolishly indulgent though he was, his father had refused to make him any further allowance. He had scarcely entered the counting-house, when Jacques, fresh and with a heightened colour from his smart walk up to the Bois de Boulogne and back again, came briskly in. Monsieur Bonhomme, who had saluted his son most affectionately, turned at once to Jacques, telling him of his purposed journey to Marseilles, and desiring him, as soon as he had had his breakfast, to go over to the bank and pay in the four thousand francs, which, for the present, he put inside his desk without locking it.

Léon had at first turned away, disgusted at Jacques preventing the interview he had contemplated having alone with his father; but when he heard the four thousand francs mentioned, there was a dangerous expression in his eye that boded no good. With a hasty good-bye, Monsieur Bonhomme hurried to his sleeping-room, packed a few things in his carpet-bag, and in ten minutes was on his way to the railway station. Jacques made some civil remark to his cousin, but receiving no response, took himself off to his breakfast.

It was nearly eleven o'clock when, having discharged several pressing duties, Jacques suddenly remembered the four thousand francs in his uncle's desk, and that he was to pay them into the bank. He was quite angry with himself for his forgetfulness, and determined to make up for it at once. What was his horror to find that the four thousand francs were gone!

Quicker than it takes to write, the thought flashed through his mind that his cousin was the thief. Why, he knew not, save that he had heard of Léon's extravagances, and knew that Monsieur Bonhomme had refused to pander to them further. It was a trying moment for Jacques; he knew that suspicion was like enough to fall on him, but he only gave a passing thought to that. The first and only thing that was uppermost in his mind was to bring back Léon, wherever he had gone, and with him, if possible, the four thousand francs intact. But where to find him? Whither had he gone? He might be in Paris, or flying away somewhere for safety. Looking out of the window, Jacques saw Prosper, the porter, standing at the yard gate.

"Have you seen Monsieur Léon?" he inquired, hurriedly of him.

"Oh, yes, sir," replied the old man, "not half an hour ago; and just before he left he asked me to get the time-table of the Northern Railway. Why, how pale you look, Monsieur Jacques," he added, gazing at Jacques' care-stricken face; "is anything the matter?"

"Nothing, Prosper, nothing," replied Jacques, withdrawing his head to the inside. "The Northern Railway," he muttered to himself.

And then, as if a thought suddenly struck him, he rushed away up-stairs to his own little room, and unlocking his desk, put what few savings he had stored away in it into his pocket. He informed no one of his purpose, but slipping out unperceived, hailed a carriage, and jumping into it, ordered the driver to convey him with all speed to the terminus of the Northern Railway. He had not paused to reflect; had he done so, he might have shrunk from the task he had imposed upon himself. But his thoughts were fixed on one who had been both father and mother to him, and whose heart would break if he were to find out that his son was a thief.

Through the whole of that day Jacques watched at the railway station, till, as evening came on, the officials about the place began to regard him as a suspicious person, who was loitering there for no good purpose. He was very tired and hungry, but he remained faithful to the duty he had assumed, and hoped against hope that his cousin would put in an appearance at last. The hour had arrived at which the night mail-train for Calais was on the point of starting. There did not, however, seem to be many people likely to travel by it, and as the last warning bell rang, Jacques turned on his heel to go home. Léon was not going to take flight in that direction, he felt assured. As he was passing out through the station gates, his attention was attracted by a cab driving hurriedly in, the horse being urged along at the top of his speed. He would not throw away this last chance, so retracing his steps, he made for the ticket-office once more. As he entered it, he was just in time to see a figure that he was satisfied was no other than that of his cousin, disappearing swiftly through the inner door on to the platform. He could not hesitate, so presenting himself at the little window where tickets were dispensed, he took one for Calais, and rushing on to the platform, regardless of the remonstrances of a surly official, who tried to stop him, opened the door of one of the carriages in the train, that had already begun to move, and scrambled in as best he could. In five minutes more the steam-horse was whirling him along through the outskirts of Paris, shrieking and screeching as if in astonishment at his temerity.

When the excitement of the moment was passed, and he could look about him, Jacques found that the carriage he was in had no other occupant but himself, and that he was to be alone for the next fifty miles. For he knew that the night mail only stopped three times on the journey between Paris and Calais. It has already been seen that Jacques was naturally very impulsive, and every minute's delay that kept him from his cousin's side seemed full of danger to the success of his enterprise. He looked out of the carriage window. It was a dark, gloomy night, and some heavy rain-drops fell upon his face, while the rushing of the wind almost took his breath away. But to wait till fifty miles had been traversed, and then run the risk of not seeing Léon at all, or if seeing him, to have to do so in company—Jacques scouted the idea, and was determined to make a daring effort, if possible, to avoid all these difficulties. Again he did not pause to reflect, but, opening the door, stepped out on to the long wooden step that ran along its full length, and closed it after him. Then he remained still for a moment, for the guard, whose van was next behind, had just looked out. But it was only to take a glance at a train which came whizzing past on its way towards Paris, and then he disappeared.

Jacques was not slow to proceed with the daring enterprise he had resolved to undertake, but made his way along the wooden steps from carriage to carriage, glancing in at the windows as he passed unseen by the occupants, and thus till he had reached nearly to the second guard's van, which came next to the engine. Could he have been mistaken, after all, in the identity of the figure he had supposed to be that of his cousin? As he paused with sinking heart to put this question to himself, he happened to look in through the window of a first-class carriage, and there, all by himself, sleeping in the corner seat on the further side, was Léon, and by his side a little black travelling-bag, which was fastened round his shoulder by a strap. Gently turning the handle of the door, Jacques opened it, and gliding softly in, shut it after him. He had played a bold game, but it seemed likely that he would win now. Léon was moving restlessly in his sleep, while his breathing was forced and heavy; every now and then he murmured something between his teeth, which were clenched together, but the words were inaudible.

"If he has but the money about him, and I can secure it without waking him," said Jacques to himself, "there is nothing to fear."

Stealthily he crept to Léon's side. The bag was resting on the arm of the seat in which Léon was sitting. Jacques tried to open it, but at first he could not. Then he remembered how he had once heard Léon tell his father about a particular spring that was attached to it, and after a search that seemed to him to last hours instead of seconds, he lighted on it, and pressing it with his finger, the bag flew open. Almost at the same moment, Léon moved as if about to wake, and Jacques started back; but his alarm soon passed when he saw his cousin seemingly sink into a sounder sleep than before; and then looking into the bag, Jacques saw a packet lying at the bottom of it, which in an instant more he held in his hand. It was made up of the four thousand francs in bank-notes that had been paid to M. Bonhomme that morning. Having satisfied himself that they were all right in number, he put them into his pocket-book, and carefully closing the bag, ensconced himself in a seat, and prepared for the time when his cousin should awake.

There is no need to linger over what remains to be told. Neither Léon nor Jacques went as far as Calais that night. Indeed, when the mail-train reached its first stopping-place, they got out together, and journeyed on no further. If the reader had been there, he would have seen that the elder of the two lads was as a child in the hands of the younger, and seemed willing to let him do as he would with him. Monsieur Bonhomme, on his return from Marseilles, was agreeably surprised to find his son installed in the counting-house, at the desk by Jacques's side, working away with a will that gladdened his heart, and re-inspired him with a hope that the glories of the old house of Bonhomme et Fils would yet be perpetuated. He never knew of Léon what we do. And Jacques toiled pleasantly on as before, more than ever a son to M. Bonhomme, and a dear and loved brother to Léon. Perhaps one day, my children, I may tell you how Léon repaid the debt of gratitude he owed to Jacques.

ANSWER TO SCRIPTURE ACROSTIC ON PAGE 544.

"Judas."—John xviii. 2.

- | | |
|---------------------|------------------------------------|
| 1. J ason | { Acts xvii. 5—9.
Rom. xvi. 21. |
| 2. U zzah | 2 Sam. vi. 6, 7. |
| 3. D oeg | 1 Sam. xxi. 7. |
| 4. A himelech | 1 Sam. xxii. 16—18. |
| 5. S hishak | 1 Kings xiv. 25, 26. |

THE QUIVER

Saturday, May 23, 1868.

(Drawn by B. ERADLEY.)

"The young lady turned her attention to a little fat spaniel."—p. 562.

THE FIRST QUARREL.

BY ALTON CLYDE.

PART I.

"THEN you are really determined to go to this party, Dora; though you know it will be, in defiance of my wishes, and that I shall not accompany you?" So spoke Edward Holmes to his young wife, as they sat at breakfast one morning.

The reply was characteristic.

"Certainly I mean to go, Edward—why not? Your wishes, as you call them, are just nothing more than absurd crotchets, and I don't see why my enjoyment should be made the sacrifice."

"Your enjoyment, Dora!" repeated the husband, with bitter, sorrowful emphasis, rising from his seat at table, and crushing down the heel of his boot into the thick mossy hearthrug, as he stood with his elbow leaning on the low marble mantelshef. "Well, perhaps I have made a mistake, as many other husbands have, doubtless, done in their time, believing that a wife should find her best enjoyment at home."

"How truly generous on your part," retorted pretty Dora, with a scornful curl of her full red lips, and a rebellious flash of her dark eyes, "to expect me to find all my enjoyment in prosing away the long evenings in this dull old house, just because I have a husband more than ten years my senior, who dislikes society, and cannot shake off the morose disposition that must have belonged to his bachelor days. Truly generous, upon my word; but remember, it will not keep me from the party, for I mean to go—either with or without your consent—as I don't think it right to encourage your unreasonable prejudices. Here, Tiny, Tiny!"

And, apparently with no concern about the effect of her irritating speech, the young lady turned her attention to a little fat spaniel which had lain coiled at her feet like a ball of tawny-looking wool. She gathered it in her arms, and taking a dainty corner of muffin from a plate on the breakfast-tray, occupied herself with trying to tempt its pampered appetite; while her husband stood and watched her movements with a look of pained surprise, and a moody contraction of his broad brow; his handsome mouth compressed, and gradually setting into lines of sternness that would not readily relax.

There was a burning flush on the sallow face, which wore "the pale cast of thought," and told its own story of hard mental work, and years of resolute, hand-to-hand struggle with the world, before he won the professional success and high social position which he had been so proud to share with the light wayward creature who was now stabbing him so ruthlessly with her sarcastic tone and manner—it might be all unconscious of the mischief she was doing.

Her words were still fretting his sensitive soul, leaving an unpleasant impression which, a few hours ago, he would not have believed could be produced by anything from the lips of his young wife. Yet so it was: they carried with them a sting which had cut deeply into the proud heart, which it was her misfortune not to understand. He gave his answer slowly and coldly; there was apparently no heat or passion in his tone, and his calmness might have misled a stranger. The fire burned more intensely for its forcible repression.

"Very well, Dora; I have heard your decision, and at the same time you have treated me to some of your opinions, which I must confess are quite new to me. But since you desire it so much, go to the party by all means; I shall not again urge my wishes as a restraining influence, for it is very far from my intention to make you a victim to my unreasonable prejudices."

Dora did not reply; she seemed still engrossed with her spaniel, stroking its silky ears through her fingers, and calling it pet names in the light, girlish way which was usually so attractive to her studious husband. At that moment he was too deeply hurt and angry to notice her manner, except to find in it new proof of her indifference about his feelings.

But for all her affected unconcern, a vague sense of uneasiness crept over the wilful young wife, and her heart fluttered as she stole a side-glance at him from under her dropped eyelashes. She did not understand him in that mood: it was something entirely beyond her management. If there had been a storm of recriminating words, or a violent outburst of temper, she could have dealt with it; anything better than that frozen sternness which seemed to be already putting such distance between them.

They had just turned the first year of their wedded life, which had flitted by like a happy dream. True, there had been occasional breaks in the harmony, little clashings of temper, which, to a thoughtful observer, perhaps might have foreboded ill for the future. But their contests had generally ended in playfulness, and the tiny clouds were only like momentary shadowings of the sunshine on a summer meadow; they went so quickly that the sky seemed all the brighter for their passing. But that morning witnessed their first real quarrel, the first break in the chain of love and union which had bound them together. Yet, even then, a little mutual forbearance would have closed the breach. Much misery would have been spared to both by a better understanding of each other's weaknesses. A few kind words from the young wife would have disarmed her husband's anger, and perhaps won from him a graceful concession to her wishes. It is one of the secrets of woman's power to "stoop to conquer;" for her true strength lies in her weakness. It is only by gentleness that she can ever hope to mould the sterner, stronger nature, or gain any lasting hold over the proud heart that will resist any amount of harsh force, but may be led with a silken thread when guided by a loving hand. Pretty, wayward Dora, the petted wife of a year, should have remembered that, when she let her husband leave her without his accustomed kiss. It was sowing the first seed of disunion, and it might be her lot to reap in tears the bitter harvest that it would bring.

* * * * *

Few couples had taken on themselves the responsibilities of wedded life, with fairer prospects of happiness than Edward Holmes and his beautiful wife. He was, as she said, more than ten years her senior; thus he had passed the impressionable age when boyish romance and sentiment may take the place of deeper feelings. There could be no measuring the wealth of love which he had lavished on his girl-wife. Even she did not know the true value of the jewel she had won, or she would never have dared to trifle with it, as she did in those unhappy days when the shadow of estrangement was growing between them.

Edward Holmes was a rising barrister, who had struggled with difficulties, and, in the face of adverse circumstances, manfully fought his way to the front ranks of his profession.

Dora was the orphan daughter of one of those hard-worked, ill-paid curates, in the poorer parishes of London, who die doing their Master's work, and drop silently into undistinguished graves; a band of noble, nameless heroes, who will only be known in the day when "He maketh up his jewels." The young girl was left destitute by her father's death, and would have been thrown on the world, but for the kindness of a widowed sister of her mother's, who enjoyed a small independence by the will of her late husband. Having no children of her own, she took the portionless orphan to her home, and kept her until she married.

No wonder that Dora clung to Aunt Charlotte, and looked up to her as a mother, depending on her in every difficulty. Edward Holmes had always professed strong regard for his wife's aunt. Experience was about to prove that she deserved it, and also confirm her claim to his highest esteem.

It was about a month after the memorable morning of their first quarrel. Against the advice of Aunt Charlotte, and in open defiance of her husband, Dora had fluttered away to the forbidden party—a gay assemblage of people whose acquaintance her fastidious husband did not wish her to cultivate. While she was shining there, as one of the stars of the evening, and delighting in the homage that was paid to her as the beautiful wife of a popular barrister, he remained at home, morosely locked in his study—as usual, supposed to be busy with his books and papers; but, in reality, sitting moodily over the fire, dejected and discontented with everything about him. With his dark brows knitted into a forbidding frown, he sat listening and watching the fingers of the time-piece, which seemed to his morbid fancy to move so sluggishly.

On the following morning their quarrel was renewed with more violence on both sides. Every day had widened the breach between them; but that morning all the smothered fire of the past month burst into flame. The husband was irritated by her manner, when she cut short some of his angry words by running to the piano and dashing off a spirited waltz.

The sound of that gay, defiant music stung him beyond all self-control. He remembered bending over her chair, with his hand grasping her slender, white wrist, forcing her to listen to bitter words which troubled him afterwards to recall, and sent the young wife to her room in a wild passion of sobs and tears.

Before another hour, she had formed and matured a certain rash plan, and proceeded to act upon it at once.

This was to leave her husband, resign her wifely duties, and go back to her old home with Aunt Charlotte never doubting that she would be received, and the story of her wrongs listened to with the deepest sympathy and compassion.

The greater part of the day was spent in collecting her little miscellaneous possessions, and packing her boxes. She made a parcel of her jewels, and left it on her husband's study table, only retaining for herself the few which she had not received from him.

Then she wrote a few hasty lines to account for her disappearance, the note being hurriedly folded in an envelope addressed to "Edward Holmes, Esq.," and enclosing her wedding-ring, which she had taken off in her excitement. She did all with eager trembling hands, and burning cheeks on which the tears were scarcely dry; hurrying on in her reckless, impetuous way, without pausing once to consider or question her own heart. Before night she was gone.

Almost at the same time that her husband was returning to find his pretty house deserted by its mistress—with the bewildered servants whispering among themselves, and looking perplexedly at each other—a cab was rapidly whirling away the truant to the railway station, from which she would take train to the village where Aunt Charlotte lived, a few miles from London.

(To be concluded in our next.)

ON SOME PLEASURES AND PAINS OF MIDDLE AGE.

O the question—what constitutes middle age? very different answers would probably be made, according as the speakers were looking forward or back to it. The former, as is always found, putting the commencement of it comparatively early; the latter putting it late. And, perhaps, we may say that it differs in different individuals; the personal character or peculiar circumstances of one causing him to feel and appear middle aged earlier than another. Yet, on the average, it will probably be allowed, that from about thirty-five to fifty people may be called middle aged. Holme Lee calls it “the silver age,” from the silver threads then first seen among the hair; and has written a pretty (if rather plaintive) volume of essays on that period of life. These essays have the air all through of making the best of a disagreeable necessity. May it not be possible to show that middle age is as much better than youth as the flower is better than the bud?

Now, it would be useless to deny that middle age, as it has its peculiar pleasures, has, too, its proper pains (what time of life or what position is without these?); but what is wished to be shown is, that to a tolerably well-ordered mind the pleasures may, and do, outweigh the pains. Let us look at some of the pains first, and then the after consideration of the pleasures will be doubly sweet, and take the taste of what went before out of the mental mouth.

One unmistakable pang which comes to us in middle life, comes to us on hearing of the deaths of our contemporaries. In youth we lost but few of our own standing; and I imagine it is the deaths of those of our own age that affect us most sensibly: and so we begin to recognise death as the rule instead of the exception, as it seemed in youth, when we “felt our life in every limb.”

Is it not a pain, too, to have outgrown the illusions of youth?—

“When all the world was young, lad,
And every goose a swan.”

Looking back, it seems almost impossible to realise that our present work-a-day selves can be the same persons who looked at the world with such different eyes long ago, who believed so intensely in the god-like virtues of very ordinary persons indeed—as they have since proved—clothed by our own imaginations, if not exactly in the “purple light of love”—which would be a very unsatisfactory, unsubstantial garment indeed—yet, at least, in a halo of romance. We regret, not the past illusions, since nothing in its nature false is worthy of regret; but the generous, cen-suring mind that wove the web of fancy; and we can never be our “dead selves” again.

And our aspirations after excellence—how high they were! Is it not a pain to have lost them? We have no such aspirations now. We breathed mountain air then, and trod lightly, and had no burden on our backs; but now we are come down into the plain, and the air is heavy and sultry with care.

Is it to be counted as a pleasure or a pain, that lessened capacity for any very strong feeling that grows on us as we advance in life? Each person must answer for himself. It stands, as it were, on the boundary-line between the two, having its advantages and disadvantages. Wherever this sobering of our feelings which accompanies growing older serves to render us callous to the sufferings, and indifferent to the feelings of others, it may be considered as harmful; but I am inclined to think, on the whole, that it often comes in usefully to assuage unreasonably-felt mortifications, to prevent our acting on impulse, and that in many ways it is a very great gain. The thin skin of youth is proverbial, and great is the misery it entails. May it not be true to say, not that the heart is colder, or the affections weaker in middle age, but that the outer shell of the animal is thicker, and feels injuries less quickly? On the whole, though, I am not prepared to say that pains and pleasures, as such, do not exist; yet it seems to me that one man's pain is often another man's pleasure. That we are very ill qualified to judge in any given case as to what will cause pleasure and what pain, and can only speak with any degree of certainty respecting ourselves.

Among the many pleasures which belong to middle age, and foremost in their rank, stands that of finding the truth and friendship of friends to be lasting. As life goes on, and the days grow shorter and darker, it warms the heart to find those standing by us still who stood by us in youth; to find them unchanged toward us, accepting us as we are—which newer friends are not so ready to do—and loving us with our faults. We cannot experience this pleasure till we have lived some years in the world. Old friends are the more precious for being old, and having occupied a large space in our thoughts for a long time back.

Amongst the pleasures of middle age also to be counted, is the power gained by the mind of letting itself be disturbed in a less degree about trifles. Things assume a truer relative value, and we see that the mistakes we made are not irreparable, and the consequences not eternal, as we almost fancied they would be. Or, let it be granted the mistakes are irreparable—the life a failure, yet we can look forward more confidently to the time of the restitution of all things. Life, in youth, looked so very long, and now seems so much shorter, that we can "look before and after," and things we broke our hearts over then, would hardly excite a passing regret now. And even though middle age is more weighted with that care and anxiety from which youth is free, it seems to me that we acquire, as we go on, a power of putting aside our cares and anxieties. "Lie there till I call you, meantime I will play." Now, in youth calamities seemed so crushing, and we foolishly thought we should never be happy any more, and found ourselves, with something like shame, returning with enjoyment to things which gave us happiness before the thunderbolt fell.

Independence of thought comes naturally with age. Either our sentiment of reverence for the opinions of others is diminished, or, which is as likely, our confidence in our own judgment is increased, and at forty we say what we should not have ventured on at twenty. "All that So-and-so says may be wise and good, but I do not think the worse of myself or others for differing from him." And this is a great pleasure to many minds. And another pleasure is allied to this, that of being able to see that every question has two sides, some persons remain through life unable to perceive this, and in their prejudice and narrowness are as children still, becoming, indeed, less and less able to discern merit in any opinion but their own. Then follows the pleasure of exercising our increased capacity for independence in speech, though here care is needful lest we exercise the capacity harmfully. And so it becomes a duty, if we have courage to speak plainly, to see, first, that there is occasion for speaking at all, and then that the speech be made in the right spirit and right form. This seen to, what a deep pleasure springs out of our power to speak words of comfort, counsel, pity, or affection (or more seldom, reproof), which we should not have had courage to have spoken ten years ago, although we should have had conscientiousness enough to make us miserable for long after we had let the opportunity slip by.

Perhaps the best of all the gains which middle life brings is freedom of action. At such time as we have laid aside the restraints and tutorings of youth, and are not come to the restraints imposed upon us by the infirmities of age, we are able to do much in our own way and after our own fashion;—freedom, not to be idle—no man has a right to that—but to work for the best of Masters, in the greatest of tasks, that of adorning and beautifying our own soul, and benefiting to the uttermost the bodies and souls of our fellow-men; or if only the bodies, was not that a great part of the daily work of our Master? This freedom realised more and more as we leave youth behind, more than compensates us for anything we lost with our youth, and how shall we regret the showers and sunshine of spring, and the bright variety of its flowers, if we can count instead the beautiful beneficent sheaves of harvest?

THE EXPLORATION OF PALESTINE.

BY CHARLES BOUTELL, M.A.

CHAPTER II.

HE results of the first exploring expedition, conducted by Captain Wilson, R.E., and Lieutenant Anderson, R.E., in the years 1865-6, may be briefly described as follows:—

In various parts of Palestine materials were collected for making about fifty plans, with detailed drawings, of churches, synagogues, mosques, temples, tombs, and other edifices, and their remains and ruins; amongst which are plans of the cities of Cæsarea, Beisan, and Sebastiyeh (Samarit.); of the Holy Place of the Samaritans, and of the ruined octagonal church of the Emperor Justinian on the summit of Mount Gerizim; of ancient churches at Baalbek, Cæsarea, Lydda, Beitin, Bireh, Yarus, Sebastiyeh, and at Jerusalem itself; the plans also of seven ancient Jewish synagogues, of the Great Mosque at Damascus, and of another at Nablus (Shechem); those of the temples at Kedes, Deir el-Kalah, and Mejd-el-Anjar; and numerous tombs in different parts of the country. A series of inscriptions also was found scattered about, like the tombs, in different places; and of these inscriptions careful copies have been taken.

Amongst the most interesting of all the discoveries are those which have established, almost with certainty, the site of Capernaum, and which for the first time have shown the true character of the ancient synagogues of Palestine.

Attention had been directed to the synagogues, or rather to the ruins of those buildings, by Dr. Robinson, in his "Later Biblical Researches;" but the first complete account of their design, construction, and arrangement, accompanied with photographs which represent their present condition, has been given by Captain Wilson. It appears that these ancient edifices were designed on a fixed and accepted plan: they were erected standing north and south, having three entrances at their southern extremity; the interior was divided into five longitudinal compartments, or aisles, by four rows of columns, and the two northern corners were formed by double columns attached to the walls. The style of decoration, notwithstanding this prevailing uniformity of plan and arrangement, evidently was not always the same. Thus, at Tel Hum, which may be regarded as identical with Capernaum, Corinthian capitals were found. Capitals of the same order were also found at Kerazeh-Chorazin. At Irbid there is a mixture—Ionic with Corinthian; while the capitals that once crowned the columns in the other ruined synagogues that were explored, proved to be in a style of character peculiar to themselves. The faces of the great stone lintels that covered the openings of the doorways were usually found to have been ornamented with some sculptured device. At Nebarten, for example, with an inscription, there is a representation of the seven-branched candlestick of the ancient Temple service; at Kefr Birim the ornament appears to have been designed to represent the paschal lamb; and at Tel Hum, with unconscious felicity of symbolical allusion, there are both the pot of manna and the lamb. Scroll-work, formed of vine-branches, with their leaves and clusters of grapes, is also an ornament of frequent occurrence, and one which cannot fail to be regarded with peculiar interest by explorers who faithfully accept the Scriptures of the New Testament. These remains, with Captain Wilson's careful and graphic descriptions of them, and with his excellent photographs, suggest perfectly fresh ideas as to what the Jewish synagogues, of which we read in the New Testament, must have been like. The remains that Captain Wilson has examined may not be of quite such early date as the commencement of the Christian era, but they undoubtedly show what were the style and character of those still earlier "synagogues of the Jews" in which so many of the most important events in the Gospel history are recorded to have taken place; and they show also that these edifices, unlike the rude structures they generally are supposed to have been, were really noble buildings, rich in the best architectural decoration of their era, and standing in the same relative artistic connection with the great and magnificent Temple at Jerusalem, that our own principal churches do to our cathedrals.

Another point of special interest, as I have observed, in Captain Wilson's exploration arises from the attention bestowed by him upon the discovery of the true site of Capernaum—that city which, above all others, might claim the supreme distinction of having been the home of the Saviour during the greater part of his life upon this earth. Capernaum, indeed, must be considered to have been second in interest not even to Jerusalem itself; and yet, so completely has the attention of pilgrims and travellers been diverted to other localities and other scenes, that scarcely any care or labour has been bestowed before upon the discovery and identification of this most remarkable spot. Without positively asserting even now that Tel Hum certainly represents Capernaum, and that its ruins cover the identical site where once that highly-favoured city stood, Captain Wilson's discoveries really have approached very nearly to a complete and decided identification.

The presence, again, of extensive remains, including those of a synagogue, may now be considered to fix with tolerable certainty the position of Chorazin at Kerazeh, situated two miles to the north of Tel Hum (Tel Hum itself is at the north-western extremity of the Sea of Tiberias), on a small plain where there is a spring. All the buildings appear to have been of basalt; and, notwithstanding the utter ruin that has fallen upon the whole, portions of the old streets with their pavements can still be clearly traced. This discovery is due to Lieut. Anderson, who also conducted the researches upon Mount Gerizim.

Other ruins, also of singular interest, now called Khersa, were visited and explored. They are situated on the eastern side of the lake, and they probably are the remains of the ancient Gergesa, the city of the Gergesenes. Near these ruins, and opposite to the city of Tiberias, appears to have been the scene of the destruction of the herd of swine. No other point on that side of the lake, indeed, is so suitable—in fact, no other point beside this can be said to be strictly suitable to the requirements of the Gospel narrative. Elsewhere, from the eastern elevated plateau, the ground slopes steeply, and in a few places almost precipitously, down to the level of the lake; but a margin of fertile land, in width from half a mile to a mile, is left intervening between the base of the hills and the water's edge. At this particular point, however, near Khersa, and only at this, a spur or little promontory runs out from the high land to the shore, and, without actually forming a cliff, the slope is steep and decided—just such a "steep place" as the evangelists have described in the few graphic words that have invested their description of the incident with such vivid truthfulness.

I leave for future consideration all the particulars and details of Captain Wilson's remarkable discovery at Jerusalem, that I may give a full description of them in connection with the more recent discoveries that have been made on the same spot.

In the department of Topography, by accurate observations made at forty-nine separate places between Beyrout and Hebron, and also carried through the country from Banias (Cæsarea Philippi) to Jerusalem, a series of detailed maps have been formed, on the scale of one mile to an inch (the scale of the English Ordnance Survey), which comprehend the whole backbone of Palestine—the entire range of the bold central highland, which traverses the country from north to south, including the Lake of Galilee and all the watercourses that descend to its western shores. The errors that exist in the earlier maps for the most part appear to have been caused by trusting too much to a general inspection of many parts of a region, which abounds in narrow ravines and tortuous water-ways, all of them impossible to lay down in a map with exact accuracy without a direct and most careful examination. To remedy these defects has been the great aim of the present maps, as it also must be one of the chief objects in whatever additions hereafter may be made to them. All that already has been laid down in these maps and plans, accordingly, is so much clear gain, and enables all future explorers to set forth to their work, having started from sure ground.

Since the return of Capt. Wilson and Lieut. Anderson in 1866, the Exploration Society has been unceasingly at work in the same earnest and energetic spirit, and on the same sound principles, that have characterised its operations from their first commencement; and the results of this working will be found to become continually more and more interesting and important. Before I proceed to consider either what has actually been accomplished in Palestine since the return of Capt. Wilson's second expedition, or what the society at this present moment is both doing and desiring to do, it may be well for me to conclude this chapter with a very few words upon the constitution, principles, and aim of the society itself.

This society has been formed "for the accurate and systematic investigation of the archæology, the topography, the geology, and physical geography, and the manners and customs of the Holy Land, for Biblical illustration;" and this association, which, in the words I now have quoted sets forth with what objects and views it has been formed, has chosen to assume the title of the "Palestine Exploration Fund." The word "fund" thus used is significant enough; since the work that lies before the society, and which it has boldly and resolutely taken in hand, can be accomplished only by the authorities of the society having ample funds placed at their disposal. And, without any question, the most cordial popularity, coupled with the most liberal support, cannot fail to be secured for this "Palestine Exploration Fund," wherever it is well known and thoroughly understood. To be well acquainted with this society, in fact, implies a resolution to take a part with it in its noble and admirable work. The funds of the society are derived entirely from voluntary subscriptions and donations, with the addition of whatever profits may arise from the sale of the photographs that have been and will be taken for the society. Her Majesty the Queen is the patron; the president is the Archbishop of York; the honorary secretaries are Mr. George Grove and the Rev. E. W. Holland,—the last-named gentleman being now in the East. And there is a numerous committee, which has been formed with the express intention of including persons of eminence, both clergy and laymen, who hold diverse religious opinions, but who, nevertheless, have readily and gladly consented so far to forego whatever differences may exist between them as may enable them to act cordially together upon the common ground, equally dear to them all, of an equal interest in Palestine and in the exploration of it. The society desires to include amongst its members all who participate in that interest: it invites all to join its ranks: it seeks from all such persons sympathy, encouragement, and a constant accession of fresh and increasing working power. And the committee represents—certainly, it is most desirous to represent—the entire body of the society: cabinet ministers, accordingly, and bishops; men of science, of learning, and of art; the leaders of education, and men of mark of every class and order; men of business, too, and men of letters; country gentlemen and peers of the realm; travellers and authors; Churchmen of every shade; Catholics; Nonconformists of every denomination; Hebrews; politicians of as many varying shades as Churchmen—all are duly represented; or, if all are not duly represented in the committee, it is simply and solely because some have been less ready than others to respond to an invitation, that in the first instance was addressed, and that still continues to be addressed, to all in the same terms and with equal cordiality. As it exists at this time, this committee, it must be added, includes in its ranks almost all the most experienced travellers in Palestine. This is the association that has undertaken to "explore" Palestine. And, in its exploration of Palestine, this association has, and will continue to have, one grand aim and purpose—to search thoroughly the Holy Land, in quest of its testimony to truth. The society is seeking neither for discoveries that may confirm some existing theories, nor for evidence that may overwhelm other theories of an opposite character. It is exploring Palestine, in order to enable Palestine to bear its own strong testimony to the Bible, alike without any restraint or imperfection on the one hand, and on the other hand without any suggestive guiding. The exploring parties of the "Palestine Exploration Fund" sink their shafts through the accumulated dust and rubbish and ruins of centuries, until they are able to lay bare foundations and they have reached the solid mass of the living rock: and so, in like manner, the principles of this society, having no fellowship with whatever may be aptly typified by dust and rubbish and ruins, rest on foundations that are deeply laid and secure, and are built up upon the rock of the written Word of God.

A WORD UPON BREAK OF DAY.

BY THE REV. W. M. STATHAM.

SCIENCE is continually teaching us that there are beautiful adaptations in Nature to the weal of man, often unthought of by him. We know something of the advantages of the varied seasons of time, but we seldom stay to ponder the fact, that winter has beautiful uses as well as summer, and that night has its blessings as well as day. Yes, night! for the darkness of night, the atmosphere of night, the silence of night, are all adapted to the physical health and the mental rest of man. Were he to turn night into day, he would suffer as much in health as he would lose in the joy and beauty of the outer world! A thousand voices say, "The night is thine;" and when the stars shine out of the dark heavens, stars which we cannot see in the daytime, magnificent hints are they to us of hidden glories yet unrevealed by God, and reminders of his love and power, who has made all worlds so lustrous and majestic, and this one amongst them all so adapted to our use, our comfort, and our wellbeing.

But if night has its teachings, so has day, and especially daybreak. "Grace," says Vinèt, "has not made Nature an outcast!" No, we may still learn from her lips; the Great Teacher has made her an illuminated missal, adorned with the gold and crimson of his own brush, ever reminding us, by Nature's pictures, of the eternal verities of His thought.

Let it be remembered, in treating of daybreak, that night, in a moral sense, belongs only to our present estate. One day we hope to reach heaven, and there will be no night there. The first dawn of heaven to our hearts will be the ushering in of everlasting day.

It is scarcely necessary even to suggest to the reader the glories of the natural morning. Who that has seen break of day amid the Scottish highlands, near Braemar or Balmoral, can ever forget it?—the purple bloom upon the heather, the diamond dew upon the gorse, the deep shadows, departing like massed troops along the valleys! or who that has been at sea, and seen the first tinge of mellow light fringing the horizon, and then spreading like a sheet of gold upon the sea, will ever forget that golden glory? No; it is not the purpose of this paper to dwell upon daybreak in this sense: it is so familiar to all, and so past the pen of man to picture. But there are other glories of the morning, concerning which we may say a word.

We awake each day into a new world of life and duty, and it is marvellous how each intervening night separates us from the cares, anxieties, and worries of the preceding day. We scarcely realise how great a change a few brief hours of rest will make. It is old but good advice, in any difficulty, to "sleep upon it;" a new existence seems to come with each new day—new possibilities, new prospects, new energies, and a new heart of hope. We cannot think of the wrong, the injury, the sorrow, just as we did the night before. Every morning there is a kind of resurrection of life, a beautiful revivification of the faculties of the mind and the energies of the body too. The break of day has formed the inspiration of many a poem and many a picture, and will doubtless do so of many more.

The religious teacher will necessarily look at it in its highest aspects. It is specially significant of the genesis of the Christian life. Memorable season that!—when the darkness is leaving the mind and the true light beginning to shine. The dawn may come very early in a young child's heart: there will always be some darkness to dispel, some clouds to disperse; but the break of moral day may come in tenderest years. The vision of Christ as a Redeemer, of God as a Father; the prospect of heaven as a home; the vileness of sin, falsehood, filthiness, enmity, and evil—these things may be seen in the young child life. Break of day is, in this sense, like entrance into a new world. No figures of speech can be truer than those which describe sin as darkness, and salvation as light. Daybreak to the soul is the opening of our eyes to a Sun which has been always shining round about us. Lord, open thou mine eyes! That is break of day to us; and there is no era so rich in blessing as the dawn of Heaven's morning to a slumbering soul.

Daybreak, however, is only the beginning of the light. Objects in the dawn are not seen at once. There are many aspects of the power and beauty of the Gospel which we do not glimpse at first. Knowledge comes by degrees. To understand and argue out all the propositions of theology, is

"When the fire burns bright, and our hearts are light,
And my love, my love will sing to me."—p. 571.

neither within the range of possibility or duty in the early era of religious life. Light would blind us if, in the natural world, it burst upon our vision at once; and there is an analogy in Christian truth, which shines in upon the mind steadily and gradually. It is enough at first to love Christ, the living Christ, who will guide us into all truth. Watch the soul as the day breaks. What possibilities of knowledge, love, and service are before it! Oh, that glorious beginning, the dawn of Christian day! Worlds want, in all their wealth, the worth of that. When we see the little eyes of a babe looking out into a new world, what a mystery lies hidden in that life; what these eyes will some day be the windows to in relation to thought and feeling; how they will gaze on the majesty of the stars, the magnificence of the mountains, the kind faces of home! And what will not those spiritual eyes see? Those wonderful words, spoken by St. Paul, are often quoted as related to the Christian in heaven, but they apply to the Christian on earth: "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit." Beautiful daybreak that! Lord, that I may receive my sight. Merciful pardon is the dawn of the Christian day, and then come the graces—righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. We must not complain of morning because it is only morning; it brings with it the promise of day—yea, of everlasting day.

We think, too, of the daybreak as showing us the scenes of darkness. At first we are occupied with the strangely beautiful new life; but in time we look back. We need not attempt to depict any startling sense of surprise or dislike, for that would not be true to our consciousness. But this experience is true. We wonder at the dark dread of God which we once had; we marvel at our base conceptions of life, as having its choicest joys in the sensuous side of our nature; we wonder that we should have refused to see the beauty of Christ; we wonder that we should have lived without prayer and without peace. Here is a contrast between the new life and the old death—friendship with God instead of enmity—rest in him in the place of tremulous dread. What sincere disciple of Christ is there who does not look back to the night as a season to which he would not, if he could, return? The new morning has its sense of joy as well as sense of safety.

We think of the daybreak as applicable to the night seasons of grief. It is representative of our human as well as our Christian life. We have not lived so long without experiencing something of the weeping which endures for the night. Unbroken health, unbroken happiness, belong to none. How long, too, are some nights! The acquaintance-ship some form with sorrow is such that they can scarcely believe in joy. They have become so accustomed to a long, Northern sort of night, that they almost cease to believe in the day. How often the worn and weary, looking through life's heart-casement, cry, "What of the night?" and the prospect says, "Night still! No red in the horizon—dark night still!" Ah, but break of day is coming! Yes, even after the most wearisome affliction, the most necessitous circumstances, the most cruel wrongs, the most bitter endurances, some alleviation—some alteration—some beneficent change is at hand. The morning cometh! Oh, lead all you can to believe in the daybreak! Hope is useful as well as beautiful, and it has life in it. It may be difficult to revive the drooping spirit, to re-quicken the dormant energy; but let these words lie close to the heart: the morning cometh! Let us believe in the daybreak ourselves! Light cometh with the new-born day! The ropes are not so rotten in the belfry of the heart that we need fear to ring out the joy-notes! It is well to disturb the owls, and bats, and dark-winged thoughts of fear, by ringing out the music of hope. Let us try how sweet the peal is: Joy cometh—joy cometh—joy cometh in the morning! There is daybreak coming for the widow sitting under the cypress shadow of her new grief. There is daybreak for the poor and needy; daybreak for the forgotten. Let us have faith in God, and whisper to other hearts, The morning cometh!

We think of the daybreak as representative of new Christian life in heathen worlds. What a title would this form for the histories of the Western Indies and the Southern Seas. It requires little artistic skill to sketch the picture of the dark night of cannibalism, and cruelty, ignorance, superstition, and shamelessness which had settled down on these fair portions of the natural world

"Where every prospect pleases,
And only man is vile."

The morning came! True, indeed, the early light fell on forms that had fallen on sleep whilst sowing the seed. True, indeed, the grey dawn lasted long, and in some cases it was fifteen years before the clear daylight came; but the Sun of Righteousness did arise on the nations. As the light came there came the revelations of vice—crime—guilt; but, in the midst of all, there was seen the Cross—the wonderful Cross—by which God was providing a healing balm for the nations. The story of Christian daybreak has never yet been fully told; indeed, no one can truly make the dead past live. Old idolatries become the forgotten follies of preceding days, and the unfruitful works of darkness, as they are hated, are also blotted out of memory. Schools, mission-houses, native training colleges, all rise before us in the new light, and we say,

"What hath God wrought? Can that old chieftain be the man who slew his own child?" He is. "Can that silver-haired communicant be he who smote with his death-blow the missionary who first landed on the isle?" He is. "Can these children, who know only of idolatry by the stories told them of what once was, be the children of those who worshipped, thirty years ago, rude images of clay?" They are. Beautiful daybreak! "A light to lighten the Gentiles, and to be the glory of thy people Israel."

We think of daybreak as yet awaiting other lands. It has not been daybreak everywhere. Night still reigns! But the glory of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea! To whom can the nations go but to the Redeemer? Blot out the Christ of history, and you take the one Sun out of the moral heavens. Well may we re-echo the disciple's words, "Lord, to whom can we go? thou hast the words of eternal life." What luminary competes with the god of day? What light can eclipse the Light of the World? We do well to feel sure that the Gospel is inherently strong, and that its self-evidencing power is its highest claim to be Divine.

Great sums are being expended in digging up the ancient foundations of old empires renowned in history, and it is suggested in certain circles that we might gain a much more correct knowledge of old monarchies by a judicious application of wealth to the explorations of scientific research. Even so. But we want to know, not only what was the golden past; we want to prepare for a more golden future. Prophecy is truer than history, and we look forward with longing eyes to the bright beginning of a better day. It will come; it must come. But it will be another thing whether we have in any sense aided or arrested its advent. Even now it may wait but our hand to draw back the curtain of ignorance, and to make way for the dawn of truth, that the light may break forth as the morning. I know it will be for some time only break of day. It is unwise to imagine that converted heathens have not yet much to put off, and much growth to attain unto, ere they walk fully in the light; but they will ultimately have the perfect likeness of their Lord.

We think of this daybreak as applicable to the dawn of heaven. After all, there must be much of shadow in all our earthly bliss, much of imperfection in all our earthly knowledge; but the morning cometh. Many mornings may have already come to us: the light of some new discovery, the light of first love, the dawning influence of truth and beauty; but there is another morning coming, when all the shadows and sorrows will flee away for ever, where the sun no more goes down. A day without a darkening cloud—a day without a desolating storm—a day without a deepening twilight! To how many hearts have these words sounded out a depth of meaning which only the worn and weary, the tired and tempted, the lonely and bereaved, can sympathetically understand—"There shall be no night there!"

LOCH AREE.

WHEN spring comes in, and the leaves are green,

And daisies sprinkled upon the lea,
Oh! the pleasant walks and the happy talks

By the glimmering waters of Loch Aree;
When the hours are bright, and our hearts are light,
And my love, my love will sing to me.

When the sun is high in the summer sky,
And the honeyed bloom invites the bee,
We wander then in the wooded glen
That leaps from the mountains of Loch Aree;
When the woods are cool, and our hearts are full,
And my love, my love will sing to me.

When the green leaves fade into yellow and red,
And the robin sings upon the tree,
In the autumn brown, we wander down
By the purpling banks of Loch Aree;
When the hours breathe balm, and our hearts are calm,
And my love, my love will sing to me.

When trees are bare in the wintry air,
And the snow is whitening o'er the lea,
Then happy our lot, in a cosy cot
By the sheltered shores of Loch Aree;
When the fire burns bright, and our hearts are light,
And my love, my love will sing to me.

In the days of toil we gather their spoil,
And live as happy as life may be;
And heartsease treasure in hours of leisure,
On the bonnie green banks of Loch Aree;
When our hearts beat time to some sweet old rhyme,
And my love, my love will sing to me.

Thus day by day, come grave or gay,
We tune our hearts to the joys we see,
And round the year, in cloud or clear,
That chase each other by Loch Aree;
Let the shadows run, our hearts are one,
And my love, my wife will sing to me.

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XVII.

RAYMOND TRIES TO GAIN TIME.

"BUT the thing must be done, Mr. Carlton, or else what is to become of us?" said Raymond Sylvester.

Mr. Carlton was the family lawyer, who had been in the Sylvester interest all his life. He was a sleek man, with a smooth bald head, and, just now, a rather puzzled expression of countenance. He passed his hand over his head several times ere he replied.

"Indeed, it is a matter for serious deliberation. For my own part, I don't see my way."

"But I do," said Raymond; "I see my way, very clearly indeed! The existence of our house hinges upon it. If this fellow carries out his threat, the whole world will rush behind the scenes, and all will be over!"

Mr. Carlton was still rubbing his head softly round and round, an occupation which might prevent him from replying as quickly as Raymond desired.

"So that he must be stopped—there is no doubt about it, Mr. Carlton—and stopped at once!"

"Perhaps you will have the goodness to explain to me how," said Mr. Carlton, politely, but with some anxiety.

"How! a hundred ways! You lawyers are full of resources."

Mr. Carlton shook his head.

"You see, Mr. Sylvester, the most satisfactory way of all—as I need scarcely hint to you—is to pay the money."

"But I am not intending to pay it," said Raymond, coldly; "you must set that idea wholly on one side."

"Are you quite resolved, Mr. Sylvester?"

"I should think I am resolved! Good gracious, man! it is not a case of will, or of intention," cried Raymond, with a vehemence quite unusual to him. "No one knows better than you do how impossible it would be to meet John Humphreys' demand!"

"Quite so—quite so," and the sleek man bowed his head in acquiescence. "But still I am in the dark. What do you want me to do?"

"To see the man, and pacify him. To tell him that, if he proceed to extremities, it will be so much the worse for him."

"On what ground, may I ask, Mr. Sylvester?"

"On this ground," said Raymond, speaking with the same vehemence: "if one stone is knocked away from the foundation, the whole building will topple over. Creditors will come, flying from all quarters. There will not be a tithe to satisfy their demands. If he will forbear, a turn may come in these miserable fortunes of ours, and he may be paid in full."

As Raymond spoke, a slight colour came into his cheek, and his eyes sank uneasily before the surprised look of Mr. Carlton.

"Are you alluding to any expectations you may have, Mr. Sylvester?" said he, mildly.

"I am alluding to nothing," said Raymond, impatiently; "I am but giving you suggestions. Can you not understand me?"

"Pardon, me, but I heard that your expectations, in a worldly point of view, had been disappointed," said the lawyer. "You will forgive my alluding to such a matter, but it has to do with the point in hand, and the plainer we are with each other, the better."

Raymond's face turned white, and he bit his lip.

"I see you have no wish to befriend us in this matter," said he at length. "As my father's oldest counsellor, I hoped you would have rendered us all the help in your power."

"And so I would, if I knew how. The fact is, Mr. Sylvester, the property is fairly eaten up by debts—debts here, debts there, debts everywhere! Now, what can even a lawyer do?"

"Debts came to us as a sort of heirloom," said Raymond, bitterly; "we have not made one-half of them!"

"Probably not; but that does not alter the case; and it strikes me that you have no remedy left. The estate must go. Well, if it were me, I should let it."

"Let it!—let the estate go?" gasped Raymond, horrified.

"Yes; anything would be better than to suffer what you must suffer—the suspense, the anxiety, the alarm. You are young, why not wipe out the old score, and begin again?"

"But my mother!— But you have forgotten that we are Sylvesters!" again gasped Raymond, his face deadly pale.

"I forgot nothing," replied the lawyer, shortly; "you ask me for advice, and I give it. I say, let the crash come."

"Never!" cried Raymond, vehemently. "What! to have our home desecrated—our name disgraced—our position blotted out!—to be dragged down to the level of the common herd—to have the finger of scorn pointed at us! If that is your advice, I must go elsewhere, to seek for better." And he rose.

"Stay, Mr. Sylvester; I am willing to do what I can. I have tided you through many a narrow strait, and by many a quicksand. You must give me time for consideration."

"There is no time to lose," said Raymond, firmly; "you must see this man to-day."

"And what am I to tell him?"

"Need I repeat it? Appeal to his self-love, his interest, his cupidity. Tell him he is wiser if he forbear. Make any terms you like. Buy him off, if you will, at any price. All I ask is delay; even a month's delay might be our salvation!"

The mild eyes of the lawyer rested on Raymond's face for a moment; then an idea seemed slowly to dawn upon him.

"I see—I see! Well, I will do the best I can; I am not sanguine of success, mind, not at all."

"If you fail, it will be your own fault," said Raymond, hoarsely.

"You must not think so, Mr. Sylvester. You must give me credit for the best intentions."

"If you fail," and Raymond went close up and spoke the words in his ear,—"if you fail, we are ruined; if you succeed, we may be saved!"

"I see—I see!" again repeated the lawyer, "and I will go at once to Mr. Humphreys. But quiet yourself down, I beg of you; I never saw you so excited before."

Raymond smiled, an uneasy kind of smile; then, after some further parley, he took leave of Mr. Carlton, and hurried out into the street.

He had left his mother in a state of great anxiety, almost of despair. Alice knew nothing of the crisis which they were approaching; the burden lay upon the mother and the son.

"Be comforted, dear mother," said he, as he entered her room; "I have averted the danger, for a time at least; be comforted!" For he was shocked at the pallid hue of her face, and the look of suspense and alarm in her eyes. She had not closed her eyes, she said, the whole night long.

He sat down by her, and took her hand. He was a devoted and affectionate son, was Raymond Sylvester.

"I have, I hope, obtained a short delay. More, we dare not anticipate. But it gives us time, mother—it gives us time."

"Time for what, Raymond?"

She was still ashy pale, and the look of trouble had not gone out of her eyes.

"Time to consider what is to be done; to devise schemes, and carry them out," said Raymond, looking down.

"Ah, my son, what schemes can we devise? where can we look? If it were to save our lives, we could not raise that money."

Raymond was silent. He appeared to be intensely studying a threadbare place on the carpet.

"So that it is but a mere respite," continued his mother, in a tone of distress; "an interval of calm, and then will come—the end!"

"Be patient, dear mother; and be strong! Better days are in store for us," said Raymond, soothingly.

Lady Sylvester sighed.

"They are!" continued Raymond, in a tone in which tenderness and bitterness were curiously blended. "You must not think that I shall fail you—I that have done so much, mother. Ah! and suffered too! I am free, now, to devote to you my whole energies, and I will! I will save you, if it be possible, and at any cost."

He spoke the words as from the depth of his soul; and he raised his mother's hand to his lips, and reverently kissed it.

"Yes, at any cost!" He had hardly fathomed the depths of his own meaning; but the words came forth again, and yet again, and each time with stronger emphasis—"At any cost!"

CHAPTER XVIII.

HAROLD HEARS A PIECE OF NEWS.

"It has made you into a hero, in the eyes of the public, however," said Mr. Mapleson. "Here is the account of your adventure in the paper; should you like to read it?"

"No, thank you," replied Harold, coolly.

"Six men against one is rather an awkward odds," continued Mr. Mapleson. "I think you are a brave young fellow, Harold Blake."

"No more brave than my broad shoulders and strong arms entitle me to be," replied Harold, laughing. "After all, it was a mere adventure, and not worth discussing."

"You may call it an adventure, if you like; but whatever it was, it has raised you very much in my esteem, Harold Blake."

Harold bowed politely.

"Not that our relations to each other will be altered in the least. In a romance, I should be expected to promote you to some great honour: in real life, you remain just as you were."

Harold bowed again.

Mr. Mapleson was still laid up with the gout; and this conversation took place a day or two after Harold's adventure at the mill.

He was going home to dinner—a meal he was accustomed to snatch in haste. It would have been more convenient to drop into some eating-house at the other end of the town, as the distance to his lodgings was considerable. But there was Charley; Charley's day would have seemed very long and dreary without this break. The sight of Harold's face, and the sound of Harold's voice, did him good. Added to which, he could grumble a little; and that did him good as well.

By this time he had heard of Harold's danger; and it had made him shed a few tears, and express a great deal of alarm. And it had made him heartily abuse the "horrid mill," as he called it; and, for a very short period indeed, forget his own grievances. But the dangers and the trials of others never made much impression on Charley; and the tide of discontent threatened to flow as full and as strong as ever.

When Harold reached his lodgings, a surprise was in store for him. He stepped briskly up the stairs as usual, whistling as he went, for Harold was as cheerful as a lark, be his outward circumstances what they might.

"Now, then, Charley; dinner, if you please," said he, coming in at the door.

Charley's face looked so bright and joyous, that Harold could hardly believe his senses. Not that he forgot to begin with a complaint.

"Harold, how late you are! I thought you never meant to come!"

"Mr. Mapleson hindered me, that was all. Now, where's this roast turkey of ours?" added he, looking round, with a comical smile.

"You know we have no roast turkey, or are ever likely to have, Harold. Why do you make one's mouth water?" said Charley, reproachfully.

"What is it, then?"

"Cold mutton."

"Never mind, it is the most wholesome thing we can have; and we are as hungry as hunters."

"You may be, but I am not. I am never hungry," said Charley, relapsing into a peevish tone.

"Have you been out in the chair?"

"Yes, and that was what I wanted to tell you, only you were so late. I have had such an adventure!" And Charley's face brightened up again.

"Why, what has happened?" asked Harold, as he carved the meat, cutting the most delicate slices for his brother.

"I have seen somebody!" and Charley's eyes sparkled with delight. Indeed, he seemed quite a different being.

"Seen somebody? Who could he be?" asked Harold, not greatly interested, and eating his cold meat with an excellent appetite.

"You must guess."

"Oh, I can never guess. You know I never guessed anything in my life."

"And it is not he, it is she," added Charley, much excited.

"She! Come, Charley, you must eat your dinner," said Harold, helping himself a second time.

"I can't! It did me so much good! Of course, I cried at first, it reminded me so of old times; especially when she called me her little Roman friend!"

Harold's knife and fork dropped, as if he had received an electric shock. A brilliant light seemed to leap into his eyes.

"You have guessed, Harold! I see it by your face. The beautiful young lady we met in Rome!"

Harold did not speak. A variety of vivid emotions played across his countenance.

"You had better eat your dinner though, you have to go back to the mill," said Charley mischievously.

"Where did you see her, Charley? Come, my little lad, you must tell me all about it."

His voice had a curious quaver in it.

"I saw her in the market-place. I was going along the pavement in my chair, and Robert was pushing behind, when all at once such a grand carriage drove up, with coachmen, and footmen, and all——"

"Never mind that, Charley! About the persons inside the carriage," asked Harold, in a tone of eager interest.

"You need not interrupt me, Harold. I hate to be cut in two!" said Charley, fretfully.

"Well, dear, tell the story your own way," replied Harold, patiently.

"I was telling it. A carriage drove up, as I said, and the footman opened the door."

"The carriage stopped then?"

"Yes, of course it stopped, or how could the footman have got down? How stupid you are, Harold!"

Harold assumed a look of penitence, and held his peace.

"The carriage stopped at that grand shop opposite the market-house. I was almost close to it, so I could see everything. First there got out a very handsome lady, dressed like a widow——"

"A widow!" interrupted Harold, as if involuntarily.

"Yes, in a deep crape veil, and a long train, all of crape. I could see her face, because the veil——"

"And was there nobody else, Charley?" said Harold, in a tone of deep disappointment.

"Yes; if you will have patience, and hear me out. If you are so tiresome, I will not tell you anything."

Harold, as if thoroughly rebuked, held his peace again.

"The lady in black got out, and went into the shop; then another lady got out after her. She was in mourning, too; and as she passed close by me, I could not help crying out for joy; I was so glad to see her again!"

"Miss Sylvester?" said Harold, in a reverential whisper.

"Yes, the very same."

"Did she know you—did she speak to you?" eagerly inquired Harold.

"I should think she did. No one would be in much danger of forgetting me," said Charley, sadly; "and then you know how very kind she was to me, and how she came and sat with me, when you and the rest were gone out. She is more my friend than yours, Harold."

"Then she did speak to you?"

"Yes; and she was so surprised. She thought we were in Rome still, and she asked after——"

Charley paused, and both were silent a few moments.

"Did she, indeed," said Harold, in a tone of awe.

"Yes; and then she was so shocked. She turned quite pale, and the tears came into her eyes. I never saw any one so much distressed."

The cloud passed from Harold's face, and a kind of sunny gleam shone there.

"We had quite a long conversation. I told her everything. It is such a time since I had any one to speak to."

"Everything, Charley?"

"Yes, everything. I told her just how we were placed, and she seemed as if she could hardly believe it. She thought we were so rich, you know."

"Yes—yes!"

"Well, I told her that when poor papa and mamma died, one after the other, and we were left orphans, I told her you might have been rich still, if you had not been so silly (for I think it silly, and always shall) as to give up the estate to pay the debts. I said it had quite beggared us, and that we had to live in lodgings, and that you were overseer of a silk mill!" added Charley, in a tone of disgust.

"Charley, how could you tell her all that?"

"I did. Why shouldn't I? She is my friend, and I love her with all my heart. I asked her to come and see me."

Harold gave a quick glance round the room. The light in his eyes was more brilliant than ever.

"I think she will, too: some day when you are at the mill."

The light dropped suddenly down. A cloud seemed to come between Harold and the blissful object he was contemplating.

"Of course it will be delightful to me," continued Charley, in a tone of exultation. "I have wanted somebody to take a little notice of me, ever since we came. I am getting very tired of Mrs. Maynard."

"I wish she might come," said Harold, thinking of Alice Sylvester.

"It won't be my fault if she doesn't. I gave her the address, and told her what part of the day I was sure to be alone. I don't want her when you are at home," added Charley, with characteristic selfishness.

Harold's thoughts had flown back as on the wings of the wind. He was in the Eternal City, his parents with him. They were staying in the best hotel, and passing for a rich English family. Alice and her relatives were staying there as well. Visions rose up, painted as memory will paint, of some sweet, rare interviews with Alice. A recollection, vivid as any present joy could be, of how he had loved the very ground she trod on. He had never told her so. He had been withheld by the dread of a future that had in it a kind of doom. The doom had come, but not till Alice had passed from that immediate scene in Harold's history. Then had happened bereavement; Harold and his brother had become orphans. Next had come the loss of worldly gains, and of position—in fact, the loss of all things. Then Harold had returned to England, putting from him every thought of love, of ease—of all but the resolute determination to be honest. He had come to Newbury, as to a place where he had, at least, one friend, and where an opening might be made. And now on the bleak, cheerless path he was treading had dawned this vision of brightness and of beauty—Alice Sylvester.

(To be continued.)

MY BROTHER BEN AND I.

WHEN I was a lad of about twelve years of age, and was attending the grammar-school in Slubberton, near which town my father, a small Scotch proprietor, resided, no study pleased me so well as that of biography; and, having made a tolerable progress in arithmetic, and other knowledge, I received for a prize a book called "The British Plutarch," in which I read the lives of Milton, Pope, Sir Cloudesley Shovel, the Duke of Marlborough, Sir Francis Drake, and Cromwell. But great as all these worthies were, they were every one of them eclipsed, in my opinion, by my brother Ben, who had been at sea from an early age, and about the beginning of the Midsummer holidays came home, after an absence of nearly five years. Ben was fifteen years older than myself, and having entered the service as a midshipman, had been in several battles, in which he had gained both prize-money and promotion, and was now first lieutenant of the Thunderer, man-of-war, commanded by Captain Truman.

So I decided, in my own mind, that Ben was a much greater hero than Sir Cloudesley Shovel, the Duke of Marlborough, or any of those recorded in my Plutarch. And besides, he was such a fine fellow to look at, with his gold epaulettes, embroidery, and buttons, his cocked hat and plume, white waistcoat, and the glittering sword by his side. All the family, especially the female part and their acquaintances, shared my enthusiasm, and we had more young lady visitors during the week after Ben came home than we had had for a whole twelvemonth before.

It certainly was glorious to hear Ben talk and sing. He had a good voice, and he sang sea songs about Tom Bowling, Admiral Benbow, and Black-eyed Susan, which made me think that if there existed anywhere a paradise upon the earth, it must be on board of a man-of-war. Then he had been in both East and West Indies, and spoke of waving palms, with groves of orange and citron, with myrtles, magnolias, and passion flowers, all growing wild; of gales laden with the odours of spices and aromatic gums; rivers flowing over golden sands; humming-birds, parrots, and parroquets of all colours and sizes; blue monkeys, orange-coloured lizards, and fireflies. The result was that I formed a resolution to go, as soon as possible, and see all these wonderful things with my own eyes.

Possessing no taste for farming, Ben amused himself, while he was at home, in making, and showing me how to rig, a small frigate, of which my sisters hemmed the sails after they were cut out. When she was complete, and Ben launched her on the duck-pond in the meadow, she really was a saucy-looking craft, with her shapely hull, raking masts, and the British ensign floating in the wind; and as the breeze filled her canvas, and she floated majestically across the pond, I felt myself, in imagination at least, every inch a sailor! But my infatuation was achieved by Ben giving me, as a parting gift, a large, handsome edition of "Robinson Crusoe." I read this book morning, afternoon, and evening, and it lay under my pillow at night.

After reading Robinson three times through, it came into my head that I should like to act it. The opportunity soon offered. My father having built a new pigsty, I begged for the old one—which was in the corner of a field, around three sides of which was a wide, deep ditch—in order to make a hut like Robinson did on his island. Obtaining permission, I and my brother Teddy, who was two years younger than I, new thatched and cleaned it as well as we possibly could. We then, with old boards, and the tools which Ben had lent me to use while he was away, contrived to make two three-legged stools, a couple of perches, and a shelf; on the latter I placed my tea-mug, an old yellow dish, and a plate or two, given me by my mother, and with my Robinson to read, and the grey parrot, that I had taught to say, "Poor Rob," which it did incessantly; the old Tom-cat; and a goat, which was lame of a leg. I spent many happy hours; Teddy, in a black paper mask, with an oval slit for the mouth, and two smaller ones for the eyes, making an admirable Man Friday. All this was very delightful, and went on for a good while; but no pleasures are lasting in this world; an accident brought ours to a conclusion. Teddy and I had made a raft by tying some boards together with an old rope, and, having pushed it into the ditch, we embarked upon it, along with the parrot, cat, and goat; and, by the aid of a clothes-prop, paddled ourselves backwards and forwards several times in triumph, till at length, the rope being rotten and unable to bear the strain, gave way, the raft came to pieces, and we were all suddenly submerged in the muddy ditch. My father and Tom Hackett, hearing our cries, came and dragged out Teddy and me. The goat scrambled up the bank by itself; but puss and poll were unfortunately drowned.

My father said but little, though he had forbidden us to play near the ditch many times. But the next day he announced his intention of putting me, as I was now nearly fourteen years old, apprentice to Mr. Dip, the tallow-chandler in Slubbarton. Now, my father was a worthy, Christian man, but he was firm almost to obstinacy. What he had once resolved upon was like the laws of the Medes and Persians, which could never be altered; so I had to give up all my dreams, and go to Mr. Dip's. I abhorred the smell of tallow, and detested grease; but it did not matter—in canvas apron and sleeves I was obliged to work in the hated melting-house from morning till night. This I had done for a week; the next day would be melting-day, and I determined to avoid it, and all its horrors, by running away. Accordingly, after all the family were in bed, I let myself down from the window by the sheets, which I tied together and fastened to the bedstead, and made the best of my way to a small seaport town about fifteen miles off. I got there early in the morning, and went to the beach to look at the ships. There were not many, but before I could observe them a stout, red-faced man accosted me, and asked if I wanted a berth; I told him I did, whereupon he said he would engage me for the voyage to go as ship's boy in the Lively Nancy, as fine a vessel as ever sailed; "and as you're a strong, active-looking chap," said he, "if you mind your p's and q's, you'll come to be a captain like me some day or other."

Captain Driver, for that was his name, took me into a small public-house, with the sign of the "Three Jolly Tars," where, after a repast of bread and cheese and ale, I fell fast asleep, and never woke till evening, when a rough-looking man, who said he was the mate, came to fetch me to go on board of the Lively Nancy. When there, he told me I might turn in for the night, and showed me my berth, which looked, for all the world, like a shelf in a coal-cellar. I was still too stupefied with the ale I had drunk to notice much, but I found the next morning, to my intense disgust, that I had shipped myself on board of a collier-brig, and that, instead of being on a voyage to "Araby the Blest" for a cargo of fragrant spices, we were bound for Sunderland to fetch coals! I was, besides all this, awfully sick, and, like my prototype Robinson, heartily repented of my wicked disobedience; but there was no help for it; we were far out at sea by this time, and to cure my seasickness, Mr. Bolt gave me a dose which he said he had never known to fail. This was a basin of gruel, seasoned with salt and Cayenne pepper. It nearly choked me, and set my throat on fire; but whether it was really efficacious, or through dread of its repetition, I don't know, but I got better. I cannot describe half the miseries I endured in this short voyage, and the return was still worse. Captain Driver had one infallible argument to enforce all his commands; this was a rope's end, by means of which he compelled me, despite of terror,

"To climb the high and giddy mast," and to perform all the other frightful tasks he imposed upon me. To make matters worse, the cargo shifted in a gale, and blocked up the door of the cabin, where was the only fireplace in the brig; so that we had to live on raw salt pork and mouldy biscuit for three weeks, during which we were knocking about in the Channel, the wind being contrary. When, after all, I reached home, black as a chimney-sweep, I found my brother Ben already there, who received me with a hearty laugh, while my mother actually wept at my appearance.

"In the name of all that's abominable," said Ben, "where have you been? On a cruise to Davy's Locker, I should think; for that you have been to sea, I can see by the cut of your jib!"

When I replied, "On board a coal brig," he laughed still more; but said, "That's no bad beginning; they make taut sailors on board those colliers."

"I don't want to go to sea any more," said I; "I hate it!"

Then my father broke in; it was the first time he had spoken to me since my return. "Eh! but ye will go to sea again, Rob. We'll hae nae mair changing. As ye hae made yer bed, so ye maun lie on't." However, in the end my mother prevailed on him to relent, and I returned to the factory.

Warned by my sufferings on board the brig, I endured its unpleasantness with patience. In time I became valuable to Mr. Dip, who, not many years after the expiration of my apprenticeship, engaged me as manager of his entire business.

My brother Ben, who retired from "the service" with the rank of post-captain, resides in the old house with his family. He often says that he believes my father was quite right in his opinion that I was intended for a man of business, and that, as a rule, parents are better judges of what is for their children's good, than they can possibly be themselves.

M. W.

THE BOYFRIEND

Saturday, May 30, 1868.

(Drawn by B. BRADLEY.)

"And dropped at his feet with a wailing cry."—p. 590.

THE FIRST QUARREL.

BY ALTON CLYDE.

PART II.

"YES, aunt, you don't seem to believe me, but it is true. I can bear Edward's tyranny no longer, so I have left him and returned to you, the only friend in the world who really understands me;" and, thoroughly broken down by the day's excitement, Dora—still in her travelling dress,—dropped into the nearest chair, and wept passionate tears behind the screen of her lace veil.

Aunt Charlotte was a little fair woman, with large tender, grey eyes, and bands of soft silver hair, parted smoothly over her forehead. She seemed greatly distressed, and gave her visitor, a grieved, startled look as she rose, putting aside her knitting so hurriedly, that many of the stitches were dropped, and the ball of wool rolled on the hearthrug, hopelessly abandoned to the mercies of a black kitten that lay there.

"Why, Dora, my child, what does all this mean? I thought you and Edward were so happy."

"Yes, so we were until lately," she answered, with a sob between each word; "but now everything is changed. It is all Edward's temper: he gets so exacting, and says such cruel things when he is vexed."

She was sobbing like a child now. Aunt Charlotte quietly removed her bonnet, and passed her soft hand over the aching, swollen eyelids, saying, "In spite of all that you tell me of your domestic troubles, Dora, I am very unwilling to believe that you have really left your husband."

"I could not help it, aunt; his bitter words goaded me on. Does not this show that I am serious?" and drawing off her glove, she showed the finger where her wedding-ring should have been.

The gentle matron started and turned pale.

"What! taken off your ring Dora! how could you do that?"

"Because I wished to show him, that though I am his wife, it does not follow I am to be the slave of his temper, and I will not!"

This was spoken with a momentary flash of the old fire. Aunt Charlotte's voice was full of sorrowful reproach, as she answered:

"Hush, child! this talk grieves me more than I can tell, for I cannot help clinging to the opinion that there are faults on both sides, and that you have sins of temper to be charged with, as well as Edward. There is only one course before us; you have made an unhappy mistake, which you can only repair by going back at once."

"Going back, Aunt Charlotte! is it possible that you refuse me a home with you?"

"Yes, Dora, I do, under present circumstances. If I loved you less, and had not your true interest at heart, I might encourage you to remain, and nurse your sense of injury, until you fancied yourself a victim; but this would be going against my conscience. Setting aside my own affection for you, and acting only as woman to woman, I should not be doing right if I did not show you that your true place is in your husband's home, and your duty, to make the best of the lot you have chosen; for a wife cannot throw off her allegiance lightly, as you have done, just because things do not chance to turn out according to her wishes. Go back, child, and bear in mind that God knows exactly how much we are capable of bearing, and will not permit poor weak humanity to be tried beyond its strength."

It was a painful scene that followed—very painful to the unselfish friend and true womanly counsellor, who was content to have her motives misjudged by the niece whom she loved so dearly. She only said, in her firm, gentle way—

"These are hard things for you to say, and me to hear, Dora; but I shall not remember them against you, because I know you are not yourself, and I can make allowances. Poor rash girl, you do not know your own heart. If anything happened to your husband, you would never forgive yourself for this night's desertion. Go back, my child, and some time you will thank me for what you now call my unkindness and want of sympathy."

It was in vain that Dora tried to move Aunt Charlotte's resolution, changing her own mood of angry opposition for one of gentle persuasion, and pleading hard to be allowed to remain only a few days, until she could decide upon her plans for the future. The good adviser listened patiently, firmly but gently resisting every new argument as it was urged.

"You must go home, Dora, under present circumstances. I would not have you stay one night under any roof but your husband's. I must take you back."

"You, aunt?"

"Yes; I may help to smooth the way for you, and I could not rest satisfied to let you go alone. Don't try to dissuade me: I have made up my mind."

Dora saw that she had, so quietly gave up the contest, and yielded to the stronger will, which, happily for her, had always guided her in the right way. Aunt Charlotte took possession of her niece, as she was wont to do; with her own hands arranging the disordered dress, and sitting by to see that she drank the tempting cup of tea which she had brought; only leaving her a few minutes, while she went to prepare for her own unexpected journey.

They were soon on their way to London: Dora, half repentant and half mutinous, crushing herself into a corner of the railway carriage, as if she wished to escape observation; Aunt Charlotte's quiet figure interposing itself as a shield between her and all inquisitive eyes, giving her the sense of security and protection which she so much needed on that trying night. That presence seemed in some way to take from her the responsibility of her rash act, and made the return less difficult. The good aunt showed such tender consideration for her feelings, and touched the new round with such delicate, womanly tact, that poor little Dora was ready to be completely subdued, before the train shrieked its arrival at the Paddington terminus.

It was growing late—an hour when quiet, respectable people, who had nothing to bring them out of doors, were either gone or going to bed, as could be seen by the lights gleaming in upper windows, and the general silence that pervaded the deserted streets, where the rattling of cab-wheels seemed to rouse such unexpected echoes. The elder of the two ladies had desired to be driven rapidly, and the cabman was willing to comply. It was likely to be his last fare, for he was tired, and anxious to get home, so he whipped his jaded horse to its utmost speed.

Aunt Charlotte felt Dora's hand creep into hers and grasp it tightly, as the cab turned into the familiar square, which she had only left a few hours before. At that moment the cabman drew up suddenly, further progress being impossible. Another instant, and the two startled women were looking at each other with blanched faces, and appealing to him for explanation of the strange scene of confusion in which they found themselves. One glance told all. It was the terrible alarm of fire which had gathered the excited crowd which now swayed to and fro before one of the rows of handsome houses in the square—a crowd that steadily increased, receiving fresh additions from every side, until a dense mass of humanity blocked the way, only parting when the impetuous whir of wheels proclaimed the arrival of another engine. There were the usual sights and sounds that accompany such scenes, the usual features which invest them with such terrible interest for the popular mind. It was a clear, frosty night, with a sharp breeze, that favoured the spreading of the devouring element. It was terribly impressive to watch the dark sea of upturned faces, catching lurid reflections, now and then, from the fierce tongues of flame shooting out from the windows, and greedily licking up everything on which it was possible to feed.

"In which house is the fire? Oh! do tell us!" cried an eager, breathless voice from the cab.

"It be at Mr. Holmes, the barrister," said a bystander, in explanation; adding, "if it weren't for the wind, there'd be a better chance. The next house has caught, and it'll be a miracle if the rest can be kept clear."

The last part of the sentence was lost to those around, being drowned in a wild scream from a woman's voice, that quivered through the air, and rose above all other sounds, shrill and sharp in its agony. At the same moment a white hand wrenched open the door of the cab, and Dora sprang out, white-faced and tearless, with a look of dumb horror in her dilating eyes, and such despair in her young face, that it touched even the cabman. Behind her, and vainly struggling to keep a hold on her dress, came Aunt Charlotte, scarcely less excited than her niece, but sterner and calmer, with nerves more under control, and better able to act in the distressing emergency.

At that moment there was a swaying, rocking movement of the crowd. The babel of tongues was suddenly hushed, and the stillness of intense expectation seemed to fall upon the crowd. A breathless interval of watching and waiting, during which all eyes were drawn to one centre—an upper window in the burning house; for there the figure of a man had been seen, where none else dared to venture, taking the great risk with a grand, brave daring, and fighting his way on, in spite of the blinding smoke and the background of flame, that showed him so plainly to those below. Dora saw him with the rest, and a gasping cry of agony broke from her lips, "My husband!—oh, my husband!"

She was right; it was he.

These were the facts, as they were canvassed among the crowd. When the alarm of fire was first given, all the household were in bed, except Mr. Holmes, who, it was supposed, had been sitting late over his papers. The fire was believed to have originated through the carelessness of a servant in putting out the kitchen lights. The flames spread with such rapidity that, from the first, there was little hope of saving the house and furniture. The utmost that the firemen could do was to confine their efforts to preserving the adjoining property.

Just at the last moment, when they were expecting the falling-in of the roof, it was discovered that an elderly female servant, reported to have been confined to her bed by illness for the last two days, had been left to perish in the flames, for it seemed impossible that human help could reach the poor creature at that eleventh hour; but while the horror-stricken servants were looking at each other in dismay, the master himself dashed back to the burning house, and went gallantly to the rescue. For some minutes it was feared that two lives would be the sacrifice; but at last he reappeared, bearing his helpless burden. When they saw him struggle on, and finally reach the window, to which the fire-escape had been fixed, the people were too excited even to cheer. Not until he had seen his charge carried down in safety did he attempt to use the escape for himself. A few moments after he reached the ground the roof fell with a loud crash. It was then, when he stood in their midst, with his scorched hands and singed dress, that the cheers of the people broke forth, rising above the crash of falling timber and the hissing of the flames.

That he, a gentleman in the ranks above them, should have risked so much to save the life of a sick servant, was something new to that section of the unlettered million gathered there. It gave them kindlier thoughts of the classes whom they were accustomed to regard with suspicion and distrust; and did more than any eloquent platform oration would have done to bridge the wide chasm of prejudice, and soften down the social inequalities which were sometimes forced so hardly upon them. It was then that Dora tore herself from Aunt Charlotte's restraining hold, and rushing wildly through the crowd, made her way to where her husband stood, and dropped at his feet with a wailing cry, too low to reach any ear but his.

"Oh, Edward! I am here: do not turn from me!"

He did not, though her desertion had given him such a heart-wound, and he had such cruel evidence against her, in the crumpled note which he had hidden in his breast, in the hurry and agitation of the fire. It contained the discarded wedding-ring. He did not turn from her when she dropped at his feet, for he read her heart without disguise, and the love which he saw there was sufficient in his eyes to cover a multitude of shortcomings. So it was that, regardless of the scene around him, and the peril which he had braved, he took the slight figure in his arms, and guided by Aunt Charlotte, who had followed close after her niece, carried her safely back to the cab.

* * * * *

That night saw their complete reconciliation. Dora wept repentant tears on her husband's breast, and when, at her timid request, he slipped back the ring to its place on her finger, she murmured that it was almost like a new marriage; and bending over her, he said with a return of all his old tenderness—

"Dora, this accident of the fire will place us in rather an awkward position as regards household accommodation, but a few weeks will repair that; and, after all, I am indebted to it for letting me know that my wife loved me. I began to doubt: for that flight of yours was a cruel revenge to take."

"Hush, Edward! I have been punished for my fault; for until I saw you in peril I did not know my own heart, as Aunt Charlotte said. I did wrong; but in the days to come I trust to be better and wiser for the lesson I have learnt to-night."

"And I also, Dora; for I cannot hold myself blameless. I was too proud and tyrannical; not making enough allowance for the difference of age and temperament; acting the master rather than the husband, and trying to exact by authority the obedience to my wishes which I might have won by gentle persuasion. But can you ignore that ten years' seniority, and take back the burden of your wifely duties, without fear even of the long dull evenings?"

"And learn to find all my enjoyment at home," she added, with an affected pout of her pretty lips.

He smiled, and said, "Now let us turn to Aunt Charlotte, whom we have forgotten too long, and thank her together for this happy reconciliation. It is her work, for if she had not been what she is, a true friend and judicious guide, she would not have sent you back, and our future lives might have been divided and marred, as many have been, for want of a little sensible advice at the right moment. 'Bear and Forbear,' let that be our motto, Dora, whenever we are in danger of forgetting what is due to each other. Then our first quarrel will be our last, and my little wife will not again have occasion to forsake her husband and discard her wedding-ring."

REST.

A YOUNG voice sang in the Christmas choir,
 'Neath an old hallowed fane;
 Its sweet tones warbled to heaven's high door,
 In the words of the solemn hymn. 'Twas o'er,
 But none who listened said, "No more Shall she chant it here again!"

The New Year turned its pure white page,
 To be written with death and life;
 And stern were thoughts of the sealed-up past,
 But hopes for the future were bright and vast;
 And the willing and weak went forth too fast
 To face the unequal strife.

Softly and low in the silent snow,
 Unheard in the chill east wind,
 Came the Master's message, that men call Death;

And no more could the faint and struggling breath
 Its tuneful utterance find.

* * * * *

The sunshine streamed over tower and tree,
 One glorious day in June;
 But the lips were still, and the brow was cold,
 And the brief, sad tale of life was told;
 So they laid her low in the churchyard old;
 To rest from the heat of noon.

To rest! Oh, hard-earned rest is sweet,
 Though we would not be forgot;
 The brave young life was not in vain,
 Its patient suffering and silent pain,
 And they are at rest, indeed, who gain
 The home of the better lot.

We need not grieve, though the place we loved Forget that we e'er have been :
 Though the world goes on as it went before,
 And the summer is joyous as of yore,
 And they think of us and our ways no more,
 And our graves are never seen.

We need not grieve, if in heaven's choir
 For us a harp be found.
 Since if for good our work outlast
 Both memory and the life soon past,
 It is a seed, for harvest cast
 Awhile into the ground. A. BOND.

BYGONES.

BY THE REV. J. HILES HITCHENS, F.R.S.L.

IT was Earl Russell who once defined a proverb to be "the wisdom of many and the wit of one." Certainly, truth sententially enshrined in some of our proverbial expressions reaches multitudes to whom books are sealed treasures. Every day the young and the unlettered thus receive valuable instruction, in a form both pleasing and portable, whilst the most experienced and learned are reminded of their moral duties and social obligations. The homely maxim—the condensed but plenary truth—finds an entrance into many minds quicker far than argument, and lodges where logic is rebutted. It is "as a nail fastened by the master of assemblies."

But every good thing is liable to abuse, and these familiar sayings are sometimes wrongly employed. The Apostle Peter declared that there were portions of Holy Writ applied by men to purposes for which they were never designed. If the Word of God be thus wrested, who can be surprised at a perverted interpretation of the word of man? There is a proverbial expression, often on the lips of some, which we venture to think will repay for a few moments' examination. Its misuse was forcibly impressed upon us by an overheard conversation between two respectably-dressed men, who were evidently well known to each other. After familiarly alluding to their past lives, to the errors into which they had fallen, and the penalties they had paid, they each strove to quiet conscience and drug memory by remarking, "Let bygones be bygones!" They employed those words in a too general acceptance; but if the expression is intended to be applied in the sense those pseudo gentlemen gave it, then the quicker it is obliterated from the catalogue of popular sayings the better.

Memory and reflection are normal endowments of the soul. God has bestowed these faculties that men may grasp events as they transpire, recall them with vivid distinctness at their pleasure, and make them pass before the introspective glance of the mind. By these powers the human soul is independent of time and space; can look backward on scenes that have long since faded from the natural vision; and can pronounce concerning their merit or demerit. Nothing is absolutely forgotten that has once been stored in the chambers of the brain. Albeit long years may elapse, during which the incidents and experiences of our early life may lie buried, they are not obliterated—not dead. A trifling event, an unusual sight or sound, may touch the secret spring, resuscitate the dormant power, and people the present with the possessions of the past. Cowper found this when, in his fifty-ninth year, he saw the portrait of his departed mother. Subdued and melted by the minute circumstances and tender impressions of his childhood, which trooped before him, he sat down to immortalise that parent in the familiar lines of thrilling beauty. Oh, it is an evidence of God's infinite wisdom and love that we are so constituted. Were bygones bygones, in the sense of total forgetfulness, man's knowledge could not be cumulative; man's intellectual powers could not be progressive; all his convictions and impressions would for ever vanish immediately they yielded their place to others; and Adam's children would never put away childish things. But now, when the mind apprehends one fact, it makes that one a stepping-stone to reach forth to many others. Every truth consciously accepted is like an additional stone in the construction of an edifice. It is the accession of a treasure to the mental museum. The man becomes more manly; he is equipped, enriched, energised, and developed for something better. Far be it from us, then, to wish bygones to be erased from the leaves of memory. Contrariwise, be it ours to look often into the register of the past, and reflect on the part we have played, and the manner in which we have played it, that thereby we may learn to be cautious, considerate, and consistent in the future. This the Eternal held forth, not only as a privilege but as a duty, when he said to the Israelites, and through them to us—"Thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldest keep his commandments or no, . . . that he might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live."

Who would wish the mercies he has received in the past to be by-gones? Is not the pleasure of life, to a very considerable extent, drawn from the recollection of the sunny, joyous, halcyon hours that have fled? There are scores of human hearts that would be crushed beneath intolerable burdens, but that they are supported by the pleasures of memory. Many a pilgrim, advancing in a dark and trying path, comforts himself by recounting the Ebenezers he has erected. Who does not know that to enumerate the love-tokens bestowed by the Divine hand, is not only an antidote to despair, but an inexhaustible source of refreshment? Richter has truly said: "Remembrance is the only paradise out of which we cannot be driven away. Indeed, our first parents were not to be deprived of it." One of the greatest mistakes we make is that of omitting to walk abroad in this paradisiacal garden of Heaven's good and perfect gifts. We too seldom visit it; and, when we do, our attention is confined only to one or two parterres; and hence we enjoy fewer of life's healthful and beauteous flowers.

There are some who, cherishing their mercies, wish their offences to be by-gones. They have most egregiously erred—lamentably sinned. Memory is crowded with their follies. But those offences will not, cannot, become by-gones. The past is not dead, though it sleepeth. The offender may command with centurion-like authority, but the sins refuse to rest in oblivion. The gloomy spectres submit not to his exorcism. Ever and anon they rise with renewed strength, biting like an adder and stinging like a scorpion.

We have heard of a wealthy landlord, who dealt with unwonted cruelty towards a poor widow, who was his tenant. The widow's son, a lad of but eight summers, witnessed the painful scene with untold horror. He never forgot it. Some years afterwards, he became a skilled artist, and then portrayed on the canvas the sad scene of which in youth he was the spectator. By a strange coincidence, the landlord saw the picture. The past relived before him. A deathlike pallor mantled his face. He felt ill; and under the profound influence of remorse, he offered an almost fabulous sum for the painting, in order to conceal it from public gaze. Just so is it with every man. There is a power ever near us taking notes, and, though our guilt may never reappear on the canvas, it is stereotyped, photographed on the mind, and will confront us right through life. Our to-day is inseparably linked to our yesterday. Man's life is one. He is what he is in the present, because of what he was in the past. Hence if a man has greatly fallen, his soul will be to him a chamber of horrors. Much as he may desire, he cannot shroud or sepulchre the sins of the remotest past. He is constrained to say with Job, "Thou writest bitter things against me, and makest me to possess the iniquities of my youth."

Nor should we wish our by-gone offences to be entirely forgotten by ourselves, even though we may have sought and found Divine forgiveness. Truly God pardons without limitations or conditions. Freely, bountifully, right royally, the Holy One forgives. Ay, he judicially forgets, and so emblematically asserts that he has cast our sins behind his back, and into the depths of the sea, that they may be remembered against us no more for ever. But if infinite mercy absolves us, we should not exonerate ourselves. We should remember our errors, that we may not only foster true humility, but strengthen our daily vigilance and reliance on Jesus.

In what sense, then, are by-gones to be by-gones? We answer: In the sense of exercising Christian charity; in the sense of forgiving the faults and cherishing reticence concerning the imperfections and failures of our fellow-men. Nothing more clearly displays the littleness of the natural man, or the weakness of the spiritual life in the professed Christian, than the constant allusion to the faults of others who are regarded as enemies. Nor does anything show greater nobility of character, and truer assimilation to the holy God-Man, than the forgiveness of, and sympathy with, wrongdoers. There are persons who take supreme delight in recounting to others the mistakes and sins of their acquaintances. Conversation to them is synonymous with detraction and defamation. They carry with them, into all circles, the recollection of a real or fancied wrong. They strive to convince themselves that vengeance is theirs, and that it is their prerogative to recompense. Others there are who boastingly affirm that they forgive, but cannot forget; and, under that cover, are ever exhuming grievances that should be entombed. Unhappy men! They disturb their own hearts, and, whether they think it or not, place themselves in a light in which no right-minded companion can admire them. A well-known member of Parliament once quoted, in the House of Commons, some puerile lines of poetry composed in youth by another member, against whose political views he was then speaking. In reply, the author retorted, "I would rather have been the man who in his youth wrote those silly verses, than the man who in his mature years would rake them up." So have we often thought, when we have heard men resuscitating and narrating the private inconsistencies and errors of others, that we would prefer to be the man who erred, and whose faults are sepulchred in the past, than he who, undertaking the grave-digger's work, finds pleasure in disinterring the unpleasant dead. Oh, it is a beautiful and God-like thing to pass by private offences with silent compassion for the offender. We do not counsel the reader to look with complacency on sins in any person. "The best man hates them most; the worst man cannot love them; but are these the man? Does a woman bear that form in virtue of these? Lies there not within the man and the woman a divine element of brotherhood, of sisterhood—a something lovely and lovable?" Let that divine element be recognised by us. Let us love the brother and the sister, but so hate that which is imperfect and unlovely about them as to hasten to forget it.

Making bygones bygones thus would neither endanger nor lessen public security. We make a distinction between private and public wrongs. A Christian man, however influenced by charity, is still a citizen of the earth, and has social rights which Christianity does not ask him to forego, but rather to defend. To be Christ-like is not to be a coward. Public sins should be followed by chastisement. The law and its penalty, which are a terror to evil-doers, must be upheld. But when justice has had its demands, and especially when the correction has proved reformatory, it is the part, not only of Christian charity, but of common fairness, to say, "Let bygones be bygones." Do not check the man's eager efforts to gain an honest livelihood—to offer society some degree of reparation for the past—and to reinstate himself and those dear to him in the esteem of men, from which, in the hour of temptation, he fell. You may not, you cannot, absolutely forget how he wronged you and society, but you can now forgive, and you need not unnecessarily remind him or others of his former guilt. Remember how the Divine Father deals with you, and think of the heart-probing petition put into your lips by Jesus, "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them who trespass against us." Go and taste the luxury of saying, with Shakespeare—

"Kneel not to me:
The power that I have on you is to spare you;
The malice towards you, to forgive you; live,
And deal with others better."

How can we expect to receive forgiveness of God while we exclude a brother from our mercy? If a voice from the Holy Presence were to pronounce us forgiven, whilst we are unforgiving, the declaration would not reach us; or, if it did, would operate as a curse. The assurance of Divine favour, coming when hatred possessed our breasts, would naturally be interpreted as an indication of God's approval, or non-observance of our ill-will. We should continue to foster the murderous feelings, under the impression that they did not affect our Godward relationships. A hell-born disease would permeate the very core, and destroy the beauty of our life, albeit we deemed ourselves healthful and prosperous. It is a solemn fact that the door which shuts out a brother from our forgiveness, shuts out Heaven's pardon from our hearts. When that door is open to let our compassion forth on her Christ-like errand, it is open also to admit Christ's pardoning grace to our spirits. It is from a heart pulsating with kindness that our Father sends the message, "If ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your heavenly Father forgive your trespasses."

THE EXPLORATION OF PALESTINE.

BY THE REV. CHARLES BOUTELL, M.A.

CHAPTER III.

WHATEVER discoveries may result from the exploration of Palestine, few, if any, can compare with those which the explorers may reasonably expect to await their researches beneath the present surface of the ground, within the walls of the existing Jerusalem, and in its immediate neighbourhood. There are, indeed, no spots on earth that, in deep and manifold interest, can compete with the sites of the Temple and of the Sepulchre of Christ. These are the two points of pre-eminent interest in the Holy City, around which a multitude of less important (but still very far from unimportant) questions range themselves. It was both right in itself and also strictly consistent that, almost at the outset of their proceedings, the Exploration Society should direct their attention to Jerusalem itself, and should enter at once with the most determined earnestness upon the work of exploration there.

Accordingly, when he had established himself in Jerusalem, towards the end of August, in the year 1867, Lieutenant Warren speedily arranged his plan of operations, and then forthwith began the work which he has carried on with but little intermission, and certainly with never-failing zeal and discretion, up to the present time.

It must be understood, however, that the works of exploration that have been projected and carried into effect, in and near the Holy City, by Lieutenant Warren, since the August of last year, were in continuation of his researches in the same localities from February to July, also in 1867.

Lieutenant Warren has had under his orders two non-commissioned officers, like himself, of the Royal Engineers, both of them exactly the right men to be associated with such a commander, and to discharge in the most satisfactory manner the duties entrusted to them. Of Sergeants Birtles and Phillips—the latter the accomplished photographer who had been with Captain Wilson—I shall have occasion hereafter frequently to speak.

Before I commence any description of Lieutenant Warren's explorations in Jerusalem, it will be desirable for me, very concisely, to give a descriptive sketch of the Holy City, of its situation, and form, and general arrangement, as it now stands on that same grand plateau of uplifted rock which David was the first to conquer, and where Solomon first built and dedicated a Temple to the Most High. Some such slight description will be necessary in order to enable the reader, without having to refer to other writings, to form a correct conception of the scene of Lieutenant Warren's explorations.

If not actually, Jerusalem is virtually placed in the centre of Palestine: distant from the Mediterranean 32 miles; 18 miles from the Jordan; from Hebron to the south, 20 miles; and from Samaria to the north, 36 miles. Jerusalem has been built on the southern edge of one of the highest table-lands of Palestine. Its site is a kind of promontory, sharply cut off and enclosed towards the east, the south, and the west by the valleys or ravines of the Kedron, of Hinnom, and of Gihon; and these three deep and precipitous valleys having united towards the south-east of the city (as is shown in the Plan) from their point of union, fall suddenly and rapidly until, as a single ravine, they reach the Dead Sea. Thus the promontory of Jerusalem is left boldly intrenched by Nature—such a site as could not elsewhere be found for a city of which the annals should be without a parallel in human history. The existing city walls, which were constructed as they now appear by the Ottoman Sultan, Selim I., A.D. 1542, to the east and west rise directly from the crests of the valleys; while towards the south the walls are seen to recede somewhat from the verge of the elevated ground. To the north, the boundary-line of the city has been marked out by no natural intrenchments of deep and precipitous valleys, so that in this one direction Jerusalem, as events in the course of its history might require, could either extend or contract its limits. The Plan shows the form and position of the existing city, with the disposition of its walls. In this Plan the letters I, L, N, and E severally indicate the north-eastern, the north-western, the south-western, and the south-eastern angles of the city walls; at K is the Damascus Gate, x is the Jaffa Gate, v the Zion Gate, and near the letter H is St. Stephen's Gate.

In round numbers, the extent of the walls may be stated as follows:—On the east, from E to I, 2,800 feet; on the north, from I to L, 3,800 feet; on the west, from L to N, 2,350 feet; and on the south, from N to E, 3,350 feet. The highest elevation of the rock-plateau of Jerusalem, near the N.W. angle (L in the Plan), is 2,581 feet above the level of the Mediterranean. From this point there is a gentle slope southwards, so that at the S.W. angle (N) the elevation is 2,538 feet. From this line of the western wall the city, between the angles L and N, the surface of the plateau inclines somewhat sharply towards the east; and, accordingly, at I, the N.E. angle, the elevation above the Mediterranean is 2,457 feet; and at the S.E. angle (E in the Plan), the level within the walls is 2,416 feet, and that without the walls is 2,365 feet above the sea. Thus, to a spectator looking at Jerusalem from without the walls, the city is seen to slope from west to east; and this slope appears more sharp and decided when the city is seen from the south. Beyond the Kedron valley, and very close to the eastern wall, E, I, the ridge of Olivet interposes between Jerusalem and the wilderness of the Dead Sea. At its highest point, which is the true "Mount of Olives," this ridge rises to the elevation of 2,724 feet above the Mediterranean; and thus Olivet commands Jerusalem from the east,

(Drawn by G. J. PINWELL.)

"The living mother bending o'er the cot Wherein her babe lay dead!"—p. 587.

while, from its close proximity, it also appears, when seen from the west, and particularly from the north-west, to rise boldly from out of the city itself. At the foot of the mount, on its western side, and below its highest elevation, at the spot marked x in the Plan, is the memorable "Garden of Gethsemane," of which there are good reasons for supposing that the traditional site may be accepted as authentic.

In addition to the three encircling valleys that enclose the promontory of Jerusalem within a great natural intrenchment, the promontory itself is cleft by another ravine-like valley running from south to north, which divides the city into two sections of unequal sizes. This valley, known as the "Tyropœon" (that is, "the valley of the cheese makers and sellers"), is shown in the Plan, issuing from the valley of Hinnom, and dying away within the walls in the direction of the Damascus Gate. In ancient times, a subordinate valley appears to have stretched westwards from the Tyropœon, about the middle of the city, as is slightly indicated in the Plan: and another branch also once extended in the other direction, eastwards, which probably joined the Kedron valley somewhere about n in the Plan. The whole of the Tyropœon valley within the walls, with its two branches, have gradually been so far filled up with ruins and accumulated earth, as to have lost all visible traces of their original character.

It will be understood that the larger, higher, and more massive portion of Jerusalem, standing to the west of the Tyropœon valley, is the "Upper City" of the Jews—the "Zion" of modern tradition; and that the smaller eastern portion, on its less elevated rock, is the "Akra," or "Lower City," of Josephus, which also has been distinguished as "Moriah," as the western city has been entitled "Zion." This eastern division of Jerusalem, as the Plan represents, contains the HARAM, or sacred enclosure, within which, without any hesitation, it may be affirmed that the Temple once stood. Within this Haram, upon a slightly elevated platform, stands the remarkable edifice (hereafter to be fully described) long called the "Mosque of Omar," but now more correctly known as the "Dome of the Rock;" its site is marked in the Plan by the letter A. b is the site of the "Golden Gate;" c, that of the mosque "Al Aksa;" d, the site of the true "Mosque of Omar;" e is the residence of the Pacha of Jerusalem; n is the spot which now bears the name of the "Pool of Bethesda;" m is the Citadel; r is the site of the pile of buildings that has been so long known as the "Church of the Holy Sepulchre;" q is the "Muristan"—the site where once stood the buildings of the Knights Hospitallers of St. John. x is the pool or reservoir "Mamilla." s, in the valley, is the "Lower Pool of Gihon." t denotes the position of an edifice which, by a strange combination of traditions, both of them alike without any vestige of authority, bears the titles of the "Tomb of David and of the "Coenaculum," or supper-chamber in which our Lord celebrated his last Passover with his apostles. z, a little more to the south-west, is the situation of the English schools, with the English cemetery near to them. To the south of the south wall of the Haram, o shows the hill "Ophel;" and here, a little below u, the south-east angle of the Haram walls, at v, is the "Virgin's Fount;" and, once more, still lower in the valley, on the slopes of Ophel, nearly opposite to the present village of Siloam, but facing towards the entrance of the Tyropœon, is the "Pool of Siloam," which, as I shall show, is connected by a remarkable passage cut in the solid rock with the Virgin's Fount.

Such is a very slight and concise sketch of some of the more important features in the topography of the modern Jerusalem, which, should it appear to be necessary or desirable, may be described more in detail hereafter; as other sites, now not noticed at all, may be brought forward, and careful descriptions of them may be given. Here I shall only add, that on the slopes and ravines that encompass the city, there prevails a dull, leaden, ashy hue of colour, that is chiefly due to the enormous heaps of broken-up ruins, mixed with the debris of stone and mortar, which, to a considerable depth, lie loose, like vast mounds of shingle. These strange and weird-looking accessories of the never-to-be-forgotten scene that opens before the eyes of pilgrims as they draw near to Jerusalem, are especially remarkable for their magnitude and extent on the southern and eastern sides of the city. Very impressive is the silent testimony that they bear to the stormy history of this wonderful city, which records, during the fifteen centuries that followed the first appearance of the armies of Israel before its walls, no less than seventeen sieges, all of them accompanied with a greater or a lesser amount of devastation and ruin.

It will be sufficient for me now to give a short summary of the principal explorations that were made by Lieutenant Warren at Jerusalem, from February to July, 1867, as introductory to the more important operations that have been carried on by him in September and the following months—works that are still in progress, and with which fresh researches are continually associated.

An excavation made near the Damascus Gate (κ in the Plan) led to the discovery, beneath an immense accumulation of rubbish, of a massive wall of ancient date, and running east and west, with a flight of steps leading down to a great tank or artificial pool. Amongst the rubbish, at the foot of the remains of this wall, a stone was found, having carved on it a Templar's cross. This stone had once formed a part of the wall, and Lieutenant Warren considers the wall itself to have been built with materials that had been prepared and used at a much earlier period by the Crusaders, and to have also been destroyed by them when they were compelled finally to withdraw from the Holy City.

Near the Church of England cemetery (z in the Plan) an excavation was made in continuation of the laying bare of some steps cut in the solid rock, that were discovered when the cemetery was levelled. The rock here appears to have formed a part of the ancient city-wall in this quarter. These steps have sometimes been considered to be those that are mentioned by Nehemiah; but there are other ancient rock-hewn steps at Siloam, which appear to correspond more closely with the Biblical narrative. At this point the excavation reached the depth of 18 feet; and on arriving at the thirty-sixth step a landing-place was found, which was partially cleared to the extent of 17 feet, and was considered by Lieutenant Warren to be the foot, or base, of the rock-scarp. The rock thus must have presented to an enemy here a perpendicular face 29 feet in height.

At Ophel (o in the Plan) two shafts were sunk to find the depth of the soil and to determine its nature. At the depth of 25 feet, large cut stones were found, and also the solid rock; and here, cut in the solid rock, was discovered the entrance to a water-course, 1 foot 9 inches high, and 5 feet broad, having a gentle slope in a south-easterly direction. After 21 feet, this channel became too small to work in. It was found to be filled with a red earth, that apparently was virgin soil.

Three separate attempts were made to find the rock at an intermediate point between the south-east angle (x in the Plan) of the walls and the present channel of the Kedron in the midst of the Kedron valley; but, notwithstanding the strenuous efforts of the explorers, it was found at that time to be impossible to reach the rock. The superincumbent mound of shingle, composed of stone-chippings without a particle of earth, lying so loosely as to be in character almost a fluid, when the shafts had been sunk about 15 feet in it ran like water, and swept away the excavations. A fresh effort was made, however, more towards the east, with better success; but this very interesting exploration, which gave a good promise of leading to the discovery of the true ancient bed of the Kedron, at a considerable depth below the heaped-up accumulations that now cover the rock, was suspended for a while until fresh supplies of timber framing to line the shaft and the gallery excavated from it could be obtained from England.

THE BURDEN OF THE BELLS.

OH, sight of woe, never to be forgot!
The living mother bending o'er the cot
Wherein her babe lay dead!
Blank face, up-claspèd hands, escaping hair—
The first dread consciousness that death was there
In the beloved one's stead!

'Twere nothing that that child was cold and stiff—Nothing to him who stood and watched them, if
No more had been divined:
He had contrived to breast the fatal blow—
Crushed down a father's heart, did he not know
There was worse, worse behind!

Up from those sightless domes of glassy blue—
Up from the spectral pallor of that hue
Gleamed a prophetic glare;
Curling its phosphor-flames about the cheek,
The lips, the brow, the fingers of that weak
And wasted woman there!

The dead beneath—the doomed to die, above—
One sudden monument of loss and love
Outsmitten at a blow:

And he whose life was theirs, beholding this,
Conscious that hour that what in both was his Must never more be so!

Conscious that instant, when the next dead lay
To make a marble of the living clay,
Who should her place supply:
What cheek that hue of hopelessness should wear—
What face exchange dejection for despair—
Who should pray God to die!

Now, 'mid the rush of life, intrudes the thought
Of that far scene, like bells the winds have brought Into a roaring street:—
I stop—and hearken—and am hustled down
By the impetuous millions of the town
Following upon my feet.

There! Let me up! before I'm trampled on—Smile, ere the many shout against the one—
Then speed as others do:
Such muffled memories only craze the brain—
Distracting memories of bliss and pain
Not to be listened to!

D. P. STARKEY.

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XIX.

MRS. BROOKLYN'S FIRST ENTERTAINMENT.

RS. BROOKLYN, of Brooklyn Hall came, by the father's side, of a line of patrician ancestors. She was a Miss Pierpoint; and the Pierpoints, of Hill Tower, held their own, amid the notabilities of the whole county. Not so as regarded her mother, from whom she inherited her voluminous person and her florid style of beauty. Her mother was nothing more nor less than an innkeeper's daughter, whose tact and good looks had assisted her to the elevation she had been resolved to reach. She did not long enjoy the fruits of success. Soon after the birth of her daughter she died, and it is worthy of remark, that her husband, though in the prime of life, never sought for a second partner.

The little Alicia Pierpoint was indeed born with a silver spoon in her mouth. She had a large fortune on the Pierpoint side, for her father barely lived to see her come of age. In a moment of pique—so the story went—she chose Squire Brooklyn as the happy individual on whom to bestow the honour of her hand. He was not young, nor particularly good-looking, nor in the least amiable; and he was a commoner by birth and by association. No one exactly knew how his immense wealth had been got together—and at the period we mention no one particularly cared. He was not a popular man, nor did he keep open house, after the fashion of a country gentleman. He was parsimonious, suspicious, and irritable; but, such as he was, Alicia Pierpoint, one fine summer's morning, married him.

She had not led a very happy life, as might have been expected. During the sixteen years that preceded her widowhood, she had been kept almost like a prisoner within the walls of Brooklyn; and though she was boastful and voluminous as ever, when society got a glimpse of her, those glimpses were few and far between. But some twelve months ago the master of Brooklyn had been gathered to his fathers, and then the fair Alicia, still in the zenith of her charms, was free.

She was now immensely rich indeed. The two fortunes, Pierpoint and Brooklyn, had increased vastly during the sixteen years of seclusion, and she was the undisputed mistress of the whole. She was, therefore, fully prepared to make a great sensation in the neighbourhood.

Mrs. Brooklyn was about to give her first entertainment. Carriages without number, and of every kind and description, were making their way towards the hall. Among them, and certainly not the last, or the least, as far as pretension went, was the equipage of the Sylvesters.

As it rolled along, with its flaming lamps, its sleek, well-fed horses, and the appendages of footmen in livery, few would guess at the exact position of its occupants.

Its occupants were Raymond and his sister Alice. Alice sat erect, as her mother might have done. There was a look of self-repression, almost of sternness, in her face. Her dress was simple as possible, scarce an ornament had been permitted.

Raymond, on the other hand, was in full costume, and got up to the highest point of perfection. His face was self-possessed and calm; but some undercurrent of excitement was stirring within him. Now and then a glow would come on his cheek, and his eye would brighten. Then, again, the glow would fade, and an expression of blank dreariness take its place.

What a sham and mockery would that gorgeous feast yonder be, to these preoccupied, harassed minds!

Once Raymond laid his hand on that of his sister. "You must brighten up, Alice, and be more like yourself," he whispered.

She looked kindly at him, and pressed his hand. But she said nothing.

When the hall was seen afar off, with its splendid array of lights, Raymond drew her attention to it.

"It is a fine thing to be rich!" he said, playfully.

"Better to be honest!" she replied.

They were the only words she had spoken.

Mrs. Brooklyn was in great glory, receiving her guests. The grand staircase was thronged with ladies, in splendid attire, and gold, and gems. Alice, leaning on her brother's arm, followed in silence. The glitter and the pomp must have jarred painfully on her feelings, for once a tear came to her eye. But the look of anxiety and distress with which Raymond regarded her, seemed to recall her to herself. She hurriedly dashed away the tear, and smiled at him.

"I am quite brave, dear!" she whispered.

The first object that met their view, as they were ushered into the drawing-room, was Mrs. Brooklyn herself. More florid and voluminous than ever, with a train, yards long, and as many jewels as her portly person could well carry, she stood giving smiles and sugared words to all around her.

Her eye singled out Raymond, in a moment. She had not felt quite sure about his coming. Now he was come, she did not move from where she stood, surrounded by her courtiers.

Raymond advanced, and gave one keen glance at the group before him. Then he bowed, with all the grace and courtesy of which he was capable. Alice, having made her devoirs, and done what was strictly correct, contrived to slip away.

Raymond did not exhibit the slightest intention of slipping away. Indeed, the very gist and purpose of the evening lay within those few square yards of velvet pile, on which the once-named Alicia Pierpoint was standing.

Raymond was young and handsome. His smile was attractive; his manners could be fascinating. In a very short space of time, not a courtier present but instinctively felt that a rival, by no means to be despised, had made his way into the field.

"Do you know, Mr. Sylvester, it was so good of you both to come!" exclaimed Mrs. Brooklyn. "As for that dear girl Alice, I positively doat upon her!"

Raymond's well-formed lip could scarce forbear a slight curve.

"It is a pity she is so retiring," continued Mrs. Brooklyn, interrupting her discourse, every moment, with nods, and becks, and smiles to those around her, "but I shall soon cure her of that. I am resolved to cultivate your sister, Mr. Sylvester."

"You are very kind," said Raymond, the slight curve visible again.

"She must come and see me, as soon as I have a niche to put her in. My house is positively crammed. There is that dear Sir Hugh and his suite. By the way, you do not know him, do you?"

"Sir Hugh Macbriar? only by name," replied Raymond.

"Ah! you have a treat in store for you. He is such a darling! He is lying down, you know, after the hunt. He is so delicate. Such a mind—in such a feeble body! But I am expecting, every moment, he will make his appearance, and I shall have the pleasure of introducing you to each other."

"Thank you," replied Raymond, without much enthusiasm.

"Sir Hugh is my especial favourite, though I dote on the marquis! The marquis would give his life for me any day, I know. Sir Hugh would give ten lives, if he had them. See, there are Lord and Lady Dartwater, isn't she beautiful! She is one of your cold folks. I see she and your sister have got together. For my part, I never could be cold! I am one of the impressionable ones," said Mrs. Brooklyn, with a gentle sigh.

"I had scarce dared to hope that," whispered Raymond, softly.

Mrs. Brooklyn cast down her eyes a moment. Raymond had led her into a less crowded part of the room, and if he wanted opportunity of paying court to the florid widow, he had it. Was he not singled out from amid all the rest to be her cavalier?

It is difficult to know what he intended to do; for at this juncture, all his self-command could scarce keep on the mask. He looked pale, haggard, and weary, even at the pinnacle of his good fortune. Perhaps, like Hamlet, he saw a spectre at the feast. Perhaps, a well-known face and two mournful eyes were visible to him alone, and woke up the memories he wished should sleep. At any rate, a golden opportunity glided by, and was lost for ever.

When the opportunity had passed, the vision had passed also; Raymond was cool, collected, and himself again. The widow had noticed his preoccupation, and she had her revenge. At that precise moment up came Sir Hugh Macbriar.

If Fortune is fickle, she must needs be a woman. All at once, a change came over the widow's tactics; she withdrew her hand from Raymond's arm.

"My dear Sir Hugh, and are you better? and have you rested? and will you let me introduce you to Mr. Sylvester?"

Sir Hugh looked at Raymond, and Raymond looked at him. Sir Hugh was not young, and Raymond was. Sir Hugh was tall and thin, and with iron-grey hair, and rather a cynical mouth. Raymond was tall likewise, and his hair was black and glossy. In respect of good looks, Raymond had it, twenty to one. Sir Hugh had a fair, broad estate, without a single rent or flaw in its wholeness and beauty. Raymond's estate was dropping to pieces. Sir Hugh stood on a good firm pedestal of public respect and opinion; Raymond was trying to hold on to the very brink of a precipice.

And, moreover, now Sir Hugh was come, the widow politely set Raymond aside. She took Sir Hugh's arm with the utmost affability. He should lead her forward now; she had a hundred things to say to him, and she had been monopolising Mr. Sylvester most shamefully.

"The young ladies will never forgive me," said she, smiling coquettishly at Raymond; "so go, if you please, and leave us old folks to amuse ourselves."

Raymond stood speechless, just where Mrs. Brooklyn had stopped him. The splendid shawl she wore had fallen off, and Sir Hugh picked it up. He was very slow and deliberate in his movements. He picked it up, and placed it on her shoulders, and then the pair went slowly away, Sir Hugh silent and imperturbable, the widow chattering with all her might. For some time, Raymond could see glimpses of the radiant shawl and of the iron-grey hair; but gradually the crowd opened and swallowed them up, and he was left alone.

With a quick contraction of the brow, and a compression of the mouth, he looked round for Alice. Very soon he found her, standing by a vase of flowers, her face pale and weary.

"Alice, what are you doing here?" said he, sharply.

"Nothing, Raymond, but what I have been doing ever since we came: wishing myself away."

"Are you tired, dear?"

His voice was kind, now, and tender.

"Yes, Raymond."

"Do you want to go home?"

"Oh, yes; I should be so glad!" and her face lighted up.

"Come, then."

She took his arm, and they threaded the brilliant assembly in silence. Very soon the stately carriage of the Sylvesters received its occupants.

"Raymond, I am for ever obliged to you!" said Alice, taking his hand caressingly.

He let her take it, but he did not return the pressure, neither did he utter a word.

CHAPTER XX.

COMING HOME.

"OUR home, Rachel; yours and mine, my dear!" said John Humphreys, pointing with his whip towards the red-brick house in the fields.

He and Rachel were jogging along in a gig, from a neighbouring town, where they had spent one week's honeymoon: for Rachel was married, and had taken John Humphreys—as, indeed, he had taken her—for better, for worse.

"And as to my mother, you must just make up your mind not to take any notice. She will soon come round, and love you as if you were her own child."

"Oh, yes!" replied Rachel, cheerfully. But she had her misgivings on that matter, nevertheless.

"I can't imagine any people happier than we shall be," continued John, as they kept jogging along. "You will be the most capital little wife that ever lived; and I'm sure I shall make a very good husband. And it's such a farm! If I had but—Well, never mind," added John, as if thrusting from him an unwelcome thought; "that will all come right, or I'll know the reason why!"

"What are you talking about, John?"

"Nothing that need trouble you, little wife. I'll manage my own affairs. Take the reins, dear; here is the first gate."

Out John jumped, and there was no opportunity for much further conversation. The fields were so full of ruts, at that time of the year, that it required some skill to keep the gig from being capsized. At length the red house was reached, and the gig stopped at a little garden-gate.

"We'll have a carriage-drive some of these days, my dear," said John, as he lifted Rachel out. "Now, just go in at that door, and I'll take the gig round to the stable."

Rachel lingered. To say the truth, she felt a little nervous at entering her new home for the first time.

John saw her hesitation, and laughed good-humouredly.

"What! is the little wife afraid? Come, then, I'll go with you. Jim!" shouted he, putting his hand to his mouth, and letting his voice go forth into the darkness, with the power and volume of Stentor; "Jim! here, my lad, quick!"

A form of some kind came shambling round the corner of the house. Rachel could not see very distinctly, but she supposed it was Jim.

"Take the horse, and lead him round, Jim. This is your new mistress," added John, complacently.

The form made an inarticulate sound, and took off its cap. Rachel saw no more, for John hurried her into the house.

"It's sharp and cold, standing there," said he, rubbing his hands. "I hope they've got us a fire."

For the first moment or two, Rachel's eyes were dazzled, coming as she did out of the darkness.

John had taken her into a good-sized room, comfortably though plainly furnished. There was a capital fire, and a lamp burning on the table, and everything in apple-pie order. Rachel was delighted.

"Oh, John! what a beautiful room!" cried she, gleefully.

"It's not the best though. Come here; I'll show you the parlour. There, what do you think of that?" and, hurrying her along the passage, he opened a door. "Just look in there, Rachel."

Rachel looked in, and in spite of its being a real parlour, carpeted all over, and with a round table in the middle, and something that actually looked like a piano, she shivered. The room had flowers in the grate, and was deadly cold, and evidently intended more for show than use. Rachel did not like it half so well as the other; but this she kept to herself.

"It is very grand, John; too good by half for me," said she.

"No, it isn't; nothing is too good for the little wife. Now, I will show you the kitchen," said John, still hurrying, and in a state of excitement.

It was quite a model kitchen, with its quarried floor, and tables white as a curd, and bright covers, in which the fire-light danced and flickered, as they hung on the wall opposite. A little maid-servant, with white apron, and cap with white ribbons in honour of the bride, was preparing the tea. She smiled and curtsied as John again proclaimed aloud—

"Here's your new mistress, my girl."

Rachel had never had a servant of her own before, and it sounded rather like an elevation.

The girl, in obedience to an order from her master, showed Rachel up-stairs to her room; all Rachel's possessions were contained in the moderately sized trunk which was being carried up-stairs after her.

Her spirits felt rather in a flutter, her hand shook a little with pleasurable excitement as she took off her shawl and bonnet. When these and her thick veil had been removed, there came into clearer view the compact figure and pleasant face that had captivated John these years past, as he was wont to say, exultingly. Very nice she looked, in her grey merino, and the bright neck ribbon—gayer than she was wont to wear, but a present from John; her smooth hair braided, and her clear honest eyes shining with happiness.

Whatever his mother might say, John had done no discredit to his taste, when he asked Rachel to be his wife.

Still rather in a flutter, she went down-stairs into the cheerful room below; the tea things were on the table, and John was hovering about in a state of ecstatic delight.

When tea was over and gone, came the best: for then husband and wife prepared to spend the first of the many happy evenings which seemed to lie hopefully before them; and the fire was mended, and the lamp trimmed, and Rachel brought out her work-box, and John (at some future time) intended to read to her whilst she worked; but he was not prepared for this yet. It was too blissful to sit and watch her nimble fingers, as they sped along, at the mysteries of sewing and of hemming; too blissful to talk to her, to feel that she had taken up her abode, for good, at his table, and under his roof; to have her loving eyes resting upon him, and the little hand put out every now and then, to give his a kindly pressure. "And all this to last," thought John, "Providence permitting it—to last!"

He had scarce thought it, scarce relinquished the dear hand, impatient to return to its cunning, when a sharp ring at the door-bell recalled him, unpleasantly, to the knowledge that the outer world, with its interruptions and its requirements, lay around his bower of bliss.

A loud, heavy step came into the passage, and a voice inquired if Mr. Humphreys were at home.

The next scene in the drama was the entrance of the little maid, to say that her master was wanted.

No intelligence could be more odious to John than this. All the more so, because he recognised the voice in the passage as that of Mr. Isaacs.

Rachel looked up at her husband's face.

"Are you obliged to go, John?" said she, anxiously.

"I suppose I must, Rachel."

"Is anything the matter, dear?"

"No, my little wife—only that I must run away."

"Run away, John?"

"Into the parlour, my dear, no farther," replied John, with a clumsy attempt to laugh.

"You will be so cold, John. Could not the—the person come in here?"

"No!" and John started to his feet in a moment; "that he could not, Rachel. Just get your hemming done, my dear. I shall be back in a quarter of an hour."

Rachel looked up and smiled. But her smile, for once, was thrown away. John did not see it. He was striding into the parlour, to know what Mr. Isaacs wanted.

(To be continued.)

TEMPTATION.

HAT a funny text teacher has given us to think of this week, 'Lead us not into temptation.' She said it was a prayer; but one would think it was all our own fault if we did wrong, or was tempted to do wrong."

"No, Annie; she said we often placed ourselves in the way of temptation," said another little girl.

"Oh, let's talk about the treat," said another, who came up at this moment; "I'm so glad it is to be this week, for mother's just made me a new pink frock, and I shall wear that."

"Ah, yes, we all know what your temptation is, Maria," said Annie. "I don't believe you could pass a linendraper's shop without stopping to wish for some of the things in the window."

"And don't you sometimes wish for things you can't get?" asked Maria, angrily, and she tossed her head and walked on.

The Sunday-school treat was to be held in the grounds of a gentleman about two miles off. Other visitors were expected to be there for the occasion, and Maria Wills was determined to exhibit all the finery she could muster on that day. Several visits were paid to the window of a milliner's shop in the course of Monday, for Maria had resolved to alter the trimmings on her bonnet. It had suited her very well until she saw one in this window, and she came to look at and admire it so often that at last she determined to have one like it, or at least have trimmings like it on her own.

But there was some difficulty in the way of doing this, for her mother refused to give her any money for the purpose; but this refusal only seemed to increase Maria's desire, and she went the more frequently to look at the coveted bonnet.

At length a thought was suggested to her mind as she stood admiring the ribbon and lace. She held a half-crown in her hand, with which she was to pay a small bill for her mother. Suppose she tore up the bill, and told her mother she had paid it, but lost the receipt coming back?

Maria was so delighted to think that she might get the ribbon after all, that, without pausing to consider, she tore up the bill, and scattered the pieces in the street. She then had to think of another plan, so as to account for her possession of the ribbon. This was not so easy; but after thinking a long time, she resolved to tell her mother that a lady had bought it for her, and she was soon on her way home with the coveted articles in her hand. But somehow Maria did not feel half the pleasure she had expected in gazing at her new bonnet when it was finished, nay, she was rather glad when it was out of sight, and she could forget all about what had happened, for she could not bear to meet her mother's eye, for fear she should ask more questions about the ribbon.

Thursday came at last, and, to the joy of all, it was a lovely day. Maria was, perhaps, the only little girl in the village that did not feel happy and light-hearted at the anticipation of the pleasure of the day, but she could not, try as she would.

"There, I told you Maria Wills would contrive to have a new bonnet," said Annie Harris, as Maria came into the schoolroom. "I'm sure teacher must have thought of her looking in at the shop-windows and getting so fond of dress, when she was talking about going into temptation."

"But, Annie, I think teacher meant us to take care that we ourselves did not run in the way of temptation—not look after each other."

"Teacher meant it all for Maria," retorted Annie. "There is no fear of any of the rest of us; we are——"

But at this moment they had to leave their places to fall in rank before starting for their walk. Several remarked how dull Maria Wills seemed, and some thought she could not be well, and ought to have put on a warmer shawl, instead of the thin, gauzy one she wore. Ah! if they had only known how miserable Maria felt—how much wretchedness her fine clothes had cost her, they would not have wondered at her looking dull and out of spirits.

Games of all kinds were played during the afternoon, but after tea all seemed disposed to wander about in twos and threes, rather than join in more active fun; and our three young friends found themselves thrown together again.

"Suppose we go and gather cowslips in that field near the shrubbery," suggested Esther; "we may go there, I know."

"Of course we may; we may go anywhere," said Annie, with an air of importance.

"No, not anywhere, for we must not go into the shrubbery or orchard," said Esther.

Annie had heard this command given—that no one should enter these two places, but she would rather have forgotten it just now, for she had made up her mind to have a peep at the orchard. She could do no harm, she reasoned, just looking in at the ripe, ruddy fruit that looked so beautiful hanging among the green leaves. So she walked on, leaving Maria and Esther picking cowslips, while she hurried towards the gate of the orchard. It stood a little way open, and no one being near, Annie pushed it a little further, and stepped inside to have a better view. How lovely everything looked! grapes and peaches growing against the wall, and apple, pear, and plum trees in every direction. Annie stood some minutes looking and wishing she might have some of the fruit that had fallen from the trees and lay in such rich profusion on the grass, but she was afraid to touch it, for fear it should be missed. Suddenly, however, a light breeze rustled the branches of the trees, and at the same moment a large pear fell at Annie's feet. The next minute it was in her pocket, and she was hurrying back to her companions in the field.

"How many have you got, Annie?" asked Esther, who, had been so busy gathering flowers that she had not missed her companion.

Annie turned crimson. "What do you mean, Esther?" she said, angrily.

"How many cowslips have you got?"

"None; I haven't been after cowslips," and she turned away to hide her blushing face. Annie's pleasure was over from the time the pear went into her pocket.

The evening came to an end at last, and Annie felt very glad when the bell summoned them to prepare for their departure: for she had made up her mind to drop the hateful pear into the ditch as they went down the lane. But another mortification awaited her first. As they passed between two ladies, a book was given to each, which they were told to put into their pockets at once, as their hands would be required for something else. Annie could not do this, and when, as they passed out of the gates, a large slice of cake and an apple were thrust into her hands, she was forced to let the cake lie upon the delicate covers of her book, which were instantly stained by it. As they went down the lane, she contrived to rid herself of the pear; but, though it no longer weighed down her pocket, she could not get rid of the heaviness at her heart.

A fresh cause of anxiety awaited Maria Wills. Her mother, who had occasion to call at the shop to which Maria had been sent, had been asked for the half-crown, and her first question when Maria came home, was to inquire who she had given the money to a few days before. Maria hesitated for a moment, almost determined to tell her mother the truth; but the next moment conscience was stifled again, and she answered, "The boy took it, mother; he was standing at the door." Maria had seen him standing there as she passed, and when this fact was mentioned to the grocer, he remembered it, and the boy still denying that he had received the money, was dismissed without a character.

A few weeks afterwards, as Annie and Maria were returning from school, they met a boy who appeared to be in great distress, and Maria recognised him as the grocer's boy. Her cheek tingled, but she could not pass without asking what was the matter, and then heard for the first time of his dismissal.

"But that isn't the worst," sobbed the boy; "father got me a place to work in the squire's garden; but this morning, when the gardener came for me, he saw a pear that I picked up in the lane last week, and he says he knows I stole it, for nobody aint got none of them winter pears but the squire."

"What sort of a pear is it?" asked Annie.

"A large one, as hard as a bullet. There was only two on the tree this year, the gardener says, and so I must have stole this one a week or two ago."

"And did you?" asked Maria.

"No; I no more stole that than I did the half-crown," and he looked steadily at Maria.

She did not answer, but, with glowing cheeks, walked on to join her companion, who, to her surprise, she found crying bitterly.

"Oh, Maria," she sobbed, "do you remember teacher giving us a text to think of, 'Lead us not into temptation?' I wish I had thought of it the day of the treat, for I went to the orchard-gate, and when the wind blew that pear down, I picked it up and put it in my pocket."

But by this time Maria was sobbing too. "Annie, I have been worse than you," she said, and she told her schoolfellow the whole story of the half-crown. They then agreed to do what they could to clear the poor boy's character, and Maria went home at once and told her mother all that had occurred, while Annie went on her more difficult errand to the gardener.

It is needless to add that poor John was at once taken to work in the squire's garden, and that Annie and Esther, though greatly humbled, felt happier after they had confessed their sin than they had done for some time; and now whenever they pray, "Lead us not into temptation," they remember that they must likewise be careful not to place themselves in the way of temptation.

EMMA LESLIE.

THE BOOBY

— Saturday, June 6, 1868. —

(Drawn by M. E. EDWARDS)

"Is she very ill, sir?"—p. 596.

'APARTMENTS IN A QUIET STREET.

AT a house where an announcement of "Apartments to Let" appeared thrust in between the wire blind and the window, a little hard-featured man paused, at about four o'clock on a December afternoon. He cast his eyes over the windows with a sharp, scrutinising look. Apparently satisfied with the survey outside, he approached the door, pacing slowly over the flag-stones leading from the gate. In another instant, the knocker fell with three regular raps, an equal space of time between every rap, and all of them hard and loud. His summons was answered by a tidy-looking girl, who, while she bade him enter, was casting sundry frowning looks in the opposite direction, without doubt intended to inspire with awe a little ruddy-faced child peeping over the top of the kitchen-stairs. If such were the intention it utterly failed, for the little eyes sparkled with a joy that melted the servant-girl's frown into a smile, as she ushered the hard-faced gentleman into the front parlour, intimating that her "missis" would be there directly. The door closed, and the little man took a chair near the empty fireplace, without apparently being influenced in the slightest degree by its desolate appearance.

The door opened, and the landlady entered, followed by the servant, who, having set a lamp upon the table, left the room, carrying off the little culprit with the ruddy cheeks and the bright eyes, who, against all rule, was found mischievously peeping in at the parlour-door. The light gave a more cheerful look to the room than it was wont to wear, and, as it fell upon the glasses on the sideboard, they sparkled like a galaxy of merry eyes just filled with joy, whose rays all seemed to centre on the little hard-faced man to make him welcome. Even the fire-irons at his feet gleamed as if they called him master, and reflected by anticipation a roaring fire in the desolate grate.

He had risen from his chair, and bowed coldly, as the landlady offered an apology for showing him into a room without a fire.

"Is this one of the apartments?" inquired the hard-faced man.

"This is the sitting-room," said the landlady, in a voice that trembled just a little; "the bedroom is the adjoining room to this."

"The same size?" he inquired.

"No, sir, rather smaller. Would you like to see it?"

She raised the lamp from the table, and the light fell full upon her young delicate features. She was beautiful—must have been more so, before that careworn look had become habitual in her face. As she drew near the door, followed by her visitor, she cast a quick glance up and down the hall, perhaps expecting the bright-eyed, ruddy little child had escaped, and was about to fill the house with his boisterous mirth. This, however musical to the young mother's ears, she felt sure would be voted a bore by the little hard-faced man at her elbow. Such a face as his never could be found with the heart that could love a child. There was something so harsh, so crude in his manners, appearance, and voice—something so repulsive in the hardness of the whole man, that, she thought a child would run away and hide in the folds of its mother's dress the moment he drew near. But the ruddy face and the bright eyes were not there, so she passed on.

The bedroom was neatly furnished, and cleanly to a fault, but the hard features of the little man underwent no change as he surveyed the apartment. Three methodical nods of his bald head (a visible echo of his knock at the street-door) were all that indicated his approbation, or the contrary. He did not see the anxious, searching gaze of the young wife, nor the puzzled look that followed, not unmixed with trembling doubt, as he turned to leave the room. She stood in the hall waiting what the little hard-faced man might say. He passed her, and, instead of going to the street-door, turned again into the parlour. At this moment, and before the door could be closed, the shrill cry of an infant reached their ears. The young mother bit her lip as she shut the door, and again her eyes were fixed upon the stranger; but the hard features were unchanged. Could it be that he really loved children—or, at least, did not hate them? Such a thing might be possible, and she felt reassured as she sat down by the door. There would have been silence between them, but that the wail of the little child filled up the void, and at last died away in short, heavy sobs.

"There are children in the house?" said he, after waiting to hear if the cry had quite ceased.

She replied by a slight inclination of her head. She could not speak, there was a throbbing at her heart and a thickness in her throat that forbade it.

"Yes—they will cry—they always do!" continued the stranger, but in a tone more like what a man will use in argument than in anger. The difference was lost upon the young mother.

"The child is ill, sir," she said, "and—children—"

"Will cry," said the hard-faced man in the same tone; "they always do."

"She cannot help it, sir—she is so young and—so—so—ill!" Again there was that thickness in her throat, and it came with tears this time.

Again there was a long pause.

"The apartments to be taken by the quarter?" said the hard-faced man.

"Yes, sir, by the quarter."

"With a quarter's notice?" said the little man.

Before she could answer, the screams of the infant were again heard, and again the young mother bit her lip till the blood seemed bursting through the skin. It was vexing—so vexing—just as— But the thought came that the child was ill, and again not the landlady but the mother sat at the parlour-door. After a time came the heavy sobs, and the wailing cry died away into silence as before.

"Children will cry—they always do!" apostrophised the hard-faced man. The tone of voice was the same as he had used not long ago, but, as then, she heard only the words.

Everything seemed decided now. A few minutes since, and no doubt he would have taken the apartments, and then what good news to tell her husband on his return! How she would have made him guess what it could be. How she would have enjoyed his puzzled look, and when she did out with it, to see his happy smile. And then to describe the hard-faced man, and then— But the airy castles were in ruins. Not the first young wife she who has gone a building in the air!

"The child is ill?" said the hard-faced man.

"Very ill, sir—worse to-day—and she cries a great deal."

"Ah! they will cry—they always do."

She caught the tone this time as well as the words.

"At what o'clock was she taken worse?"

"At twelve, sir."

The little hard-faced man sat lost in thought, and his companion watched him with a half-bewildered look, as if doubting the evidence of her senses. Could it be possible, and if possible, was it indeed a fact, that the hard, stony image before her was really but the outer covering—the shell—and that within was a gentle heart, full of compassion and strong human love? What mattered the shell, when the feeble cry of a sick child could break it? Surely it must have been the tears in her eyes that made the lines in that hard face soften and spread almost into smiles; but so they did—at least it appeared so to her; but then mothers are such fond, foolish things, Heaven help them! Their brightest pictures are all tinted with colours all the world knows must fade; and the sunlight of their fond and silly love, once bathed in tears, why all the world about them is in rainbows for a time!

"Subject to a quarter's notice?" said the hard-faced man. "And what are the terms—the rent I mean?"

She must have been looking through two great tears, for when they fell upon her hands, and she looked again, the little man sat there as stony and as hard as ever.

She made no answer, nor did he repeat the question. Both were silent for a time.

"Can I see the child?" said the hard-faced man to the landlady he had addressed a few moments before. The question was replied to by an incredulous look.

"You are surprised at the request—from a stranger too. No matter about that. Time in these cases is sometimes precious, so to lose none, let me tell you I am in the medical profession—that is, I was, for lately I have given up practice. Can I see the child?"

The hard lines in that hard face were all growing soft again, as she looked towards it, and no doubt would have spread into smiles, only that, asking him to wait a minute, she turned to the door, fumbling for something in her pocket the while. It may be the world was in rainbows just then; certain it is that a mental picture of the little hard-faced man was in a perfect coruscation of light.

Scarcely had the young mother's footfall sounded on the stairs, when a ruddy little face peeped in at the half-open door. The bright eyes of the little culprit met those of the hard-faced man. There must have been some great similarity in those two beings, apparently so different, for the ruddy little face was not drawn away in fear, but advanced with a kind of bashful boldness right into the middle of the room. A child, after all, is often your true philosopher and physiognomist! With a confidence that would have graced Lavater himself, it needed but a glance, and in an instant the ruddy child had sidled up to the old man. When the little culprit's mother returned, the hard face was beaming with a real smile, as with the child on his knee, he held his watch to the upturned ear, and the two carried on a chorus, the burden of which was—"Tic—tic—tic."

"Fred!" exclaimed the young mother, as she entered the room.

The boy turned his eyes to the old man's face, and, assured that all was right, continued to repeat—"Tic—tic—tic." They were both children, and the boy knew it, though the world called his companion an old man.

By the nursery fire, in a little cradle, lay the sick child. The servant-girl sat beside it, rocking it to and fro, but a wailing cry of pain told that sleep was not a visitor there. The little hard-faced man was there too, hand in hand with his ruddy-faced playmate, but as if catching the truth from the old man's face, both sat silent and serious. The young mother took the servant's place, and gently drew away the shawl that had been thrown over the hoops of the cradle, to ward off the light from the sick child's face. At his bidding, she raised the infant in her arms, and drew nearer the lamp standing on the mantelshelf, where he had placed it. How anxiously the mother gazed into the face of the little man, as if she would read there a solution of all her hopes and fears!

Three measured nods of his hard, shining, bald head, which looked like a metal skull-cap, rubbed into a high state of polish, it appeared so hard and so bright! but not a word from his lips of life or death! He motioned the child back to the cradle, and asked for a pen and ink.

"Is she very ill, sir?" timidly asked the young mother. She could not bear the suspense, but held the child pressed in her bosom. She felt she could struggle with death, and ward off the terrible arrow, did she only know he was near.

"Do not alarm yourself, madam," said the little man, as he seated himself at a table to write; "we are in good time." He wrote his prescription. "You will have this prepared at once."

"But the child?"

"Has sickened with the measles."

"The measles! I must send Fred away then?"

"On the contrary; he must have them at some time—let him stay."

His mother's tearful looks, and an ill-defined notion that some terrible event was about to befall him, coupled with the hard look of the little man, brought the great tears into the boy's eyes, and he presently burst into a loud cry.

"Tic—tic—tic," said the hard-faced man, drawing out his watch. The boy climbed to his knee.

"Tic—tic—tic! Tic—tic—tic!" said the two children, playing with the watch.

In the little parlour which the hard-faced man and the little boy had lately quitted, stood a young man. He had been led—nay, almost dragged there from the street-door, which his wife had flown herself to open, carrying him off captive in spite of himself. The news was soon told—how that the lodgings were let; and then there was an eloquent description of the hard-faced man, with everything he said, and all he did, and how she had left him and Master Fred high friends in the nursery.

"Well, Laura, you must let me see this enigma, this hard, metallic gentleman, with a heart like a sponge-cake, soft and sweet! It is the funniest thing— But come."

They ascended to the nursery; Laura the meanwhile putting on a quiet, demure, landlady-like look, and her husband not a little curious about his future tenant.

On entering the nursery—whatever they had expected—they were not a little surprised. Overcome with fatigue, the servant-girl had fallen asleep at her post. She had been up the greater part of the night before, for the child had been fretful and restless. Master Fred stood with the watch still pressed to his ear; but to get it there he had to lean down, for the little hard-faced man was kneeling beside the cradle of the sick child, and was rocking it to and fro. On their entering he looked up, but continued rocking the cradle.

For a few moments they stood at the door in mute surprise, when Laura advanced to introduce her husband. The introduction was acknowledged on the part of the hard-faced man by three regular nods of his smooth, bald head, which swung to and fro as the cradle moved, and possibly might have gone on for an hour or more, but that the servant, roused by the sound of her mistress' voice, rubbed her eyes, and resumed her task.

"I cannot tell you how much I feel indebted to you, sir, for this great kindness," said Laura's husband, drawing near to the little man, and assisting him to rise.

"Hush!" said he, with a nod and a look at the sick child. The father took the hint, and together they sat down at the table, and the conversation that ensued was carried on in a low voice. Presently, the servant being called away, the hard-faced man returned to the object of his visit, and inquired the terms at which the parlour and the adjoining room were to be let. Short as the discussion was, often the little man rose, and on tip-toe sought the cradle of the sick child, now plunging his head under the shawl, and now gently rocking the cradle, as the child slept a little restless sleep. Not a sigh of the little voice escaped him—good, kind, tender-hearted, hard-faced little man!

After a time the young wife returned, announcing that tea was ready. Obedient to their request, the little man followed them down-stairs, and, at his own desire, the bright-eyed boy was his companion. They entered the same room—the parlour—which they had recently quitted. What a magical change was there. A roaring, crackling fire burned in the grate so desolate-looking awhile before. The kettle sent forth a long jet of steam as it bubbled and sang—singing, too, as if it would never get tired, pouring out its notes with such a ceaseless stream of breath. How pleasant, too, the song is—how cheerful! Then, it makes everybody friends with itself and with everybody else, and everybody feels contented and happy, and at home.

Some such feeling was surely creeping over the honest heart of the hard-faced man, as he sipped his tea and shared his muffin with the bright-eyed, ruddy little culprit at his elbow. Then he looked at the fire and he nodded his head, and then at the kettle, and then at the glass on the sideboard, which sparkled brighter than ever. Then, somehow his foot got upon the fender, a sure sign he felt himself at home—quite at home—and at last he said so.

Was it really a fact, that the fire burned brighter, and the kettle sang louder and louder its song of home, or had the young wife's eyes and ears deceived her? Somehow, too, there was quite a prismatic look about them, and when she looked at her husband with those loving eyes of hers, she could scarcely see him for the rainbows.

Now, the watch had gone tic-tic-tic a long, long time—not that any one counted it—when the little hard-faced man rose to depart. In the hall he stood still, for his quick ear caught the feeble cry of the sick child.

"It is hard for children to bear pain," said he; "they can't bear it. They will cry—they always do."

Nobody mistook the tone this time.

Presently the hard, even tread of the little man was heard on the garden flagstones, and then in the street. How very hard his tread was, so firm, so decided, as he turned into the busy highway, now almost deserted, and as he buttoned the last button of his great-coat firmly over his chest everybody, as they passed him, thought, "What a hard-faced, hard-hearted little man!" People will look at the outside, and judge by it, too. But as his heart was under his great-coat, what could be expected when it was buttoned up—so firmly, too, and so tight?

There were calculations over and over again, and joy, and tears, and congratulations, and through and about them all hovered the shadow of the little hard-faced man, till the last embers died away in the grate of the lodgings—now let—in the quiet street.

And up-stairs, too, hovered the same dim shadow over the cradle of the sick child, and was only lost in prayer, or at night in the fitful picture of a passing dream.

FIELD FLOWERS.

I.

DAILY I gather for garlands of flowers, but I know not why;
Daily I weave and bind them, and bind and weave till they die.

Hot and faint with the fever of eager fingers and palms,
Soon they sicken, and wither, and sigh out their last sweet balms.

II.

Day by day, and the days are as years, though the nights be long;
Morn by morn the garlands are gay, and dewy, and strong;
Eve by eve my wreathes lie strewed in the dust, and dead:
Also I laugh and weep at the flow'rs, and grey hairs in my head.

III.

Would I were living like these in the dewy orient hours,
Or that I died at eve with the same fair, perishing flow'rs!
Tender blooms of the field, that flourish and fade in a day,
Sweet is the fate to be plucked from the sod-clinging root and the clay.

IV.

Dead is the strong deep fibre that dwelt in the warmth of the earth,
Drawing sweet juices of joy that budded in verdure of mirth;
Gnaw on, O pitiless worm, that wouldst leave me a tithe of life,
Stay, of thy merciless mercy, and hack with thy jaws of the knife.

V.

Where be the fickle hands that fondled the wreathes I wove?
Where be the full, false lips that beguiled me with lores of love?
Faithless feet that threaded the down-blown waves of the grass?
Fathomless eyes, ere they hardened and shut on my soul like glass?

VI.

All have turned to the guiles and blooms of a fairer face,
Beaming and flushing with joy for to-day and a little space.
"Faithful for aye and a day," he saith, and to me once said:
Also I laugh and weep at the flow'rs, and grey hairs in my head.

BROKEN CISTERNs.

"My people have committed two evils; they have forsaken me the fountain of living waters, and hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water."—Jer. ii. 13.

WE all of us know well the character of him who, in the name of the Lord his God, addressed to his unheeding countrymen the warnings from which this text is taken. He was one who, in the course of a melancholy and persecuted life, gained the experience which added such energy to his lamentations over the ruins of his country.

The soul of poetry within him, and the powers of exquisite pathos which he possessed, made him well fitted to perform the office which fell to his lot, of chanting a dirge over the ruins of his country, of performing, as it were, the funeral obsequies for the last of her kings, and giving utterance to a sad requiem over a desolate city, a ruined temple, and a captive people. Throughout that most mournful period of Jewish history, he stands out to view, the one central figure round which gathers all the interest of the tottering kingdom. His is the one warning voice which makes itself heard amid the din of hostile armies, amid the contest of Egypt and Assyria, for his beloved fatherland. He alone for more than twenty years, during which the death-agony of Judah was protracted—he alone is striving to ward off, or at least to mitigate, the impending blow. His eagle eye saw from afar the surrounding nations swallowed up, one by one, in the advancing tide of Assyrian conquest. Long he struggled to avert from Jerusalem the inevitable tempest, and restore its former strength to the state by re-uniting it to its forsaken God. But he spoke to heedless ears and hardened hearts; and it only remained for him to behold the sad accomplishment of all his darkest prophecies, and record in language of unrivalled pathos the passionate sorrow of his patriotic heart. Yet he knew that it was but the fulfilment of his own prophecies. He knew that all this was the anger, the well-deserved anger, of an offended God, who by his voice had warned the nation of its danger; and who held their desertion of him such a wonderful and horrible crime, that he called for the wonder of all creation. “Be astonished, O ye heavens, at this, and be horribly afraid, be ye very desolate, saith the Lord. For my people have committed two evils; they have forsaken me the fountain of living waters, and hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water.”

This, then, is the original and primary application of the words of Jeremiah. They are a declaration of the horror felt by God at the desertion of his people. But I would take them now in a secondary and applied sense, yet one exactly parallel to that which they bore on their first utterance. Is not this hewing of cisterns, broken cisterns, which can hold no water, the constant occupation of a very large portion of mankind? There is an insatiable craving in the heart of man for something to support the inner life of his soul; there is a universal longing for some source whence water may be obtained; for some supply whence we may draw continually a draught to satisfy the thirst within us. Look through every phase of the religious and social history of man, and you will find that this is what he is perpetually seeking. There are those to whom God has not revealed himself as the one source of all satisfaction—as the one fountain of living waters. The longings of their nature expended themselves upon a vague philosophy, or strove to satisfy themselves with the ideal conceptions of human ingenuity. But with these the words are concerned neither in their original nor in their applied sense. They speak of the horror felt in heaven of those who, having once received a revelation of God's truth, afterwards turn away into apostasy from him; of those who, having once been brought near to the fountain of living waters, yet turn back again to cisterns of their own hewing. Therefore is it that they are peculiarly applicable to those, whether Jews under the old or Christians under the new dispensation, upon whom the light of God's truth has most brightly shone. They are the favoured ones, who have been given to drink of the water of life. Therefore is theirs the greater sin, and theirs shall be the more terrible fall, if they turn from that heavenly draught to hew them out broken cisterns.

Take, first, the case of the Jews under the old dispensation, to whom belongs their primary application. Of all the nations of the world, none had been favoured as they had been with the presence and guidance of Jehovah. Others, indeed, he had led, for his providence extends to all his creatures. Others he had led by other means; but the Jewish nation he had especially chosen, to place his name there, that they should be to him a peculiar people, educated in his own way, to receive in due time even a fuller revelation of himself. What wonder, then, that he should call even upon the heavens to be horribly afraid, when they, his own children, rebelled against him and served other gods! Yet so it was. The ways of God are not as the ways of man, and it was hard for them, in a material age, to keep their faith with a God who showed himself in no material form. This was the secret of their idolatry. They had the same feeling with the nations who surrounded them; that their eyes must behold some similitude of that which they adored. And, perhaps, we shall not be transgressing the bounds of due reverence, if we look upon that dispensation of which Moses was the mediator, as a condescension on the part of God to that tendency in man; if we regard the ark, and the tabernacle, and the ceremonial worship as intended to satisfy the longing for externals in the hearts of that generation; as calculated to educate the people by slow degrees into that spiritual worship which, in after times, was to replace it. But how often does the evil heart of man pervert the merciful designs of God! How often do we stubbornly refuse to be led even by the gentlest means! How often do we refuse the fountain of living waters, and hasten to cisterns of our own hewing! The whole history of the Jews is but one long night of apostasy from God, whose darkness is only broken by fitful gleams of light, when some Josiah of his age enjoins upon his people a repentance only too brief. Then they would return for a space to the fountain of living waters, only to increase their condemnation by again deserting Him.

But the age of actual material idolatry passes away, and we come to an idolatry of a far more subtle kind in the ages immediately preceding the coming of Christ. I allude, of course, to the traditions and ceremonies with which the Pharisees had surrounded the worship of God. What was this but the hewing out of broken cisterns? What was it but placing their own inventions, the work of their own hands, in the place of God; striving to satisfy with those outward forms the longing for religious happiness which each man felt in his heart? Theirs was but idolatry in a more subtle, and therefore more dangerous, form; idolatry clothing itself in the garments of its own peculiar age. To them, too, were the words of Jeremiah applicable, for they, too, had tasted of the living water, yet had turned away to cisterns of human workmanship.

But the revolution in the religious history of the world wrought by the coming of Christ in the flesh, carried men back for a time to purity of religion. Alas! that the evil tendency of the human heart should so soon have corrupted that purity, and led men again to desert the fountain of living waters. We all know how the religion of Christ was perverted to become the religion of a priesthood; how the one sacrifice of his body upon the cross—the great central fact of our religion—was repeated and travestied in the perpetual sacrifice of the mass; how the one Mediator between God and man was neglected and dishonoured by the substitution of a host of other intercessors; how, in short, the word of God was made of none effect by traditions, and the precepts of Christ and his Gospel, the one fountain of living waters, neglected and despised, while mankind were bidden to slake the thirst of their souls in the muddy waters of a grasping sacerdotalism. From all these errors the Reformed churches have now, for three hundred years, been happily delivered. God grant that what is called the religious revival of the present day may not carry us back into them ere we are aware of it. Then should we, indeed, be guilty of the sin denounced by Jeremiah. Once having been privileged with a Reformed religion, and sinking back into Romish error, we should just as really be committing this sin, as did Israel of old when they forsook the institutions of Moses, and did homage to Baal and Ashtaroth.

Thus far I have regarded these words historically, and applied them to cases in which our own personal religion has only a contemplative, not a practical interest. Let us now turn to rather a different view of the subject, and see whether there is not within us some power leading us, not like the Jews of old, to the worship of false gods; not, perhaps, into Romish error, but teaching us to seek religious happiness from other sources besides the worship of the true God; teaching us to draw that nourishment which every soul must and will have, rather from cisterns of our own hewing, than from Him who cries to every one that thirsteth, "Come ye to the waters of life."

First, then, there are those who strive to satisfy the thirst of their soul from the pleasures which the world gives;—men who, calling themselves Christians, are yet in their hearts the servants of sin;—men who, like the Samaritans of old, feared the Lord and served their own gods, not seeing in their blindness how inconsistent they were in so doing. The cases are exactly parallel: the Samaritans found themselves in a strange land, where Jehovah had been worshipped, and they felt that they, too, must worship him, or some dire calamity would befall them; they feared the Lord, but the mere animal instinct of fear was not enough to induce them to give up their own gods: and so they devised what they, doubtless, considered a happy combination of two different worships: they feared the Lord, and served their own gods. Just so is it with those who have not realised the teaching of Christ, that "ye cannot serve God and Mammon." When the attempt is made, the worship which is given to God is only just so much as in our foolishness we think will suffice to ward off his anger. It is only because we are afraid of him that we serve him. The true service of the heart is all given to our own gods. And if you doubt this, take a great practical test. The time will soon come—nay, it comes every day of our lives—when our duty to God clashes with our service of Mammon. See, then, which has to give way; whichever power be stronger in our hearts must soon show itself by unmistakable signs. We cannot draw our supplies from the fountain of living waters, and at the same time from cisterns of our own hewing. "He to whom we yield ourselves servants to obey, his servants we are to whom we obey." But, I think, that when we speak of the service of the world, we hardly understand clearly what Holy Scripture intends by the expression; and as this is, undoubtedly, one of the chief sources whence men strive to draw their happiness, let me briefly consider it here.

St. John puts it very concisely: "The lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is of the world." Not the flesh itself, not the eye itself, not the life itself; but the lust and pride thereof. It is not the love of man which is forbidden. This was the Pharisaic notion. It was upon the due observance of the social affections that they wrote "corban" only as an excuse for not exercising them at all. The teaching of Christ is: "He that loveth not his brother, his wife, his family, his friends, whom he hath seen, how shall he love God whom he hath not seen?" Nor is it the love of our worldly occupation or profession which is forbidden. On the contrary, St. Paul bids us run with diligence the course that is set before us, remembering always that he who is faithful in that which is least, will be faithful also in much.

But the worldliness which is condemned in Holy Scripture, is the worldly spirit. The affections fixed on that which is outward, unreal, and transitory; the lust of pleasures which affect only the senses; the pride of men's opinion or our own position. In short, that love of the world which if a man have, the love of the Father is not in him. But let the love of God once take possession of his heart, and how quickly will it expel all that former unreal affection! If a man do but once drink of the fountain of living water, he will find there all—yea, infinitely more than all—that his soul needs, and he will soon cease from the vain toil of hewing out for himself cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water.

It is almost needless for us to inquire the reasons why the cisterns which man hews out for himself are only broken cisterns that can hold no water. He hews them out with infinite care and toil; he exhausts all his energy and all his ingenuity to provide happiness for himself, and satisfy the craving thirst within him; and then, when he has exhausted every device that human cleverness can suggest; when he has ransacked the world's treasury, thinking that he can find in that the good he seeks, he discovers that it is but a broken cistern after all. It is only at the command of God that the rock is smitten, and the fountain gushes forth with living waters. It is written on every page of creation that the world passeth away, and the glory of it. Everything changes. The things which are, are changed from those which were, and still are changing with each fleeting moment. Change is the law of natural being; only that which is supernatural—only God in his infinity—remains unchangeable. Therefore it is that the soul within man cannot find satiety in that which is merely natural. It soars upwards to that which is superior to nature—to that which has affinity with itself; refusing to be tied down to earth by the fetters of its earthly tabernacle. Surely this is a mighty proof of its immortality—a sure sign that it is made for some sphere of being higher than this which it now enjoys. I can imagine nothing clearer than that the existence which is satisfied with the present, is not made for the future. But when I find the universal confession on the lips and in the hearts of those who have had the best opportunity of tasting the pleasures of this present life, that not only the things themselves pall upon the taste, but also the desire of them passeth away, then I can have no hesitation in believing—even without the authority of Holy Writ—that there must be some sphere of being in which these desires will be satisfied; some higher spiritual life, wherein "he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever."

There is one other consideration in connection with this subject—that of a danger, more subtle than that of the worldly man, a danger which may at times beset even the best of Christians—the danger of mistaking the externals of religion for religion itself. These should be only the outward expressions of the inward spiritual life. It is true, indeed, that that inner life cannot exist without finding its utterance in outward acts of worship; but the converse of this is not equally true, the outward may be there without the inward. And, perhaps, there is no one in so great danger as he who has lulled to sleep his conscience with works of charity and religious observance. He has placed his cistern so close to the fountain, that it seems as if it must catch some of the living water; but it is a broken cistern still, though hewn with all the toil and care of a lifetime. In the time of our direst need we shall turn to it in vain. Happy are we if we learn the lesson ere it be too late, that love to God and the realisation of his love to us as measured by the cross of Christ, is the one and only source whence the cravings of the immortal soul can find their fullest and completest satisfaction.

Let us notice, moreover, the contrast between ourselves and the Israelite of old, to whom these words were addressed. Even in his case, God held it a terrible thing that he should forsake the fountain of living waters. Yet God had not vouchsafed to him such knowledge of himself as we now possess. All the gentler attributes of the Divine nature were hidden behind a veil. Then he was revealed as Power; now he is revealed as Love—love incarnate in the person of Christ.

How much greater, then, shall be our condemnation if we neglect so great a salvation! if we strive to draw from earthly sources that which He only can supply. Only the love of God can drive out from the heart the love of the world. An empty heart there cannot be. It must devote its energies and affections to some object. It must drink of the water of life, or else hew out cisterns for itself. It must honour God, or else dishonour him. It cannot remain neutral. It dishonours him if it chooses that which is low and vile and transitory, instead of that which is high and heavenly, and fadeth not away. It dishonours him if it thinks to serve him by the letter of the law, instead of the spirit of Christ. It dishonours him if it forgets its own immortal nature, and omits to prepare itself by its life here for the life which it must live in the future. It dishonours him if it forms false notions of him, and pictures him as a God who would drive us into holiness by force or terror, instead of that which he really is, a God all gentleness, and love, and mercy, whose Holy Spirit is ever on the watch to catch the first faint longings for that peace which the world cannot give; ready to set before the awakened soul the life and death of the Saviour as the only satisfaction of all spiritual desire, the one fountain of living waters; ready to dwell with that soul henceforth as an ever-present Comforter, leading and guiding into all truth.

(Drawn by B. BRADLEY.)

"Tender blooms of the field, that flourish and fade in a day."—p. 597.

What, then, is the test by which to try ourselves? Simply: are we living so that the will of God may be done in us and by us? Are we glorifying God, whether by our life or by our death? If so, then have we made the spirit of Christ's cross our own. We have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts. The power of the world is gone, the enticements of the flesh are gone. The spirit of Christ is all in all. We have forsaken the broken cisterns that could hold no water, and turned again to the fountain of living waters, realising now and for ever, on this and on the other side the grave, his blessed promise, who said: "He that drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall never thirst."

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XXI.

A SHADOW ON THE HEARTH.

HE burly man had established himself at the table on which he had placed his hat and his stick. The room was very cold, but he must have walked himself into a heat; he was wiping his forehead with his handkerchief when John came in.

John was, evidently, not at all glad to see him; on the very threshold of the matter, this fact was apparent; he was not glad to see him, and, moreover, he had a suspicion that the visit boded no good.

"Good evening, Mr. Isaacs," said John.

"The same to you," replied the other, carelessly.

John sat down at the side of the table. As regarded externals, the two men were in pretty much the same position as before: sitting face to face; a fireless grate, and one solitary candle which was dimly burning, between them.

"Any news stirring to-night?" said John, breaking a rather oppressive silence, and speaking evasively.

"None that I've heard of," replied the burly man, who was feeling in his pocket.

The eye of John Humphreys noted this movement with some uneasiness.

"Wife got home?" asked the burly man, bringing forth a leather pocket-book, of an unmistakable business character, and flinging it on the table.

"Yes," said John, his eye on the pocket-book, "she is."

"Ah!" There was a sinister expression in the tone of the monosyllable. John did not speak. It was very chill and miserable here, with Mr. Isaacs sitting opposite: very bright and genial there, with Rachel. He felt like a bird suddenly caught and caged.

The burly man was deliberately opening his pocket-book. "You see, Mr. Humphreys," he began, "this is like to be a rather ugly affair, between you and me."

"How so?" said John, quickly.

"Why, because, you see, things aint just pleasant," said Mr. Isaacs, scratching his ear, while his attention was wholly fixed on the pocket-book. "One can't see one's way clear in this world; there are such turns and twists."

"What has happened, pray?" asked John, in the same quick tone. The distance between himself and the genial atmosphere where Rachel abode began to increase.

"Well, you see, what has happened is this," said Mr. Isaacs, who had now his pocket-book open before him; "I have lost a mint of money, this last fortnight—more fool I for doing it!"

"Doing what? and what have you lost?" asked John, getting a trifle impatient.

"Well, you see, I need must speculate. Never mind how, it isn't to the purpose, and would not, in the least, interest you; but I'm the loser, and that's where the shoe pinches."

John was silent; a certain rather loose transaction rose to his mind; and it occurred to him that, having largely built his faith on Mr. Isaacs, he might chance to find himself outwitted. But, for the present, he said nothing; he was like the ostrich when it hides its head in the sand, and when, as certain as can be, up will come the hunter!

"Now, this affair has flung me into difficulties. I have no need to hide it from you, John Humphreys, —into serious difficulties."

Nearer, nearer comes the hunter, but the ostrich goes on hiding. John Humphreys said not a word.

"There is but one way I can turn," continued Mr. Isaacs, fingering a document which John knew but too well.

"Have you got the money, pray?"

"Money!—what money?" stammered John, like a man taken by surprise.

"What money! Why, the money old Sylvester borrowed of your father, to be sure. Have you got it?"

John did not immediately reply. Mr. Isaacs knew, as well as could be, that he had not got it.

"You were going to proceed to extremities, you know," continued he, still fingering the document; "that was, let me see—when was it?"

"Six weeks ago," replied John, mechanically.

"Ah, yes, six weeks! Time to have sacked Rome!" and the burly man laughed at his own wit; "so you have got it, haven't you?"

"No, I haven't," stammered John.

Poor fellow! to be put on the rack in this cold, dismal room, while she sat close by, expecting every moment he would come back.

Come back? It seemed that half-an-hour had gone already!

It was too bad to meet with a stumble, on the very threshold of his new happiness.

"If you haven't, it will be so much the worse for you," continued Mr. Isaacs; "you know this writing, don't you?"

"Yes," said John.

"You engage, in black and white, to pay me back the money at request."

"Yes, but," burst out John, "you said that was a mere form of speech. You told me the money was as good to you as an investment; you know you did; and that you were never likely——"

"Hush, Mr. Humphreys, if you talk so loud your wife will hear you!"

"Of course," continued John, eagerly, and lowering his voice, "I never dreamed that you would call it back in six weeks. I call it a swindle—a regular swindle!"

"You may call it what you like, but I'm good in law, and that's the matter to be considered; now all you have to do is just to pay me."

"But I can't," exclaimed John, his distress getting the better of his anger; "I have nothing to pay with."

"Why don't you stump up the Sylvesters? I would, this very day! what are you sparing them for?"

John's face looked very blank indeed. Another little transaction, scarcely more wise than the other, occurred to him, with remarkable unpleasantness.

"You can't be devoted enough to sacrifice yourself for the sake of Mr. Sylvester?" continued the burly man, snuffing the candle; "if you are, you're scarce the article I take you for."

John's face denoted the most extreme perplexity.

"Stump them up, I tell you!" cried the other; "put an execution in the house! Why not?"

"I can't," said John, despondingly; "no, I can't do that."

"Why not, pray; what is to hinder you?"

"I was going to put an execution in the house," said John, slowly and deliberately; "I wish to my heart I had! But there came a lawyer——"

"A lawyer!" gasped Mr. Isaacs.

"Yes, a lawyer; and he told me I should be a fool if I carried out my threat, and should get only half the money. He said a turn was coming in the Sylvester affairs, and one of them—I'm sure I don't know which—was likely to come into a great fortune. He took a vast deal of trouble to argue the matter, and he made it so plain, at last, that I gave in. I thought I was doing the best for myself," added John, ruefully.

"Very likely. But you need not be crestfallen about it," said the burly man, cheerfully. "Just give me your orders, and I'll see that they are carried out. You are not obliged to keep faith with a lawyer. Bless you! he won't expect it."

"But I must!" cried John, in a tone of distress. "I see it clearly now. I have been entrapped, all ways. He made me sign a paper promising to wait six months."

"Did he? Then all I have to say is, John Humphreys, you are the most unlucky dog that ever lived!"

John groaned under the weight of the epithet.

"Because, you see, whatever comes, I must have my money," continued the other, briskly. "I can't afford to be ruined."

John pointed to the door. His face was very pale.

"My wife is in your room, Mr. Isaacs," said he, tremulously; "my wife of a week old. I've brought her home this very night. What do you think will become of us, if you don't show us any mercy?"

"Mercy! It is not a matter of mercy, my friend. I can't justly say what would become of you. I know what my fate would be, if I let you off. Just this—a debtors' prison!" He rose as he said it.

John hid his face in his hands.

"You will, perhaps, think the matter over," continued the burly man. "I shouldn't like to have to serve a writ, you know, on an old friend—and a week from to-day——"

"A week!" exclaimed John, horrified.

"Yes; not an hour longer! It is more than I can afford. But to an old friend——"

"Hark ye, Mr. Isaacs," said John, rising also, and with blanched face and kindling eyes confronting him, "if I'd known you'd been a knave, I'd have had no dealings with you. As it is, I'd have you leave the house, sir, and not insult me, by calling yourself a friend!"

"I am quite agreeable. Indeed, I have stayed too long. It is cruel to part husband and wife in this way. Good night, John Humphreys, and a week to-day, remember!"

"I shall not be likely to forget," said John, sternly.

When the other man was gone, came the worst. Then John strode up and down the dark, fireless room, feeling that he was a ruined man—ruined as far as his brightest prospects went.

And there was Rachel! He must go back to her. As the front door shut, the door of her room had opened, and a little whisper came stealing along the passage.

"John, dear, are you coming?"

He would not tell her. No; whatever it might cost him. How bright she looked, how happy! How she came to meet him, nestling her head on his shoulder, and scolding him for being so long away. How glad she was that they were alone again, and that "intolerable person," as she called him, was fairly shut out of the house. How she put away her work, and came and sat by him, and talked to him, and laughed in the gaiety of her heart!

No; he could not tell her—not then. Yet, in spite of all, a kind of shadow fell on the hearth, that had been so bright. In spite of his efforts, John was not altogether himself. He was absent and preoccupied; and now and then a look of deep disquiet stole over his face. Rachel saw it, ere the evening had come to an end. She felt the shadow dimming her sunny landscape. It was strange, mysterious, and inscrutable! But John would tell her nothing. No; not a word!

CHAPTER XXII.

JOSEPHINE'S PICTURE.

In the days of which we are speaking, Raymond Sylvester was not often seen in the streets of Newbury. When he was visible, it was a stray glimpse caught of him at the carriage window. But one fine morning, when the sun shone brighter than it had done of late, and, to use a homely expression, the crows had picked up the dirt, Raymond, in elegant morning costume, and not a hair out of place, was walking leisurely up the pavement that fronted the shops in the market-place.

The carriage was not far off, it stood at the corner, the reins gathered into the hands of the old coachman on the box; while the footman, having alighted to let his master out, remained standing by the door, ready at a moment's notice to let him in again.

Raymond, then, was walking, at an easy pace along the pavement. The shops were very gay. Newbury was proud of her shops; but Raymond, who seemed in a preoccupied state, scarcely deigned to look at them, until at last he came to the great shop, at the corner, and then he was obliged to look. He was going in here, to make a purchase for Alice.

It was a stationer's shop, on rather a grand scale, and the attractive part of it consisted in the display of pictures in the windows. Some were engravings of considerable value, others were original drawings and water-colour paintings, and these Raymond stood a moment to contemplate. He was a bit of a painter himself, and had a great love for art, and these pictures were too good to be passed by.

He stood a moment, and then his heart gave a convulsive leap, and his whole frame trembled. One of the pictures he knew quite well. It met him as a familiar friend: it had once belonged to Josephine!

He remembered her doing it. It had been an outdoor sketch originally, and she had worked it up at leisure. He had sat by her as she did so. How vivid the scene was in his memory! The pretty, cheerful room, the sweet, tranquil face of his beloved, the peaceful moments which had gone by, never, alas! to return—yes, he remembered it well!

How came the picture here? Raymond's cheek crimsoned, and the hot tears gushed to his eyes. It was for sale. For sale! This little gem that was to have adorned their home—his home, and Josephine's—now thrust rudely forth on the world, to the highest bidder.

The thought was very dreadful, it stung him to the quick. It brought back the old passionate longing; it opened the wound wide!

He stood gazing at the rural spot depicted by her hand: the stream, with broad leaves of water-lilies lying open to the sun, the old mill, the sweep of country, the cornfield yonder—with gleaners, in picturesque costume, some carrying bundles of corn on their heads. There was not a stroke, not a line, in that picture, but he knew it. The man's heart, hard as it may seem, was racked with cruel pain. It took some moments to recall himself to composure. He could have wept and sobbed.

When he had recovered himself, and was again the Raymond Sylvester of old, he stepped into the shop. It was a hazardous game he was playing. He might break down, spite of his Stoicism and his Sylvester dignity. Yes, break down, and be weak and pitiful as a woman.

But he must get that picture into his keeping. He would not have it—one of his own love-tokens, so he regarded it—drifting on the current of a careless, unthinking world—a world that did not know his Josephine! No, he would snatch it away. He would hide it in some secret spot, and cherish it, his whole life long, for the sake of Josephine.

He stood before the counter, cold and self-possessed as ever. He asked for what he wanted with a voice as calm as it had ever been. And then he said he should like that picture.

The man reached it down in obsequious haste. It was quite a bargain, he said, glibly; painted with no idea of sale, but the party had been reduced, and would be thankful to get only half its value.

While he spoke, Raymond's cheeks tingled, and the muscles of his face quivered; but he kept the command of himself. Happily, there was no need of much speaking, or his voice might have betrayed him. The man told him the price unasked, and Raymond paid it down. If it had taken his last farthing, he would have had that picture!

He carried it away. He had not dared to inquire about her, where she was, what she was doing, or suffering. But when he got into the street again, he gave an eager look around, as though he were entertaining the vague hope that he might find her. He could not go back to the carriage all at once; he was in too great misery. He was on his way to Brooklyn Hall, to pay a visit to the widow, and all this had happened to him.

What was that figure on the other side of the street—a slight figure, but graceful, and with the bearing of a gentlewoman; and habited in mourning, and with a thick crape veil? His heart beat strangely, he was almost unmanned at the very sight, for it was Josephine!

He knew her in a minute. He could have rushed to her, undemonstrative as he was, and fallen at her feet, and wept, and prayed to clasp her to his heart; but of course he did not; Raymond Sylvester rarely overstepped the mark. She was walking slowly, and, as it seemed, feebly; but, then, she had been ill. Yes, he knew that. He thought of the sweet face, hidden by the veil, and guessed that he should find it altered. Well, was he not altered? Had not he suffered?

He crossed the street, by an impulse too irresistible to be controlled. She did not see him, for she was some steps in advance. He walked, for a few moments, behind her, and then he ventured to come close up, yea, even to touch her garment.

"Josephine!"

It was the sweet, low, insidious voice that she had heard so often. The poor girl stopped, and a stifled cry was heard from behind the thick crape that concealed her features; not such a concealment, though, but Raymond could see the pale, sharpened face and sunken eye; not such a concealment, but that he could realise the wreck she had become!

"Josephine!"

He said it again. He might think she had not heard, but she had. Her whole frame was in a tremor. She put out her hand to motion him away. And he knew he had no business there, but he could not go.

"See, Josephine, I have bought your picture!"

She had stopped a moment, and now she looked hurriedly up at him, tears were in her eyes.

"I bought it, because everything is precious to me that belongs to you; because I shall never part with it, while I live."

She had begun to walk on again. He walked beside her.

"I think I am mad, Josephine, to be here, to speak to you, to look at you again. If you have any pity for me, you will tell me——"

His voice broke down, and he turned away his face.

"What do you want to know?" she asked.

He turned to her again, with a quick, hurried gesture.

"I want to know where you are, what has befallen you, since—since we parted? The suspense tortures me!"

"If you care to inquire," said Josephine, calmly, "I will tell you. I am in lodgings, earning my bread."

"Oh, Josephine!"

It was all he said, and they walked on side by side. When they came to the end of the street, Josephine stopped. Then Raymond spoke again.

"Will you tell me where you live?"

She paused a moment. She had wonderful self-control, or she would have wept aloud.

"It cannot interest you," she said at length. "Our ways lie wide apart now, and ever will do."

"Then you will not tell me?"

"I think not."

There was another silence. They stood opposite. A casual meeting of two friends, it seemed to be—no more. But a scene in many a life's drama takes place with no more sensation than this. When they had stood thus a few moments, he began to say, in a low, hurried tone—

"Josephine, if God ever forgives me, will you forgive?"

"I have forgiven," said she, quickly.

"And will you sometimes let me speak to you, or look at you, even afar off, Josephine? Oh, my love! my love!" said he, in a tone of passionate fondness, and holding out his hands to her.

But she withdrew a few paces. She would not let him take her hands. No; the thread was broken; they were on opposite sides of the stream, and could not join hands again. She was not resentful. She knew the whole sad story well. She knew that her heart and Raymond's were one still; that she could not uproot the affection which had grown so long, nor could he. He had been base to leave her; but was she not portionless? Would it not be poverty mating with poverty? If he had been base, it was because the ordeal had been beyond his strength. The rotten principles of his race hung round him like fetters. His nobler self would have been true to her, and shielded and cherished her. But the Sylvester had sacrificed her. Tears were swimming in her eyes. She saw his anguish, and it was far deeper than hers; for remorse was an ingredient in his anguish, and Josephine had no remorse. He must suffer. She knew he would. It was not for her to whisper comfort; oh, no! Her lips were sealed!

She turned to go. It was time she did. She to her humble refuge; he back to his home. The sooner they parted the better.

He saw she meant to go, and he pressed forward with a sudden vehemence, and took her hand. He had it in his grasp an instant only, and then he dropped it, and was gone. But as he turned away, there burst from his lips, with a kind of passionate wail,

"Oh, my love! my love!"

Raymond was not usually demonstrative. To be demonstrative was a crime in the eyes of the Sylvesters.

"Always preserve your self-control, my son," was the earliest advice his mother had given him.

When Josephine was gone, he had to fall back on these first principles. He could easily have broken down. He could easily have flung the Sylvester dignity to the winds, and fought with his whole soul to get back his love. But then the old fabric must fall down like the house on the sand!

Pity he could not do as other men have done, and support its decaying walls by manly industry and the golden meed of labour. He had youth, and intellect, and the field was wide and open, and the blessing of watchful Providence was there.

But no! If he tried that experiment, it would be a novelty. It would compromise the dignity of his race, and forfeit his birthright.

His birthright was to sit with folded hands, and be a gentleman.

"No, Sylvester had ever worked, or ever would," his mother had told him.

Besides, what time was there to enter the only branches of industry suited to him? Professions are not caught up in a day. They have to be approached by many a long route of patience and persevering energy. And here was the doom even at the doors!

He walked back to his carriage. He showed no outward sign of discomposure. The footman held open the door as his master stepped in. Then he climbed to his place, and the carriage drove on.

The coachman knew where he had to drive. He turned his horses' heads towards Brooklyn.

Raymond sat erect and self-possessed till the town was cleared. There was no fear that any one should see him. Then he crouched down, his face buried in his hands, his great agony taking hold upon him. Then you would scarce have known him to be Raymond Sylvester.

A sound roused him. He slowly raised himself from his attitude of dejection and looked up. A horse was coming along at a brisk trot. Then the horseman drew up alongside the carriage, which had drawn up as well.

"Good morning, Mr. Sylvester," said the well-known voice of the family lawyer. "Out for a drive, I suppose?"

"Yes," replied Raymond, hastily.

"You look to want air. I can't congratulate you much on your appearance."

Raymond forced a kind of smile.

"It's a fine morning to get out," continued the lawyer, still looking in at the carriage-window; "I've had a gallop myself. The doctor says I am getting too fat by half."

"Indeed," said Raymond, absently.

"Yes;—a word with you, Mr. Sylvester," and he came nearer, and spoke in a low, cautious tone; "going to Brooklyn?"

Raymond turned pale.

"I think I am," stammered he.

"All right! You remember an old adage: 'Happy the——'"

"Oh, hush—hush!" cried Raymond, shuddering; "it has not come to that. No, and perhaps never will."

"Oh! I misunderstood you then. I thought you gave me instructions——"

"Never mind what I did," said Raymond, in a suppressed voice; "there are some positions in which a man gets placed when he knows not what he does."

"Exactly; well, I was wanting to see you. That fellow—Isaacs, I think his name was—who lent the other fellow the money—you know what I mean——"

"Yes—yes."

"Well, he has come to grief; has lost in some silly speculation, and falls back on Humphreys—that's the name—falls back on Humphreys, and insists on being paid."

Raymond turned paler still.

"Now, Humphreys is an honest sort of a man, and has just married, and settled in a farm he bought with this said money. It will go hard with him, I am afraid."

"Will it?" said Raymond, anxiously.

"Yes; he will have to sell the farm. I don't know what else he can do. I am really sorry."

"Sell the farm?" repeated Raymond, mechanically.

"Yes. I tied him off you know for six months. I think it was a dodge of Isaacs. He got paid for the accommodation. The fact is, if people will do things without a lawyer," added Mr. Carlton, complacently, "they are sure to be taken in. Humphreys has been sold."

Raymond did not answer. In fact, the news seemed to have stunned him.

"Her ladyship quite well?" said Mr. Carlton, retiring from the carriage-window, and speaking in his natural tone.

"Quite well, thank you," replied Raymond.

"And Miss Sylvester?"

"Quite well, thank you," replied Raymond.

"Well, I am glad to see you out. A pleasant ride," said the lawyer, cheerfully, and giving the rein to his horse. "Good morning."

"Good morning," said Raymond.

And Mr. Carlton rode off.

The Sylvester horses, which had been showing signs of impatience, and had required the coachman's utmost skill to hold them in, gave a few plunges, and went on again. Straight on the road to Brooklyn. He felt he could not help it.

(To be continued.)

"MIRANDOLINE."

"THAT is mirandoline, Mary?" asked Charles. "I heard Aunt Ellen speak of it, the other day, and did not know what she meant."

"I am sure it must be pretty, for I like the name," said little Emily.

"It is not always a good plan to judge flowers by their names," replied Mary; "but in this case you are right, for mirandoline is a very beautiful hyacinth; first, let me describe it, and afterwards I shall tell you of one I had a long time ago."

"Oh!" exclaimed Charles, "we are going to have another of Mary's flower stories. I do believe there is not a plant that grows, about which she does not recollect something interesting."

Emily clapped her hands in delight, and said, "Tell us quickly, Mary, what mirandoline is like, then we shall better understand the story, and can make a little picture in our minds to look at while you are speaking."

"Well, imagine a tall white hyacinth, with long green leaves."

"Oh, yes!" interrupted Emily, "I know hyacinths; mamma has a great many at home. She says they grow better than most other flowers in a city. Is mirandoline a double white hyacinth?"

"No," replied Mary, "it is single; but has large bells which cluster round the stalk. It is purely white, and looks like wax."

"Wax, Mary! surely real flowers are prettier than wax?"

"Certainly, Emily. I only meant that mirandoline has a soft, waxy appearance, though much more beautiful than any imitation could be. Man's utmost ingenuity cannot bear comparison with the works of God."

"Emily," said Charles, "why do you ask so many questions? you are keeping us from hearing the story."

"I shall not try your patience longer," said Mary. "When I was about nine years old I went to spend a little time with my uncle and aunt, at a quiet watering-place, where they had taken a house for the season. At first I was delighted with the change of scene; but, as the novelty wore away, I began to feel lonely, having no companion of my own age. My aunt took me to walk every day; but when she went out to visit, or sat with my uncle, instead of employing myself reading or working, as she wisely advised, I used to wander about listlessly, often wishing myself at home."

"There was a grass-plot before the door, surrounded by a railing, with a gate opening on the public road, and there I spent a good deal of my time. Frequently I had observed a little girl, about my own age, walking in the garden of the adjoining house, and longed much to make her acquaintance. She had long, golden hair, blue eyes, and a lovely colour in her cheek. I noticed she was much quieter than myself; she never ran or played, but used to walk sedately back and forward, or sit on the grass when the day was warm. She had a grave, thoughtful expression, although her countenance was sweet and gentle. I think she must have observed how often I watched her, and been anxious to gratify my desire, for one day she came close to the railings which divided us, and, seeing a large bunch of wild flowers in my hand, which I had gathered during my last walk, she said, 'I am very fond of flowers; please let me look at that pretty bunch.'"

"I drew near, glad that the ice was at length broken between us. I handed it to her, and as she admired the flowers one by one, told her where each had been gathered, and of the nice walk I had taken."

"Do you ever go for a country ramble," I asked, "or climb the rocks for plants?"

"I should like to do so," she replied; "but I cannot, for it tires me to walk far; however, I sometimes go to the beach in search of shells."

"I am sorry you cannot walk," I said, "for I could show you such pretty places. All I can do is to bring you flowers. Will you take these now?"

"Thank you," said the little girl; "I shall like so much arranging them in the new vase mamma bought for me. It is very pleasant amusement, settling flowers, but I seldom get any. We live in town, and only come to the country for a short time every summer, to make me stronger. I like being here very much, and think I shall enjoy it even more now, when you bring me flowers, and tell me of all the pretty places I cannot see."

"Oh, yes; I shall come out very often, and tell you of everything I have seen, for I like you greatly. But what shall I call you?"

"My name," she said, "is Violet. You see I am called after a flower, which accounts for my being so fond of my sister plants."

"And she smiled so sweetly, that I felt no one could help loving her."

"I suppose you are the only flower in your own home?" I said, "for I believe it is difficult to make plants grow in towns."

"We have hyacinths," she replied. "And mamma has promised to give me a root this year for myself, and a pretty blue glass for it to grow in. She had one last year, called mirandoline. I liked the name, but the blossom was even prettier; and mine is to be the same. I am to plant it late in autumn, and it will blow in spring. It is interesting to watch a root, which looks withered and dead, shoot out a fresh, green bud, and then a lovely flower; it is like being in the grave, and rising again in renewed beauty at the last day. I was very ill last winter, but the nice warm summer has made me almost quite well."

"Just at this moment my aunt called me to come in, so saying good-bye hastily to my new friend, I ran to the house. From this time we met frequently. She used to spend evenings with me, and I with her, and sometimes we were able to enjoy short walks together, and grew fonder of each other every day. It was therefore with great sorrow I was obliged to part from her, in order to return home. She had been much stronger latterly, and during our last walk had spoken hopefully of our meeting again the following summer."

"The cold weather was now commencing, and Violet remained in the country only a short time after our departure. I had a pleasant letter from her on her return to town, in which she wrote: 'My mirandoline is just budding. I often wish you were here to watch it with me; but perhaps you may see it when in blossom.'"

"This was my first friendship, and dearly I loved the gentle little girl. At first she wrote frequently, afterwards her letters came at longer intervals. In one she said: 'Do not think, my own Mary, that I am forgetting you, because I do not write as much as I used. Mamma will not let me, for I feel very weak and ill; but do write to me often, as I take great pleasure in reading your letters.'"

"These lines sent a pang through my heart; however, I continued to write as she had requested, until I got her last, written evidently with great difficulty: 'My own Mary, I want to write to you once more, though I can hardly hold the pencil, I am so weak. You will never see me in this world, but do not be sorry, for we shall meet again where violets do not fade. I love my Saviour very much, and I am almost glad he is going to take his little earthly flower to grow in his heavenly garden. I have asked mamma to send you my mirandoline, in its pretty blue glass, to keep for my sake. I shall never see its beauty; but I shall be like it, pure and spotless, washed in my Saviour's blood, and made "whiter than snow." I cannot write more, for I am tired—'

"Here it broke off suddenly, and was enclosed in one from her mother, saying she would write and let us know when her dear child was taken, which she feared must be very soon. In a few days the dreaded letter arrived, announcing that little Violet was transplanted to the garden above. This was my first great grief, and I bore it badly.

"The mirandoline arrived shortly after, carefully packed, and quite uninjured. I placed it in the window of my own room, and as the blossoms expanded one by one, I gazed at their beauty, and thought, 'My friend has been taken from me, but I have been given this lovely flower as an image of what she is now, clothed in the white robe of Christ's righteousness.' But every image must be broken, and oh! this was a sore trial to me."

"Broken, Mary! surely your beautiful hyacinth was not broken; how sorry you must have been!"

"I shall tell you how it occurred. My little cousin, Harry, a child of four years old, was staying with us at the time, and, as is not unfrequent with little fellows of that age, he was very troublesome, and, being a great pet at home, had been allowed to do pretty much as he pleased. My mother had strictly forbidden him to enter my room, or touch anything belonging to others without leave; but, alas! poor little Harry had no idea of obedience, and one day when I was returning from a walk with her, he ran to meet us in great delight, with what he called a nice white plume stuck in his cap. Fancy my horror when I recognised my mirandoline blossom! I rushed to my room, unable to believe so dreadful a thing could be real. Alas! there on the floor, in a hundred pieces, lay the pretty blue glass, of which poor Violet had been so proud—the water spilled, and the root thrown at some distance, after the stalk had been ruthlessly torn from it. I felt overpowered at the sorrowful sight, and could only sit down among the ruins and weep, oh! so bitterly. I fear there was a dark spirit of revenge in my heart towards Harry, as I muttered between my sobs, 'Nasty, mischievous, spiteful, little monkey!'

"Presently my mother entered, carrying in her hand the broken flower, which she had rescued from the boy's cap. She found it very hard to pacify me; I flung the beauteous flower from me, exclaiming—'It is gone, destroyed—like everything I care for.'

"'My child,' she answered, 'this is wrong. You are allowing your evil passions to get the better of you. I know this is a great trial. I am not surprised you are sorry, but we must try to make the best of it. I shall buy you a flower-pot, in which you can replant your mirandoline. It will not be so fine the second year, but you will still have the precious root. You can put this pretty blossom in water upon your table; it will last nearly as long as if still growing. You know, dear, it would have faded soon, in any case; nothing in this world, however beautiful, can last for ever.'

"'But, mamma,' I said, 'was it not very spiteful in Harry to destroy my greatest treasure? Will you not punish him for his disobedience?'

"'Poor Harry is very young, and scarcely knows right from wrong. He has been much petted, and is unused to punishment. While his maid went downstairs for a few minutes, he darted into your room, probably forgetting that it was forbidden ground, and, seeing the pretty flower, no doubt longed to have it. He was not capable of understanding your fondness for the plant, or I am sure would not have been so ill-natured; but if you wish me to punish him, I will do so.'

"'Oh, yes, mamma; do, I should like it.'

"'Mary, would the punishment of Harry restore your plant to beauty? Would it make you feel happier? Is it what your friend Violet would advise, were she here? Above all, was it thus Jesus acted towards those who ill-treated him, when on earth? Consider, dear, and let me know in the morning what you wish. I shall not punish him until then.'

"I was very sad, and I am sorry to say, out of temper, all that evening. I went early to bed, and lay awake a long time, thinking of what my mother had said, and of Violet. I prayed earnestly to be enabled to forgive little Harry, though he had grieved me so much. I then arose, placed the mirandoline blossom in water, after which my mind became more composed, and I slept. Next morning I went early to my mother to beg she would not punish Harry, and when he came into the room I kissed him as usual. He threw his arms round my neck fondly, and said, 'Mary, I am sorry I broke your pretty flower. I will never touch anything not my own again.'

"I do not say this promise was at all times strictly kept; but the little fellow improved, and I certainly felt happier than I should have done, had he been punished at my desire."

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

1. Where reigned a king for seven days alone?
2. What tribute-gatherer did Israel stone?
3. Who o'er the host of Reuben had command?
4. Where died a king by his own children's hand?
5. With whom did Paul his cloak at Troas leave?
6. From whom did Paul in prison help receive?
7. What king in sheep and wool his tribute paid?
8. What heathen towa was of God's ark afraid?
9. Where Israel laid its leader in his grave.
10. The town which Joshua to Caleb gave.
11. What governor to King Darius wrote?
12. The town where Joab falsely Abner smote.
13. Where to a false god Ahaziah sent.
14. Where in disguise a mighty monarch went.
15. What prince for Judah first his offering gave?
16. Who vainly sought God's word from fire to save?
Sin reigns on earth awhile;
But time is fleeting fast;
The end draws nigh, when Christ shall reign
Over his own at last.

THE EVER

— Saturday, June 13, 1868. —

(Drawn by CHARLES GREEN.)

"The child seemed the mother, the mother the child."—p. 610.

PARTNERS FOR LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE," ETC.

CHAPTER I.—THE MERCHANT'S WIFE.

"WILL you be home early to-night?" said Mrs. Barnton to her husband, as he rose from the breakfast-table, at which, substantial man as he was in every sense, he had just dispatched a substantial meal.

"No. Why?" he answered, abruptly.

"Because I feel so ill to-day," replied the lady, with a helpless look, which seemed only to have the effect of irritating the gentleman.

"I will send in the doctor if you like." (Here an interjectional "Oh, no, no"). "But I shall be late to-night; in short, it is a matter of business."

At this point, the third person in the room, a slight young girl, with magnificent dark eyes, rose, and flashed out of the room.

Then, with the name of the inexorable deity whom he worshipped upon his lips, the man of business closed behind him the dining-room door, and, half a minute after, the street-door also.

Mrs. Barnton pushed back her chair and went to the window, from which she almost daily sent a forlorn look after her husband; but before she had moved her tall, drooping figure to the point of view, he had already rounded the corner and was out of sight. She sighed as she dropped into a chair. She had done the same nearly every day for years, but to-day the sigh ended in a little gasping cry.

"What is the matter, mamma?" said the same bright dark girl, re-entering, a few minutes later, in a walking dress, and with a roll of music in her hand, seeing a look of pain contracting her mother's face.

"I feel very ill to-day, Maddie," said the mother. "But you will go to your lessons, love?" she added, yet with a question in her voice and look, as if she waited the decision of her child.

She was answered with a caress such as a mother might have given, and she felt soothed by the touch.

"No, darling mamma, I will not leave you," said the girl.

This mother and daughter were tender to each other with a peculiar tenderness. Madeline, from her earliest childhood, had been her mother's stay. With her alone Madeline had never been in a passion; her presence alone would calm the childish bursts of temper which had earned her the diminutive "Maddie," suggested by her name. That calming influence was more like the restraint which the presence of a child puts upon the passions of its elders, than the result of filial reverence and awe. The child seemed the mother, the mother the child. There was yet another bond between them: they alone, in their little world, were of one blood. Their great dark eyes were of another clime, and the hue which bronzed the mother's brow was but a shade less dusky beneath the transparent smoothness of the daughter's.

A secret trouble deepened the tenderness between them. A fatal craving was creeping upon the weak and gentle woman, and she read the knowledge of it in the eyes of all about her, except those of her child. They alone never glanced at her suspiciously; they never watched her voice and step with mistrust and the pity which is akin to scorn. The girl saw only suffering in the faltering step and nerveless hands, in the vacant eye and wandering speech. Of late a gleam of the truth had dawned upon her; but she still found the cause in her mother's weakness and suffering, and spent all the bitterness of the discovery in secret, passionate tears.

Madeline, after caressing and coaxing her mother, ran up-stairs, took off her bonnet, and prepared to spend the day at home. She carried her books, her drawings, her music, in a great heap into the drawing-room. She liked to look at a heap of work; she liked to task herself with impossible tasks. So she prepared for a busy day, first proceeding to make everything comfortable for "poor mamma." She stirred the fire, and piled the cushions on a couch near it, and then went down to fetch her.

Mrs. Barnton, meantime, had gone to the side-board, and swallowed, standing there, a glassful of brandy. She was seated quietly when her daughter entered and playfully offered her arm to conduct her up-stairs. In a very little time she was asleep among the cushions arranged for her.

She woke at length with an irrepressible cry, and Madeline, who had been as still as a mouse, was at her side in a moment.

"What is it, mamma?" said the startled girl.

"Oh, I have such a pain here," she murmured, pressing her hand to her side. "Bring me some brandy, Lena."

Madeline brought it, and, as she saw her carry it eagerly to her lips, she had a wild impulse to dash the glass down. Scarcely had her mother swallowed the spirit, when every breath became a moan of anguish.

With a new and strange tension of feeling, Madeline hovered all day over the couch from which the sufferer refused to stir. Several times she entreated to be allowed to send for the doctor, but was always answered, helplessly, "Wait till papa comes. I shall be better soon." And so the day wore on.

It was late when Mr. Barnton came home, and by that time the pain had ceased. The acute inflammation had done its worst, and had left the vital tissue dead. He looked gloomily at his wife, chid his daughter for sitting up and looking wretched, and so brought to a close the business of the day.

In the morning Mrs. Barnton did not get up. This was not quite unusual, and her husband did not exhibit much concern.

"You are not to sit moping in the house to-day, Madeline," he said, preparing to make his exit.

"But if mamma should need me?" she objected, without much hesitation in her mind as to what she would do in that case.

"She does not need you," was the peremptory reply. "I cannot have you losing your time in this way. You have lost too much already; but your mother has not a particle of consideration." So saying, Mr. Barnton quitted his home, avoiding an encounter with his daughter's eyes, not at that moment remarkable for meekness.

As soon as the closing door announced that he was gone, Madeline flew to her mother, and, stooping over her, begged to be allowed to stay and nurse her.

"What did papa say? He did not like it yesterday," was the answer; "but I was so ill, and it did me good to have you with me, darling."

"Never mind, papa; let me stay."

"What did he say?" murmured the mother, with feeble persistence.

Madeline told the truth.

"Then, don't stay, love. I am better, only weak. Good-bye."

Madeline kissed her, and went off at once, followed fondly by the languid eyes, which rested on her lovingly as she turned at the door, waved good-bye again, and was gone.

She long remembered vividly every line and note of that day's lessons, and yet it seemed at the time that she was not thinking of them at all. As the day advanced, a sudden restlessness and eagerness to get home seized upon her. She almost flew through the streets, where the lamps, already lighted, glimmered down on the black slippery pavement.

Mrs. Barnton did not rise. Several times a servant had gone up to ask if she wanted anything; but she only asked to be allowed to sleep. They sent up food, which she left untasted, and among themselves they whispered, with a significant carelessness, "She will sleep it off."

Madeline was told that her mother was asleep, and she moved softly through the house and waited patiently for her waking. She had gone to sit beside her with a shaded lamp, that she might be with her when she awoke; but she had not been there long before the awful breathless calm struck her, and, lifting her lamp, she went and looked upon the face of the sleeper, and knew, child as she was, that hers was the sleep that knows no waking.

CHAPTER II.—BALANCING ACCOUNTS.

MR. BARNTON stood leaning on the drawing-room mantelpiece, waiting for the announcement of dinner—an unusual thing for him; and waiting with patience—a thing more unusual still. For, in the first place, dinner was generally kept waiting for him; and in the second, he has been known, in the prospect of having to wait for it, to plunge out of the house and dine, as was surmised, at the nearest hotel. Mr. Barnton held that punctuality was the soul of business, and often gave expression to his conviction in these notable words. He had another phrase, on whose sternly logical basis he stood secure against every argument, and "Business is business" would sometimes fall from his lips; but he was no longer free to use it. His dark-eyed daughter detested it. She flashed at it, and her great eyes showed their opal rings, till her father mentally compared her to a vicious young colt. Never had respectable father so uncomfortable a child.

His attitude of patience is easily explained. On that day business had been suspended. He had had to stand still and look down into the narrow house appointed for all living, to look on at that final winding-up of all earthly concerns in which the balance comes out clear in "dust to dust."

And yet even now, as he stands arrayed in "the trappings and the suits of woe," there is business on his brow, and calculation on his lips. Is he settling accounts with the dead? Is he saying to himself, "She brought me so many thousands. Well, they will be repaid with interest to her daughter. I married as a matter of business, and could not have got on without the money; but she had everything a woman could desire!" He left out one small item—her husband's heart. Conscience, too, would present a little bill for kindness due, calling to mind that day of unpitied pain, and that other day of loneliness and death, on which the account between them closed.

"Well, who could have foreseen the close?" he went on thinking; "and with that frightful habit taking hold of her, perhaps it has not come too soon."

But his calculations took a more practical turn with the appearance of his daughter, her eyes gleaming in big hollows, worn by torrents of weeping that had swept over her like the tornado of her mother's Western isle. She looked at him, and a quivering, like the play of lightning, passed over her face. The desolate girl would have given her heart then and there for a word of love, and the man was not so hard that he could not have spoken it; but reading her look by the light of recent reflections, he took it for reproach, and held his tongue. The moment passed, the young face grew rigid, and the door of out-going affection was closed.

Madeline, it must be confessed, had not been a dutiful daughter, as far as her father was concerned. It is difficult for the child of an imperfect union to be wholly dutiful; and the practical conclusion at which her father arrived before the end of that day's dinner was, that she must be sent to school.

CHAPTER III.—FINISHING.

It must be a hard task, one would imagine, to finish what has never been begun, but such was the task undertaken by Miss Busk in her Establishment for Young Ladies. She undertook to finish their education. Most of the middle-class young ladies who were placed in her hands had never received anything worthy of the name. They had had governesses—nursery governesses, and day governesses—with all the accomplishments and all the incompetency of that ill-paid class of the community; they had learnt to read in a scrambling fashion, and to write what looked very neat and even at a distance, but did not always admit of close inspection as to spelling. A little execrable French, and more execrable music, generally completed their attainments at fourteen or fifteen, the finishing age. Real systematic education had not, in most cases, even been begun. Madeline was older by a year than the latest of these ages, and had fared far better than most of her compeers. Her father had had the sense to see that his daughter's education was suffering, and would suffer, in her mother's hands, and he had dismissed the last of the incompetents, and sent her to attend the classes of an excellent day-school. He would have sent her away long before, but for a lingering feeling for his wife, who would have been utterly desolate without her.

Miss Busk occupied a pair of semi-detached villas, thrown into one, in a pleasant suburb of London. She took only ten young ladies, and very conscientiously did her best to supply the deficiencies of their former training. It was to this lady, strongly recommended by the head of the day-school, that Mr. Barnton resolved to commit his somewhat refractory daughter.

Mr. Barnton lost no time in carrying out his resolution; and Madeline, in the freshness of her first sorrow, was called upon to make preparation for her immediate removal from home. A good deal to her father's astonishment, she made not the slightest opposition to his wishes. It seemed to him that her mother's death had wrought upon her a softening change. But in reality, the change which was in process was a hardening one. The circumstances connected with the loss of her mother had, in the shock of her sudden death, made a sore and deep impression on the sensitive mind of the girl. All that was morbid in the impression, would doubtless have worn away amid the influence of a kindly home, or among sympathising friends; but the morbid strain might easily deepen until it eat into her very heart. Girl as she was, she had begun to look back, and think that her mother's life was yet sadder than her death; that as the child of a mother so little loved, it was better for her to go away, no matter where, from the same loveless life awaiting her.

Business in London carried Mr. Barnton thither in little more than a fortnight after his wife's death. At the same time he escorted to school the—at present—passive Madeline. For the remainder of the day on which they arrived, he took her to his hotel, where she spent the greater part of the evening alone, and in the morning he drove her without delay to her destination, making the poor child's heart ache in silence, with the bitter thought that he wanted to be rid of her as soon as possible. It is needless to say that the man of business had not the slightest idea that he was inflicting any suffering whatever.

It was a stout, active, motherly-looking lady to whom Madeline was presented by her father, with an apology for hastening the time fixed for her reception. Very kindly Miss Busk received her from his hands; and she was presently sent away with a young German girl, half governess, half lady's-maid, leaving her father to confer in private with the head of the establishment, while Madeline, on her return, was allowed a private leave-taking, which only embarrassed both father and daughter.

The next step was to test Madeline's acquirements, and Miss Busk found that she would be an acquisition to the school; and as such, introduced her to her future companions. But Madeline in her mourning dress looked quite plain; and in her suffering not quite pleasant, and did not make at all a favourable impression.

The young lady whose departure would make room for Miss Barnton, had not yet gone; and a special arrangement for the domestication of the latter had to be made for the two or three days during which the former was still to remain in the house. At length the energetic head of the establishment had settled it to her entire satisfaction; and the time drew near when the pupils were allowed to retire to their rooms. Madeline had been appointed to share the apartment of a flaxen-headed, blue-eyed little beauty, who was the pet of the school—the reigning belle, in fact. During the evening, Miss Busk kindly endeavoured to make them specially at home with each other; but the little beauty shrank from the acquaintanceship in a rather noticeable manner. After lessons, a great deal of private conversation had been going on, and at length a request reached Miss Busk, through one of the elder girls, that Fanny might be allowed to give up her room entirely to Miss Barnton, and share that of another schoolfellow.

"I must speak to Fanny," said Miss Busk, annoyed at the request, and thinking it a plot to get possession of the favourite. Going up to the child, she said, rather sharply, "Fanny, I desire you to share your room with Miss Barnton. I have had another bed put up in it for the purpose, and it cannot now be changed."

The little beauty put on a look which was by no means favourable to her pretensions, and exclaimed, pettishly, "But I do not like to sleep with her: she is black."

The pretty fool would have looked long enough on the clear, dark face, which could show rose-tints deeper and more delicate than her own, before she had made such a discovery; but she credited the cruel whispers that had passed among her thoughtless companions concerning her darker blood.

(To be concluded in our next.)

RELIGION IN THE HOME.

BY THE REV. W. B. MACKENZIE, M.A., INCUMBENT OF ST. JAMES'S, HOLLOWAY.

HOME GOVERNMENT.

SO important did St. Paul esteem home government, that in describing the personal qualifications requisite for a bishop, he makes no special mention of his talent, learning, or eloquence, but looks to his successful discharge of home duties, and requires (1 Tim. iii. 4) that he shall be "one that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity." Nothing is more attractively beautiful, or rich in diffusive good, than family government well and wisely administered. To see their children as they grow up, devout, dutiful, and blameless, beset as they must be by allurements to evil, yet inexorably faithful to the supreme demands of duty, neither deterred by threats nor seduced by smiles, but going straightforward in the pathway—rugged it may be—of conscientious obedience, is inexpressibly gratifying to parents' hearts, and welcomed as an ample remuneration for years of anxiety and labour. And yet such a household is hardly conscious of control. Successful home government is something so refined and sensitive, so gentle and imperceptible in its action, that it is recognised mainly in its happy results,—in the formation of wholesome habits,—in the benefits of successful discipline,—in uprooting selfishness, and making each the minister and guardian of others' good. Parents who so rule their houses need no marble monument to record their greatness. Children so wisely disciplined for the duties and conflict of life are their living epistles, read and studied by admiring observers, and their children's children will reckon it their high and hereditary distinction to perpetuate the name and inherit the virtues of such forefathers,—

"My boast is not that I deduce my birth
From loins enthroned, and rulers of the earth;
But higher far my proud pretensions rise,
The son of parents passed into the skies."

Important as the duties of home government are at all times, it is easy to discover their daily increasing value now. The signs of social transformation are everywhere prominent. Power is irresistibly passing over from institutions to individuals. No sooner have children laid aside their school lessons, than they begin to take their part on the world's stage, and intermingle with its responsibilities and perils. Knowing, then, that in a few years the members of our families, far removed from our control, will be acting out their principles, and bringing personal influence to bear upon the great questions—social, political, and religious—now gathering deeper solemnity year by year, it becomes a matter of the gravest importance, to "put our houses in order," so as to make "home," as it ought to be, the place of wise and effective discipline, as well as the centre of attractive enjoyments and abiding love.

There can be no sound home government unless parents are possessed with right convictions of their own responsibility. If children are to be trained aright, to whom but their parents is this grave obligation committed? No other persons in the world possess power so supremely commanding as parents over their offspring. Flexible, gentle, confiding, ready to receive impressions, to adopt ideas, or to be moulded into habits, they are plastic as clay in the potter's hand. Nor is this power assumed, but given by the Great Ruler of all to secure the highest and best results. Family government is part of God's government of the world. He gives "power and authority" to parents for the administration of their houses. A well-governed family is a miniature of his universal government. The same dangers, laws, and blessings belong to both. Parents are the representatives of God in their houses, and in obeying them, children obey the Lord. Their administration is narrowed down to the limits of their own family; but within that circle their authority is unlimited. Higher than them, in their lawful administration, there is none; no one can legitimately control them, nor is there any appeal, except to the supreme tribunal, from their decision. They stand next to God, from whom they immediately hold their power, and to whom they must one day render their account. Oh! that all persons, on finding themselves invested with parental relationships, would meditate on their responsibilities! Children are "a heritage and gift," neither to be trifled with as mere amusements, nor received as unwelcome encumbrances; but "gifts which God has graciously given"—children of sorrow, yet heirs of glory; companions for this life, and more than companions in the next—to act no unimportant part among passing events and duties, but to find their unchangeable destination among the realities yet to be revealed. Oh, that parents would remember that they are endowed with a Divinely-delegated power to rule their houses well, that their children, happy, prosperous, and prepared for both worlds, may "so pass through things temporal as not to lose the things which are eternal!"

The power of parents in home government is never dormant, but acting incessantly, either for good or evil. It forms the atmosphere in which the children live, and move, and have their being. Nature has made them susceptible of the influence of their parents in the highest degree. Even their presence acts upon them as none others' can. Virtue emanates from them for good or evil in indelible results. Their example operates with irresistible effect. Their opinions and sentiments, their common talk to which children listen eagerly as they sit at table,—the notions and feelings brought into play by the events of everyday life,—the friends or visitors that may join the family circle, their opinions, sentiments, and influences,—and all the multifarious agencies, even the most familiar and unassuming, that actively centre on home life—all are stealthily deposited into children's minds, and help to lay the foundation of what they are to be. Just as coral insects in the Southern Ocean build up the strong battlements of islands and continents, the same kind of construction, only still more enduring, is silently going on in families. Parents are every day setting the life-lessons which their children learn with eager voracity, and which they will assuredly act out for themselves when the great struggle of life and its stern realities come on. Parents are doing this by the silent influence of character. The soil is all prepared. Favoured by the sunshine and rain, theirs is the spring-time for planting seeds, which will spring up and reproduce themselves in a harvest of welfare or misery when the sowers' work is done, and they have passed into another world.

But the influences of home life act upon the parents themselves as much as upon the children. It is an egregious error to think that all the care, trouble, and expense bestowed on their children are so much capital sunk for many years, and will yield no profitable return till they are old enough to take their part in the remunerative labours of life. The fact is that the parent is as much better for the child as the child is for the parent. In the compensating arrangements of life, children, unconsciously in most cases, give back to their parents as much good as they take. Efforts to do good react upon the doer. They "are twice blessed; they bless him that gives and him that takes." Every loving effort, or sacrifice, or plan for their children's good, is recompensed in some way by an abundant and immediate remuneration. In this productive labour the reaper overtakes the sower. There is no wearisome waiting. The soil which receives this precious seed yields an instantaneous return in parental satisfaction and bright hope. The duty of providing for their family has often constrained them to adopt such habits as proved the source of untold blessing to the parents themselves. The endeavour to govern their household well has proved such an invaluable self-government for them, that many parents gladly acknowledge they owe everything to their children. The virtues which encircle their name with honour, and the competency which makes life easy, are due to the self-denial, diligence, and forethought which the responsibilities of home life compelled them to exercise. No motive operates more powerfully to make men kind, provident, sober, and devout, than the desire to secure by every means the abiding comfort and well-being of their children; so that it sounds strange, but is literally true, in instances beyond number, that the children have been the making of their parents. And perhaps their safeguard and restorers too. For if all other remonstrances fail to rescue an ill-doing father from his perilous ways, to tell him the effect which his vicious folly must have upon his children, will sometimes arrest and bring him to sorrow and amendment. "You seem," I would say to such a one, "to have thrown down every barrier of self-respect, to have already sacrificed everything that ought to be valued by you as a man and a husband; you have blasted your prospects, ruined your comforts, done your utmost to quench your wife's love, and well nigh broken her heart. Still, there are yet your children. Do you not see that you are dragging them down to poverty and shame, and even perhaps to crime? And are you, who ought to defend them from the least stain of evil, willing to poison the fountain-head of their life, turn the whole stream into bitterness, and consign your own offspring to waste their years among pollutions fouler and more wretched than your own? Can you bear the thought of forfeiting their love for ever, and putting such a separation between your children and yourself, that they can never think of you but with shame, and never hear your name mentioned without a blush?"

Children's preparation for life is accomplished mainly at home. I neither forget nor underrate the influence of schools; nor would I overrate it. But it is in vain to expect that a few hours spent daily in the routine of school lessons will effectually counteract the evils that thickly assail them outside the school walls. Good and wholesome discipline, so far as it consists in training the will, subduing the temper, and forming habits of order, punctuality, and industry, is one great object in all well-managed schools; but it is when the strain is taken off, and the child's energies are left free and unfettered, as at home, that character takes its permanent shape. Whenever the two shall be combined, when the self-control and wholesome instructions of school are encouraged by the parents, and brought into active operation among the claims and duties of home life, then may we hope to see growing up around us a community rich in the possession of every-day virtues, and, beyond that, ennobled with the hopes of a higher inheritance in another world.

It cannot be urged too forcibly that sound home government will not flourish to maturity where there is no religion. Family government, unlike that of a country, is not based upon legal enactments, to be enforced by the fear of penal results. Wise home government appeals not to fear, but to the affections and the conscience. It is a sad hour for any house when love and the sense of filial duty fail to uphold its authority. Even the whisper of resorting to any more stringent measures grates upon the delicate sensitiveness of home life, and disturbs its harmony. Some families are ruled with ease. They all seem to govern themselves. They "perceive and know what things they ought to do, and have grace and power faithfully to fulfil the same." But these are the exceptions.

Children are not exempt from the hereditary taint of sinful nature. Till the tree is made good, the fruit will not be good. The evil treasure of the heart will bring forth evil things. Slight and venial faults, which spring rather from the inexperience and thoughtless impetuosity of youth than any intentional wrong-doing, may be wisely passed over. Such failings, it may be expected, will cure themselves. Other faults may assume a graver type, and reveal tendencies which must be met with decisive treatment. When parents see their children listening to temptation, or struggling feebly against it, and already beginning to yield, their position thus becoming every day more critical and perilous, and needing consummate tact and tenderness, lest the mischief should be aggravated by unwise interposition—at such times the reality and wisdom of their personal religion is brought to the test. A great pressure is then put upon the parents' faith in God; but the pressure upon filial obedience is still greater. The peril to both is extreme. The evils which visit the young grow bolder and more aggressive, while yet their sense of duty and the whispers of conscience become feebler and more obscure. Other restraints, too, they feel, are giving way one by one, leaving them "naked and defenceless to their enemies." When things come to this, an anxious Christian parent knows that he has then but one resort—appeal to God as his God in this hour of peril, and unless he can summon his family before the throne of God, and spread before him in united faith their sins and woes, sorrows and fears, in penitent confession and heartfelt prayer, supplicating Divine forgiveness and "grace to help"—unless he can do this, there is a wound and an injury inflicted already upon the peace and happiness of that home, which may never cease to fester in cold looks, and waning sympathies, and ever-widening alienation. And who can tell what the end of these things shall be? But we must take care how we introduce the solemnities of religion to allay the elements of domestic strife. The history of Eli may warn us of the danger of bringing the ark upon the field of conflict. Nothing invests home government with such deeply-felt power as the consciousness of the personal religion of parents. But it must be sterling and true. Any suspicion of alloy or insincerity in their religious profession, makes such efforts worse than powerless. Children are keen observers, and the consciousness of their own failings makes them blind and severe in their judgment upon parental government. If, then, parents set up a religious standard which is hardly consistent with the habits of their own defective life, the household feels that they come to them armed with an unusual weapon which they have not the skill to use, and smile inwardly at their feeble and inconsistent zeal. Religion, as an element of power in home government, must be above suspicion, genuine, and sincere. Many a man that never heeded religious duties for his own sake, feels bitterly his naked deficiency when he sets himself to rebuke the grave and growing evils of his household. He tries to work upon the lower motives which worldly men have readily at hand, but they fail; he knows there is one sword, and only one, that, if brandished by a Hand mightier than his, would conquer and subdue; but it is the Sword of the Spirit, and that sword he never learnt to handle. And now he wants it, but can do nothing. To his intense regret, he sees his children led as helpless captives by sin, from which he might have delivered them, if he had been a good soldier of Jesus Christ himself, and had known what it was to overcome his enemies by the blood of the Lamb.

Family worship, if rightly conducted, is an agency of immense power in home government.

Parents who from shame, or fear, or personal indecision, or prejudice created by the admitted or disguised inconsistencies of others, or any of the numberless objections to domestic worship, have no idea to what extent their home government is enfeebled from their neglect of this agency. If they mean to govern their children and their household well, let them meet together day by day—if twice a day, so much the better—for the duties of Scripture reading and united prayer. Shun everything tedious, formal, unreal. Let the service be full of life, solemn, not too long, pithy, pointed, natural, easy to be understood, suited to their every-day wants, seeking help for daily duty, and strength to shun daily temptation. Let the priestly father who leads their devotions feel that in his sacred functions he is the representative of the house to God, presenting their cases, and mediating for Divine mercy, while each member of the household feels, too, that he has a personal interest in that holy solemnity,—and who can calculate the results which such duties, devoutly fulfilled, must produce on family government? Then you touch the mainspring that regulates the movements of home life. You gain united access to the altar of the Divine Presence, and invoke His gracious power to order each unruly will, and subdue each sinful affection. It is no longer you that guide the house. You then solemnly place the reins in the hands of the Divine Ruler of all things, and beseech Him, with your household kneeling around you, to guide you with his counsel, deliver you from all evil, and bring you in safety to your heavenly home.

All this is not easy. This sketch of home government may create the impression of sins, errors, negligences. Be it so. The sense of want must ever precede the earnest striving for better things. Remember the promise, "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him."

THE EXPLORATION OF PALESTINE.

BY THE REV. CHARLES BOUTELL, M.A.

CHAPTER IV.

IMMEDIATELY after his arrival at Jerusalem, in the beginning of September, 1867, Lieutenant Warren laid bare the south wall of the Haram, near its eastern extremity, in two places—at the south-east angle (marked ε in the Plan, given at page 584), to the depth of 20 feet beneath the present surface; and more to the west (about midway between ε and ρ, but somewhat nearer to ε, in the Plan), to the depth of 16 feet. This work was suddenly stopped by the Pacha. Subsequently, however, Lieutenant Warren obtained greater powers; and his own admirable tact in using those powers enabled him to pursue his work without any serious interruption.

As any excavation, commenced at the surface of the ground near the Haram wall, was thus prevented, like a true engineer, Lieutenant Warren, being determined to ascertain what the foundations of that wall were like, sunk a shaft at some distance from the wall itself to the south of it, and then excavated a gallery from the bottom of his shaft northwards in the direction of the wall. He opened his shaft 40 feet to the south of the south-east angle (ε in Plan), and sunk it to the depth of 53 feet. Here, beneath the present surface, he came upon a massive wall that was found to abut upon the Haram wall at ε, and to run from it towards the south; also at the short distance of only 15 feet he found a second buried wall, 4 feet thick, built into the other wall, and running from it at right angles towards the west and parallel to the Haram wall. Great difficulties were experienced in mining through these walls, the stones being very large and very hard. The stones of the buried lower courses of the Haram wall were discovered here to be either 4 feet or 4 feet 6 inches in height; and all, except the lowest course resting on the rock (which was found to have been partially levelled to receive it) and the next course above it, were dressed after the manner of the Jewish masons (to be described and illustrated hereafter) with the evident intention of being visible, and, therefore, originally they were placed above the ground. The buried wall was traced for 300 feet to the south from the Haram wall, and a tower was there found, from which the wall took a south-westerly direction. These discoveries will be found to have been carried out more completely when the exploration was resumed later in the year.

There remains to be noticed a series of shafts that were sunk before July last in the Tyropeon valley, nearly in a line westwards with the wall ε ρ, but a little to the north of such a line, and where the line of dots appears in the Plan near the letter ρ. At this point the valley measures from its western crest to the Haram wall about 310 feet. Here, commencing westwards, at 285 feet from the Haram wall, the first of five shafts was sunk through a common garden soil, until, at 21 feet 6 inches, a slab of polished limestone was

(Drawn by E. M. WIMPERIS.)

"Gaily down the mountain-side,
In unceasing motion,
Mark the sparkling torrent glide
• To the mighty ocean."—p. 620.

found covering a passage (now used as a sewer) cut in the rock, through which a current of water was observed to be flowing.

The second shaft, sunk 250 feet from the Haram wall, came upon a pier of masonry measuring 3 feet by 4 feet, in which was the entrance to a circular cistern lined with cement 2 feet thick, and having its roof slightly domed. Galleries, which were driven north and west from this shaft, at 12 feet 6 inches each way, came upon similar piers, with fallen arches between them. The whole appeared to have formed a kind of colonnade or bazaar, running east and west. It had been built of a sandstone, well-dressed, and having a flooring (much disturbed) of finely-dressed limestone laid in squares. This relic of a Jerusalem beneath that city which now stands in the open air and upon the present surface of the ground, was found to be closed towards the north. The rock here is 18 feet below the surface.

At 216 feet from the Haram wall, the third shaft at 12 feet in depth came upon a small arch in a line with the north wall discovered by shaft No. 2; and at 18 feet deep another polished limestone pavement was reached. Below this pavement, débris of cut stones; and resting on the rock, here 32 feet below the surface, a wall of squared and dressed stones was found running north and south.

Still advancing eastwards, at 182 feet from the Haram wall, a fourth shaft at the depth of 12 feet came upon the remains of building stones and a part of a white marble column 1 foot in diameter. These ruins appeared to form a part of the colonnade first discovered by shaft No. 2. At the depth of 22 feet a row of stones was laid bare, and also the mouth of a cistern excavated in the rock. Amongst the rubbish in this cistern, which is square and with a flat roof, was a piece of marble pavement. The sides of the cistern itself are lined with cement, two feet thick. Two man-holes open into it, but there is no entrance for water; and, accordingly, it may be considered to have been an ancient receptacle for grain.

The fifth of these shafts, at the distance of 82 feet from the Haram wall, had just been commenced, when Lieutenant Warren suspended his works in the city until after the summer heat should have subsided. At 2 feet beneath the surface a small arch and some vaulted passages, apparently for water, were discovered; and it was observed that all the stones that were disclosed by these shafts in the line of the colonnade had been cut in the same style. Lieutenant Warren, in his Reports, takes leave of this shaft No. 5, with the remark that he expects from it, when in a more advanced condition, results that probably may prove competent to explain the true character of that portion of the Tyropœon valley which adjoins the line of the western wall (from F to G in the Plan) of the Haram; and when we rejoin him again, and follow with him his autumn explorations, we have the gratification to learn that, after he had added to the number of his earlier shafts, his expectations were realised even beyond his hopes. It now remains for me to communicate Lieut. Warren's graphic description of what an exploration shaft, sunk through the débris and rubbish and earth down to the solid rock at Jerusalem, really is; together with an account of the processes employed by this famous explorer in shaft-sinking, and of the appliances and means that have been at his disposal.

It was not, however, from his shaft No. 5 that Lieutenant Warren ultimately obtained that remarkable reward for his zealous perseverance which was in store for him. This shaft, indeed, after it had been sunk to the depth of 24 feet 6 inches, was abandoned, in consequence of its having become dangerous, and at the distance of 10 feet to the N.W. of it a fresh shaft was commenced. Here, at the depth of 14 feet, a floor was found, and a passage with small communications leading north, west, and south, "the last being a recess like a baker's oven." Also, at 9 feet below the surface, here was discovered the entrance to a shaft which led, through its arched roof, to a chamber full of stones and rubbish. The floor of this chamber was found to be 36 feet 6 inches below the present surface, and after the plaster flooring had been broken through, at 40 feet 6 inches below the surface, the rock appeared; the chamber itself measured 18 feet by 11 feet 6 inches, and in all probability it was used as a tank. From this chamber a gallery sloping downwards was driven towards the Haram wall. While this work was in progress, a sixth shaft was sunk in the same line with the others, but between shafts Nos. 4 and 5, and 162 feet from the Haram wall. This shaft No. 6 was carried through an old plastered chamber; then it passed, at the depth of 21 feet 3 inches, a strong wall of hammer-dressed stones running north and south; and, still lower down, at the depth of 26 feet 10 inches, it reached the remains of a more massive wall, upwards of 14 feet thick, running east and west. Three courses of stones only were found, and the lowermost of them rested on the rock at the depth of 30 feet. The rock here had been scarped away for 4 feet, and then it had been cut down in steps, the lowest point being 37 feet 6 inches below the surface. Though certainly very ancient, the masonry of this wall is not in keeping with that of the Haram wall. Abutting on this wall is another, running north and south, and supported by a buttress.

At the distance of 54 feet from the remains of "Robinson's Arch" in the Haram wall, and at the depth of about 55 feet, the gallery from the new No. 5 shaft was found to have accidentally been carried along an ancient artificial cutting in the solid rock until it was stopped by a mass of masonry, constructed of fine bevelled stones of great size, and evidently still remaining in their original position. This masonry, of which three courses remain, proved to be the lowermost portion of the original western pier of "Robinson's Arch"—the very relic for which Lieutenant Warren was in search, this arch having its eastern springing, as will be remembered, issuing from the solid masonry of the Haram wall itself. The remains of the pier Lieutenant Warren describes to be formed of "splendid stones" of a peculiarly hard texture, of great magnitude, and in perfect preservation; the lowest course, resting on the rock, is 3 feet 6 inches high, and the next 3 feet 9 inches—the height of the large stones still visible, above the present surface of the ground, in the Haram wall. The pier was rather more than 12 feet in thickness east and west; and it was constructed, not as a solid mass, but so built with the great stones that I have mentioned that it had a hollow space in the inside, with openings leading to this space through the exterior masonry; and thus the whole pier may be said to have been made up of smaller ones. This singular style of pier construction Lieutenant Warren considers to be characteristic of some particular epoch, probably before the arch was in general use; and yet it certainly differs altogether from the massive styles of Egypt and Assyria.

East of these remarkable and most interesting remains of this arch-pier, and on a level with the rock-surface, a pavement of stone was found to extend towards the Haram wall; and here, on this pavement, upwards of 50 feet beneath the present surface, when they had cleared away a cavern-like space sufficiently large for them to examine the ancient relics that were lying before them, the explorers discovered, ranged in two lines north and south, and "huddled together just as they fell, the actual voussoirs," or wedge-shaped arch-stones, "of which, when in its complete condition, the great viaduct of 'Robinson's Arch' had been constructed." That viaduct had led from the Jerusalem on the western portion of the rock-plateau that formed the site of the city, over the Tyropœon valley, to the Temple on Zion—the eastern portion. It was the approach from the city to the Temple; and they, in ancient times, who went to the Temple from the city, passed over this very causeway. The great arch, its span 41 feet 6 inches, and its width upwards of 50 feet, which supported this causeway, was broken down by command of Titus, when at length the whole of Jerusalem had fallen into his power; and the arch-stones, hard, and their forms still as clearly defined as when they fell, and each one weighing at least 20 tons, may now be seen in the excavated cavern at the bottom of Lieutenant Warren's shaft, preserved in safety while hidden from sight through eighteen centuries by the gradually accumulating covering of ruins and earth, that at length rose 50 feet above them. I know of no relic of ancient times that is more interesting than this broken archway. The apostles must very often have passed over it, while yet the arch remained entire; and so, also, must their Master and ours often have passed over it with them. Once before, another Roman, Pompey, had caused the viaduct at this same spot to be beaten down. Herod the Great had reconstructed the archway, as it was during the time the Redeemer frequented the Temple—as it was, also, when Titus, unconsciously fulfilling the Redeemer's prediction, commanded its final demolition. Titus himself had stood on this same archway when he made his last appeal to the frantic Jews: the Temple had already fallen, and Zion was in the hands of their Roman enemies, and they themselves had fallen back on their last possible refuge—then, however, no longer tenable—on the western hill; and Titus held a parley with the Jews, and summoned them to surrender. Their obstinate refusal was swiftly followed by the final catastrophe; and, in the midst of the surrounding ruin and destruction, the Roman engineers demolished the famous archway. A stone or two remained clinging to the grand enclosure-wall, from out of which they marked the springing of the arch; the rest of the arch fell with a crash upon the massive pavement below. A traveller from a hemisphere then unknown, after eighteen centuries had nearly passed away, discovered the springers of the arch, just visible above the enormous heap of accumulated soil that had almost filled the valley and obliterated its presence, and so the arch itself came to be called by his name, "Robinson's Arch;" and, a little later still, an English lieutenant and sergeant discover the fallen arch-stones, and they clear away the earth and ruins that cover them sufficiently to admit of a comparatively free access to these wonderful stones, and they light up this strange cavern with magnesium light, and so they both pursue their own researches and receive the visits of anxious and curious strangers.

(To be continued.)

THE WATERFALL.

AILY down the mountain-side,
In unceasing motion,
Watch the sparkling torrent glide
To the mighty ocean.

Gently now, now far and near,
Silv'ry laughter flinging;
Hark! what fairy feet I hear,
Down the rough rock springing.

Bounding, fetterless, and free,
Obstacles unheeding,
Onward to its home, the sea,
Mark the torrent speeding.

Stones that fain its course would stay,
Bathing with its blessing;
Drooping flow'rets by the way
Cheering and caressing.

Pure and free from earthly blot,
On it speeds in brightness;
Cleansing earth, yet mingling not—
Perfect in its whiteness.

Panting for a wider bed,
Pausing, resting never,
Till old Ocean's arms outspread,
Welcome it for ever!

Down life's rugged mountain-side,
In unceasing motion,
Streams of human kindness glide,
On to Love's great ocean.

Gently now, now far and near,
Tones of comfort flinging;
Hark! what willing feet I hear,
Joy to mourners bringing.

Bounding, fetterless, and free,
Obstacles unheeding,
Onward to Love's endless sea,
Mark the torrent speeding.

Foes that fain its course would stay,
Bathing with its blessing;
Drooping spirits by the way
Cheering and caressing.

Pure and free from earthly blot,
On it speeds in brightness;
Cleansing earth, yet mingling not—
Perfect in its whiteness.

Panting for a wider bed,
Pausing, resting never,
Till Love's mighty arms outspread
Welcome it for ever!

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPPALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XXIII.

BROOKLYN HALL.

RS. BROOKLYN was busy at work on a sumptuous piece of embroidery. The materials with which she was embroidering were wools of brilliant colours, and which lay in a basket on the table. The only other occupant of the room was Sir Hugh Macbriar, who was sitting in the bay-window, reading the Times.

Sir Hugh was silent and reflective by nature, and never had much to say. The widow's loquacity had been held in check the last half-hour, since the time Sir Hugh had received the paper, and had been, as she said, "gloating over it." But her self-restraint could not last much longer.

"Is not that a sweet rose, Sir Hugh?" said she, laying the gorgeous piece of colouring, with which she was busy, on her knee, and endeavouring to draw his attention to the part she had just completed. "So like nature!"

"It is very pretty, I am sure," said Sir Hugh, scrutinising it through his glass; his heart, all the time, secretly going after the leading article.

"I was sure you would say so, you are such a capital judge. And now, I want your advice: which of these greens would you ground with? So much depends on the grounding, you know. This, or that?" And she held a number of skeins of wool before him.

Sir Hugh was a member of Parliament and a politician, but he looked puzzled.

"I think, perhaps, I should choose this," said he, hazarding the opinion, and touching the skein as if he was afraid it would burn him.

"And so I think. Your opinion exactly accords with mine. Isn't it curious?"

An idea dawned into Sir Hugh's mind, that he ought to make some little smart speech implying a compliment; but his natural slowness and pompousness prevented him from getting it out before the entrance of the footman, with a card laid on a silver waiter. It was too late then. Sir Hugh, having just opened his lips, shut them again. Mrs. Brooklyn took up the card.

"Why, it is Mr. Sylvester; how glad I am! Show him in at once," added she to the footman.

The footman sped swiftly away on his errand. Sir Hugh looked uneasy, and wished he had made his speech sooner.

"He is such a favourite of mine!" continued the widow, with fervour. "And his sister is such a darling! I dote on her—positively dote!"

Sir Hugh had no time to answer. In walked Raymond Sylvester. He was a trifle pale, and there was a look of trouble in his eyes, that he had not been able to get rid of. But how handsome he was! In respect of personal attractions and address, how incomparably Sir Hugh's superior!

"I am so glad to see you!" said the widow, rising, and letting a host of reds, and whites, and blues, and yellows drop on the floor. "I began to think you had forsaken Brooklyn," and her jewelled hand was offered cordially to Raymond.

Raymond, all courtesy and smiles, made the neatest, trimmest little speech that it was in the power of man to improvise. The widow laughed, and blushed. Sir Hugh, who was on the floor, picking up the wools, looked as grim as an ogre.

"I am sorry to give you that trouble, Sir Hugh," said Mrs. Brooklyn, with a beaming smile. "Thank you; there is one more, just under the piano. Ah, yes, let Mr. Sylvester reach it. He is young and active, you know; it won't hurt him to stoop and to scramble."

Sir Hugh's face, which had been red with the un-wanted exertions he had made, turned pale, and almost livid. He darted a look at Raymond.

Raymond returned it by a courteous bow. Nothing could exceed his politeness to Sir Hugh.

In spite of this, however, Sir Hugh had but a sorry time of it. Raymond could talk far better than he could, and the conversation was kept up briskly, without allowing space for any observations he might have wished to make. In fact, he might have read his paper unmolested in the bay-window, had he chosen. But circumstances alter cases. Sir Hugh did not choose. All he could do was to sit stiff and sullen, while Mrs. Brooklyn and Mr. Sylvester were enjoying themselves. Things came, at length, to a climax.

"I shall not let you go," said Mrs. Brooklyn, as Raymond gave signs of departure, "without taking a bouquet for that darling Alice. How naughty of her not to come!"

Another bright little speech. Sir Hugh thought he must have learned them from a book. He could not have made such a speech, if it had been to save his life!

Again, the widow blushed and smiled. Then, with her most benignant air, she said—

"You have never seen my conservatory, Mr. Sylvester. Come, we will get the bouquet ourselves. Sir Hugh wants to be rid of us, that he may read his paper."

We! Ourselves! Sir Hugh was absolutely speechless.

Raymond, perfect master of the occasion, led the comely mistress of Brooklyn from the room. The conservatory was not far off—it opened, in all its tropical beauty, from the drawing-room—and thither the two directed their steps.

Mrs. Brooklyn chattered incessantly.

"Don't you think I have improved the old place?"

said she. "I can't tell you what it will cost me. Something positively enormous; but I like to do things on a grand scale. See, we must have that rose to begin with. Thank you, I have my scissors. Is not this heliotrope sweet? As many geraniums as you like. I dote on colour; colour is everything, poor papa used to say, in this climate, where we live in a perpetual grey. Very warm, isn't it? But I love warmth. India would be the place for me, with all those delightful humming-birds, and things. See, there is a nosegay for you!"

She had gone from flower to flower, and he had stood and watched her. She wore a dress of black moiré-antique, with heavy velvet trimmings. Her dark hair, very abundant, but not fine, or glossy, was enclosed in a crimson net with threads of gold. The rings on her fingers sparkled and shone as she moved about, cutting first one flower and then another. When she had finished, she offered the bouquet to him.

"With my love to the dear girl!" meaning Alice.

One double geranium of great beauty she kept back. He could not but take the hint. He knew she meant that he should ask for it, for his own. By this time, the part he was acting had grown intolerable. The sharp agony he had been suffering had been somewhat dulled by the change of scene and place, and the excitement of his position. But as he stood before the voluminous mistress of Brooklyn, enduring her smiles and courtesies, the bitter pang came back again. He asked for the flower; he bore up tolerably well, while she gave it to him, with new smiles and fresh condescensions. But he could do no more. He took a hasty leave, and hurried to his carriage. Safe there, where no eye could see, the man crouched down, and writhed with the tortures he was suffering. And then he rose, his face pale and almost fierce in its expression, and tearing the scarlet flower from its place, as though its presence were a blight and a curse, he flung it far away. Would he could have flung the burden from his heart as well!

CHAPTER XXIV.

ALICE PAYS CHARLEY A VISIT.

"Of course I am the person most to be pitied," said Charley. "I am always ill; and Harold never has anything the matter with him."

"But your brother must feel the change," said Alice, half reproachfully.

"Oh, he feels it, but nothing to what I do. Besides, it was, after all, his own fault. He should have thought of me, and not of those nasty creditors."

A slight colour rose to Alice's cheek at the ill-omened word.

"He ought not to have done as he did. All our friends said so, and they were very angry with him."

"I wish you would tell me about it, Charley," said Alice, in rather a tremulous voice, and the look of interest deepening in her face. "You did not make me understand exactly what you meant."

"I can soon tell you," said Charley, who was always rather imperious as well as exacting—the result of his early training; “it was the most ridiculous thing in the world, and no one but Harold would have thought of doing so. When poor papa and mamma died,” here his tone softened a little, “and we two orphans were left; a nice estate came to Harold. Papa left no will, and Harold took everything, and could do what he liked.”

“Yes—yes,” said Alice, eagerly.

“Well, we came to England—and, would you believe it?—he called a meeting of papa’s creditors? There were a great many of them, and some must have been ruined, no doubt,” added Charley, without an atom of feeling, “and some had been ruined already; but they all came, like a swarm of locusts, to see what they could get.”

There was a bright light in Alice’s eyes, as though her whole soul was kindled into vivid interest.

“Well, Charley, and what happened?” said she.

“Oh, then Harold made a speech. I was there, because I was so angry. I would go, just to see what he would do. He made a speech, to say how grieved he was, that any one present should have suffered on account of us. And each person was to send in his claim to the lawyer, and he should be paid as far as the estate would go. Was it not a shame?”

Alice was wiping away a tear with the corner of her laced handkerchief.

“Of course that meant that we ourselves should be beggared. When all the debts were paid, there was not a farthing left. The whole estate was gone!”

“But you were out of debt, Charley,” said Alice, feelingly.

“Yes, we were. It was a great shame though. It made me so ill, I thought I should have died. It was so cruel of Harold. And then he had to go to that horrid mill, and work all among the looms. Is it not shocking, Miss Sylvester?”

“Not so shocking Charley as being in debt.”

“I never cared much about that,” said Charley, in a tone of unconcern. “I wanted us to be comfortable, and to keep the carriage. Only think how terrible it has been for me! I have had to lie here all day by myself, and with no one to speak to.”

“Don’t you think it is as bad for—for your brother?” said Alice, a faint flush rising to her cheek.

“Oh, Harold does not mind! He is out from morning till night; but as for me— Oh, Miss Sylvester, it is dreary work!” said Charley, with a sigh.

Alice glanced round the room. It was very bare, even of comforts. The last time she had seen Charley, it had been at an hotel, in a handsome apartment, and surrounded with luxuries.

“Poor Charley,” said she, pityingly, “we must see what we can do to cheer you up. Have you any books?”

“The landlady brings me a novel, now and then, from the circulating library; but I am getting tired of novels.”

“I don’t wonder at that, Charley. The utmost a novel can do is to amuse you for a little time. When the excitement goes off, it leaves you just as it found you.”

“That it does! And I never was fond of reading. Harold is the maz for books.”

Again the slight flush upon her cheek. Then she said, “You must read the books I shall bring you, Charley. See, I have one here. This is the kind of reading for you.”

Charley grasped it eagerly.

“Why, this is a religious book!” cried he. “This would do for Harold.”

“No, Charley, I meant it for you. It is a book written for those persons upon whom God has been pleased to lay some affliction. It tells them how they may be able to bear it; and it tells them,” continued Alice, her voice growing more solemn and earnest, “of One who suffered far more than they ever could—you know who that is, Charley?”

“Yes,” said Charley, in a softened tone; “mamma used to talk in that way when she was ill.”

“Charley,” continued Alice, still earnestly, “don’t you think it would comfort you, and make you bear your trial better, if you thought more of Christ; if you loved him; and if, all the long hours you lay here alone, his presence was with you, making you happy?”

“I think it would,” faltered Charley, in the same subdued tone, his querulous spirit, for the moment, laid to rest.

Her visit had a happy influence upon him, though that influence did not last. When she was gone, he looked into his book, for a few minutes, and then lay musing on the sofa, his finger between the leaves.

“I wish Harold would come,” he at length said to the woman who brought up the tea; “he never thinks of me!”

“Indeed, Mr. Charley! and it’s my opinion as he don’t often think of anything else,” replied the woman, resenting the attack on her favourite.

“Why doesn’t he come then?” continued Charley, peevishly. “He knows I haven’t been out all day.”

“He couldn’t help that, Master Charley; and I am sure you haven’t hurt,” said the goodnatured landlady. “You’ve had the beautifullest lady as ever was, to keep you company all the afternoon!”

“I’d need have somebody,” grumbled Charley, a little mollified, in spite of himself, at the thought of the lovely face, that had brought such comfort with it. “And she was pretty!”

“Pretty! I wonder what he would have,” thought the landlady, as she went down for the kettle. “If Queen Victoria herself come to see him, I don’t suppose he’d be content!”

Ere the landlady could come back with the kettle, Harold had returned. He had heard some rumour or other, down-stairs, for he came up with a glow on his face, and his eyes sparkling.

“Well, Charley, so she has been at last!”

“I thought you would never come at all, Harold,” said Charley, fretfully. “It is nearly half-past six.”

“I was detained, dear, that was all. So Miss Sylvester has been,” repeated Harold, taking up a bunch of violets from the table.

"Yes, and brought me those violets. It is a good thing somebody does take a little notice of me."

Harold brought a vase from the cupboard, a relic of better days, and began to put the violets in water. He handled them with the utmost tenderness. When he had done, he glanced up at the chair in which Alice had sat. Everything connected with her was of interest to him. He would have liked to know what she said, how she looked, and a hundred other things; but it was no good to ask. Charley was cross, and wanted his tea. And when he had had his tea, he was still cross. He refused to speak of Alice, or, indeed, of anything but his own complaints; and when he had fairly grumbled himself out, he let Harold carry him off to bed.

By this time, Harold looked jaded and weary; but when the pallid face had settled itself on the pillow, and the curtains had been drawn, Harold came back to spend the rest of the evening by himself. Then he sat down at the table, and, for once, neither read nor wrote. The busy head and hand were idle. But, in truth, he was thinking of Alice. And on he thought, his eye bright, his cheek flushed, till the waning candle and the dying embers warned him to retire. And then he rose, and, bending over the bouquet of violets, kissed it tenderly.

CHAPTER XXV

MR. HEATHERLY TAKES POSSESSION.

THE half-past six train ran into the Newbury station punctual to a minute. It was an express, and did not often vary. From out a first-class carriage there stepped a young man, slightly but compactly made, with light hair and beard, the latter carefully trimmed, and an air of semi-dandyism about him, from his glossy hat to his well-polished boots. He began instantly to call about him—

"Now then, porter, your attention, if you please! I have a whole cargo of luggage."

"What name, if you please, sir?"

"Francis Heatherly, Esquire, 12, Gower Street, Newbury."

"Yes, sir; you be the gentleman as come into Miss Graham's money," said the porter, looking at him with a little curiosity.

The disposition of Miss Graham's property, had been a nine days' wonder in Newbury.

Francis Heatherly was walking along the platform towards the van, to show the porter his luggage. The gaslight shone full on his face, and disclosed a pair of light blue eyes, and thin lips, that had rather a trick of compressing themselves together. He had a quick, firm tread, and his manner was that of a man who never mistrusts himself, let him be doubtful of anybody else.

His luggage was, as he said, a cargo. It took some time to get out all the numerous boxes and packages stowed into the van, and with the name of Heatherly upon them.

"You will want a couple of cabs, sir," said the porter.

"Of course I shall!"

He had a brisk, off-hand way of speaking. The porter, who looked upon him as a personage of importance, attended to him sedulously. In as short a space as could be, he and his luggage were rattling along to Gower Street. He had a memorandum-book in his hand, and every now and then he kept jotting down items. When the cab stopped, and he entered the old projecting house in Gower Street, he made one note more.

The housekeeper, in a black silk, and her best cap, came out to meet him. The light blue eye ran over her carelessly.

"I am sure, I am very glad to see you, sir," began the woman, curtsying and obsequious.

"Exactly. Just see to my luggage, will you, Mrs.— What is your name, pray?"

"Mrs. Harris, at your service, sir."

"Mrs. Harris, I want all these packages and boxes put into a spare room, on the ground-floor."

"In course, sir; there's the study just handy."

"Then see to it, will you?"

He did not go away. He stood on the stairs, watching the proceeding carefully. When the last box had been stowed away, he said, making another note in his book—

"Now show me to my room, if you please."

There was something in the man, with his cold blue eye, and imperative manner, which gave you the impression that, in whatever state or station Providence should place him, he meant to be master of it.

The landlady preceded him up the stairs, her lamp in her hand. He went up the antique staircase with its statues, and its vases, and the pictures on the landing, looking just as they did when Raymond had stepped briskly up that same staircase, to visit Josephine.

His bedroom had been prepared for him, and a fire was burning brightly. He took the lamp from the housekeeper's hand, and went in.

"When should you like dinner to be served, sir?"

"In ten minutes."

He had looked as spruce, and well got up, as need be, in spite of his seven hours' travel; but when, in precisely ten minutes (he was the soul of punctuality), he entered the old-fashioned dining-room, he was sprucer still. He had changed his travelling-dress for a new suit of superfine mourning. His hair was oiled and perfumed, and a ring sparkled on his finger.

"Quite a gentleman, one can see at a glance!" said the housekeeper, complacently.

She was very fond of his society. While he ate his dinner off the old family plate, that had come to him in virtue of Miss Graham's will, she contrived sundry little errands in and out of the room. She hovered about him with a strange kind of fascination. Yet he said very little to her. He was hungry, for one thing, and his dinner was nice; so that a glance, now and then, from the cold blue eye was the utmost vouchsafed to her.

(To be continued.)

ALFRED'S BIRTHDAY.

H, Lilly!" cried a bright handsome boy of eight, as he ran into the nursery one morning, "what do you think?"

The little girl thus spoken to opened her eyes in utter bewilderment, as much as to say that she didn't know what she was to think. Her brother, however, was too impatient to wait for an answer, so went on—

"Mamma has given me leave to invite Charley Greaves and Willie Marston to tea this evening, because it's my birthday," adding, after a little hesitation, a tiny blush making itself visible on his open countenance, "and she says I may ask Alice to come too, if I like—isn't she a good, kind mamma?"

But oh! how slowly the time seemed to pass. Would evening ever come? The longest day, however, has an end; and so, just as it began to grow dusk—it was winter time—Alfred's friends made their appearance.

"Ah!" he cried, "there's Willie, and there's Charley coming up the garden-walk, and there's—but where's Alice?"

These hurried words were uttered as he stood on a chair, looking through the parlour-window. The next instant he was at the door to receive and welcome his guests.

Alice's absence remained unexplained, until a servant called to say that Miss Alice was on a visit to a relative in the country, and was not expected home for more than three weeks. This was the first thorn in the day's pleasure; but although tears started into his eyes at the moment, he bore his disappointment bravely. When at last tea was over, he brought forth, from some secret corner, the birthday presents which the thoughtful kindness of mamma had procured for him. There was the gold (as he called it) watch and chain, the humming-top, the barking—or rather the squeaking—dog, the little bag quite full of marbles, and last, and best of all, the large and beautiful picture-book, containing the marvellous and exciting adventures of "Jack the Giant-killer."

And when all these beautiful things had been passed round some half-dozen times, nothing would do but that mamma should read the wonderful history of "Jack the Giant-killer."

"Wasn't he a brave boy?" exclaimed Alfred, when the tale was finished. "I should like to have been him!"

"My son," said his mother, closing the book, "though you cannot do what he did, you can be quite as great and noble."

"As great as Jack the Giant-killer, mamma?" he exclaimed, astonished at the very idea of such a thing.

"Yes, my darling," was the reply. "Greatness consists, not so much in killing giants, or in anything the world calls great, as in actions that are in themselves noble and good."

An unusually thoughtful expression spread itself over the boy's countenance at these words, which he only partly understood, and for a few moments all were silent.

"But come," said his mother, fondly patting his cheek, "let you and your friends try if you can make a new game, and call it 'Jack the Giant-killer.'"

"Oh, capital!" they all cried in the same breath; "come along," highly delighted (and what boy is not?) with something new.

How the game was carried on need not be told; suffice it to say that the time for saying good-night came, and found them still, as Alfred expressed it, "in the very middle of the game."

As he stood at the garden-gate, gazing after his friends until the darkness hid them from his sight, he heard the deep sobs of some one close at hand, and looking over the low wall, he saw a little girl sitting on the cold, frost-covered ground, and crying bitterly.

"What are you crying for?" he asked, in a kindly tone, feeling very sorry for the poor creature. But as no answer came, he stepped outside the gate, and stooping down, took the little girl, who was evidently very young, by the hand, and again asked her why she was crying.

She looked up into his face confidently, and said, "I want to go home."

"Why don't you go, then?" was the innocent rejoinder.

"Don't know where to go," she said, mournfully.

"Come with me, and I'll ask mamma, then," said he, taking her hand again; and leading her into the house, he told his mother where he had found her.

Meanwhile the child, who had been brought from the dark and dismal street into the warm, comfortable-looking room, soon began to forget her troubles, and being attracted by the sight of Alfred's pretty presents, which were still upon the table, she seemed in no hurry to go home. Alfred's mother, however, having discovered where the poor child lived, gave orders to a servant to take her carefully home.

As she was leaving the room, Alfred, who had been attentively regarding her for some minutes, said, "Mamma, may I give her one of my presents?"

"You may, my dear," replied his mother.

When the child was made to understand that she was to take one of those "pretty things," and even, by Alfred's wish, to have her choice, her joy became unbounded. However, after carefully looking at each thing separately, she decided to have the "History of Jack the Giant-killer," which was accordingly handed to her by Alfred, who seemed more pleased at giving it away than he had been to have it.

A tear glistened in his mother's eye, as she repeated the words, "It is more blessed to give than to receive;" then drawing her son to her arms, she said, "Now my son has made himself greater and more noble than Jack the Giant-killer."

R. G. W.

THE BUIVIER

Saturday, June 20, 1868.

(Drawn by CHARLES GREEN.)

"She fancied that Mr. Maxwell's grave politeness in opening the door, had something in it of real alacrity."—p. 623.

PARTNERS FOR LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "PEGGY OGLIVIE'S INHERITANCE," ETC.

CHAPTER IV.—HOME.

IT is not to be wondered at that, after such an introduction, Madeline Barnton was not very happy in her school-life. The girls had been well reprimanded for their folly and unkindness; but this, if it made them any wiser, failed to make them any kinder, and Madeline speedily became aware of the feeling of aversion toward her which was fostered by some of her companions, and met it by an ever-increasing reserve and loftiness. Unfortunately, she had been made acquainted with what had taken place on the day of her arrival, and it filled her heart with bitterness, and clouded completely the tender and generous side of her nature. The result of all this was that, in spite of the kindness and even partiality of her teacher, Madeline made up her mind that she was not destined to be happy—or, what was the same thing, that she was not made to be loved. And at length, duly “finished,” she was coming home.

The home to which she returned was not the one she had left. It was a new, and far more magnificent dwelling, out of the sight and smoke of Manchester, and furnished to the best taste of the upholsterer—that is, in the most expensive manner, and with the greatest number of the heaviest articles of furniture that it could be made to hold. Business was rewarding Mr. Barnton’s exclusive devotion to her service. He was building up for himself a fortune which might one day reach colossal proportions; and he had already so far advanced in the work that he could pause to take breath. In one of these pauses he had bethought himself that it would be well to surround himself with more of the outward and visible manifestations of success than he had yet ventured to do.

Madeline had profited sufficiently by her two years’ residence at school. She played well, though she hated the very sound of the piano, as any creature of sensitive organisation might be expected to do who had lived in a house where four of these unlucky instruments had been put to the torture daily, and nearly all day long. She drew tolerably, spoke French like the mother tongue, which indeed it was to her; and above all, had acquired “manner,” though that same manner was somewhat haughty and defiant. Well as she wore it, it was no more a part of her than a suit of chain-armour would have been. She had donned it in what she considered self-defence.

Her father noted with satisfaction the change which was apparent in his young daughter’s demeanour, especially that he could now calculate on a certain amount of deference and obedience to his expressed wishes. He began to be almost proud of her, and to cultivate a circle of acquaintances on her behalf. And so she grew silently into a dark lovely woman, who led a life as hidden as any enchanted princess, in the vicinity of the most matter-of-fact city in the world.

But the girl’s life became more and more intolerable to her. It had, in truth, neither outlet in the present, nor outlook on the future, and her whole soul was rising up in rebellion against it. She had a habit of voracious reading, which kept her tame at times. But at other times she would pace up and down the dreary drawing-room like a caged creature, till she could almost have dashed herself against the walls.

One day, when she had been more than usually oppressed with the life-weariness which is the natural result of unsatisfied activities of body and mind, she startled her father by asking abruptly, “Are you very rich, papa?”

“Why do you ask?” he said.

“Because I wish we were poor, and that I had to earn my bread,” she replied.

His reply was a string of commonplaces on contentment; but secretly he thought, “Now she begins to be uncomfortable, it is time she was settled in life.” In this opinion he was confirmed when, having bethought himself that some offering to female vanity might promote the contentment, which he desired to see, he brought her a costly gift—a bracelet of virgin gold in the shape of a heavy fetter. With unusual kindness he made her hold out her slender wrist that he might fasten it on, and though she thanked him and tried to look pleased, he could not help seeing the shudder which ran through her frame as he did so, and the swimming eyes with which she turned away from the symbol of slavery.

CHAPTER V.—THE PARTNER.

MR. BARNTON having turned his attention to the business of settling his daughter in life, lost no time in looking round for a suitable partner. He lighted on one ready made, so to speak. George Maxwell had come into the merchant’s service as a probable partner, was well connected, had a little money, and, more than all, was an excellent man of business. He was decidedly handsome, but slow of speech, scarce of smiles, and scant of courtesy. Elderly men praised him, and young ladies admired him, but failed to flirt with him. More than a mere outward acquaintance was needed in order to penetrate to the character of the man, and more than an outward acquaintance he did not yield. He began, however, to be a frequent guest at Mr. Barnton’s table, over which Madeline presided in solitary state.

The topics discussed at that dinner-table were not those which are considered interesting to young ladies. They were usually business topics, such as the state of foreign markets, the rate of discounts, and the condition of manufactures. Mr. Maxwell seemed to make an effort now and then to find something to say to her; but Madeline was sure that they settled into talk more comfortably when she had left them, and she almost fancied that Mr. Maxwell’s grave politeness in opening the door for her exit, had something in it of real alacrity. She had always to spend a considerable interval in the drawing-room alone, and she was not aware that he showed any signs of impatience to be allowed to join her.

His visits were, however, a relief. They roused her to speculate on his character. He was so different from her father; young, handsome, evidently educated, and yet absorbed in the same pursuits, and seemingly with equal devotion. Madeline found herself taking an interest in subjects which she had formerly despised, in the effort to discover what could be their interest to him, over and above the money one, which she hesitated to believe was the sole object of the enthusiasm which animated him.

"I fear we bore you awfully, Miss Barnton," he said, one evening, as he took his cup of tea from Madeline's hands. "You must find the talk about business intolerably dull."

"No, I am beginning to take an interest in it," she answered; "and I am sure it would interest me more if I knew enough about it to make it real to me. Things that are real are so much more interesting than make-believes."

Mr. Barnton was near enough to hear the answer, and he was about to speak in some astonishment, but he thought better of it, and judiciously retired to an arm-chair and the evening paper.

"What do you mean by make-believes?" he returned.

"Well," she replied, with an animation he had never seen her display before, "there are make-believe speeches which don't mean anything, and make-believe work which doesn't do anything, and make-believe pleasures which do not please one, and make-believe lives which are made up of these, and tire one to death."

"Then you would rather have a few plain words that meant something, even if they meant only business."

She assented with a laugh, quite a gay, girlish laugh, which made her dark loveliness radiant with light and warmth.

"I wish I knew what it is that makes the charm of business," she said; "I think I shall go into it on my own account, and find out some day."

"It is the possibilities it involves, for one thing," he answered. "I do not mean altogether chances of gain and loss, but possibilities of action on which these depend. It is like a great game of mingled chance and skill, only more real and more absorbing; and at times of pressure like this it becomes doubly so. And that is not all: with the interests of trade and commerce are bound up many others—the interest of civilisation itself, the lives and well-being of thousands."

He alluded to the American war.

"I never hear you and my father speak of it," she said, inquiringly.

"We have agreed to keep free of it," he answered, "like sensible men, knowing that we cannot possibly agree on the subject itself."

"Which side do you take?" she asked, eagerly.

"The North," he answered, unhesitatingly.

"I hope—I believe—they will triumph!" she said, in a low tone, almost passionately.

From that evening they were friends.

CHAPTER VI.—THE PARTNERSHIP.

GEORGE MAXWELL was on one of the committees of relief. It formed a subject of real interest between him and Miss Barnton. Still, it was not of the business of his committee that he talked, but of the sufferings and bravery of the unemployed mill-workers. There was one noble fellow, who had hitherto refused help, and who had even shared his savings with others, who was now enduring privation himself, and who even when offered relief, still said, "Not yet—not yet; I can 'clem' a while yet, and mayhap better days will come." Madeline found out all about this man, and resolved to help him after her own fashion—a very wild one; but then she knew nothing of business, though beginning to think it was not such a bad thing, after all.

She had put away all her ornaments out of pure sympathy with "the distress," and was wearing a simple frock of dark serge. So one day she went to her room and gathered together all that she had of gold. There were two chains, several locketts and rings, a pair of earrings, and the hated, heavy golden fetter. She kept back only her mother's wedding-ring, and another that had been hers—not for its costly diamonds, but that she had always worn it. Then making the rest up in a parcel, she sealed it and carried it away with her one afternoon.

Her destination—towards which she proceeded without hesitation—was the quarter of the town in which Mr. Maxwell's hero lived. It was in "Angel Meadow," a dismal misnomer, unless it may be taken to mean that angels grow there, in the shape of multitudes of little children, yearly transplanted from its filthy alleys to their native heaven. She entered into a squalid court, and asked a half-savage looking woman if Amos Wilson lived there. Being answered in the affirmative, she was shown his room. It was on the ground floor, and she had to knock with her fingers. A gaunt young fellow opened wide the door of a perfectly empty room, empty of all but a little wooden shelf, containing a few old and quite unsaleable books. She did not see the bed of straw behind the door. She asked again, "Are you Amos Wilson?" and he nodding assent, she placed the little parcel in his hands, saying, "This is for you," and hastened away.

On the morning after this little adventure,

George Maxwell waited upon Madeline Barnton, soon after her father had gone for the day. She marvelled much at a call so early. She had never before seen him in the morning, and she felt a little disturbed, though she could not have told why.

She found him in the drawing-room leaning on the back of a chair, and looking unusually grave even for him. They began with the usual commonplaces. He shifted his place several times, at last he came and leaned on the mantleshef opposite to her.

"You know, perhaps," he said, "that I am about to enter into partnership with your father?"

A simple negative seemed to stop his progress in this direction.

"I am thinking far more of another partnership," he said at last—"a partnership for life."

Madeline stared and smiled.

The young Scotchman was looking intensely awkward, and absurdly matter-of-fact. He looked as if the position had been forced upon him, not as if he had taken it up naturally, as he asked plainly and abruptly, dropping his metaphor, "Will you be my wife?"

She was quite unprepared for it, and answered, hurriedly, and as plainly as he, "No, no—I cannot!"

He turned away his face for a moment, and then asked gently, and in a tone from which the embarrassment had vanished in a great effort of self-control, "Is there any special reason?"

"I do not love you," she answered.

No more need or could be said, and neither were capable at that moment of saying it, if there had. He put her hand to his lips and left her.

When he was gone she sat down in dismay, and a little stir of tenderness woke up in her. "I could have loved him," she said to herself, "if only I had known if he had really loved me." Then the tenderness was lost in a perfect storm of self-pity, as the mention of the partnership occurred to her. "It is part of the business, I suppose," she soliloquised; "all arranged and settled with my father. Oh, mother—mother!" she moaned, as she hid her face among the sofa-cushions, "I would rather be a slave than a wife on such terms."

Her father came in early. He had a look of unusual satisfaction on his face, which had been often anxious and careworn of late. His "Well, Madeline, have you seen Mr. Maxwell to-day?" showed her that he knew at least of that gentleman's intention; but she did not answer more than, "Yes."

Her father looked perplexed, and waited for more.

After a pause she said, "I have refused him."

Mr. Barnton began to walk up and down the floor. Suddenly he stood still before her and said, "Madeline, it is time you knew that I am a ruined man, and you have completed the ruin. George Maxwell would have saved me but for you. Of course, he will give up the whole business now."

"Father," she said, sternly, "I would rather be poor, rather work for myself and for you too, if I could, than marry and live as my mother lived."

The first part of her speech had called forth an emphatic ejaculation of contempt; the second, a look almost of suffering.

"What do you mean?" he said, hoarsely. These two might torment each other by means of the natural love left in them; but neither help nor comfort could reach over the gulf that divided them.

With quick instinct the daughter divined this, and answered, sadly and gently, "My mother had no share in your thoughts; you were never with her. You told her nothing of your concerns, of your cares and troubles, or successes. Her life was a dreary blank. I will never marry as a mere matter of business."

She did not know how closely she had hit the mark on his conscience. But the effect of the wound was only to irritate.

"You are mistaken, if you suppose George Maxwell was trying to make a good bargain, if that is what you are driving at," he said, trying to read the face of his unfathomable daughter. "He knew this morning before he came to you that my wealth had gone to the last penny, swallowed up in this American quicksand. He offered to join me at once, and go over to America to redeem whatever could yet be saved. His money would tide us over the crisis here. He only asked to speak to you at once before setting off."

It was an altogether new light on the business.

Mr. Barnton went out of the room without giving time for a reply, even if his daughter had desired to make one. She was left to her own meditations for the rest of the evening. Her father had shut himself up in a small writing-room, and had ordered some refreshment there. Madeline had to dine alone.

She was a generous girl, and her heart was profoundly touched. Every moment of those solitary hours deepened the impression. Her self-reproach rose to the verge of agony. It was no sluggish feeling which possessed her. The tide rushed along her heart swift and full as a torrent. That she should have misconstrued his generosity into mercenary motives, was anguish enough for her, but she had doubtless wounded a loving heart in casting it away from her. How precious the offered gift seemed now! how priceless, indeed! worth heart, and soul, and life of hers! A new humility possessed her, as she sat there, and the twilight stole upon her, and she neither moved nor wept.

She heard a ring at the bell, and found herself trembling; then a deep voice she knew sounded in the hall, and she almost gasped for breath. A step passed the drawing-room door and entered the little writing-room beyond.

Another hour passed, and still Madeline sat there alone in the fire-light among the shadows, her whole life centred in listening. At length the door opened. In another moment he would be gone, and the girl bent her head upon her hands and felt that her hope would go with him. There was a pause. Instead of passing on, George Maxwell entered, and gently closed the door and came forward.

"Pardon me for again intruding on you, Miss Barnton," he said, without a shadow of the morning's awkwardness, "I came to say good-bye, and also to excuse myself for my abruptness."

She rose and held out her hand to him in silence, and hardly suppressed a little sob. He sat down on the other side of the fire, and she took her seat again mechanically.

"I have also brought this little packet," he said, "for your inspection."

Madeline recognised her jewels at a glance.

"They are yours," he said.

She could not resist saying, "How do you know?"

"You have not worn them for some time," he said, "but I know this, and this, and this," and he took them up tenderly one by one.

"They were mine," she said; "but I gave them away. How have they reached your hands?"

"They were placed in my hands to see if they were honestly come by, that is all," he said.

"Amos would not be tempted, you see; and even now they are going to be divided."

She smiled, but it was a smile that flickered sadly, and at last the tears would come, and she let them drop on her clasped hands in the fire-light, like great diamonds. "Indeed, indeed, I did not know that, perhaps, they are not mine to give."

"Not quite so bad as that," he said, seeing her allusion. "I have disposed of them already." He did not say that he had paid their full value himself. "And now I must say good-bye, I am going to America on business. The ship sails from Liverpool to-morrow. It will be a pleasanter voyage for me if I can carry with me your good wishes and forgiveness. Nothing but the hasty call to prolonged absence would have made me so unfeelingly abrupt. Promise that you will forget all about it."

Left to time, maidenly reserve might—nay, would—have triumphed, and Madeline would have felt a hundred reasons for hiding her heart from this lover of hers; but what she did was to glide from her seat to the knees of the speaker—oh! sad reverse of the order of things—and say, "No, I cannot forget, but please forgive me."

"Madeline, my darling——"

But she persisted in sitting there, and telling him how she thought he cared only for business, and how wildly she had resented being made a partner on such terms.

The time they spent in further explanations was altogether unwarrantable, and when Madeline hinted as much, her lover archly replied, "Business is business, but love is love." Before they parted, the articles of partnership were agreed on, and, it may be added, that they have since been duly ratified.

DUST.

CAN any subject be lighter and more contemptible than this? We are accustomed to use the word as indicative of something entirely worthless and beneath notice, and in thought, as in reality, to trample the thing beneath our feet. But, after all, our scorn, however rational, is lavished in this manner upon ourselves—that of which we are made, and in which we end. What, then, is the moral truth and significance of this paradox? There is, of course, a physical solution immediately at hand. All forms of matter can be reduced to a few simple substances, and a very slight chemical change is sufficient to transmute the most valuable material into the most useless, and vice versa. These changes we may or may not be capable of producing at will, but with Nature they are the constant acts of every day. She has but a very few materials to work upon, and with an infinite variety of combination she produces an infinite variety of effects. There is no refuse or waste with her; nothing is really despicable. The crust of the earth, the life upon its surface, the air, the cloud, the sunbeam, are all busy in ceaseless change—ceaseless buildings up, and ceaseless pulling down. We are, indeed, fearfully and wonderfully made, and the wonder is not abated when we learn that we are made with marvellous simplicity also. The fact, however, remains the same, that matter in the form of dust is very useless, and often very troublesome. Again, dust is naturally associated with the idea of death, of annihilation, of oblivion, and so becomes possessed of a strong figurative significance.

Thus we come to look upon dust or mire with annoyance, with scorn, with loathing, and to use the words as descriptive of something useless, or abandoned, or destroyed. But we would do well sometimes to humble ourselves to the dust, to reflect with these words in our ears on what we really are, and what all our works are so ready to become. Take any one of the multitudinous forms of organised matter that we see around us full of life, and beauty, and power—a man, a tree, a beast from the jungle, or a bird from the air. The point of a knife, or a grain of poison is applied, and the whole structure, however perfect, however lovely, however strong, is doomed to ruin and decay, crumbling swiftly or slowly into dust and slime. Such changes are going on everywhere every moment of the year; indeed, we are ourselves the subjects of a somewhat similar process every moment of our lives. We are, in fact, less constant than many things about us; the gold and the marble outlive us, and we change like leaves of the autumn in the shadows of the everlasting hills.

We are familiar in the Bible with many allusions to the mutability of man, and of his fortunes and circumstances, and when we turn from this to God's great book of creation and event, we read his will in similar language. It seems to be the Divine intention that certain great truths should lie about us, ready always for our apprehension, but not eclipsing the necessary details of life. They are always to be seen, they must never be actually forgotten; but if they were to press constantly upon the thought, it would unhinge the mind for its daily intercourse with the world.

Thus the subject before us cannot always be quite remembered, must never be quite forgotten. Dust is a useful memento mori. It is well that we should look sometimes into the grave, that the bell should toll in our ears; but it was not intended that this should be our constant sight and hearing, and that we should always be haunted with the face of Death. What a great and pregnant saying was that of Christ's, "Let the dead bury their dead." There is something stern, and sad, and necessary about it. It is a reproof to long and selfish grief, the fatuous complaining for that which is lost to this scene for ever. It seems to say, With life only the living are concerned; for the dead, we place them in keeping of the dead; dust to dust, the soul unto God that gave it: come, thou, and follow me. We must work whilst it is day; it is the sloven and the fool who anticipates the night, when no man can work. Our fellows have passed into the shadow of that night, but we must not stand lingering upon the verge of darkness.

Again, how terrible is that saying of the Lord's, "Thou fool, this night shall thy soul be required of thee." If the first fixes the thought, does not this fascinate it with fear? Whatsoever thou hast garnered up with peculiar care, whatsoever the long years have hoarded for thee, whatsoever new passion, or indulgence, or ambition has painted life in fresh colours for thee, this night they shall be nothing to thee, they shall turn to ashes in thy hand; thy soul alone of these shall be real and living to thee in the presence of new and eternal realities.

Thus, it seems to be God's will that we should in no way neglect life through fear of death, or the memory of the dead; but that, on the other hand, we must concern ourselves with it in the full consciousness that we stay here but a short time, and that the moment of our departure is uncertain. This latter thought will be found to need the more frequent expression. There are few of us with whom the world is not so large as to hide everything else, so that we cannot look above it to God, or beyond it to eternity, or beneath it to death; and yet these are of infinitely greater importance than that which so occupies our attention. Is it not well, then, that we have about us a continual memorial of decay? The companions of our youth, like the beauty of summer, are laid lifeless in the dust before our eyes. The clay receives all, and assimilates all to itself: "All go unto one place; all are of dust, and all turn to dust again." If the dust preaches death to all, it does not preach equal death to all. The surviving soul of man marks him as distinct from all else that perishes. The risen Redeemer of man has brought again even his body from the dust, and won back the conquest of corruption. Thus death, which destroys other identities, is to us the gate of immortality, and of this distinction we have even now a continual witness from analogy; for while destruction and change are continuous about us in the animal and vegetable kingdoms, in our own bodies, and our achievements, in nature and in art, the spirit of man alone continues constant, while its functions are even progressive from the first, and are destined, perhaps, to be progressive always. In this respect Nature cannot produce his equal. She, indeed, has been before him here, and shall be after him; but with her children, the birth of one is the destruction of another, and she breathes for ever in the atmosphere of death.

But we enjoy little of this higher and spiritual life; we seldom even think of our splendid—our inestimable treasure. We are like one who, dwelling in a noble mansion, inhabits its meanest room, and takes no count of its long galleries of art, its cabinets of costly treasures. Our spirits have been cast into moulds of clay very beautiful, indeed, but destined, sooner or later, to be broken into shapeless dust again as by the potter's hand. Shall we become, then, so enamoured of this short tenement and its conditions, that we forget our true selves and our immortality? "He that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting." To such diverse issues must the question be finally brought! In such a strange and terrible contrast will the alternatives before us result! Corruption on the one side; life everlasting on the other. Life now is a compromise, a mixture of good and evil, a confusion of principles, a struggling of hope, necessity, and fear; but there the tumult is stilled into a calm of inevitable results, of final and immutable decisions. Hope is lapsed for ever in enjoyment, and fear more darkly accomplished in despair.

What, then, is the choice before us on which so much depends? The Apostle Paul thus writes to the Galatians: "Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh. For the flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh: and these are contrary the one to the other:" and he proceeds to enumerate the works of the flesh and the works of the Spirit.

We are, therefore, to decide between these two and happily for us, while there is temptation on one side, there is almighty power on the other. In all that we do we are beset by doubt and weakness; but "if any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally;" if any of us lack strength, let us go to Him that said, "My grace is sufficient for thee, for my strength is made perfect in weakness." In this lies the secret of success in that contest between the Spirit and the flesh, which goes on about us, even when we are unconscious of it. No man can develop within himself a spirit of love, purity, and truth, to be the only law within him. It has been tried over and over again, and whatever success there has been, there has been no complete and continuous triumph: "In many things we offend all." The solution, then, of the whole question is to be found as a matter alike of theory and practice, in the assistance from without which is proffered for man's acceptance, and lies about him as liberal and boundless as the air he breathes. As his body enjoys and is supported by this, so his soul must receive that Divine atmosphere; for, privation in the one case is as surely fatal as in the other.

J. S. W.

THE EXPLORATION OF PALESTINE.

BY THE REV. CHARLES BOUTELL, M.A.

CHAPTER V.

THE discoveries of the pier of Robinson's Arch," writes Lieutenant Warren, on the 11th of January of this present year, "and of the fallen arch-stones, have created no small stir in Jerusalem, and all classes are wishing to go down to see them. I have had a visit from Mr. Berlina, the son of the late chief Rabbi of London," the lieutenant adds, "and have made arrangements for taking a party of learned Jews down next Monday; he talked about bringing a hundred, but it will take half a day to show ten all that there is to be seen. Yesterday the works were crowded with Jews wishing to go down; we were obliged to put them off until after working hours, so as not to interfere with the workmen. To-day," continues the same letter, "when taking an English party round, I found some Jews seated at the top of the shaft, and asked them to come down; they declined on account of its being the Sabbath. One of our party explained that the Sabbath-day's journey might be taken underground as well as on the surface, and then one of them joined us and came down. On Thursday I took the Consul-General of France and party over the excavations, and they were particularly interested and delighted with what they saw. Our progress on the whole is very slow, as now we are among large loose stones. We are trying the fellahin's (Arab's) courage a great deal." In another letter, Lieutenant Warren says he has had an arm-chair made for the purpose of lowering the aged rabbis in comfort as well as in safety down his shaft; and, referring to quite a different class of visitors, on another occasion the lieutenant writes—"I have been taking many visitors over the works lately, and I can see that they do not at all realise what is going on until after they have been slung down some of the shafts and squeezed through a few holes."

The pavement, on a level with the rock foundation of the western pier of "Robinson's Arch," which led eastwards towards the Haram wall, Lieutenant Warren was disposed to regard as a low-level causeway, supported by another massive sub-arch, which had never been destroyed; and this we may consider to be a conjecture that the researches, which are still in progress, will eventually show to have been well founded. Other discoveries, hereafter to be described, will be found to have proved that this low-level pavement was not resting on a solid mass of masonry or earth, since, without any doubt, at a very considerably lower depth beneath the pavement, a stream of running water, long forgotten and altogether unknown, was still flowing, and may fairly be assumed to have been flowing for very many centuries. This running water we shall endeavour, in succeeding chapters, to follow along its onward course, and also to trace upwards towards its source. In the annexed diagram, illustrative of "Robinson's Arch," A B shows the western Haram wall in section, with a section of the springers of the arch at F; the line H H denotes the present surface of the ground; L K shows the outline of the western arch-pier, with the three courses of masonry resting on the rock at K; G shows the sweep of the arch; E E are the fallen arch-stones, as they now lie on the pavement, which extends from the pier, K, to the Haram wall, A B; and beneath this pavement I have placed a conjectural sub-arch, as at C; while below this arch the running water appears at D. This diagram shows how the western Haram wall rests on the rock at B. From B upwards to F this same wall rises to the height of 95 ft.; it then emerges from the ground, and attains the height of 85 feet above the present surface; so that the entire height of this grand wall is not less than 180 feet from foundation to crest. And, since it may be assumed as certain that Solomon's wall at this point rose to at least the same towering height, we may readily accept Lieutenant Warren's words when he says, "No wonder that the poor Queen of Sheba's spirit failed her when she saw the stupendous ascent" which, when she made her memorable visit to the wise king, led up, over the chasm of the Tyropœon valley, from the western city and the royal palace there, to the brow of Mount Sion, and to the Temple that crowned it.

The wood-cut below, carefully drawn from the photograph taken by Sergeant Phillips, represents the masonry of the western Haram wall, as it rises above the present surface of the ground, and with the springers of "Robinson's Arch."

In the diagram, the section of the rock from below the pier masonry at K to the point B is drawn from conjecture; still, as the rock, both at B and also below the masonry K, has been actually explored, the surface-line of the rock between those points must closely resemble the line that appears in the diagram. The sudden and precipitous fall of the rock here may have been produced, at any rate partially, by excavation when Solomon first laid the foundations of the great western wall of the Temple enclosure.

In order to determine the exact character of the rise of the rock from the bottom of the Tyropœon chasm or gully towards the east, and at the same time to follow the southern wall of the Haram downwards beneath the present surface of the ground to its foundation on the rock, at and also near the junction of the southern and western Haram walls at the south-west angle, a shaft was sunk down the face of the southern wall, about 40 feet to the eastward of the south-west angle.

(Drawn by F. W. LAWSON.)

"He dragged a heavy sail across."—p. 636.

At 12 feet 6 inches below the surface, this shaft encountered a pavement formed of small stones, irregular in form, and polished, probably from wear. Below, for a depth of 16 feet, a kind of concrete, composed of stones, bricks, and mortar, was pierced; and then succeeded, first, loose stones and shingle, and afterwards large wrought stones, and a wall of rubble running north and south, and abutting on the Haram wall. On the 11th of October, 1867, this shaft had been sunk to the great depth of 79 feet, and the men were in the act of breaking through a great stone, in order to carry the shaft down still deeper, when suddenly the bottom of the shaft gave way. Down went stone and hammers, and the Arab workmen barely succeeded in saving themselves from following with them. They at once rushed up and told the sergeant that they had found a bottomless pit. Lieutenant Warren himself went down to examine into the true nature of the sudden and unexpected addition to the depth of his shaft, and, in his report on this occasion, he says, in order that we may have an idea of the nature and magnitude of his work, he will give us a description of his descent of the shaft on this 11th day of last October:—

"The shaft-mouth is on the south side of the Haram wall, near the south-west angle," writes Lieutenant Warren, "among the prickly pears. Beside it, to the east, lying against the wall, is a large mass of rubbish that has been brought up; while over the mouth of the shaft itself is a triangular gin, with an iron wheel attached, and with a guy for running up the excavated soil. Looking down the shaft, I see that it is lined for the first 20 feet with timber framing 4 feet 6 inches in the clear. Further down, the Haram wall is seen, and the soil which has been cut through, and a man appears standing at what apparently is the bottom. An order is given to this man, who repeats it, and then a sepulchral voice is heard answering faintly, as if from another world. Reaching down towards the man who is visible is a 34-foot rope-ladder; and on descending by it, I find that the man is standing on a ledge which the ladder does not touch by 4 feet. This ledge is the top of the wall running north and south, which abuts on the Haram wall. The east face of this wall just cuts the centre of the shaft, which, consequently, has to be canted off about 2 feet towards the east, just where some large loose stones jut out in the most disagreeable manner. Here five more of the timber frames have been fixed to keep these stones steady. On peering down from this ledge, the Haram wall is discovered, and its grand projecting courses of masonry become lost in the darkness still lower down; and, at the same time, it becomes evident that two sides of the shaft are cut through the soil, and are self-supporting. In order to descend this second stage of the shaft, the ladder is again required. Accordingly, having told the man at the bottom to get under cover, the ladder is lowered to the ledge, and then, since it does not reach the bottom of the shaft, it has to be lowered about twelve feet more, and I have to reach it by climbing down by a rope hand over hand. As I pass along, I observe the marvellous joints of the Haram wall, and also probably encounter a few blows on the head and knuckles from falling pebbles. At last, on reaching the bottom of the ladder, I remember that there is still a pit of unknown depth to be explored, and so I step cautiously over the aperture leading to it. Then can be seen that one course of the Haram wall, near its base, is quite smooth all over, the stone being finely dressed, all the other courses being well dressed only round their drafts (or sunk borders). Two stout boards also are here seen lying against the Haram wall, under which the men retire whenever an accidental shower of stones renders their position dangerous. I am now at the depth of seventy-nine feet from the surface, and here I commence my exploration of the 'bottomless pit.' Having dropped a rope down into it, I discover that it really is only six feet deep, though certainly it looked black enough for anything. On climbing down with the sergeant, we find ourselves in a passage 4 feet high by 2 feet wide, running south from the Haram area; and we explore this passage. It is of rough rubble masonry, with flat stones at the top, and the floor and sides are muddy, as if water gathers there in the rainy season. It at once struck me," continues Lieutenant Warren, "that this was one of the overflow aqueducts from the Temple of Solomon, and that there might be a water-conduit underneath. We scrambled along on our feet, until, after about 200 feet, we found that the mud reached so high as to compel us to crawl by means of our elbows and toes. Gradually the passage became more and more filled up, and our bodies could barely squeeze through, and there did not appear sufficient air to support us for any length of time; so that, having advanced 400 feet, we commenced a difficult retrograde movement, having to get back half way before we could turn our heads round. On arriving at the mouth of the passage under the shaft, we spent some time in examining the sides, but there is no appearance of its having come under the Haram wall. It seems to start suddenly, and I can only suppose it to have been an examining passage over an aqueduct coming from the Temple." (This surmise was not confirmed; for, on breaking through the bottom of the passage the workmen came upon the solid rock.) "The bottom of this passage," Lieutenant Warren proceeds, "is the enormous distance of 85 feet below the surface of the ground, and, as far as I can see yet, the wall at the south-west angle must be buried 95 feet underground; so that at one time it must have risen clear to the height of 180 feet above the Tyropœon gully." It must be added, that in this singular passage, at 350 feet from the shaft, a branch gallery from the east was found; but it was impossible to clear it from the deposit with which it was almost filled. Subsequently, the great shaft was filled up, the position of the passage having first been fixed on the outside of the city walls, so that access to it could be gained at any time by sinking a fresh shaft at a suitable distance from the walls. This afterwards was actually done. A shaft was sunk 350 feet south of the walls, and at the depth of 60 feet it dropped directly upon the passage. The fellahin," remarks the lieutenant, "were regularly scared when they broke through stone" in this new shaft, "and found the passage with our well-known broad arrow burnt black on the roof. The passage is now being cleared out to the south." This was on the 2nd of February of this present year; but as I now write I have not any report of the results of the "clearing out" that at that time was commenced.

It appears desirable here to quote a few more lines from Lieutenant Warren's report of October 11, 1867, on the subject of the means then at his disposal for sinking his deep shafts. "I consider it," he writes, "very unsafe to sink these shafts without sheathing them; but I have been obliged to do this from want of wood." (He elsewhere mentions the great difficulty of obtaining even very small quantities of suitable wood in Palestine.) "In this shaft in particular" (the deep one near the south-west angle), continues Lieutenant Warren, "there is about sixty feet unsheathed, and a loose stone from any part might stave a man's head in before he is aware of it. . . .

The amount of wood wanted is very great: this shaft, if sheathed, would require 100 boards, 18 feet long, and 9 inches by 1 inch. We are also very much in want of English dockyard rope, and rope-ladders; . . . we have only two rope-ladders, and are often in great difficulties in consequence. It is all very well climbing hand over hand 35 feet up a rope, when hanging in the air; but, when it hangs in an unsheathed shaft, and loose stones may be brought down on one's head by the dangling of the rope, it is unsafe." Most certainly this is unsafe. Again the lieutenant writes:—"I wish to call your attention particularly to the deep shafts we have sunk lately. It is absolutely necessary, if this sort of work is to be continued, that the public should give with sufficient liberality to enable me to conduct the works in perfect safety to those who are employed continually under ground."

Since these reports reached England, the public has given with such liberality that abundant supplies have been placed at the disposal of Lieutenant Warren, to enable him to carry on his operations with energy and in safety. Still, a very considerably enlarged measure of public support is needed even now, if we would have this enterprise worked out in a manner and on a scale worthy of itself. I believe that this fact only requires to be known, coupled with a correct understanding of the nature of the work itself, and of the principles and aim of the Exploration Society, in order to secure most ample funds. What I myself particularly desire to see, is a multitude of small donations—something, indeed, from every individual who loves the Bible, and who therefore must feel a personal interest in the exploration of Palestine.

In my next chapter I propose to resume my description of the discoveries in the Tyropœon valley, along the western wall of the Haram.

A YOUNG HERO.

BALLAD. BY THE REV. WILLIAM JOSEPH SMITH, B.A.

[NOTE.—The incidents described in this ballad may be read in the Newfoundland Public Ledger of November 8th. They occurred during the gale of October 9th. Whole families go in the fishing vessels to the summer stations, where they put up their huts, or "tilts," and return in the laden vessels in the autumn. Thus 15,000 persons are said to have been wrecked on that one day, and on that coast alone.]

N Labrador, like coils of flame
That clasp the walls of blazing town,
The long restless billows came,
And swept the craggy headlands down;
Till ploughing in strong agonies
Their furrows deep into the land,
They carried rocks, and bars of sand
Past farthest margin of old seas,
And in their giant fury bore
Full thirty crowded craft ashore.

That night they pushed the darkness through,
O'er rocks where slippery lichens grew,
And swamps of slime and melted snow,
And torrents filled to overflow;
Through pathless wilds, in showers and wind,
Where woe to him who lags behind!
Where children slipped in ooze, and lay
Half frozen, buried half in clay;
Young mothers, with their babes at breast,
In chilly stupor dropped to rest.

A sailor lad of years fourteen,
 Had chanced, as by the waters thrown,
 On four that made sad cry and moan
 For parents they had lost between
 The wreck and shore, or haply missed.
 Cheerly and kind their cheeks he kissed,
 And folded each in other's arm.
 Upon a sloping mound of moss
 He dragged a heavy sail across,
 Close-pinned with boulders, rough yet warm;
 And packing it with mosses tight,
 Kept steadfast watch the livelong night,
 Nor dared depart, lest e'er again
 Was found this treasure he had hid.
 Some sudden treacherous gust had slid
 Beneath that rugged counterpane.
 He knew not name or face of one:
 He saved them. It was nobly done!

Day dawned at last. The storm had lulled;
 And these were happy, sleeping yet.
 A few fresh hands of moss he pulled,
 Then traced with trembling steps the track
 Of many footprints deeply set;
 And pressing forward, early met
 These children's parents hasting back,
 And filled their hearts with boundless joy.
 As with blanched lips, and chattering teeth,
 He told them of his night's employ;
 Feigned, too, he was not much distressed,
 Although his dying heart, beneath
 His icy-frozen shirt and vest,

Beat faint. They went; and o'er his eyes
 A gathering film beclouded light;
 And music, murmured in his brain,
 Such respite sang from toil and strain,
 That all his senses, wearied quite,
 Were lapped to slumber, lulling pain;
 Whilst soothing visions seemed to rise,
 That brought him scenes of other times,
 Of many children, and the rhymes
 His mother taught him on her knee,
 In happy days of infancy.
 Then gentlest forms, with rustling wings,
 Were wafting him a world of ease
 Beneath those downy canopies,
 Wherewith they shut out angry skies;
 And they with winning beckonings—
 Who looked so sweet and saintly-wise—
 His buoyant spirit drew afar
 From creaking timbers, shivering sails,
 And ships that strain in autumn gales,
 And snow-mixed rains, and sleeting hails,
 And wind and waves at endless war.
 Oh! who will e'er forget the day,
 The bitter tears, the voiceless prayer,
 The thoughts of grief we could not say,
 The shallow graves within the bay,
 The fifteen dear ones buried there,
 The grown, the young, who side by side,
 Without or coffin, shroud, or priest,
 Were laid; and him we mourned not least—
 The boy that had so bravely died!

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XXVI.

A CASTLE IN THE AIR.

UITE betimes in the morning, before the lazy, irregular household had well opened its eyes, Francis Heatherly's bell rang sharp and distinct.

He was accustomed, he said, to strict punctuality, and he always had his breakfast at eight o'clock.

He had taken his domestics rather by surprise.
 His eye ran over the slovenly room, scarcely ready for him—the unpolished grate, the dusty carpet—and noted every defect. He had ample time; for he waited half-an-hour in the breakfast-room, ere the kettle could be made to boil.

"Which convinces me," said Francis Heatherly to himself—and I almost think he put it down in his book—"that I must have a wife!"

And almost as quickly as we could write it down, he had formed, as he thought, a most perfect scheme, which he at once proceeded to carry into operation.

He asked the housekeeper for Miss Graham's address, and she gave it to him, written on a scrap of paper. The address was No. 3, Prospect Cottages.

"Quite an out-of-the-way place, where nobody lives," the housekeeper told him—by which she meant, nobody of consequence.

When Francis Heatherly had finished his breakfast, he spent a little time in looking at his packages.
 Then he went over the house, jotting down, as he did so, sundry items in his note-book. The result of these calculations was, that an architect should be set to work, either to repair the old place, or to make plans for the new. He had not made up his mind. Then, as the morning was getting on apace, he prepared to go out. He made the best of himself before he went.
 He gave an additional curl to his moustache, and an additional perfume to his well-oiled locks. His new suit of black became him admirably; and, lest he should soil his carefully-polished boots, he sent for a cab, and desired the man to drive to Prospect Cottages. He amused himself, as he rode along, by thinking what he should say to Josephine. He had scarce settled the matter, which required a great deal of consideration, when the cab drew up at the door.
 He was not in the least fluttered. He got out, paid the cabman, and dismissed him. Then he rang at the bell. He had his card-case in his hand. He would do the thing in the most gentlemanly manner. He sent in his card, with the name elaborately engraved, and ornamented by sundry flourishes, to Josephine.

While the card was taken in, he stood in the passage, pulling off his glove. The glove was new and tight, and he had just accomplished the matter, when the woman of the house came back, and asked him to walk into Miss Graham's room.

Francis Heatherly, his hat in his hand, and diffusing a kind of fragrance around him, stepped into the presence of Josephine. The room was perfectly neat and comfortable. Some working materials were on the table, and the morning sun was shining cheerily in at the window. Francis Heatherly, who loved order, and neatness, and cheerfulness, was gratified. Last of all, he looked at Josephine. She had risen to receive him. The extreme grace of the movement was not lost upon him. He liked a graceful manner in a woman.

"I have taken the liberty of making myself known to you, Miss Graham," he began, the cold blue eye resting on her with some curiosity; "I only arrived last night."

She asked him to be seated, and then she sat down herself. Her voice trembled a little; she had been ill the day before, and had only just left her room; but of that, she told him nothing.

"I allowed no time to elapse," he continued, "before I paid my respects to you. Justice demanded it of me."

"You are very good," replied Josephine, colouring at the terms of his introduction.

"I am strictly just, Miss Graham. If there is one principle of my nature stronger than another, it is that!"

She bowed her head in token of assent.

"I have heard your story, and it is a very sad one. That you should have been left——"

"Oh!" exclaimed Josephine, hastily, and her face flushing with a strange feeling of annoyance and dislike, "let me beg of you to pass by that subject; it is painful and unnecessary."

He smiled a smile of extreme complacency.

"Not so unnecessary as you think, Miss Graham. I wish you to regard me, from the very first, in the light of a friend."

She hesitated. It might be impolitic, and uncourtous, but friendships are not won with a word.

"I am obliged to you," she said at length, the same tingling sensation in her cheek.

All this time, the blue eye had never wandered from her, except once, and that was to the reflection of himself in the mirror. He did not think her handsome. I told you, from the first, that opinions were divided on that head. He inclined to regard her as plain. But, plain or handsome, it made no difference when strict justice held the balance.

"When this property came to me," he continued, "the first inquiry I made, was, whether the late Miss Graham had any near relation. My relationship to her was, as you, perhaps, are aware, very distant indeed."

Josephine assented. He had not an agreeable voice. It was too hard, and there was none of the flexibility that renders speech pleasant to the ear.

"I heard rumours of a niece who had expected to enjoy the estate willed, by some freak, to myself. I resolved to search the matter out. I am not a man who flinches from my duty."

Again Josephine assented.

"I do so. I find you in poverty. I find——"

The crimson flush on her cheek made him pause a moment. He altered the term.

"I find you in reduced circumstances, and I regret it exceedingly. Believe me, Miss Graham, I am prepared to act fairly by you."

Her varying colour and the pained look in her face might have told him how distressing the conversation was to her; but his cold blue eye saw nothing.

"My object, this morning, was to offer to you permanent assistance. I am about to——"

"Excuse me," interrupted Josephine, hastily, and brushing away a tear that would come; "I may seem ungrateful, but I have learned to be independent, and it does not occur to me, that I need assistance."

His patronising tone jarred on her sensibilities, and wounded them to the quick.

"That is pride, Miss Graham."

"Oh, no; I am not proud," she replied. "I confess to having felt the blow that scattered my expectations to the winds; but I have recovered from that. I am settled here, in quiet and content. I need nothing more."

She could not repress a sigh as she said it. He little knew what the great shipwreck of her life had been!

"Yes, it is pride," he insisted, his voice growing harsher and more intolerable. "You must learn to be humble. These trials are sent us——"

She could not bear that from him. Oh, no! Come what might, she would break off that strain! The look she gave him, stopped him. It was then he remembered that the great errand of the morning had not even been approached. She was not the sort of person he expected to find. He thought she would have been deferential to him, as the owner of the property, and as inclining to be her benefactor and her patron. But to regard him in this light, did not occur to Josephine.

"Now, Miss Graham, I have a request to make to you. I hope you understand our relative positions. I am sure you are a lady of considerable penetration; otherwise, there might be some mistake here."

"What do you mean?" she asked, in simple surprise.

"I mean that, in the eye of justice, I have that which ought to have been yours. In the eye of the law, of course, it is my own, and no one can make restitution to you."

"But I do not wish for restitution," said Josephine, impatiently. She was getting weary of the cold blue eye and the offensive conceit of the man who had chosen to intrude himself upon her.

"No matter," and he smiled complacently. "I do!"

Her face flushed again. She wished he would go. There was no earthly reason why he should inflict this visit upon her.

"As a lover of justice, I do," he continued, getting more and more complacent. "And possessing, besides, a tolerable share of acumen, I see, quite clearly, the proper way of acting for us both."

She raised her head with something of haughtiness. How dare he to link himself with her, in this way?

He took no notice of the hint. It was not his habit to turn aside from any purpose he might have formed. He went straight on.

"I am aware we are comparative strangers; but that has been accidental, and admits of remedy. When you have seen me some few times, perhaps you will grow to—to—" Here he paused, for once embarrassed. Josephine's look of blank amazement tended to bring him to a halt.

"You will become better acquainted with me," he continued, recovering his self-possession. "And then, why should I mince the matter? I am a plain, straightforward, man, and know my own mind. I feel it will be no more than my bounden duty to—to—"

Josephine was speechless; so no help could come from that quarter.

"In fact, to marry you!" blurted out Francis Heatherly.

There was a dead silence after this announcement. He thought he had done it admirably, and he glanced at himself in the mirror.

Josephine, for the first few moments, felt unable to utter a single word. His folly and absurdity made her incline to laugh. But he was quite serious, never more so in his life. He looked at her, expecting a reply. She would be only too happy, he thought, to accept such a solution of the knot in her history. Of course she was taken by surprise; she was sure to be. He must give her time; he must encourage her a little: and a smile, meant to be benignant, curled the thin lips.

"Don't be too much agitated, Miss Graham. I can wait for your reply. I am not in such a hurry as—as you think!"

Josephine laughed now—laughed outright. Then correcting herself, "You are mistaking me for some other person," said she, quietly. "No one syllable that you have uttered can have the least reference to myself."

"But are you not Josephine Graham?"

"Oh, yes! and that is precisely the reason."

He looked at her, and, without the least embarrassment, she looked full at him. Her eyes, he began to discover, were remarkably handsome. For once in his life, he felt rather at a disadvantage.

"I am afraid I have been too abrupt. But when you come to think the matter over—"

"Oh, no," she interrupted, "there will not be the least occasion! The conclusion has been arrived at already."

"Then you actually refuse me!"

"I do."

She said it quietly, but firmly. She rose as she said it. He began to think that, after all, she was very good-looking.

"And a girl of spirit, too!" he thought.

He did not care so much about this point-blank negative. It was early in the day, and she would find out her mistake. He had, at least, raised an interest in her mind, and that was something. As she was standing, he felt compelled to rise also.

"At any rate, Miss Graham, setting this matter aside for the present, you will allow me to be your friend."

"Setting it aside for ever," she replied, with some vehemence, "and distinctly understanding that it shall never be alluded to again."

"You make hard terms, Miss Graham."

"Oh, no; I am only reasonable. And for the rest, I do not think it wise to lose a friend."

She forced herself to say it. She would not make him an enemy.

"Then I may visit you sometimes?"

"I receive no visitors."

"I am glad of that!" He said it abruptly. "At all events, there is no rival on the field," he thought.

When he had thought it, he took his leave. He was not altogether dissatisfied with his visit. A man of his tact and skill, and with all the prestige that wealth could give, was sure to be successful in the end: it was a mere matter of time. There was no earthly reason to prevent Josephine Graham from becoming his wife!

Well for him, he could not look back into the little room, and see her walking up and down with flushed, tearful face, and agitated step; and that he did not hear her cry, in the bitterness of her soul—

"Oh, Raymond, Raymond! you should have saved me from this!"

CHAPTER XXVII.

CATCHING AT A STRAW.

THE face of Alice Sylvester wore a look of quiet happiness, as she walked home from her visit to Charley. It was one of those rare intervals when the harassing cares and troubles, that beset her daily path, had hidden their heads. She had gone away from them, in thought, at least, to some other days that lay embalmed in her memory. A smile played about her mouth, her eye was bright, her step elastic; just for those few moments!

She had reached the gate that led, by a private road, into the grounds of the old house on the common. Grim as ever, and bare, and bleak, and desolate, there stood before her the home in which she had been nurtured. Still the same smile played about her mouth; her thoughts were still wandering in the past, and while they did so she was happy!

A voice sounded close to her ear—

"Miss Sylvester!"

She turned to look. All her bright thoughts faded. The happy memories were rent away, like a web of gossamer. The voice was that of Humphreys.

She looked at him kindly. There was an amount of involuntary sympathy in her voice as she said, "Did you wish to speak to me?"

"I want to tell you the trouble I am in, Miss Sylvester. It mayn't do much good, but a man will grasp a straw sometimes, if he thinks it stands between him and drowning."

She knew it was coming—the old story, old as her memory lasted, and which had been older than that! And what could she do? The slender fingers were twisted together in a kind of agony. But she did not show it outwardly. She was calm and dignified, as she stood to listen.

"It's the money that has ruined me," continued John; "the money my father was mad enough to lend to old Mr.——"

He stopped. The burning blush on her cheek, and the flash of her eye drew him up quickly. He changed his tone.

"I did not mean to offend you, Miss Sylvester. I am not as polite as I ought to be. Indeed, I hardly know what I am saying!"

"I am not offended," replied Alice, calmly. "Pray go on."

"I hardly know what I am saying," repeated he, hurriedly, and in a tone of keen distress. "Six weeks ago, I thought I was the luckiest fellow alive—a good farm, and the best wife that ever lived, and who doesn't know, no more than a babe unborn, what is going to happen to her! On my word, she doesn't, and how I am to tell her I don't know!" added John, rubbing his eyes with the back of his hand.

"You see, I bought the farm with money raised on the debt," continued John, trying to speak more coherently. "It wouldn't have mattered, if I'd had to do with honest folks. Don't be angry, Miss Sylvester," for she had started, as if stung to the quick. "I was not speaking of you, only of the man who did business with me. He was a rogue of the first water; more fool I was to trust him!"

She did not speak. The mute anguish of her face touched him.

"I'm sorry to have to lay the matter before you, Miss Sylvester. Ladies have no business with such things, I know; but, you see, I'm just desperate—that's what I am, and who else is there will hear me?"

Again the fingers clutched in her bitterness of soul. How could she help him? That was the keenest shaft flung at her by her evil destiny. How could she help him? She would have coined her heart's blood, she knew that, rather than inflict such woe on others. She would, she was resolved as she stood, break through all barriers, and contribute her mite, be it ever so small, to undo the mass of evil. She would use her youth, her strength, her energy—all she had, in the contest. Yes, come what might! The kindling of her face, the flash of her eye, told that she would. The resolute will of the Sylvesters was stamped on every feature.

"Who else will hear me?" continued John Humphreys, growing more and more excited. "They've tied me off for six months, or I'd have put an execution in the house. I was very near it."

She laid her hand on the gate, as if to steady herself. Every atom of colour died from cheek and brow. What a dreadful sound the words had! How they jarred on every nerve. She looked up at the bare, blank windows of the old house on the common. A sense of danger, of desolation, of degradation, too, came over her. What a position they were placed in! What help was there? what rescue? She could have wept, but her tears seemed dried up by the burning, intolerable sense of shame!

"It's just that six months that will beat me down," continued John. "The man who lent me the money is pressing me hard. I shall have to sell the farm. Think of that, Miss Sylvester! My farm that I have just got settled in! And my wife——" Here his voice faltered. He could see Rachel, even now, sitting by her bright fireside, and singing in the gladness of her heart. He would have to tell her, before that day was over, and the thought drove him frantic. "Oh, Miss Sylvester! can't you suggest anything—not anything, to save us?"

Her face looked rigid, her lips were compressed. The mouth, so sweet and tender, was now hard and set; for the thing, in all its bitterness and hatefulness, thrust itself full upon her; the thing expressed by that one expressive word—debt!

This it was which clouded her young life in its morning hours; which hid her path in darkness and perplexity; which brought with it danger, nay destruction. "For it will, it is destroying us," she thought, her eyes wandering a moment to the old house yonder. Then they rested on John Humphreys. The haggard lines on his face, the sad, sleepless eyes, the look of weariness and perplexity, was too much. She could not bear it.

"Oh!" cried she, tearfully, "may God forgive us what we have done to you, John Humphreys!"

He was very much affected. She was so beautiful, so high born, so far removed from him. She was a Sylvester, and yet she wept for him! I think he wept too, for a tear fell on his hard, weatherbeaten hand. If she could have given him a fortune, it could scarce have soothed him as those tears of hers did.

"I will try what I can do," continued she, vehemently. "I will move heaven and earth to get you the money. Don't you feel convinced of it?"

"I do!" replied John Humphreys, eagerly; "I do!"

"If I cannot, it will not be my fault. I will strain every nerve. There is nothing I will not do, or suffer!" She spoke passionately.

"Nothing I will not do, or suffer!"

She repeated the words, as she hurried home. She meant to tell them so, her mother and Raymond. They had been riding out, in the equipage of the Sylvesters, with all the appurtenances of wealth and fashion. She had seen it rolling along in the distance, and, as she remembered it, she gasped out the words breathlessly, and with flushed, angry face—"Shame! shame! shame!"

(To be continued).

THE PAINTED WINDOW.

ONE day Arthur's papa called him to his side, and said, "Arthur, my dear boy, you have been so good to-day that you shall go with me out riding; and as I am going to pay a morning visit at that old house you were so desirous of exploring, I think you will be very much pleased."

"Oh, thank you, papa!" cried Arthur; "I remember the house so well, and how I longed to go into it that day we rode past. Oh, I am so glad!" and Arthur clapped his hands with joy.

When they reached the old house, they passed under an archway, and rode up to the door, which was of strong oak, studded with nails; and there were quaint old buttresses, and mullioned windows, and gables covered with ivy. And Arthur's papa rang the door-bell, and they waited till the servant came to let them in.

When the servant appeared, he informed them that his master had been obliged to keep an engagement of some importance, and was therefore out, but that in half an hour's time he would return; and being very anxious to see Arthur's papa, he had left a message for him, begging that he would come in and wait for him; so, as this gentleman and little Arthur's papa were friends, and stood on no ceremony with each other, Arthur had the great pleasure of being desired to dismount and follow his papa, who walked into the house.

At one end of the hall there was a beautiful long window, called a lancet window, that is, of the same shape as those in churches, pointed towards the top; and this window was entirely made of the most beautiful stained glass. There were figures and coats of arms painted upon it in the richest colours—crimson, and azure, and orange, and purple, and green; and Arthur, who had never seen anything half so beautiful before, was quite enchanted. The sunshine, too, was pouring in through this window like a flood of glory, and the different coloured rays fell upon the floor, slanting up to Arthur's feet, like bars of amethyst, and ruby, and sapphire, and emerald. It seemed to Arthur the work of magic; for, except the small east window at church, the colours of which were pale and dim compared with these, he had never seen anything of the kind before.

"Oh, papa, how beautiful!" was all he could say.

"Yes, my boy," answered his papa, "it is a beautiful window."

"But, papa, you do not seem to care about it; oh, I suppose you have seen it before?"

"Yes, my dear; I have seen it often; and I have seen cathedrals, where there are not one but many such windows as this. But I am very glad to be able to show my little boy anything so beautiful; and I am glad, too, to see that he has so quick an eye for what is beautiful."

"Oh, but, papa, who could help seeing this window, unless he were blind? And, oh, papa, do you think that I shall ever see those cathedrals, and all their windows?"

"I have no doubt of it, Arthur. And as you are pleased with the bright colours of this window, shall I show you another beauty in it, which I do not think you have yet observed?"

"Oh, do, please, papa," said Arthur.

"It has often struck me," continued his papa, "that all these beautiful colours are like the joys of this world, so bright, so warm, so captivating. Now, by the joys of this world, I do not mean its sinful pleasures, or its vain frivolities; I mean—Tell me, Arthur, first, what you think are the joys of this world."

"I don't know very well, papa, what the world is; but I know what my joys are—oh, yes!—they are you and mamma, and all your kindness to me; and then, you know, papa, we love each other so dearly; and my pony, and my rabbits, and all the flowers, and birds, and the sunshine, and the stars, and my pretty poetry-book; and, oh, dear papa, a thousand things besides!" and Arthur looked quite overwhelmed with the weight of the joys of this world.

"Yes, my darling boy," said his papa, looking pleased, "I thought you would rank our affection for each other first in your list, as, I assure you, I do in mine. And, what I mean by that happiness of life which resembles the colours in this window, is, first of all, the love that is implanted in all human creatures—the deep, warm love of parent and child, of husband and wife, of brother and sister; and, after that, the numerous blessings we enjoy in this world—the beauties of Nature, the love of animals, and flowers, and music, and poetry. Do you see, Arthur, how these things are like the colours in the window?"

"I think I do," replied Arthur, thoughtfully: "they are strong, and warm, and do not change."

"You are right," said his papa. "But I was speaking then, Arthur, only of the colours as they are without the sunshine. But, my dear child, as this stained window is luminous only within itself, and throws no colours on the floor if the sun does not shine upon it; so our blessings in this life, our innocent pleasures, and our human affections, will all be gathered and concentrated in self, if we view them not through the true light of heaven, the love of God. It is only in spreading and diffusing the blessings we enjoy in this world, that we can make a right use of them; and wherever you see one who helps and succours his fellow-creatures, and gives them peace, and consolation, and happiness, when he can do so, you may rest assured that, at least, some rays of the heavenly light are shining upon his life."

THE GILLYER

— Saturday, June 27, 1868. —

THE ABBEY CHURCH OF IONA.

THE ABBEY CHURCH OF IONA,

AND THE ANCIENT BRITISH MISSIONARIES.

WE shall assume that some of our readers have, now and then, noticed a little Scottish island just to the west of Mull, before which it stands like an advanced breakwater, to receive the shock of the Atlantic billows. A few may have marked its bleak and storm-beaten shores, while sailing up the sound of Hy, on their way to inspect the huge basaltic columns and romantic caves of Staffa. If such a visit happened on a bright summer's day, the visitor, looking southwards from the depths of Pingal's Cave, would see the distant Iona in its brightest and most picturesque aspect. Of course he resolves to land on the far-famed isle, but then the beauty vanishes. Bleak moors, dark peat wastes, and storm-beaten hills remind him that Iona is not visited for her riches of landscape beauty. Those weather-worn ruins of stern red granite, at the foot of yonder dark hill, on the eastern shores of the island, speak of the days when Iona was the spiritual light-house of these Northern regions.

Here was one great centre of ancient mission work. From this now desolate place, many a preacher of the faith went forth, not only to Ireland, Scotland, and England, but even to the fierce pagans of Germany. This ancient missionary station was well placed. On the north, extended many a wild Norse settlement, where the ravens of Odin were honoured, and the Cross abhorred. On the east, the Scot and the Pict were battling for mastery; while heathenism still held dominion over many a tribe. On the south, Ireland was waiting for the welcome Celtic missionary; and lower down, to the south-east, were the lands of the conquering and heathen Angles. The isle—not three miles long and about one broad—was large enough for a small mission community, and not sufficiently attractive to allure the daring rovers of the Norse seas. Those who delight in tracing the history of the ancient British or Celtic Church—long before Augustine landed in Kent from Rome—must ever look with deep veneration on sea-girt Iona. Here for ages a mission of the old church of these lands long and bravely held its ground, in spite of the Norse fire and sword.

When was this remarkable missionary centre founded? About the year 563, Columba, a famous Irish missionary of that age, obtained a grant of the island of Hy from a Scottish prince, and erected dwellings for himself and twelve associated missionaries. The church and surrounding structures were then called a monastery, and the reader may, if so disposed, call the missionaries monks; but he must, in that case, use the word in a special sense, separating it from many notions afterwards connected with the term by superstitious usage.

Missionary would, however, be the best designation for those early preachers of Iona. Before proceeding, it is proper to remind a few of our younger readers, that the small isle is called by three names. The most ancient is I or Hy, signifying island. This was afterwards written I-wa, and Iowa; the w in the latter names being changed to n, by the copier of an old manuscript, the term Iona took the place of the ancient I-wa, or Iowa.

When the fame of Columba was spread far and wide by the labours of his missionaries, the place naturally took a name from him, Columba's Isle. The modern form of this designation, I-colum-kill—the church of Columba's isle—is that usually found on the maps. When Columba settled in Iona his missionaries began to instruct both Scots and Fenians, the latter a subject, the former a dominant race. All the neighbouring islands and the adjacent mainland were quickly dotted with rude mission stations; often a turf or timber hut sufficed, but in many cases a stone chapel was reared in the deep solitude of remote Highland glens. Sometimes, even in the middle of the nineteenth century, the English tourist, searching for grand and picturesque scenery, comes suddenly upon a ruined chapel, far from the haunts of men, at the head of an Argyshire frith. He wonders much from what nooks the old worshippers came; nor does his marvelling cease, when some antiquarian fellow-traveller declares the solitary ruin to have been a Celtic mission station.

Let us call up, though but for a moment, the picture of the old Columban missionary community in Iona. A wooden church, surrounded by rows of wooden houses, or rather huts, would have first attracted the attention of a visitor in the sixth century. Gardens and fields, producing the simplest and indigenous vegetables, stretched around. Children, too, are playing about, and women are visible. What is the meaning of this? The explanation is very simple. These early British missionaries deemed marriage allowable, some took to themselves wives, and some declined the trouble. What are those boats used for which are drawn up along the shore? Are the Columban missionaries fishers of the sea or fishers of men? Both; the boats were used to catch fish, and also to carry the various mission parties to the neighbouring islands and coasts.

The Columbans gradually rose into repute; Iona became holy ground, the primitive wooden structures were succeeded by buildings of sculptured stone, and the old mission centre became, in the twelfth century, a monastery of the Cluniac order, and the seat of the "Bishop of the Isles."

No part of the ancient Columban buildings remains; the existing ruins of Iona being, for the most part, not older than the thirteenth century.

The abbey church is a hoary pile of red granite, with nave, choir, transept, and a tower seventy-five feet high. Perhaps some parts of the structure have stood on this wild shore for 600 years. Time has spared a little of the rich sculptured cunning work of long-forgotten artists. The beautiful doorway of the choir, the elegant rounded arches of the chapter-house, and the window tracery of the south aisle, prove that poet-sculptors were not unknown in the isle.

Some ruined crosses, covered with rich and symbolic tracery, stand near the church; the one on the south is called Maclean's; and St. Martin's Cross, fourteen feet high, is ever telling, in antique sculpture, how Columba drove out all the serpents from Iona.

The burial-ground of this ancient Celtic mission was formerly deemed the holiest home of the Caledonian dead; princes, pilgrims, and priests sought a burial-place in Columba's Isle. Forty "kings," says old tradition, were honoured by graves in such hallowed soil. One writer raises the number to at least sixty, amongst whom were forty-eight Scottish and four Norwegian chiefs. This lonely "God's acre" drew towards it a long line of pilgrims from far-off lands. Even the distant valleys of Iceland deemed it an honour to send a "palmer" to Iona's shores. Superstition, or a fond sentimental veneration, surrounded all things in Icolmkill with a mystic sanctity. An oath sworn on the once-venerated "black stone" of Columba, was deemed to carry with it a mysterious weight of obligation. Up to the year 1830 the "stone of the oath" remained in Iona, when it was removed by the Duke of Argyll, the owner of the isle. The old church was supposed to contain the grave of the renowned Columba himself. At the west end of the church, visitors are still shown a large vault-like structure called the tomb of St. Columba; but not even the village children of Icolmkill believe that the grave of the once-famous saint is now within their isle.

When the "bishopric of the Isles and Man" had become subject to the Norwegian Archbishop of Drontheim, the Scottish Church settled a native bishop at Iona. The present diocese of Argyll and the Isles is the representative of this ancient see. The last abbot of the monastery seems to have become Bishop of the Isles about 1492, when the abbey church was annexed to the see. The effigy of this abbot is yet to be seen on the north side of the choir.

The old library of Iona has suffered a strange and wide dispersion. It seems to have contained, in the thirteenth century, the Scottish national records, which were probably carried off to England by that "stark" spoiler Edward I. Some of the old books have been traced to Rome, others were taken to the English Roman Catholic College at Douay, a few have been found at Ratisbon, and some even at Drontheim. It is now, perhaps, impossible to recover this scattered library, and to place it in Edinburgh, as a memorial of the ancient seat of Caledonian missions.

The word missions reminds us of the men who, in ages past, carried from this island home the message of heavenly peace to many a remote coast. Aidan, the Northumbrian missionary, who recovered the north of England from the paganism into which the Angles had relapsed, is not the least worthy. He established a mission station on the small island of Lindisfarne, now Holy Isle, whence the English coast could more easily be visited than from Iona. Aidan's zeal for the old customs of the British churches drew upon him the gentle rebuke of Bede, who was sore troubled that his ardent friend should oppose the rule of Rome, respecting the time of keeping Easter. It would surely form a noble picture, were a poetic artist to represent, effectively, the fervid Aidan preaching to the Northumbrians, while each sentence was interpreted by the converted King Oswald to his wondering Angles. Wilfred, Bishop of Northumbria, was a pupil of Aidan, and therefore trained under the rules of Iona; but his restless spirit soon led him far from the simple habits of the Columban missionaries. He was highly benefiting the rude people of Northumbria, when love of power involved him in a conflict with King Egfrid and the Anglian Church. Being deposed from his bishopric of York, and endeavouring to stir up the Pope against his own country, he was banished, and, taking refuge in the wilds of Sussex, became an earnest preacher to its pagan people. Ambition soon led him again to the North; he recovered his see; was again deposed and again restored, by the rival political and ecclesiastical parties of his time. He died about 709 A.D.; a good missionary spoiled by priestly arrogance. Wilfred is, probably, the least interesting of all "the children of Iona."

From this island came also Finan, the Apostle of Essex, and of the midland districts; Kilian, a Saxon noble, who perished while preaching Christ to the heathen of Franconia; and Virgilius, Bishop of Salzburg, who is said to have irritated his contemporaries by believing in the globular shape of the earth.

Nor must we forget Columbanus, who headed a mission to the Franks in Gaul, and ended his labours in Italy, at Bobbio, whence his prayer-book was afterwards removed, as a prized relic, to the Ambrosian Library at Milan.

But the greatest name connected with Iona is that of its founder, Columba. Wonderful, to men of the nineteenth century, seems the fame which long surrounded this Celtic missionary. He was ranked next to the apostles in honour; he was deemed a prophet; angels were supposed to visit him; the stormy waves were said to have been hushed at his bidding; and his last miraculous work was the expulsion of serpents from Iona. Of course, such marvels were easily imagined, easily written, and readily believed; but their reception proves the height of Columba's reputation. Princes fought for the possession of his old and torn psalm-book, well named the Catach, or book of battles. The O'Donnell family held for ages this prized relic, which was recovered from a Belgian monastery in 1818, and is now deposited in the Royal Irish Academy, where the saint's bell and crosier may also be seen. Even his bed was reverently preserved until the year 1034, when it was lost in the Irish Sea.

What was Columba in reality? A simple-minded Celtic missionary, born of a noble Scotic family, in Donegal, on the 7th of December, 524 A.D. His father, named Fedhlimidh, and his mother, Eithne, were both of the Dalriad, or royal line. Their son came to Iona as an exile, about the year 563, bringing with him a body of missionaries. His love for books was the cause of this banishment. It appears that Finan, whom we have mentioned above, lent a favourite psalter to his friend Columba. The borrower zealously copied the book, and honestly returned the original. But Finan resented this violation of copyright law, and claimed the volume thus made from his own. Columba refused to give up what he had so laboriously copied. The case was brought before King Diarmid at Tara. His majesty decreed in favour of Finan, judgment being uttered in a style not yet familiar to Westminster Hall; "to every cow belongeth her own calf;" being the form of this old Irish decree. Columba, we regret to say, lost his temper, stirred up his powerful friends against the royal decision; war followed, and to prevent further strife, the king banished Columba from Ireland. Every lawyer will side with his Irish majesty; Columba was clearly guilty of "contempt of court," and showed that a saint may, on convenient occasions, have a "bit of a temper." This hotly-contested psalter is thought to be the Catach to which reference has been already made.

Columba soon recovered his right mind, and sent out his preachers to Ireland, and along the coasts of Caledonia. Above thirty missionary stations were established by him in Ireland, and about fifty in Scotland. Some of his missionaries are said to have reached even Iceland; and the first Christian church built in that island was dedicated to Columba. This remote settlement perished; but, three hundred years after, the Norwegian colonists found some memorials of the old mission. There is a tradition that pupils of Columba crossed the Alps, and preached Christ amid the Swiss mountains at St. Gall. Columba had one physical qualification for a missionary in a powerful voice, which, his admiring biographers say, could be heard for a full mile! Our readers will not fail to remark that all this Celtic missionary agency was carried on without any dependence on Rome. Her consent was not sought, her influence was unfelt.

Columba died in Iona, on the 9th of June, 597, at the age of seventy six—the year after Augustine had landed in Kent as a missionary from Rome. Columba is said to have had a presentiment of the hour of his death, and when the time drew near, was carried into the nave of the simple mission church. It was then late on Saturday night, the old love for copying books seized him in his last hours, and calling for writing materials, the dying man endeavoured to transcribe the thirty-fourth Psalm. The effort was too much, he stopped at the end of the tenth verse, and died just after midnight.

He was buried in the church, but the body is supposed to have been removed, in after times, to rest near St. Patrick's grave at Downpatrick.

Many of our readers may never see the shores of Iona, but they may do well to remember that this isle of the Western seas was formerly the holy place of the Hebrides, and the home of a brave-hearted missionary band. W. D.

"ALL THESE THINGS ARE AGAINST ME."*

BY THE REV. C. CARUS-WILSON, M.A., VICAR OF RAMSGATE.

HO it was that uttered these words, what were the things that he thought were against him, and whether he was right in saying what he did, are the three points which we intend to inquire into.

Who, then, was it that used these words? It was Jacob. Let us briefly call to our recollection something of the history of Jacob, up to the time of the present incident.

He was the son of Isaac, and the grandson of Abraham, the "Father of the Faithful." Consequently, he was under the tuition and had the example of the very best of men. He himself is held up to us, in Scripture, as one of God's chosen servants—a patriarch. His early life was a chequered one. He was the favourite of his mother; while his elder brother, Esau, was the favourite of his father. While yet young, he took an undue advantage of Esau: he made a successful bargain with him for his birthright; and, on the strength of this, and at the persuasion of his cunning mother, he procured his father's blessing, which had been intended for the first-born. This caused a rupture between him and his brother. He was obliged to leave home. He ran away to his mother's relations at Haran, many miles in the far east. There he lived for twenty years, labouring as a farm-servant. He married, and became the father of a large family. Then he returned home. On his way he met his brother Esau. It was a critical meeting; but God took care of him, and his brother was pacified with presents. After this, he settled, with his twelve sons, at Beersheba, in the south of Canaan. This, in brief, is the history of Jacob up to our present point.

* Gen. xlii. 36.

And now, what were the things to which he specially refers in the words, "All these things are against me?" They were not the troubles of his early life: these had long since passed away. It is astonishing how, gradually, we lose sight of the trouble which is past. We may be thankful for "the healing hand of Time." No, it was something that was then lying upon him. You remember the circumstances. While living at Beersheba, his sons were apt to quarrel amongst themselves. Most of them took a special dislike to Joseph, the youngest but one, because he was his father's favourite. They went so far in their dislike as to take an opportunity of getting rid of him. They sold him to some merchants, who took him down to Egypt as a slave; and they persuaded their father that he had been killed by a wild beast. The loss of his favourite boy pressed sadly upon the old man. Then came fresh trouble. A famine made its appearance; the comforts of the household were curtailed; even its very existence was threatened. He sends his sons down to Egypt for corn; one of them is detained there by the governor of the country. Another son gone! And now the loss of a third appears but too probable. The same governor refuses to give up the one in custody unless the youngest is sent down—the youngest, so loved, so cherished by the father, that he had not been allowed to accompany his brethren lest evil should befall him by the way! And then, to add to all his other perplexities, on opening the sacks of corn, which his sons had brought from Egypt, they find that all their money has been returned. We can imagine that we see the family party standing round, making the discovery. Famine staring them in the face; strong suspicion of foul play on the part of the Egyptians; the sons pressing hard upon him to send Benjamin down with them to get more corn. What dismay! Helpless and hopeless, the old man exclaims—"All these things are against me!"

But, now, was he right in saying this? Let us consider. What did he mean by his words? Did he mean, "All these things are against my feelings. Here am I, a father, losing my dear children one by one?" We cannot say that this would have been wrong. Or did he mean, "All these things are against my plans of life? Here have I been labouring hard to bring up my large family in comfort and respectability, and they are all being scattered from me, and famine is taking away our comforts, and all the peace and happiness of our home is being destroyed."

Doubtless, some such things as these were in poor Jacob's mind; and we cannot wonder that it should be so. Who can bear to have the feelings of his heart torn by bereavement? Who, that has lost some favourite child, does not know what it is to have, as it were, a sword piercing through the heart? Who can bear to see all the fond plans of life dashed to the ground without some pang? Jacob would not have been a man if he had not felt the pressure of these things. God has given us feelings, and religion does not dry them up. Even Jesus sighed, and Jesus wept.

But still, these words were not right words, not words that should have come, we think, from such a man as Jacob. For, you know, it is not so much the words that we care about as the state of mind that they indicate; and there can be little doubt that these words imply that which we are surprised to see in such a man as Jacob, with all his privileges and all his experience.

And what was this state of mind? Utter perplexity, if not utter despair! Do you not imagine you see the old man, with his long white locks flowing over his shoulders, his arms uplifted, his eyes dropping tears, in the utmost distress, exclaiming, "All these things are against me?"

Now, was this right? Would you not have expected a man like Jacob to have taken his troubles more quietly?—that something should have enabled him to bear up against them more bravely?—more like Abraham, his grandfather, when he was called to leave his home and go into a strange country; more like Eli, when he heard of the death of his sons; more like Job, when he lost his all; more like Christ, of whom Jacob was a type; more like himself on former occasions?

We think so. Still, let us make allowances for the poor old man, as we always must do for persons under great pressure of temptation or affliction. Let us remember that it is a very easy thing to bear other people's troubles, and not such an easy thing to bear our own. Each heart alone really knows its own bitterness.

But, no doubt, Jacob was wrong; and the question is, Where was he wrong? Let us see. I think that it was mainly in this—that, at the time, he was forgetting his relationship to God.

Was he or was he not in covenant with God? Had not God appeared to him, and assured him, several times, of his interest in him? Did not Jacob forget, at the moment, how once he was lying on a plain, with a stone for his pillow, and heard God say, "I am the God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac; and, behold, I am with thee, and will keep thee in all places whithersoever thou goest. The land whereon thou liest, I will give thee. I will not leave thee, till I have done that which I have spoken to thee of?" Did not Jacob forget that he had made an altar of that stone pillow, and upon it had vowed a vow, and said, "If God will be with me, and will keep me in this way that I go, and will give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on, so that I come to my father's house again in peace; then shall the Lord be my God?" Had Jacob forgotten all this? What forgetfulness! If all this had been strongly impressed upon his mind, could he ever have used such words of despair? Did he really believe that God was now going back from his word, and to turn everything against him? And did he not also ignore all his past experience of God's loving-kindness and mercy? Did he not lose sight of the "Angel, who had redeemed him from all evil," and to whom, a few years afterwards, he so touchingly commended his "lads?" No doubt, Jacob, under great pressure of present trouble, either because the clouds hung so thickly around him, or because of some physical weakness, broke down completely in his faith. These words were not the language of faith, but of fear and distrust.

Now let us learn some lessons which this interesting incident is designed to teach us:

First.—Let it be a comfort to God's people under similar circumstances. What candour there is here in the Scripture history! You see it faithfully relates the lives and describes the characters of good men, and does not withhold their faults. If it had done so, it would have given us a very false idea of renewed human nature. These patriarchs were men of like passions as we are. Jacob, though eminently, in the long run, a man of faith, is here represented as failing in his faith, forgetting that he was a stranger and a pilgrim—forgetting God's care. And if this happened to Jacob, do you not think it may sometimes happen to some of us? The children of God must not, therefore, be too hard upon themselves if they find that, now and then, they fail, even in what they think to be their strongest point. You must not be discouraged; you must not be too ready to cast yourselves out of your inheritance. Look at your covenant with God; look at your past experience of his loving-kindness; look at your merciful Saviour, pitying your infirmities and trials; and take your weary soul to him, to pardon your failings, as well as to relieve you of your burden of care. Remember that even David said, "I shall one day perish by the hand of Saul," and that Jacob said, "All these things are against me."

But, at the same time, we must take care to avoid, as far as possible, falling into the same mistake that Jacob did. We must not forget that we are strangers and pilgrims; and therefore that trouble is our portion. We must not forget our relationship to God, and the many precious promises that he has made us. Why, what does St. Paul take occasion to say, respecting this very instance of Jacob, when comforting the Hebrew Christians in their troubles?—"He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee" (Heb. xiii. 5). Who said this? God. And to whom? To Jacob. When? When he was lying, with the stone for his pillow, on the plains of Bethel. And was this said only to Jacob? No, says St. Paul; all true servants of God may confidently take it to themselves. "We may boldly say, The Lord is our helper."

Oh, let us remember that the true child of God is under God's special care. To each good man God says, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." What if things seem to go wrong with him; yet, says God, "Tell the righteous, Surely it shall be well with them that fear the Lord." What if some blessings be withheld, or taken away; yet "no good thing will He withhold from them that walk uprightly." What if all things seem to go against you; they only seem: "all things work together for good to them that love God." No worldly trouble is against the Christian's real and best interests. It is not against God's plans for your happiness, and your eventual security. It is not against your faith, your growth in grace, and your preparedness for heaven. If we are God's true children, we may safely put all the affairs of our soul and body into his hands; and rest satisfied that he will do all things well. For "if God be for us, what can be against us?"

And let us not fail to observe how completely Jacob was mistaken in what he said. Not only was he wrong in sentiment, but he was also wrong in fact. "Joseph is not," he said, meaning he is dead. Was he dead? No; while his father was bemoaning him, Joseph was alive and well, high in rank in the land of Egypt. "Simeon is not," he says. Was he dead, or even lost? No; he was being taken care of, and was soon going to be restored. I think that Jacob must have felt somewhat humbled afterwards, when he found that all turned out so very differently from what he expected. What must have been his feelings when he said to Joseph, "I had not thought to see thy face!"

Ah! we are all very apt both to make our own troubles, and to exaggerate those that God is pleased to send us. Trouble is truly compared to a cloud. When we are in it, it bewilders us, we lose our right judgment of things. When it has passed away, we wonder how we could have taken such wrong views.

The things that Jacob thought were working against him, were really all working for him. Joseph was taken from him to be made ruler of Egypt. The famine was sent to take him down to Joseph. Many of the wheels of a great machine may seem to be going the reverse way of its action; when, without such movements, the machine would not go at all. And so with many of the crosses and sorrows of life; if a Christian were without them, he would lose some of the richest blessings that God designs for him. And, whatever we may say in this world, there can be no doubt that in another world there will be no bewilderment, and no dissatisfaction with God's providence. There will be only praise and thankfulness, when we see "all the way by which he has led us;" and how "he has done all things well."

Now, we have been speaking of one of the greatest blessings that a man can possibly have in this world—peace, comfort, and support amidst the troubles of life. There is all this provided for God's faithful people. Suppose that any one who reads this feels that he is not one of God's faithful people. Suppose that, by open sin, or utter indifference and carelessness about God and religion, your conscience tells you that you are no friend of God. What then? Can you expect to enjoy these blessings, so long as you are in such a position? I fear not. For "all things work together for good"—to whom? to the wicked? to careless men and women, who set God at defiance, and laugh at everything that is good? No; but "to them that love God." Can you say that you love God, or that you wish to do so? The great business of every one is to see that he does this. And why not love God? Why love sin, or the world, or anything else, rather than God? God loves you, and wishes to do everything for you. Oh, set your heart the right way! Like the prodigal son, turn to your Father. Bring all your past sin to your Saviour, fully owning it, and condemning yourself for it, and then claim God as your reconciled Father, through Jesus Christ. Then, with such a Father and such a Friend, what is there that you will possibly want in this world or the next?

TATTLING.

TO speak no slander—no, nor listen to it," such was the injunction of King Arthur to his knights. Such, too, is the principle on which alone people must conduct themselves who would escape the bite of the weapon which cuts deeper than a sword—viz., a tattling tongue, and who would for their own part live in perfect charity with all men.

There is authority even greater than King Arthur against tattling. Our Lord and all his apostles condemn it as a mischievous and harmful habit, which injures both the speaker and him spoken of, and surely the experience of the world—ay, and the experience of every individual man—fully testify to the wisdom of the condemnation. Who does not know, out of his own experience, the sort of persons mentioned by the Apostle Paul in his letter to Timothy, those who "learn to be idle, wandering about from house to house; and not only idle, but tattlers also and busybodies, speaking things which they ought not?" Truly, a dangerous class, as powerful for evil to the mental peace and to the reputation of man or woman, as a poisonous open sewer is to their bodily health. They are they who are spoken of by Mrs. Brown-ing, in "Aurora Leigh,"—people who

"Cut your morning up
To mince-meat of the very smallest talk,
Then help to sugar their bores at night
With your reputation."

It must be supposed that if people really knew, or even gave themselves to think seriously about, the harm a chance word, an ungrateful expression, or an uncertified report, is capable of doing, they would not—nay, they could not—be so ready to tell and hear some new thing. "She is a very good sort of person in her way, but——" Well, that but is, more often than not, the initial word of a sentence so damaging, as not only to nullify the spare praise given in the first instance, but even to go far beyond, and eat away name, character—all the most precious belongings of her spoken of. Almost always this damaging part of the speech is uttered on the faith of what somebody has said, that "somebody else" having heard it from another, and not having suffered it to diminish in the repeating. Rarely it happens that it is spoken from the personal knowledge of the speaker. Where it is so, the charge is made in more absolute terms, and there is no "damning with faint praise" by way of prelude. Where it is not so, the speaker, if taxed with carelessness in repeating an unwarranted tale, will take refuge in the assertion, "I had it from So-and-so," as if that made any difference. The injury caused by the poison of a serpent is as destructive when injected at second-hand, as when fresh from the reptile's fang; and it could never be admitted as an excuse for the poisoner, that he was not the originator of the deadly stuff he used. The effect is well stated in the oft-quoted words of Iago, truthful, though spoken by a villain :

"He that flitches from me my good name
Robs me of that which not enriches him,
And makes me poor indeed."

Half the time it is due to thoughtlessness, or to a want of power to connect cause and effect, that tattling goes on, it may be to the blasting of a woman's reputation, to the commencement of the ruin of a man's credit, but certainly to the promotion of a dearth of "Christian charity under the sun." In cases where the evil tongue can be traced, the victim of its poison has a remedy at law; but how rarely can the originator of a rumour be traced! how impossible it is to point to one of many streams, and say that one in particular is the parent of yonder river! Besides, the law gives no remedy against the listener to slander, and as it is certain there would not be thieves if there were not any receivers of stolen goods, so tattling, "speaking things which they ought not," would not go on if there were no one to listen. The principle enunciated by King Arthur goes further than the principle of our law, and includes in the same condemnation the speaker and the hearer. How different would all societies of men and women be, how much better and happier, if all the members of them would but stop a tale-bearer on the threshold of his story and ask him, "Are you about to speak from your own knowledge? Have you good ground for believing what you are about to state?" Better still would it be, if both speaker and hearer would govern themselves by the principle on which our existing law of libel is founded, and which will not admit the truth of the libel as an excuse for uttering it, unless the defendant can show that, besides being true, it was for the general advantage that the truth should be known. Surely there are charges enough against individual persons, which the public is concerned to know, without dragging into the light those many more which are not of the least importance to the generality. Let a man's sin find him out—as it must do—without your help, and if he can atone for it to those he has injured, and get rid of the moral stain by recourse to God's grace, why should you presume to punish him by publishing his fault, and perhaps set a stumbling-block in the way of your weak brother to repentance? And as of a man's sins, so of his minor faults—bridle the tongue and check the ear in reference to them, lest you, too, fall into condemnation, and find that lack of charity uncovers the multitude of sins. Even when the slander spoken is true, all this and much more can be said against the repetition of it; but when it is false—as in the majority of cases—there are not words strong enough to castigate those who utter it. Slander is a social curse, a very evil disease, and there is no practice so liable to propagate it, and to prevent all endeavours to make it die out, as the idle habit against which every one should prayerfully guard—the habit of "having talks," or tattling.

FRANCIS W. ROWSELL.

THE PRISONER'S DOG.

CARLO, amico! I rejoice
To hear the sad, half-human voice
Of you, my morning guest;
I have no feast for you to share,
Another master's badge you wear—
But yet you love me best.

A prison seldom is a place
To see a friend's endearing face:
But friends as true as you
Would come at dawn, or with the stars,
And whisper to me through the bars,
"Believe that we are true!"

This cell of mine—except your moan—
Ne'er echoed to a loving tone,
Save ere one went to die—
During the last hour of his life,
'Twas here they brought his girlish wife,
To say a last good-bye.

And often, in the twilight dim,
When the far-distant convent hymn
Comes softly on the air,

Methinks two shadowy forms I see,
A noble, stalwart man was he—
They say that she was fair.

And some day—still in manhood's pride—
The deadly block I'll kneel beside:
I wish the time were nigh!
But no dear lip will press my cheek—
A long farewell—too long to speak,
With watchful gaolers by!

Round my old home the sunshine plays,
But new feet tread the ancient ways,
Strange eyes my harvests see:
And Jessa hath another wed,
And even mid my household dead
No place is kept for me!

My faithful dog alone returns,
To lick the hand that never spurns,
Although it cannot feed:
And yet I feel a wondrous calm,— Methinks God keeps his sweetest balm
For hours of blankest need.

L. FRYER.

(Drawn by T. B. WIRGMAN.)

"And whisper to me through the bars,
"Believe that we are true."—p. 648.

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

"I SEE! YOU COULD DO NOTHING!"

ALPH CARLTON, Esq., of Carlton Villa, Newbury, so ran his address, was by this time an independent gentleman, and held his profession with a loose grasp. He had been very successful all his life—had made money, as the people of Newbury said, and had married money. And now, though he attended at his office a part of the day, when he was not hunting, or shooting, or paying visits, or riding for the benefit of his health, yet it was pretty generally understood that the actual work of the establishment devolved on his partner, Mr. Sowerby.

Mr. Sowerby was in his place morning, noon, and night; indeed, it would have been a serious matter if he had not.

But some of the old clients, especially the titled ones, and those holding a high position in the county, rather demurred to Mr. Sowerby. They had been used to Carlton, they said, and they insisted on opening their cases to him, and to him alone. Mr. Carlton bore these demands on his patience with his usual blandness. It would come right in time, he observed, smilingly, to Mr. Sowerby.

He had been shut up all the morning with a spendthrift lord, who had been recklessly scheming to rackrent his tenantry. The sun shone, and his constitutional ride was slow of attainment. But he could not turn his noble client over to Mr. Sowerby.

The noble client was gone at last, and Mr. Carlton gave a sigh of relief. The sky was still blue and tempting, and a part of the morning remained. He had taken up his hat and gloves, and was preparing to depart, when in came the clerk.

"If you please, sir, the lady who has been waiting—"

"Oh, I cannot see any one else to-day, Rogers!" said the lawyer, drawing on his gloves. "Mr. Sowerby is within, I suppose?"

"Yes, sir; but—this is her card, sir," added the clerk, presenting it.

Mr. Carlton ran his eye over it, and began hastily to pull off his gloves, his face expressive of the utmost concern.

"Miss Sylvester! Why in the world didn't you tell me? Where is she?"

"She has been waiting in the office, sir."

"In the office—the common office? Miss Sylvester?"

"There was nowhere else, sir," said the clerk, respectfully.

"Oh, dear! oh, dear! Only to think of it!" cried Mr. Carlton, in a tone of extreme annoyance. "I would not have had it happen, on any account whatever! Show her in directly, Rogers—directly!"

For him, calm and phlegmatic as his nature was, Mr. Carlton was in a fuss.

He had only time to dispose of his hat and gloves, draw a chair to the fire, for Alice, of course, when there was a footstep outside the door, and then she came in.

Mr. Carlton held up both his hands. "My dear Miss Sylvester, if I had but known—how could I imagine that it was you? And what is the matter?"

She was very pale, and her face had that set, rigid look, it was apt to wear in these days. Though he drew the chair forward, and pointed to it, she did not sit down; she came and stood by the fire.

"I wanted to speak to you," she began, in a low, earnest tone.

"I am sure I shall be very happy; but, pray be seated," said the polite lawyer. "I am sure you do me a great honour."

"I will not sit down. I feel as if I could say what I have to say better standing."

There was the same low, suppressed tone. The corners of the mouth tightened. Some high pressure was upon her. Knowing what he did of the history of the Sylvesters, he could guess what it was.

"As you please," replied he, still politely. "I am all attention."

Now she had gained admission to his presence, and he was there opposite, ready to listen to what she had to say, the communication seemed as if likely to be checked. She was silent a few moments, the muscles of her face worked painfully. It was evidently very hard to bring the subject which pressed upon her mind before him.

He thought he would help her a little.

"Nothing has happened at home, I hope?" he asked. "All are quite well?"

She started as from a momentary fit of abstraction. "Oh, yes, quite well, I thank you. Mr. Carlton," and her beautiful eyes, shining with earnestness, were fixed upon him, "I want you to do something for me."

"What is it, Miss Sylvester?"

"It is this," she replied, in the same suppressed tone. "I hardly know how to put the idea into suitable words, for I have had so little to do with matters of business; but is there not"—a flush dyed her cheek as she said it—"some money coming to me when I shall be of age?"

"A little, there is, yes, and I am glad of it," said the lawyer, complacently.

She came a step or two nearer. Her eye sparkled, and her cheek glowed with some inward excitement.

"What I want you to do for me is to let me have that money now."

He looked at her in blank astonishment.

"I know it seems strange," she continued, hurriedly; "but I have an urgent reason for wishing it—very urgent, indeed!"

"But, my dear Miss Sylvester, of course, it could not be thought of," began the lawyer.

"Why should it not be thought of?" asked she, with a touch of the Sylvester ring in her voice.

"Why? Oh, for every reason. In the first place, it would not be legal. The money is not yours till you are twenty-one."

"But you can arrange that for me," and she came nearer still, and spoke still more eagerly. "I know you will. You are an old friend; you have been connected with our family for years and years before I can remember. Oh, I am sure you will do it!"

Her pleading tone, the earnest look in her eyes, her varying colour, showed that some powerful motive was at work.

A few vague suggestions floated through the lawyer's mind; but none of them were quite tangible. "Except that they are going to ruin as fast as they can go," thought he, "that is tangible enough!"

"You will do it," continued Alice, still standing before him. "I do not ask how. I put the matter in your hands; only, I beg of you, let me have the money!"

Lady Sylvester, in dignified ease, was reclining in her carriage. The pomp and glory of the Sylvesters were rolling abroad that fine sunshiny morning. Raymond, on his high-bred hunter, was pricking forward, in company with a few of the notabilities of the county. If poverty was stealing a march upon them, at least they ignored the knowledge of it. They set their faces like a flint against the coming ruin! Only from the lips of Alice, there issued the ominous words—

"I beg of you, let me have the money!"

He was very sorry for her, this bland lawyer, who could pleasantly finger his thousands. He admired her extremely, and would have done anything, as he said, in reason. But her request had no more effect upon him, as regarded any practical purpose, than if it had been spoken to the winds. It was altogether outrageous, and not to be thought of for a moment.

"What shall you have to live upon—excuse the question, Miss Sylvester, seeing it is rather important—if that money goes?" he asked, when he had a little recovered from his astonishment.

"Is that your only objection, Mr. Carlton?" said she, quickly.

"No, it is only one amongst a great many. But it stares one in the face, you know. Of course, you naturally wish to keep up your position."

"No, I don't. I don't wish it at all!"

She spoke impulsively, and with all the ring in her voice. He rubbed his hand over his head, and was silent. The expression of his face seemed to say that wonders would never cease.

"You need not consider me in any way," continued Alice, still impetuously. "I can do without the money."

He looked up now, in more blank astonishment still. "What shall you do?" he asked, in a tone of wonder.

"I shall work!"

"Work?"

What, from the lips of a Sylvester. Work! He could hardly believe his senses.

"And if I cannot work, I will starve!" There was a despairing energy in the tone of her voice, that startled him. "Yes," she repeated, "I will starve!"

He rubbed his head five minutes, at least, before he could think of any form of speech to meet a case so unparalleled. When he had left off rubbing, he said—

"Indeed, Miss Sylvester, you must excuse my being quite unprepared for such a disclosure."

She smiled sadly. She had thrown aside her muff, and the gloved fingers were interlacing each other with a nervous restlessness which had become habitual of late.

"Yes, quite unprepared," continued Mr. Carlton, blandly; "indeed, to say the truth, I was never more surprised in my life."

The resolute look came into her face again. The mouth tightened, the eyes were hard and set. She thought he was trifling with her, and the matter was so urgent. The happiness or misery of a fellow-creature was bound up with it. She was not like the rest of the Sylvesters, who could trample these things under their feet.

He saw the look, for he had been watching her narrowly. He was a keen observer, and he read her thoughts as though they had been written in a book. He admired her greatly. It was not often in his province to meet with a character like hers.

"I cannot meet your wishes," he said, at length, in a tone of some regret; "added to which, you have not given me your confidence, Miss Sylvester. In plain English, what do you want the money for?"

The vivid colour mounted to her cheek, and dyed her forehead; the sense of intolerable shame cut into her very soul. She would not tell him. Oh, no! her lips could never utter words, every one of which was a sting and reproach to her and hers!

Again he read her thoughts as though they had been written. He knew her history too well to be in much perplexity, and he said, in a low tone, and as gently as he could, "Is it to pay some debt?"

He had touched the chord that was so sensitive. The colour came again more vivid than ever, and then it faded. She sat down, and covered her face with her hands.

"My dear young lady," said the lawyer, kindly, "pray don't take it so to heart! None of these things have been brought about by any fault of yours; you must take comfort from that reflection."

She raised her head with a passionate gesture. The consciousness of the position in which she and hers were placed, was gnawing at her heart.

He was thinking, all the while, how beautiful she was, and that she was young, and life was before her, and that many things might happen to avert the fate which seemed impending.

"She must marry well," he thought—and the idea tended greatly to his comfort—"marry well, and with money!"

As for being the party to any act by which her future might be damaged, he had no intention of the kind.

"Once and for all, no!" said he, in reply to her further entreaties. "Let me assure you, that you can do nothing—nothing whatever!"

"Then you refuse to help me?" exclaimed she, rising hastily.

"Most certainly I do."

She turned to go; the hot tears were gushing to her eyes.

He would have detained her. He was glad he had been firm, but he fancied he could soothe down her feelings—that he could reason with her, and pacify her. But he could not.

She went away almost directly. Very soon she was in the street, walking towards her home. She had drawn down her veil, so that no one could see the flushed cheek and the quivering mouth. She was resolved what to do. She would put from her, for ever, the false pomp and pretentiousness which did but add to their shame. She would set at nought prejudice, and the old rotten customs that, like manacles, had held her in. She would work; yes, she would work!

She loathed the miserable ease in which they sat, and waited for their doom. Not for this had Heaven given her youth, and strength, and energy. Yes, she would work, no matter at what! The humblest employment seemed to her an inestimable boon. The commonest working woman, who trudged along the pavement, appeared noble by the side of the Sylvesters! As she hurried onwards, some one spoke to her.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Sylvester, for stopping you, but I want to know if you have done anything for me?"

The voice was that of John Humphreys; the haggard, beseeching eyes were his.

She walked a few steps without speaking. He walked beside her. There was no question of dignity, or of precedence. Here were two human beings whose cup of misery was full.

"Because you are my only hope," he continued; "I've kept off telling her, till I'd seen you, and I've been walking about the streets for hours and hours! I want to know if you have done anything for me?"

She did not speak. He knew what her silence meant. Yet he kept up with her, step by step. Once, she made a little movement as if she were about to speak.

"Yes?" said he, eagerly, as though she had already addressed him, "yes?"

Not a word came from her lips, but partly in pity, partly in her own cruel perplexity, she turned her face towards him.

He saw her face through the veil. In that one look was revealed to him the whole of what she was suffering—the entire hopelessness there was for her, and for him! "Ah!" exclaimed he; "I see! I see! you could do nothing!"

CHAPTER XXIX.

"IF IT DOES BUT LAST."

RACHEL HUMPHREYS had had rather a trying day of it. Not that her husband had told her any of his troubles. He had kept a bold front so far. Perhaps the calm and happy atmosphere of home had so soothing an influence, that, when he came into it, the lines on his forehead were smoothed, and the haggard look went out of his eyes. At all events, up to the present moment, beyond an occasional cloud, which sailed across her summer sky and disappeared, Rachel had no intimation of the evil days that were coming.

Her trials had proceeded from the fact that her husband's mother had, for the first time, condescended to pay her a visit.

Rachel had made great preparations to do the old lady honour. She had a fire lighted in the best room, and the best china reached out, and had put on her wedding-gown, all at the instigation of John.

"I should like my mother to see the best side of us, Rachel," he had said.

"I suppose I must go and drink tea with this girl John has chosen to marry!" was the old lady's observation, not to John, of course, but to a confidential friend and neighbour.

In due time she came. Rachel met her at the door. She was determined to do all she could to create some better kind of understanding between herself and Dame Humphreys.

"I am very glad to see you. It is kind of you to come," said Rachel, and offering her hand.

The old lady barely touched the tips of Rachel's fingers. "Ah, yes! I promised John I would come. Of course I owed a duty to John!"

Rachel felt a little chill creeping over her; but she was resolved not to yield.

She ushered the old lady into the room, with its blazing fire, and polished furniture, where all was clean, and bright, and orderly. Dame Humphreys glanced round, and then gave a little sniff, a habit peculiar to her.

"We have got quite settled, you see," said Rachel, cheerfully, and with a little pride, too, in her new home.

"Ah, yes, I see! A nice thing for you," replied the old woman.

Rachel coloured, she could not help it, for she was as sensitive as any lady.

"Poor John has done his best," continued Dame Humphreys, with another glance round. "Well, I am sure I hope you may be happy, and that it will last!"

"Thank you," said Rachel, colouring again.

She next took the old lady up-stairs. The bedroom was cheerful, and cleanly, and bright, as the room below. There were muslin curtains to the windows, and the quilt was of snowy whiteness, and everywhere was diffused the fragrance of fresh air and lavender.

The old lady sniffed again. "John thought he'd begin grand, with his fine house!" said she.

"Not fine, only comfortable and pleasant," said Rachel, gently. "See what a nice view there is from the window;" and she went to raise the blind.

"Thank you, I don't care about views," said Dame Humphreys, who was untying her bonnet-strings with a jerk. "There's enough for me to see in-doors."

Rachel withdrew from the window. She was hurt and vexed; but she had not practised self-control all these years, that it should fail her now. She made no reply, but assisted Dame Humphreys to unrobe.

When she and her visitor returned to the parlour, the best china was on the table, and the kettle was sending out a stream of vapour. There was another kind of fragrance now, that of hot cakes and buttered toast.

"We shall not begin without John. He will be here directly," said Rachel, as she put the tea in the pot.

"Ah, poor John!"

Rachel made a quick turn of her head, as if she were going to say something hasty; but she restrained herself, and was silent. When she had set the tea to brew, she took up her work.

Dame Humphreys looked round with a sniff; but as there was really nothing to find fault about, she was obliged to be silent.

Rachel was very glad, when, as she watched at the window, John's well-known figure appeared in the distance. He was coming up the field, but he did not walk so briskly as usual. He held his head down, and as he came nearer Rachel could see how pale and jaded he looked. Various floating suspicions had been in her mind about him of late. Now, all in a moment, they assumed a definite form.

"I am sure something is the matter, she thought; and almost directly she had slipped out of the room, and had gone to meet him.

He was at the gate by this time, and when he saw her, his face brightened. It was the old, dear, familiar smile that, come when she would, never failed to greet her.

She put her arm in his, and they walked up the garden together.

"John, I am sure you are very tired. Where have you been to?"

"Only out on business, Rachel, and I am tired." He sighed as he said it.

"Is anything the matter, John?"

The question came as quick as could be.

He did not reply to her, except by a question, as Rachel said, wholly irrelevant to the purpose.

"Is my mother here, Rachel?"

"Yes, John. But——"

"Then how came you to leave her? Pray go in at once."

He spoke sharply, more so than he had ever done before.

Rachel's feelings had been rather jarred upon, as we know, and the tears came into her eyes.

When he saw the tears his face softened. He stooped down and kissed her forehead. As he did so, he said, in a voice more full of emotion than it was wont to be, "God bless you, my own darling!"

Then the husband and wife parted. Rachel went back to Dame Humphreys, and John took himself off to make himself, as he said, fit for his mother to see him. His toilette took him a long time—much longer than usual. Rachel tried to convince herself that the time was more tedious on account of the tête-à-tête she was obliged to have with Dame Humphreys.

He came down at last, and then he seemed so like himself that Rachel's surmises and suspicions began to dissipate like vapours in the sun. He was very glad to see his mother, and being thoroughly used to her ways of thinking and speaking, he was not in danger of being hurt as Rachel had been.

Her cue, during the rest of the evening was, to pity him incessantly. "Poor John!" and "My poor boy!" were constantly on her lips. And another expression, too, she used that did not leave him so scatheless: "I wish it may last!"

When his mother said this, John would change colour a little; and once, his hand shook as he handed her a cup of tea, performing this act in the midst of her speech. His hand shook so much that the tea was spilt.

Rachel thought he was vexed. She herself attached no more importance to this observation, than she did to any other that came from Dame Humphreys.

By-and-by it was time for Mrs. Humphreys to go home, and then John fetched his hat and his comforter, and prepared to escort her. As he tied the comforter round his neck, he whispered to Rachel—

"I shall not be long. You'll sit up?"

"Sit up, of course she would! How could he think any otherwise!"

When he was gone, she put a fresh log on the fire to keep it up. Then she sat down before it, and the light shone and flickered on her smooth hair and calm, happy face: for she was quite happy now, and calm as ever. The small, venomous stings she had been called on to endure were but for a moment; not for long could they ruffle the deep, underlying serenity of her life!

She thought her lot had indeed fallen to her in pleasant places, that she had a goodly heritage!

Poor Rachel!

Her husband's step was, even now, turned towards his home. When he got there, he meant to tell her what had happened. Presently she heard him coming, and she rose and drew back the bolt, which she had fastened for greater security. Then, as it was cold, she went back to the fire, and stood before it, waiting till he should have locked and barred the door.

He had soon done that, and had hung up his cap, and taken off his comforter. It was the one atom of respite granted her, and no more, not a single moment longer. It was coming on her quick as thought!

"John—dear John! what is the matter?"

For, now the restraint was over, he could bear it no longer. He had striven hard to keep up before his mother, and had succeeded. The old lady had gone to bed in a state of as blissful ignorance as when she rose from it. But he could do no more. He was ashy pale; his face, in its weariness and haggardness, seemed as if suddenly ploughed up with care and sorrow. He sat down, and looked at her with a strange blank look that frightened her.

She was by his side in a moment. She had put her hand on his shoulder. All her misgivings started into vivid, actual life. The ground seemed to tremble under her feet.

Yet, whatever it was, this nameless, mysterious evil, she could bear it, if he could. She would not be the one to fail or faint. Her courage rose, as it always does in these brave natures, when it was needed.

By this time he had recovered a little. He had been planning, again and again, what word she should use, and had wearied himself with speculations as to how she would bear it. He might have saved himself the trouble. The whole matter resolved itself into a few words. He wondered at the little time, the small amount of skill, it took to say them.

She was still standing close by him. As he spoke he had slipped his arm round her. He expected her to start, and to tremble, and perhaps cry out at the downfall of her prosperity; but she did not. When he had finished telling her, he looked up.

Yes, there she stood, brave and true-hearted as ever. There was a tear on her cheek, and she was a little pale; but her eye never shone with a brighter, kindlier lustre. She stooped down and kissed him.

"My husband, why did you not tell me this before?"

He was so rejoiced to hear her speak, to see her smile, to feel that the worst was over, and the burden shared, and that she had not failed, or given way before the advancing tide of evil, that he wept for very thankfulness.

She wept, too, for a few moments. It was a relief thus to give vent to the new feelings that had come upon her with such suddenness. But she soon dried her tears. Hers was not a weeping temperament.

Still standing by him, his loving helpmeet, his faithful friend, she began calmly to discuss the matter. If he had so misjudged her unselfish nature as to fancy he would have to persuade, to soothe, to argue her into compliance with what he was about to do, he soon found he had been mistaken. She had not been well tried and disciplined in the school of life all these years, that such should be the result. Oh, no! He felt, from the first, that he had been a fool not to trust her sooner.

He told her everything. The relief to his own mind was greater than he could have believed. And he asked her how she could bear it, if this new home had to be taken away, and the farm sold.

She stooped down, and kissed him again.

"We can make another home," she said, "and quite as happy as this is."

"But it won't be such a good home, Rachel. We shall be poor people compared to what we are now."

"It is the hand of the diligent that maketh rich," she said, with a smile.

"Ah, Rachel! I know you are one of a thousand," said he, despondingly; "but to have the ground rent from under one by a swindler, and by——"

"John," said she, interrupting him, "we will not think of that. If we do, we shall never rise above our misfortunes. We must just be brave, dear, and do our utmost to retrieve that one mistake. It will be retrieved in time."

"Do you think it will, Rachel?"

"Oh, yes, and I am so thankful!" here the tears gushed forth again.

"Thankful for what, Rachel?"

"Thankful that nothing worse has happened, dear. Sickness might have come, or separation. When I saw how ill you looked, my mind jumped to a hundred conclusions, every one of which was worse than this."

"Rachel!" and he caught her to his arms, "you are my good angel! As long as I have you, I care for nothing!"

"And as long as I have you!" she said.

(To be continued.)

THE DOCTOR'S APPLE.

THE Greek class was over in the school-room—the boys were beginning to gather their books together to put them by for the afternoon—when Dr. Markham, rapping on the desk before him, called for silence.

"Boys," he said, pleasantly, "we have just been reading in our Greek mythology the story of Paris and the three goddesses, and how they scrambled for the apple. Well, I'm going to roll an apple in amongst all of you now, and you'll have to fight and push very hard to see who can pick it up; but you must not allow it to become an apple of discord. To-morrow there is to be a grand fête given in the Alderseley Gardens, some ten miles off: Professor Horsemann is to make his first ascent in his large balloon, and there are to be fireworks in the evening. Now, I can take one of you boys with me to this fête, and only one; and, as I don't like to single out any of you in particular, I have determined that you shall fight for the privilege in fair and open warfare, with brains for your cudgels and pens for your swords. You shall, each of you who wish to go, write me an essay, in poetry, on the subject of the fête, the balloon ascent, &c. &c.—the first class to make their attempt in Latin verse, and the lower classes in English. As to-day is a half-holiday, and you have plenty of spare time, I shall expect these papers to be finished and given up to me this evening at supper-time; and I shall judge each paper according to the age of the author, and the opportunities he has had for improving himself."

It was evident, from the buzz, and clapping, and row which followed this announcement in the school-room, that there would be a great scuffle for Dr. Markham's apple; but, outside in the playground, when the boys congregated together to talk the matter over, there were not a few ungenerous enough to say, with a sneer, "Young Markham, of course, will be the one chosen. It's a mere farce setting us to work, when the doctor knows quite well who he intends to take;" and one or two, who knew they had no chance, added, that "they wished Tall Graham would put on steam, and send up a set of verses, as he well could, which would compel the doctor to take the apple, for once in his life, out of his son's mouth."

Now, all these remarks were decidedly ungenerous, as well as unjust. Young Markham was the doctor's son—his only son—and he might easily have given the vacant place in his carriage to him without calling forth indignation, or being accused of showing partiality or favouritism. But Dr. Markham was nervously sensitive about ever extending any favour to his son which he could not grant to the rest of the boys in the school, especially as his position of master was rendered doubly difficult by the fact that young Markham, though a very small boy, and the youngest in his class, was, without doubt, the cleverest and most hard-working boy in the school; and if, in selecting the nature of the competition, the doctor had erred in justice towards any one, it was towards this very son, as a defective ear in versification was the difficulty young Markham had most to struggle against.

Notwithstanding these ill-natured remarks, which were whispered freely among the boys, the struggle for the apple began. Foolscap paper, pens, ink, and books were eagerly sought for; and, instead of the game of cricket, which was to have been held in the playground, all the quietest nooks in the house and garden were taken speedy possession of, to give the young idea space to shoot.

Big Graham—or "The Giant," as the boys called him—carried off his paper to the furthest corner of the ground. He was determined to put out all his strength this time. He knew right well he could make good Latin verses if he chose; but the slightest noise or bustle put him out; so he seated himself beneath a hawthorn-tree, with his back to the hedge, and set to work.

After a time, he grew impatient: it was, perhaps, the effect of over-anxiety; but somehow, this evening, he did not seem capable of turning a single verse to his satisfaction, or grasping any very first-rate idea. He wrote, and scratched out, and began again—but all in vain—each line he scribbled down seemed worse than the one before. The first hour was gone by, and not even one simile was caught and pinned to the paper. At this rate, Markham, faulty as he was in his verses, would certainly outstrip him. He had seen the look of steady determination on the little boy's pale face as he carried off his paper and pen, and with each moment of lost time his fears of Markham's success redoubled.

At length he stood up in disgust, and threw his papers on the grass away from him. He thought, perhaps, if he looked over the hedge-row into the lane, he might find a new position give a new turn to his ideas; so he leaned across the sweet-smelling may-bushes, and vaguely turned dactyls and spondees in his mind; but still all in vain: the divine afflatus refused to descend upon his head.

He had stood there half an hour, staring straight before him, when he heard a step on the road, and looking round suddenly, saw Waters, the village schoolmaster, coming down the lane, with some books and a cotton umbrella under his arm. He nodded respectfully to Graham, as he noticed his long neck above the hedge, and passed on.

"Waters," cried Graham, struck by a sudden thought, "come back; I want to speak to you, You are no end of a swell at Latin verses, are you not?"

Waters turned back, flattered by the question, and replied, with feigned humility, "Ay, ay, in a kind of a small way, I am; but nothing to you young gentlemen."

"Nonsense! I know better; and I'm in terrible want of a helping hand just now. I've been trying these two hours to make some plaguy verses on a balloon, and fireworks, and all that kind of thing; and I can't make a decent line—or even catch an idea. Here, look at what I've been doing."

"I don't find fault with your ideas, sir," said the old man, looking over Graham's paper; "but the rhythm is bad."

"Well, could not you show me how to make it better? Just a hint or two, to set me going. I'm hard up for time."

"I'm returning home to my dinner now, sir; but, if you'll let me take it with me, I'll just run my eye over it, and bring it back in an hour or so."

Graham hesitated a moment, and then, overcome by the sudden temptation, yielded his paper into the old man's hands. "I'll wait for you here," he said, hurriedly; "only don't be long; some of the fellows might come this way, and wonder what I was doing."

Waters put the paper in his pocket, and, walking fast, was soon out of sight, while Graham sat down again beneath the tree to wait for him; but, even before the sound of the footsteps had died away, a creeping doubt as to the honesty of his act had stolen into Graham's mind, and, by the uneasy way he tore the heads off the dandelions, and snapped at the spears of grass beside him, it was easy to see that, as he awaited Waters's return, the doubt was fast growing into conviction.

But he was not given long for reflection. The schoolmaster, pleased with his literary effort, hurried back to the place of tryst, and handed the paper across the hedge with a satisfied smile.

Graham could not, he thought, refuse to take it back now: it would look so babyish, and as if a fellow did not know his own mind; so he read it over, and said, as he finished it, "First-rate! The very thing I wanted! You've hit it off to a T! Thank you, Waters; you're a brick!"

"Not at all, sir. I'm glad you're pleased."

"I think it's tip-top! Good evening."

And Graham, putting the paper into his pocket, sauntered home. He met no one in the playground, so he went up to his own room, and bolted the door.

There was an hour still before the supper-bell would ring; and Graham, uneasy and dispirited, said to himself, he would alter the whole poem again and take his chance. But deceit, unless it is rooted out at the first moment, puts forth a thousand shoots. Graham found it far more difficult than he expected to make any vital change in Waters's composition, and he had not time to make an entirely new one. He worked over it, and sighed over it, till within ten minutes of the supper-time. Then the thought of the balloon and fireworks came upon him with terrible force, and in those ten minutes Waters's composition was copied out in a fair hand and folded up for the doctor's inspection.

The morning came, bright and clear, promising a lovely day for the balloon ascent. The essays had all been left with the doctor the night before; and nearly every heart in the school held some trembling hope that the treat would fall to their lot.

"Boys," said the master, when they were all marshalled before him, and he had taken a folded paper from his pocket, "it is pleasant in a case like this, when I see you are all equally desirous to go, not to be distracted by anxious doubts as to whose essay was really the best. I expected, I confess, to have had some difficulty in deciding; but I find one paper so decidedly above the average, I cannot but express my delight with it, as well as congratulate the author."

Poor Markham half started up—the flush of anticipated success rose already in his face, when his father continued—

"Graham, this essay of yours" (he unfolded the paper as he spoke) "is a credit to you. I only hope, now that you have shown what you are capable of doing, you will continue to work as well."

It was now Graham's turn to colour, and a deep red blush spread over his whole face as he took the paper back from the doctor's hands.

"Keep your essay, Graham," added his master, kindly. "I would like your father, when you return home, to see what progress you have made. And now, as we must make an early start, you had better go up and get ready."

Graham did keep the paper, but only till he got to his own room, and then he tore it into a thousand fragments and threw them into the grate.

"Show it to my father!" he cried, bitterly; "why, I shall be ashamed even to show him my face. I won't go to the place at all, and there's an end of it. I don't think, in all my life, I ever felt so wretched."

Graham spoke the truth—he was thoroughly miserable. He had passed a long, wakeful night, torn with remorse for his deceitful act, and the dread of confessing it to his master; for he knew quite well he must either go through with the one, or make up his mind to the humiliation of the other. The doctor had said the prize apple was to be struggled for in fair and open warfare; and how had he obtained it?—by treachery and deceit.

He made no effort to arrange his toilet for the coming fête, but sat stupidly on the corner of his bed, till the wheels of the carriage outside, and the opening of his room door, startled him from his painful reverie.

"Graham, why aren't you ready? Father has gone down stairs already. Here, I brought you my telescope: you'll be able to follow the balloon no end of a distance. But make haste, or you'll be late."

"I'm not going," replied Graham, gruffly.

"Not going? Nonsense! Why not?"

"I won't go. Your essay was a thousand times better than mine."

"How can you talk such rubbish, Graham?"

"It's not rubbish; it's the truth. And if you want to hear more truth, you shall. I did not write that essay at all,"—he pointed to the fragments scattered on the hearthstone. "It was Waters, the schoolmaster, wrote it. I did not intend to be a sneak, but I have been one; and you may go down and tell your father so; for I won't go; and he may give me any punishment he likes."

Markham grew very pale. He walked over to the window, and looked down at the carriage, and at the horses, which were pawing the ground beneath. "Shall I really go down and tell father? Do you wish me to do so, Graham?" he asked, turning slowly round, as if from a painful struggle.

"Yes," replied Graham, almost sullenly; "and the rest of the fellows, while you are about it."

And Markham left the room, with what seemed to his unhappy companion, a too willing alacrity.

But he was a long time absent, and when he returned he was accompanied by his father.

"Graham," said the doctor, very gravely, but with a certain mixture of kindness, "I have heard the confession you have just made, and also your willingness to suffer whatever punishment I may choose to inflict. I left the choice of that punishment in my son's hands, and he has chosen rightly—that you should accompany me to Alderseley."

"Oh, father! don't put it that way," said young Markham, earnestly. "Please, Graham, for my sake, go."

"Your father is right," said Graham, bitterly; "it is the worst revenge Markham could have taken."

But the doctor was fixed in his resolution to carry the punishment into effect, and Graham accompanied him to Alderseley. He spoke kindly to the boy as he drove beside him in the carriage, and even encouragingly; but in vain—for, as long as Graham lived afterwards, he never forgot the struggle for the doctor's apple, the sudden temptation yielded to, and how, like the fruit in the wide Arabian desert, though tempting and bright to look at, it had turned to dust and ashes in his grasp.

The following day Graham made the only reparation in his power—he confessed his deceitful act before the whole school; and as the story of Markham's generous revenge went round, all the envious and ungenerous tongues which had been raised against him, were once and for ever silenced.

THE BIVVER

Saturday, July 4, 1858.

(Drawn by W. RIDLEY.)

"There is nothing amiss."—p. 660.

CHRISSY'S FOLLY.

CHRISSY'S father was a collier, living in the neighbourhood of Newcastle. Being a sober, industrious man, he earned enough money to make his home very comfortable. His cottage was a model specimen of the home of a well-to-do mechanic in the North-country. The front door opened into a large brick-floored room, furnished with the good old furniture which he had inherited from his grandmother. In one corner stood an old eight-day clock, which had tick-tacked there for more than fifty years. On the high mantel-shelf were placed some gay-coloured china dogs and sheep; and, in the centre, on a nail, hung a large silver watch. A few Scripture prints, framed in rosewood, adorned the whitewashed walls; the window-sill was filled with flower-pots, in which geraniums, fuchsias, and other window-plants were kept. At the further end of the room, opposite the fireplace, a chest of drawers stood, the top of which served as a book-shelf for the family Bible, Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," and a few other books.

On Chrissy's fifteenth birthday, this room was filled with merry guests. At the close of the day, when the whole party had left the house, and her brother John had gone with his cousins across the fields to their home, Chrissy and her parents were left alone. In his low arm-chair, close to the chimney-corner, sat John Smith, her father. Opposite to him, her mother sat, with Chrissy standing by her side, looking dreamily into the fire which was blazing brightly on the hearth.

"Now, Chrissy, my love," said her father, with one of his sunniest smiles, and rubbing his hands together, "bring me my great-coat; you'll find it hanging behind the door."

The coat was soon brought to him. He took out of one of its huge pockets a new pocket Bible, with gilt edges and brass clasps, and held it out to Chrissy.

"Here, my darling, take this Bible for your birthday gift. I have put your name in it. It did not cost much money, but I hope God will make it a blessing to you."

"What, another book! Thank you, father; I shall soon have quite a library," she added, almost involuntary.

"Indeed," he replied, "have you had any books since the one I gave you last Christmas?"

"Well, father, I have only one besides."

"Where did you get it from, Chrissy? I should like to see it."

"Oh, it's up-stairs in my box now; you shall see it some day, father."

"Can't you run and fetch it now? or tell me what sort of a book it is, and who gave it to you?"

Chrissy hesitated, and coloured deeply. She was evidently vexed with her father for wanting to know so much about this book. Her mother whispered in her ear, "Come, Chrissy, pray run and fetch it to satisfy your father."

She did so. Her father looked at it, and found that it was a novel of the silliest and most pernicious kind. Inside, on the cover, he found her name written, and underneath, that of the giver, who signed himself, "Stephen Waters." The father hastily shut the book, and was in the act of throwing it into the fire, but his wife snatched it out of his hand.

"Wait a little," she said; "it would perhaps be better to return it to the person who gave it. Who is Stephen Waters, Chrissy?" she said, softly.

Chrissy did not answer. She looked down on the ground, and seemed-afraid to speak. Her father got up from his chair, and took hold of Chrissy's hand, and drew her gently towards him.

"Come," he said, "you must tell me all you know about the young man who gave you that trashy book."

Chrissy began to cry.

"I fear," he said, "you have got acquainted with some vain fellow, who is trying to make you as bad as himself. The book he has given you is not fit for you to read. It will only fill your head with nonsense. I beg that you will not keep company with persons who are fond of reading silly novels; neither they nor their books will do you any good—come, don't cry, Chrissy, on your birthday, too! Go to bed now, my child, and calmly think over what I have been telling you for your good, and I hope it will prove to be a word in season to you."

After Chrissy had gone up-stairs to bed, her brother John returned home. His father asked him if he knew Stephen Waters. He said he had often seen him in the town. He was a tall, smart-looking fellow, with very jovial manners, and a great favourite with the young men of the place. Sometimes he had seen him talking with his sister in the street. But he thought nothing of that, having seen other young men do the same: in fact, he had heard her spoken of by some of them as the "belle of the parish."

Next morning Chrissy was directed by her parents to send back, through her brother, the book which Waters had given to her. It was then hoped that Chrissy's connection with Waters would be broken off. But Chrissy's mind was already so warped by the trash which she had read through before it was sent back, that she could not take the warning which her father had given her. She thought he was prejudiced against the young man for want of knowing him better, and persuaded herself to believe that by-and-by he would change his mind, and be as well pleased with him as other people were. So, instead of trying to avoid further intercourse with Waters, she sought the earliest opportunity of meeting him, and speaking to him privately.

An interview being as eagerly sought by Waters, it was not long before they met, and they soon became as friendly as ever. At one of their meetings they happened to be seen by her brother John, who, having reason to suspect his sister might be going to see Waters, followed her, and found her in his company.

"Ah! is that you, Chrissy?" John called out rather loudly, as he drew near his sister.

She turned round abruptly, saying, "Good-night" to her companion, and then said to John, "Come along, I am going home with you."

While they were on their way home, John said—"What will father say, Chrissy, when I tell him who you were talking to this evening?"

"Oh! pray don't tell him, John," she said, imploringly.

"But I must tell him; you are very naughty not to mind what he says."

"No, you must not tell him, John," she repeated, with vehemence. "I shall run away from home if you do; so you had better say nothing at all about it."

John was very fond of his sister, and could not bear the thought of her leaving home. He had only one other sister, and she was too young to be any companion for him. What to do for the best he could not tell. On reaching home they found their father standing at the door. He said to them, "Where have you been?" Chrissy quickly replied, "We have been for a short walk together."

John said nothing to his father, but afterwards he told his mother, privately, where he had found Chrissy, and who was with her.

That night both father and mother considered what had best be done with their undutiful daughter. They did not like to send her away from home, where she was very useful to them; but they thought they must do so. A fortnight afterwards, a light employment was found for her in Manchester, and Chrissy left home, promising to have no more to do with Waters.

But her parents' difficulties and anxieties were not to end so soon and so easily. About a year afterwards, news came that Chrissy had left her situation. She had contrived to get a week's holiday. It was supposed that she went home to spend it; but as she did not return at the end of the week, a letter was sent to her father to inquire the cause. This was the first intimation her afflicted parents had of her flight. What had become of her could only be guessed. They thought she must have gone somewhere with Waters. This was, indeed, the fact. While Chrissy was at Manchester, she broke her promise to her parents, and sent a letter to Waters, telling him where she was, and that she had not, and could not, forget him, though she had been sent from home on purpose to be out of his way.

He replied to her letter, and afterwards they kept up a weekly correspondence for several months. This led, eventually, to the unfortunate step which Chrissy had taken in leaving her employer. Waters met her by appointment at the Manchester station, and took her to Liverpool, where his parents lived, and thence, after being privately married at a registrar's office, they took their passage to Australia.

They arrived safely at Port Adelaide. Her husband, who was a joiner, and an expert workman, soon obtained employment. His wages were good; and for some time he worked hard. Before they had been two years in Adelaide, where they wished to settle, they had built themselves a nice dwelling, and furnished it with every convenience. All was then going on happily. They had one child, and he added much to their comfort, especially of the mother, who often felt dull and lonely before his birth, and bitterly regretted her folly in marrying against her parents' wishes, and leaving her friends and her native land.

Had Waters continued to be industrious, he might have become a very prosperous man; but though he had changed his country, he had not changed his character. His gay temper and social habits soon won him new companions, and by degrees he relapsed into his former vicious course of wasting his time and money in fashionable amusements. He was clever as a gambler, and the billiard-table was his chief delight. He often won much money; but he spent more. At the end of six years after his arrival in the country, he became almost as poor as ever he had been in his life. Chrissy foresaw that gambling would soon be her husband's ruin, and her own too. He was not intemperate, but he was extravagant, and was imposed upon by every rogue he met with.

Time wore on. Chrissy's anxieties increased every day. The dreaded evil came at last. In one night Waters lost all he had to lose. He then decamped, leaving his wife and child to the mercy of his creditors, and joined a vessel bound for America.

When Chrissy found herself deserted and almost penniless in a strange land, far from home, she was overwhelmed with alarm and grief. Her anguish of mind was greatly increased by the remembrance that all her trouble had been brought on herself by her self-will and her undutifulness to her parents. Her misery was extreme. She had no friend to care for her, or to advise her what to do. And then, for the first time since she had left home, she thought of the Bible which her dear, but ill-used, father had given her on her fifteenth birthday, long before she knew what real sorrow was. She knew well what it was now, and found there was One only who could hear and help her in her need.

She could only raise a few pounds, barely enough to take her back to England, where she wished to return as soon as possible.

After a long, tedious passage of five months, during which her child sickened with measles, and died, Chrissy reached her destination. How eagerly she watched the shore as the good ship neared it! There were many welcome greetings given and received, as soon as her fellow-passengers who crowded the deck-side, and their expectant friends on the shore, recognised each other; but no waving hand or loving glance welcomed poor Chrissy's return.

* * * * *

Two travellers, the one an aged man, the other a young girl of fourteen or fifteen, entered the almost deserted streets of a seaport town late one December night. They had evidently come on foot from a great distance, for their clothes were stained with travel, and they crawled along wearily, with bent back and drooping head.

"Where shall we find lodgings to-night, father?" said the girl, in an anxious tone.

"Don't know, Jane," said the old man; "but I hope we shall find some door open to take us in."

They walked through several streets; but every house was closely shut up, and no light was to be seen from the windows.

"Oh, dear!" sighed the father, "I feel almost ready to drop down with fatigue. I really cannot go a step further."

Just at that moment the sound of footsteps was heard coming near them. Jane turned to look. Presently she saw, by the light of a gas-lamp close by, a mounted policeman on his rounds. When he came up to them, he stopped to ask what was the matter.

"Oh, sir, there is nothing amiss," answered the old man; "only we are in search of a friend here, and want to find a place where to sleep for the night."

"Well," he said, "if you will come along with me a little further up this road, I will show you a house which is open for the accommodation of travellers at all hours of the night."

"Thank you kindly," said the old man, who, meanwhile, had sunk on the ground to rest; "though how to walk another yard I don't know. I am almost too tired to get up on my feet again."

The next day was Sunday, and our travellers were glad to rest till the evening, when they went to the nearest church. As they were coming out, Jane felt something on the pew-floor when reaching her father's hat. Picking it up, she found it was a pocket Bible, in which was written "Christine Smith, the gift of her affectionate father, June 12th, 1852."

"Bless me!" murmured the old man, on looking at it; "she must have been here lately—perhaps this very evening, in the same pew with us, and we never knew it."

The only means of discovering the owner they could think of, was to ask the door-keeper to tell the loser of the book to call at the house where they lodged.

Being unable to wait longer than the next day before going home again, they anxiously waited till the afternoon for a call.

At length the expected visitor arrived, and was shown in.

"Have you come," said the old man, "for the Bible which we picked up in church on Sunday night?"

"Yes, I have," she said; "and am very much obliged to you for taking care of it—for me, as I value it very much."

"Indeed," he replied, in a tremulous voice, showing her the writing inside; "but pray tell me, first, is that your name?"

"Yes," she said, "it was my name before I was married."

Unable to restrain his feelings any longer, he cried out, bursting into tears, and stretching out his arms towards her, "Oh, Chrissy—Chrissy! come to me, my daughter. I am your own father, and this is your own sister Jane."

Chrissy stared, first at him, and then at Jane, in mute astonishment.

"What! is it really you, my poor wronged father? Oh, how changed!—looking so old and ill! And is this my sister Jane, too? Oh! how can it be true?"

"Oh, yes, it is quite true—believe me, it is true; and how glad I am we have met together at last!" he said, embracing her, with tears of joy in his eyes.

"But," said Chrissy, still lost in doubt and surprise, "how is it you are here? I wrote home to Northumberland, and my letters came back to me unopened. I thought you must be dead, or gone I knew not where; and had given up all hopes of meeting you again in this world."

Jane seeing her father sink down in his chair, overcome with emotion, and unable to give the necessary explanation, said to her sister, "Pray listen to me; I will tell you how it is we have met here in this strange, unexpected manner. When father was very ill, a month ago, a kind clergyman came to see him. He asked him about his family. Father told him that his wife died of a broken heart through the loss of two of her children; one a son who was drowned, and the other a daughter who had left home and gone away, as he feared, with a bad young man to some place abroad. He said he was reminded, by what father told him of his daughter, of the case of a poor woman who was one of his fellow-passengers from Australia, when he returned to this country a few months since. Father asked him if he would tell him the particulars. He said, 'Yes. I remember a young woman on board with her little boy, whom I buried at sea, the poor child having died with measles. She said she was going home to her parents in Northumberland, of the same name as yours; but perhaps if she did not find them there, she might stay in Liverpool, where her husband's parents resided, and get her living as best she could."

"Yes, Chrissy," said her father, rousing himself to energy, "I told the gentleman it was a most remarkable story, and that I had reason to believe God had directed his steps to me, to let me know where my lost child was at last to be found. As soon as I got well enough, I set off with your sister to this town, and searched for you two days without finding you. The rest you know. Oh! how glad I am we have met at last."

Chrissy, choked with surprise and emotion, fell at her father's knees and sobbed out the confession of her fault, and asked his forgiveness. The old man tenderly embraced his daughter, and said he heartily forgave all the past, and hoped she would never leave him again. He then gave back to her the Bible, and she received it with tears of gratitude, saying, "This book has been to me a blessing indeed; it first led me to my heavenly Father, and now it has been the means of leading me back to you."

Chrissy never left her father again, but while she lived she was his chief earthly comfort, and helped to support him with the work of her own hands.

THE ASCENSION OF OUR LORD.

LIVET is prominent among "the consecrated heights" of Palestine. Horeb was hallowed by the mystic fire; Sinai had its solemn lessons; Carmel caught the heavenly flame;

Tabor tells of teachings uttered by Him who spake as never man spake. All these hills have their echoes that never die, and an unfading light lingers around them. But there are deeper footprints of Divinity on Olivet than on them all. Next to "mournful Calvary," it stirs most profoundly the Christian's soul. To Bethany, near its south-eastern base, our blessed Lord was wont to retire, that he might enjoy the quiet seclusion which the favoured family offered. Sitting on the slope of this hill, with the Temple shimmering at his feet in the rays of the eastern sun, he foretold that shortly not one stone of that grand structure should be left on another. From the brow of that mount, when Jerusalem burst suddenly on his sight, the Saviour wept over the Holy City. In the garden of Gethsemane, at the foot of Olivet, his soul was exceeding sorrowful, and the world's sins and sorrows wrung from His sympathetic nature drops of blood.

This place of so many memories, the scene of his severest sufferings and deepest humiliation, was chosen as his point of departure when Jesus returned a conqueror to heaven. On the chosen day our Lord met his disciples in the city, discoursed to them there, answered their too curious inquiries about his coming kingdom, gave them his final commands, and then led them out to Bethany.

We follow them in fancy. They leave the city, cross the Kedron, are lost for a time in the shadow of the olive-trees; then again we trace them as they near the village. There he pauses. He spreads his hands over his followers in priestly manner, and while in the act of blessing them he rises sublimely from earth, mounts higher and higher as they gaze upward with fixed and startled look, and presently a cloud encloses him, and they see him no more. They stand awe-stricken and mute, and stare with strained sight into the sky. Then two angels appear to them in shining garb, and say, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven."

In this account of our blessed Lord's ascension, the first thing that strikes us is the fact of his rising from earth unaided. It differs thus in instructive particulars from Elijah's translation. By a sweeping storm, in the midst of which a chariot of cloud rolled by and caught him up, the prophet was conveyed to his reward. But Jesus rose slowly and sublimely, the heavenly life within counteracting the law of gravitation, as the vital energy of the bird enables it to fill its hollow bones with air and rise from earth. Elijah's departure was an assumption—a taking up; Jesus's, an ascension—a going up. As he could not be holden of the grave when he willed to roll back the stone, so he could not be holden of earth when he had finished fully the work the Father had given him to do. His glorified life had its home in heaven, so his ascension followed as a consequence of his resurrection. He consented to tarry on this world for a time, but his affinities were not here. It was by a generous effort of self-denial that he descended to earth. It was by a spontaneous tendency of his nature that he went back to his glory. He rose again to the level whence he had come down, and so proved his origin to be heavenly, his essence Divine. He went back naturally to his source, and rested at last on the throne which on earth he had daily been nearing, his whole life here being a gradual, steady advance heavenwards. And such should our life be. By virtue of the resurrection-life which he imparts to us, we can, through grace, claim a citizenship in the skies; and through the in-working of the Divine life, we should be daily drawing nearer and nearer to our home on high. So living, when we are called away, we too shall ascend, the life within going to its kindred skies with a glad sense of release. We should, then, consider ourselves as strangers here, and, being "risen with Christ," should set our affections on things above. As the heart of Bruce was carried forward in the battle to draw on the soldiers, so should Jesus, by his going before, draw us to the place where he will share with us his victory. Therefore, as Bishop Pearson says, "we should trample on our sins, and subdue our lusts of the flesh, that our conversation may be correspondent to the Saviour's condition; that where the eyes of the apostles were forced to leave him, thither our thoughts may follow him." The Christian's cry should be—

"Chains of my heart, avaunt! I say;
I will arise, and, in the strength of love,
Pursue the bright track ere it fade away—
My Saviour's pathway to his home above."

But we are told that "a cloud received" the Saviour out of the sight of the disciples. Now clouds were not so common in Palestine as in our clime: they have their significance in Scripture symbolism. The cloud that concealed Christ from the earnest gaze of the little group on Olivet was a sign of separation. It was drawn between the Saviour and mortal sight to check too curious inquiries as to his present condition. But it was also a symbol of glory—an evidence of his enthronisation.

Let us be thankful that it is only a cloud that has come between our dear Lord and ourselves. No adamant rock has to be scaled that we may reach him; no mighty barrier divides us. There is but a little gathered mist—an "earth-born cloud," between our Jesus and ourselves. It is but a little film of vapour that veils him from our view. And this does not hide us from him; it does not bar his approach; it is no hindrance to the fulfilment of his promise—"Lo, I am with you alway." His disciples can no longer see him face to face, but they can feel his presence with a sense more quick and connecting than touch. And this thin tissue will be torn away one day, and the Saviour will come in triumph to take to himself the great power and reign. The angels announced—"This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Then we shall be caught up to reign with him; and when the everlasting doors shall roll back to receive him once more, a long line of glorified men shall swell his triumphal train.

Meanwhile the heavenly messengers chide our idly looking for our ascended Lord. "Why stand ye gazing up into heaven?" they ask. Musing is to be balanced by doing; contemplation is to be followed by practical application to the work of witnessing to our Redeemer.

FAITH IN LITTLE THINGS THE PROOF OF NO LITTLE FAITH.

BY THE REV. J. B. OWEN, M.A.

FAITHFULNESS to one's trust, whether in great things or small, whether in sacred or secular duties, the same principle being involved in them all, is the frequent subject of our Lord's illustrative parables. There are the ten virgins, five wise enough to trim their lamps, and five foolish enough to neglect their oil; there are the servants of an absent lord, to whom he severally confided their ten, five, or one talent, who, on his return to reckon with them, promoted to greater trust the faithful ones, and banished from his service and favour the indolent and disloyal; there are the wicked husbandmen, misappropriating the inheritance entrusted to their economy, stoning their lord's messengers, and even slaying his son, who are punished with destruction, and their office transferred to the charge of others; and there is the course of the wasteful steward, culminating in a series of wholesale frauds, and losing his stewardship, with our Lord's expostulating moral: "He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much"—i.e., such a man of high-principled integrity would display the same fealty to duty in either case; and, on the other hand, "he that is unjust in the least, is unjust also in much." "If therefore ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches?" The dishonest disciple whose petty filchings robbed the bag, was the same who betrayed and sold his Lord and Master, hypocrisy equally lying at the root of both delinquencies. "If ye have not been faithful in that which is another man's, who shall give you that which is your own?" If, indeed, anything whatever may be rightly called your own, for "what hast thou, O man, that thou didst not receive?" "Ye are not your own; ye are bought with a price;" yourself, your body, soul, and spirit, your time, talents, intellects, and property, all are His who redeemed you by His precious blood. You may be called proprietors, as between man and man, but all are stewards in the sight of God; "and it is required of stewards that a man be found faithful." The obligation is incumbent upon all men, but specially on Christ's disciples, for they have publicly avouched him for their Master, and taken service under him. Divi sacramentum, each one of them may affirm; "I have sworn to be faithful, and my Lord and Master's pledge to me is: 'Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee the crown of life.'"

In assuring us that the glory of manhood is its unswerving fidelity, the Lord Jesus states nothing new, or strange, or difficult to realise. The faithfulness which God requires between man and God, men require from their fellow-men. They honour them in whom it exists, and despise and distrust those in whom it is wanting. Nothing attracts so much affection, honour, confidence, and respect, as trustworthiness. You may not be religious in principle and spirit; you may be unable to discern the higher aspect of the virtue, but none can choose but appreciate the moral beauty and value of integrity, as between man and man. Indeed, there is not a single grace or duty which God requires of us to be exercised towards himself, the operation of which in our fellow-citizen character would not enhance our welcome and usefulness to each other. "Godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come."

We may be subject to many defects, and oft infirmities, but no nobler epitaph could dignify our tomb than the simple inscription: "Here lies a true man; loyal in all the relations of life; in friendship sincere; his word his bond; upright in all his dealings: he never wittingly betrayed a trust."

Faithfulness—including honesty, industry, and truth—is the propagation and support of mutual confidence, as like begets its like. Diplomats were compelled to deal truly and explicitly with the explicit truth and sincerity of De Witte, the Grand Pensionary of Holland. Lies can no more compete with uniform truth, than darkness compass light. That style of faith which commercial men call credit, is the life of trade. No trust, no trade. It is the only solid basis of the stability and progress of society. What is the comprehensive term which involves all that is allied to admiration, comfort, trust, and reliance, and constitutes individual respectability? It is simply faithfulness—faithfulness to your word, your profession, your every responsibility, social or moral. It is a quality within every man's reach, and beyond no man's power of exercise. God nowhere in his Word demands great things of men in general. He may, in rare instances, put individual faith to a difficult test, with a view to such things happening unto them, for our ensamples in like rare emergencies, and they are written for our admonition, unto whom the ends of the world are come. Thus he may search an Abraham's parental soul by the command: "Go, offer up thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest;" he may bid an Elijah go forth, on peril of his life, to meet Ahab; or a Moses to come up to him in the midst of the terrors of the mount; but the Divine commandments are in the main simple and attainable, their yoke is easy and their burden light, and mostly to be summed up in the requirement to be faithful. That is the thing to be aimed at; as to other and—what may seem to us—higher things, God often asks, "Who hath required this at your hands?" Do that which lies nearest to you, which is your immediate duty; show all good fidelity in the transactions of your daily calling—what you may think trifles are no trifling tests. On the contrary, to neglect the small thing for what strikes you to be the greater, betrays a mistaken view of what constitutes faithfulness. For instance, the man who deserts his every-day business, however humble, for some smart speculation, or for the pursuit of some daring exploit, in order to be talked of, is a fool in the sight of God, who appointed his ordinary calling, but had not called him to the extraordinary achievement; nor is he less a fool in the estimation of his fellow-men, who may be damaged by his neglect of the duty which belonged to him, and must be scandalised by his silly example in meddling with what did not belong to him.

Naaman's servants hit upon a notable weakness in human vanity when they challenged their master: "If the prophet had bidden thee do some great thing, wouldest thou not have done it?" It is easier to draw men to the great public occasional effort, than to keep them steadfast to what seem to be the small trivial things of common daily life and duty. Hence in these things—light and unsuspected as Samson's locks—lies the secret of individual strength, and the real proof of faithfulness. Nothing short of being true to the business which happens to be on hand, will avail us in the long run. There are no lucky hits, nor shrewd ventures, in the discharges of duty. God asks us to be faithful, not to be famous. The fame may follow the being faithful, but without the faithfulness there will be no fame at last. I have known a vague, desultory student at college stored with all kinds of knowledge, except in the subjects on his examination in which depended his degree. That is unfaithfulness to the course of reading prescribed for him, it is an aberration, the effect of a misdirected light, and the learned rambler miserably fails. If I were examining a group of candidates who were aware beforehand that the appointed theme was history, and they pleaded in excuse of their ignorance in the one thing, their proficiency in others—as in geology, mathematics, or chemistry—what else could I reply than what God often replies, “Who hath required this at your hands?”

Its parallel blunder is in the rebuke: “The world by wisdom knew not God;” not because God was not to be known, but because men’s intellects had been exercised on every other subject except him, “whom to know is life eternal;” they had not honoured the precept: “Get wisdom, get knowledge; but with all thy getting get understanding.” This study to “acquaint ourselves with God” is faithfulness to our own minds. It is human reason paying the homage of her confidence in the fact and truth of revelation; in other words, it is being faithful to the Bible, and that means belief in the God of the Bible; it is simple, child-like, subjective obedience to his holy law and covenant love which are treasured up therein, as the tables of Sinai were hidden in the ark.

In that one question which God will demand of us at the bar of final judgment, “Have you been faithful?” it will be useless, it will be worse, it will aggravate our sin and folly, to affirm, as many do in this life, that we knew the truth in theory, had defended it against gainsayers, had done great things for the Gospel, had wrestled and wrought hard in life, and realised wealth and social position; the only question of any importance then will be, Were you faithful in the calling wherein He called you? diligent in the things which He chose for you, not in the things which you chose for yourself? Was your life spent, notwithstanding all its imperfections, sins, and shortcomings, with a view to pleasing God and pleasing your neighbour, for his good to his edification, and not in pleasing yourself? “Even as Christ pleased not himself,” but did all things to “please him that sent him.”

We know little of the past chronicles of our race. We know less of the future, as to the kind of being which will comprise the life eternal; for “eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive, what things the Lord hath prepared for them that love him.” We often long to know more of both past and future. We fly abroad on wings of wildest hypotheses; we drop, like birds wounded in their flight, into deep, obscure reveries; we cry up to God, “Oh! tell us more, thou Eternal One, of such fragments of thine own eternity which concern our past and future. Thy Genesis and man’s geology agree in revealing this earth of ours as beginning in darkness. Alas! that its whole history seems doomed to be the nebulous era of our souls, for here, from first to last of our mortal memoirs, ‘we see, through a glass darkly.’ Help us to exhumate from the dust of ages the fossil records of our nature. Give us the telescopic power to discern the infinitely more profound futurities of our race. We are thine images, lend us the mystic mirrors in which we may trace humanity as it was with thee in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end.” Some such thoughts as these at times occupy our hearts, to the hindrance of more immediate practical duties. But God’s significant reserve as to both past and future, indicates his will that we should cease non-essential speculations on those eras of our being which lie beyond our experience, and bend all our moral energies on the duties belonging to the present, which is within our experience. In these things there is no lack of positive light and direction. Conscience in man, like instinct in the lower animals, points out the true course to be pursued; and if we listen with an understanding heart and believing ear, we hear a voice behind us, saying, “This is the way; walk ye in it;” and if we are “obedient to the heavenly calling,” we shall assuredly receive grace, strength, spontaneity, and wisdom, to “walk worthy of the Lord, who hath called us, unto all well pleasing.”

The world is still our school, as the law was our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ. The child Jesus going down to Nazareth with his parents, and being subject unto them, was the training of the Man Christ Jesus to become obedient unto death, and thence ascending into heaven, to the glory of God the Father. He hath left us an example which we should follow step by step. The discipline which proves our “faithfulness in the few things,” through grace, qualifies us to be “made rulers over many things.” I have no great reliance on the common adage, that a dissolute youth will grow out of his vagaries and profligacies, and that when greater responsibilities fall upon him, he will rise to a sense of their obligation, and be equal to the occasion. Our Lord’s teaching contradicts this unlikely and indefinite hope. He who knew what was in man affirms, “He that is unjust in the least, is unjust also in much.” He warns the indolent, perhaps fraudulent, certainly the unprofitable, apprentice or journeyman, “If ye have not been faithful in that which is another man’s, who shall give you that which is your own?” An ill-served apprenticeship is the worst preliminary to success in your own business. Whereas the well-principled youth who feels, with Joseph in Potiphar’s house, “My master hath put all things under my hands,” and in the face of temptation to the contrary, requites his master’s generous confidence by the most scrupulous fidelity to his interests, that is the man who thereby shows himself worthy of a larger trust. By the modesty which was cheerfully content to discharge the functions belonging to its humble outset in life; by the faithfulness with which it made a conscience of the smallest matter that fell in its way, such a career by-and-by meets its graceful recognition in the earthly master's bidding, "Friend, go up higher!" And the same faithfulness in the service of the heavenly Master inherits the priceless commendation, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord!"

(Drawn by H. Woods.)

"Good night."—p. 666.

A true sense of responsibility has no relation to smaller or greater; it cannot discriminate between things of less or more importance. Nothing is unimportant which involves principle. Consequently, it is not correct to describe one man's responsibility as greater than another's. Any man's responsibility is equal to any other man's, in the ratio of his talents, gifts, opportunities, and field of action. A friend, to whom I owe some of these thoughts, remarks—"If you have more to answer for to God, then you have more to answer with. So that your responsibility may be absolutely greater, or less, than mine; but relatively—and this is the way God looks at it—it is the same. For you, therefore—for any individual—nothing can be trivial, nothing insignificant. It may be so, as far as others are concerned—as far as general and ultimate results are concerned—but it cannot be so, as far as you are concerned." That little test, or that great one, as the case may be, is equally the crisis of your character; if you fail of being faithful there, you violate the whole principle at issue. You are weighed in the balances, and found wanting on the solemn predicament: "He that offendeth in one point is guilty of all."

On the other hand, the principle is applicable to the spirit and tone of mind in which faith in God should sustain the believer, under the recurrence of petty annoyances. They cease to be petty when they are regarded as occasions for being "faithful in that which is least." The consideration invests them with an import beyond their intrinsic significance. It astonished the wife of Job, that in the very depth of his accumulated afflictions, in spite of their desolating pressure, he still "retained his integrity;" yet even his patience failed under a slight put upon that integrity. The failure in the small grievance, with the conquest of the great trouble, is often repeated; but we should be more on our guard against this inconsistency, if we remembered in the moment of irritation, or annoyance, the Saviour's warning, that to be faithful in that which is least, is essential to the inauguration and completion of the faithfulness in that which is much. Samson's triumph over a thousand men was spoiled of its moral trophy by his subjugation to a woman. The beginning of strife between conscience and conduct—the petty violation of principle—may be as when one leeteth out water. It may be an inconsiderable oozing of a few drops at the outset; but the elementary force rapidly gains upon its opportunity, till it bursts the embankment, and whole districts become a waste of waters. Hence the cogency of the warning to resist the beginning of evil. It was the cruel policy of Egypt to crush the growing power of Israel by the slaughter of her male children. "The children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light." When will the servants of God learn that the man of sin is most easily destroyed in his infancy? The wars of Israel, as the Lord's avengers upon Canaan, impressed this truth, when women and children shared the fate of their husbands and fathers. It is still the stern necessity; if we would be thoroughly faithful to our trust, that the little sins must be cut off with the greater ones, both must be destroyed, if we would aim at the fulness of the stature of His standard, whose disciple must "deny himself, take up His cross, and follow Him."

If the dread of failure, founded on past weakness and faintings by the way, discourage us from the undertaking, let us fall back upon the prayer—"O Lord, undertake for me; suffer me not to venture a step, except where thy mighty hand guide and lead me. Give me thy Holy Spirit, as a spirit of faith, to 'run with patience the race that is set before me, looking unto Jesus,' that I may be always true to thy truth, and trustworthy to thy trust. All I am, and all I have, thou hast put into my hands; give me grace to be thy faithful steward, that at the last thou mayest receive me and mine, as all thine own, with usury."

GOOD NIGHT.

THE sun is sinking,
One star is blinking,
All white and pale;
Nature is sleeping,
Soft mists are creeping
O'er hill and dale.

Good night!

Far bells are chiming,
Heaven's solemn rhyming,
As night draws nigh;
All holy feelings,
All sad appealings,
Mount up on high.

Good night!

Though mute, the flowers
From dewy bowers
Their heads upraise:
Sweet bluebells ringing,
Sweet incense swinging
To their God's praise.

Good night!

The blackbirds trilling
Sounds yet more thrilling
Now day is done;
The kine's soft lowing,
The streamlet's flowing,
Give deeper tone.

Good night!

The sun is sinking,
One star is blinking
With drowsy eye:
Nature is sleeping,
But God is keeping
Bright watch on high.

Good night!

Thus seeing, hearing,
No danger fearing,
Sleep well to-night;
Your eyelids closing,
Calmly reposing
Till morning's light.

Good night!

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XXX.

NOT WORDS, BUT DEEDS!

"It is everything, dear mother, to have gained a respite."

"Yes, for six months, Raymond."

She was in her place by the fire, her hands, with their lace ruffles, folded on her lap.

"Six months, Raymond!"

She repeated the words uneasily. He knew what she meant, and replied in a soothing tone—

"Something may happen before that period comes, to an end. I wish you would learn to sleep better, dear mother. You will be ill, if you persist in being so anxious."

"Am I anxious?" She gave a little laugh. "I think I have stood it bravely, Raymond."

He took her hand, and kissed it. He had sat down close by her.

She turned her eager eyes upon him.

"I often wonder what the end will be, Raymond! All the winter long, I have looked into that fire, and sat wondering. What can it be?"

He was softly rubbing the white hand that lay in his. She had got to speak in that way of late: to him, only; never to Alice.

"A good ending, mother, I hope. One can but do one's best. The spring may bring better days, perhaps."

She shook her head. It was useless to talk in that way. He knew it was so, in his heart.

It was getting dusk, but the lamps had not been lighted. They sat alone, the mother and son; they often sat alone, in these days: they had so many confidences unshared by Alice.

It was not for want of love. She was their hope, their pride—all, indeed, they had in the world. But they dared not tell her how narrow was the pass, how profound the gulf, they were approaching. There was a wonderful patience, a quiet resolution about these two, that was worthy of a better cause. They made no loud lamentations, nor uttered useless regrets. You will see, daily, the space narrowing—the enemy pressing nearer—yet they will not flinch, either of them.

A light step outside the door roused them. They seemed to think they must assume some kind of cheerfulness, and hide up the skeleton; for Alice was coming.

She was changed. Those who loved her knew it, though they dare not whisper it, even to each other. She rarely sang now; she would move noiselessly about the house; she would be abstracted and pre-occupied. There was a look of trouble in her eyes; her brow would often be knit. The gladness and the gaiety of youth seemed as if ground out of her.

They knew what had done it!

She came into the room very quietly. Raymond was the first who spoke to her.

He had called up, as we said, a little cheerfulness. "Come, Alice, are we never to hear you sing again?"

She did not answer. She stood and looked at him with two sad, wistful eyes. Her face was very pale, and even by that uncertain light, he could see that she had been weeping bitterly.

Still, the skeleton must be forced back into its place. It would never do to let go the veil, be it never so flimsy.

He got up, saying, still cheerfully, "If you will not, I will. This is just the hour for music."

"Stay, Raymond, I cannot bear it!"

Her voice was sharp and thrilling. She put her hand to her forehead.

"Have you the headache, dear?" asked Raymond, tenderly.

"No, no! it is my heart," she cried—"my heart!"

They looked at her anxiously. They knew what was coming, well.

"Oh, mother, mother! why do we deceive ourselves?" exclaimed she, coming forward, and fresh from her great anguish. "Why do we keep up this miserable farce—this daily, hourly lie? Let us do better, mother; let us begin afresh, and be true, and brave, and honest. Let us, mother!—let us!"

She had come close up. Her mother had risen, and Alice had thrown herself into her arms, her pleading face raised to hers.

Lady Sylvester's face did not plead; it never looked more harsh, more pitiless.

She withdrew herself from the clinging embrace of her daughter. Her daughter's heart was warm, and impassioned. Lady Sylvester's heart was kept down, as by a grip of iron.

She said that Alice was foolish, and that no true Sylvester ever lost self-control; that to make a scene like this was undignified and unworthy: words Alice had heard from her childhood upwards. They had rung in her ears till she was weary of them.

It was useless to defy these walls of adamant, that had stood for centuries. She knew it was useless, and she held her peace. Then the ripple on the surface died away, and the dead, unwholesome calm came back again. The conversation began by fits and starts, and was kept up irregularly and on indifferent subjects. The home atmosphere was growing more and more oppressive. And thus the hours dragged heavily by, till the time came for retiring. Then the old house was shut up, and silence brooded over it. In some instances, at least, silence only—not sleep!

Alice had been longing ardently for this hour. She was not a person to let her tears or her regrets stand in the place of action. She had laid her plans, and was about to carry them into effect. In the stillness and the security of her own chamber she meant to work. Yes, work for money!

By some path or other she would reach that golden field out yonder—the field of honest industry! It was little she could do; but she would do that little. If one iota of the misery she was compelled to know of could be mitigated, then let the busy hand do its utmost. Let her forget to sleep, to eat, so she might work!

She closed her door, and locked it. Her face looked happier, in spite of its pallid weariness. One moment she stood and listened. It were folly to take the Sylvesters into confidence, and she did not try. Her labour would be carried on in secret.

It was mere hand labour. The people at the repository had told her they would buy any number of fancy articles that she could make; and she was going to make them.

The artist paints his picture, and embodies some creation of his fancy. The poet writes, and his poem stands immortal, and looks down on generations. This girl was no painter, and no poet; she had not the gift of genius; but it seems to me as if her work were grand as theirs was!

How glad she was that she could work! How eagerly the busy fingers plied their task! What sweetness was dropped into her bitter lot! What healing balm to her sore conscience, by the fulfilment of the golden rule of honesty! No matter the hours snatched from repose! No matter, to her inexperienced mind, the wear and tear of nerve, and brain, and eyesight! No matter anything, so she might work!

CHAPTER XXXI.

HAROLD HEARS SWEET MUSIC.

CHARLEY BLAKE had grown patient—that is, patient by comparison of what he used to be. Two reasons might be assigned for this change; one was, that he was growing sensibly weaker. No one who saw him could dare to hope that the poor frail body would hold its tenure much longer.

On very fine days he went out in his chair; but it became painful to him to be carried up and down stairs. Generally speaking, he lay tolerably passive on the sofa, reading the books which Alice lent him. And now came the second reason for his patience. Those books had had a great effect upon him: they had taught him lessons of patience, and of kindness, and of charity,—lessons that he had never before thought he needed. They had shown him, as in a glass, his own fretfulness, and impatience, and unlovely tempers. They had soothed his loneliness, and opened up to him some better, brighter hopes than he had ever yet dreamed of.

And the visits which Alice paid to him had become the greatest blessing to him. He would lie and listen for her step upon the stairs. His eye would glisten and his pale cheek have a shade of colour, as she came in. If he clung to any human being on this earth more than another, it was to Alice.

She was very kind to him. She looked upon him as upon a sick child, who wants care and tending. The few good offices she could render him were done heartily, and with all the kindness of her nature. She always came to see him when he was alone, and there was no fear of meeting with Harold. "Stay a few minutes longer," Charley would say. "Harold won't be back till five."

Sometimes she would stay, but she always kept glancing at the French clock on the mantelpiece. When the hand got within the range of five, she would rise up and go.

She would often play and sing to Charley. There was an old piano in the room, that Harold had caused to be tuned and repaired for the amusement of his brother. Alice often played for the hour together. She would sing hymns, sometimes; Charley had grown fond of sacred music.

Her voice was not powerful, nor was her singing at all scientific; but it had a sweetness and freshness about it, like that of the lark. Charley would never tire of listening. "Again! Miss Sylvester, if you please, again!" he would say; and Alice would sing the hymn or song again.

One afternoon she was singing to him, as usual. He was lying, listening; and they were both too much preoccupied to notice that some one was coming up the stairs. But that some one was Harold.

He had never seen Alice Sylvester since the days they were in Rome. He knew it was her voice—that rich, soft music that came stealing to his ear. He knew it in a moment.

He changed colour violently. Such a look of glad surprise came into his face, that it was like an illumination. He stole softly up stairs, and listened.

When she had finished, she turned hastily round, to look at the clock. Then she saw Harold. It was a great surprise to her. A look of alarm came into her face. She had stayed too late, and she hurriedly began to put on her hat.

"Miss Sylvester, won't you speak to me?" asked Harold, pained and disappointed.

"Oh, yes!" and she put her hand into his. "I am very glad to see you. But it is late. I ought to be home by now."

"I hoped you would indulge me with a little talk of the old Roman days," said Harold, with a shade of reproach in his voice; and yet he smiled, too. "Have you forgotten them?"

"No—oh, no!"

She spoke hurriedly, and was rolling up her music.

"At least you will let me thank you for your kindness to Charley."

"Charley can speak for himself," said a pettish voice from the sofa; "and you need not have come back so soon. You have driven Miss Sylvester away."

"Oh, no—no!"

Her eyes were raised, and a kind of look fell upon him, such as he remembered to have had once before from Alice. It was the morning that she went away from Rome. Every pulse in his body had been made to throb and tingle by that look! He did not care, now, an atom for anything Charley might say!

He hoped she would look at him again; but she did not; she still seemed hurried, and a little agitated. She was rolling up her music; but the pieces did not fit into the case. Harold took it from her, and rolled the pieces up himself.

She stood by in silence; her eyes were fixed on the music. She did not say another word, except that, when he had finished, she took the case from him, and thanked him.

Joyful as the incident had been, he felt it was a selfish joy, and he reproached himself. Something told him that a spell was broken. That, now he had once seen her, Alice would be wary how she came again.

Before he had time to think more, Alice was in the street. He stepped to the window, and watched to catch the last glimpse of her, before she turned the corner of the street. Charley was talking to him; but, for once, Charley was neglected, and, for the moment, unheard.

Charley, however, was not a person to be trifled with. He raised his voice, till its very shrillness pierced through Harold's brain, and brought him back.

"Harold! are you deaf?"

"No, dear, not by any means," replied Harold, returning to the side of the sofa, and taking up again the thread of his daily cares and occupations. "What were you saying, Charley?"

"I have said, three times over, how is it you are come home so soon?"

Charley was getting fretful again.

"Ah, that reminds me, Charley! I have such a piece of glorious news for you!"

"Have you, Harold? What is it?"

"You have not been out to-day, Charley, have you?"

"Of course I have not. You know how I hate those nasty stones. And what has that to do with the news?"

"Because, how should you like to live where there are no nasty stones? We are going to move from here, at Lady Day."

"Move from here! How is that, Harold?"

"We are going to a better place, dear; to a snug little home of our own, and where you can get into the fields."

"Oh, Harold! where—where?"

"Mr. Mapleson has been very good to me, Charley. He told me, to-day, that he had bought a house which stands very near the mill—a nice little place it is, dear, and that he means the overseer to live in it. I am the overseer, you know."

"And are you to live in it?"

"Yes, we two together."

Charley's face grew radiant.

"How glad I am! How nice it will be! Oh, Harold! if I could only breathe the fresh air once more I think I could almost live!"

He said it with energy. Harold looked at the frail, wasting figure, and hollow cheek, and a pang shot through his heart—a pang he had felt many a time before, and would feel till the end.

But he did not abate his cheerfulness.

"It will be very nice, dear, and I shall send for our old nurse, good Mrs. Brown; she shall come and keep house for us. You will like that."

"It won't be lodgings, then?"

"Oh, no, we shall be absolute masters of our own little domain. We shall be as happy as princes, and happier too, a great deal."

"I am sure we shall. But won't it take more money, Harold, to keep house?"

"Yes, perhaps it will. But then, you see, that excellent Mr. Mapleson has doubled my salary."

Charley laughed, and clapped his hands with glee.

"Hurrah!" cried he. "Three cheers for the miller!"

Charley would persist in calling Mr. Mapleson the miller, a title that, as Harold said, had no reference to him whatever.

"So that you have only to get a little stronger, Charley. We shall see what the fresh air does for you."

"I wish we were going to-morrow. I am so afraid——"

He paused; there was a grave, almost a solemn, look upon his face.

"Afraid of what, dear?" said Harold, inwardly trembling.

"Afraid," and he spoke slowly, and with unusual seriousness, "that this change will come too late!"

Tears gushed into Harold's eyes. He took the thin hand in his.

"No! Charley, no! Let us pray God that it may not be so," said he, with deep feeling.

"Yes, we will pray," said Charley, in the same unusual tone; "but for all that, God may not hear our prayers. It may be his will that I should go."

Strange words from the lips of Charley. Had he begun to think that he should die?

CHAPTER XXXII.

CAPTAIN JACK.

"Your name, sir, if you please—your name?" cried the footman, vigorously plucking back an individual who had just made good his entrance to the hall at Brooklyn.

"My name, sir, if you must know—though what business it is of yours I can't imagine—my name is Captain Jack; and I am come to see Alicia Pierpoint."

"Then you've made a mistake," replied the footman, with an air of triumph. "There's no such person lives here or hereabouts. My mistress is Mrs. Brooklyn, of Brooklyn Hall."

"But wasn't she a Miss Pierpoint? Heaven bless her! and wasn't Alicia her Christian name? There, now! you'd best let me!" And with one vigorous effort he shook off his opponent, and marched along the hall with an assurance that was astounding.

He seemed to know his way too, which was more than Mercury had bargained for. In fact, Mercury being rather old and puffy, and with a touch of chronic asthma, was obliged to pause, and recover breath. During that pause, Captain Jack had got out of his sphere of observation.

He walked along in a careless, rollicking manner. He had on a sailor's uniform, and there was a medal on his breast. His hands were in his pockets, and a catch of a song in his mouth, as he progressed through the mansion.

The first room he came to he entered. It was the breakfast-room. Alicia was not there; but her portrait was. The mistress of Brooklyn hung smiling in her bridal costume. On the other side of the fireplace, was the full-length likeness of an elderly gentleman, with a solemn face, and rather a bilious complexion. That was the late Mr. Brooklyn.

Captain Jack fell immediately into ecstasies—that is, with the portrait of Alicia. It hung up rather high, and he got a chair, climbed up, and kissed it again and again—and with great smacks too, that resounded through the room.

Then he got down. He was very adroit in his movements. He got down, and his eye fell upon the other portrait.

"Unpleasant brute!"

This was addressed to the late Mr. Brooklyn.

The chair was moved in no time. Up climbed Captain Jack, whipped a knife out of his pocket, and began deliberately to cut the portrait of Alicia's lamented husband from its frame; an employment which so fully engrossed him, that he did not hear the door open, or perceive that Alicia herself had entered.

The sight of a stranger absorbed in so extraordinary an act, in the very heart of her domains, was calculated to startle Alicia out of her wits. She had just time to utter a preliminary shriek, when Captain Jack turned round, the deceased Brooklyn hanging in an undignified and imbecile manner, his head flapping against his feet.

The moment Captain Jack caught sight of Alicia, he jumped from the chair, shut his knife, put it in his pocket, and ran towards her. It was well he did. She had ceased, indeed, to make any outcry; but she became deadly pale, and, to use his own expression, "fainted right slap away on the carpet."

Captain Jack was a man of ready resources. First he ran to the door and bolted it, to keep, as he said, the women out; then he opened a window as wide as it would go; and, lastly, he took Alicia in his arms, and carried her to a sofa, where a full current of air would blow upon her. Not lastly; I am wrong there. Last of all, he took a little flask from his pocket—familiarily called his pocket-pistol—and applied it to the lips of Alicia.

Now, whether it was the result of the current of air, which blew her black hair hither and thither, or the unusual aroma of the pocket-pistol, or both these things together, certain it is that Mrs. Brooklyn began to revive. It was rather a dangerous revival, for the moment her eyes opened, and fell, as naturally they would, upon Captain Jack, she went into violent hysterics. Indeed, the wonder is, that the whole house was not roused, and brought to the spot. Captain Jack seemed more nonplussed by this predicament than he had been by the other. He stood over her with a face of extreme anxiety; and all he could do was to utter the words, at intervals, and in a soothing tone, "Steady, my lass! steady, will you!"

After a time, the widow calmed down a little. It was evident that her emotion, violent as it was, did not proceed so much from fear as from surprise. When she had got better, and sat up, her hair dishevelled, her face wet with tears, and in a glow with agitation, Captain Jack felt considerably relieved. He had even begun to whistle, only that he checked himself.

"I thought you were dead!" cried Alicia, bringing out the last words almost with a shriek, and giving symptoms of another fit of hysterics.

Captain Jack whipped out his pocket-pistol, quick as thought.

"Oh, no, thank you!" cried the widow, putting up her hands, as though to keep it off. "Only, I never thought to see you any more." And a shower of tears began to fall.

"Steady, my—that is, don't cry, Alicia. I never was more alive since I was born. And I'm come back, more in love with you than ever."

"Oh, Captain Jack!"

"Yes, I am! I've been tumbling about on the sea, all this time, Alicia. I've been north, and south, and east, and west. I've seen all the countries that are—almost. There's nowhere I haven't been, and nothing I haven't seen! I nailed your colours to my mast, before I started. I've kept true to 'em, and I'm come sailing home with 'em. And the colours, bless 'em! are just included in one word, and that's the prettiest word in the whole language—Alicia!"

The widow gave a little laugh; then a little scream. "What on earth is that?" cried she.

The window was still open. Flap, flap, went the unhappy Brooklyn, head touching heels.

Captain Jack was on the chair, in the twinkling of an eye. He whipped out his knife, and lo! Brooklyn lay prone, almost before his widow had time to exclaim—

"Oh, Captain Jack, my husband—my precious husband! My——"

"Never do you mind, Alicia," and he caught her as she was rushing to the portrait; "you know very well you did not care a rush for him. And you know the frame is worth fifty guineas, and you can have a picture of me inside it."

A laugh, a flood of tears, a few hysteric sobs, and then another laugh. Then a storm of expostulation. Captain Jack was too busy to reply. He was rolling the piece of canvas round as tightly as possible, and tying it with string.

"There, it may go to the lumber room, and the sooner the better," said he, pitching it into a corner.

"I wonder you are not ashamed of yourself. I wonder you dare. You had better go!" with an hysterical emphasis on the word.

Captain Jack had seated himself in the most comfortable chair he could find.

"Oh, no; I am only just come."

Mrs. Brooklyn darted on him a look of indignation. There he sat, as cool and self-possessed as ever. There was something in the merry twinkle of his eye, in the roguish and audacious curve of the mouth, that disarmed her. With it all, she was not really angry with him. With it all, her heart was in raptures at having him back.

Years ago he had been her lover. Alicia had loved him in return. But the whole thing had been scouted and put down by the Pierpoint family.

Ne'er-do-well Jack? (For this was the name he went by.) Oh, it was not to be thought of for a moment! Send him to sea; send him anywhere, to be out of the girl's way.

So Jack, whose Christian name was Walter, was sent to sea, and kept there, till such time as Alicia had discreetly married Mr. Brooklyn. Then, as he said to himself, what was the use of coming back at all? From that time to this, he had made his home on the salt sea-wave, a daring, reckless, thriftless, but withal a generous and kind-hearted, fellow.

Everybody liked Captain Jack, which title had been given to him from his boyhood. He was not captain in a literal sense, nor, perhaps, ever would be.

He was not long in informing Mrs. Brooklyn that he had come back in his normal state—that is, without a penny in his pocket.

The news did not seem much to affect her. What a bronzed, handsome, audacious fellow he was! Just the same as when he climbed up the rocks, to get an eagle's nest. She saw him do it, and come battling down again, the old birds flying at his head. Or when he jumped on the back of Wild Tom, her father's hunter, and rode him without saddle or bridle, to the alarm and terror of the whole neighbourhood. He had been her hero. She had thought no one was like him in the world.

And had she changed her opinion?

We only know that the asthmatic Mercury, who had been vainly looking for the intruder, and who was in two minds about the police, found him at length. He met him coming down the long corridor, Mrs. Brooklyn herself, the late Alicia Pierpoint, leaning on his arm!

(To be continued.)

VOICELESS.

HE was leaning with her arms crossed on the ledge of an open window, all the summer sunshine streaming in on her face—on the dark eyes, with the piteous expression saddening their beauty; on the lovely curves of the little closed mouth—closed, alas! for ever; on the disconsolate grace of her bending figure. It was the sunset of a hot day at which the dumb girl was gazing—at the tinted heavens, the blue hills where the red clouds rested, the flashing and sparkling little brook, and the mountain road shining yellow in the golden light. And all down by the road sprang the blue corn-flowers, the red poppies, and the long feather grass. But the tears in Maggie's eyes threw a mist upon the earth, and a very wet veil on the flowers.

"I must walk it off," said Maggie, whispering the words to herself, and moving her lips as though she had indeed a voice; and she drew back into the little room that had been given up to her, and in the lovely little room was all that money or art could devise—snowy draperies round the fanciful bed; green Venetians, keeping the warm light cool; many-coloured flowers all round the open window; jessamine and roses stealing in from the outside. There were baskets of flowers on queer little tables, hanging baskets where the flowers dropped over, and delicate ferns softening down the bright tints. Green birds sang among the flowers, gold-fish rose and sank in bowls of cool fresh water, a large white cat lay asleep in the silken folds of a dress.

Books in the room were but scarce, but the selection, perhaps, was a good one: a large and clasped volume that tells the way of life, a simply-bound Prayer-Book, and a "Christian Year." And on a lower shelf a miscellaneous collection—"Sesame and Lilies," "A Crown of Wild Olives," and a very great favourite, a baby-book, but clever enough to rank among other than baby-books—"Alice in Wonderland."

On the light-papered walls hung prints symbolic of the purest hopes and fancies: "Purity," "Faith," and a smaller one, "The Star of Hope;" and on them the girl's dark eyes had many a time rested, but now they were not lifted so high.

She took down a light checked shawl, veiled herself, that no one might guess at her tears, and went out into the dying day. And the scent of the flowers rose up sweet around her; but all unheeded by Maggie were the flowers and the evening hymn of the birds.

One thought alone throbbed through her brain—"But thou continuest holy: O thou glory of Israel." Yet the want of faith in her heart bewildered her; so that the words brought her no comfort, but only a wild despair: for she understood them not.

Poor little Maggie! the trouble that was weighing on her was a very heavy one; and as long as she writhed beneath it the burden would never be lighter. Once she had had a voice as sweet as wild birds; then had been a time of trouble and illness; and after, when slowly there had come recovery, the sweetest tones of the house had been hushed, the well-loved accents lost for ever. And then, hardest of all to bear, there had been hope given; an operation skilfully performed—certainly a chance.

And now the experiment was over, and Maggie knew that through all the years of her life, long or few, there should none again hear her voice.

Oh, rudderless heart, seeking a rudder—the glory of Israel is steadfast. Suddenly, what we call an impulse, took Maggie off the winding golden road into some dewy fields that led to a cottage, the latch on the door of which gave to her hand, and showed another version of sorrow. When the door opened, Maggie stepped on to some red stones—the only piece of colour in the cottage—where the walls were bare and plain, and very ugly to the artistic eye of the dumb girl, that took them all in suddenly with a sense of disgust. There were damp-stains wherever it was possible for stains to be, and it was altogether utterly unlike the model cottage-home that once a year regularly appears in so many places on the Academy walls. A woman but little older than Maggie, three years ago a village beauty, now a wreck where beauty would not care to dwell, and had only left behind those traces which, when once given, can never be taken away. Gold, silky hair, from which much of the colour had fled, and outlines that told what the form and face might once have been. This girl—this woman—lay stretched on the damp, hard floor, her hands and face resting on a baby's little coffin, her tears dropping upon it, her heart beating on the cold little heart of her child. Not tears like Maggie's, nor heart-throbs like hers, though strangely—or not so strangely, perhaps, after all—the thought of both was the same:

That the God who sees all trouble in the heavens is holy; the unspoken words of both hearts the words of the Psalmist.

To Maggie they said: "All my happiness is gone; there is no more good for me. Life is but a name, when all that makes life dear is taken from me—when I must live in the past, and the future means nothing.

There shall never be love for me, unmixed with pity. The thoughts that God gives me, my voice shall never utter. A girl among girls, and unlike them all. And still—looking on my pain, 'Thou continuest holy!'"

But the mother's thought was half a prayer: "Oh, my God, many things are altered these last gone years. The happy home thou hadst given me, broken up for ever; my strength as though it never had been; my husband far away beyond the seas, and our only little child dead in my arms! One thought alone remains. My strength has failed by reason of thy will; the life of my husband rests with thy care; my child is gone to the everlasting hills, 'and thou continuest holy: O thou glory of Israel.'"

Softly Maggie closed the door, unheard by the mother. She quitted the cottage. She had learnt her lesson; from no words, indeed, for the mother had but wept and sobbed, but the dumb girl's quickened instinct told her the sobs were patient, the tears not rebellious. And so, walking homeward, the current of her thoughts was all changed. Self, slipping from sight, had left no jar in her nature. Instead of her troubles, she thought of the mother. Like a photograph, the scene kept rising up before her—the little coffin, the dead child, and the weeping, patient mother, and the girl that had cried for her voice ransacked her brain for the power to comfort. She had left hastily, lest the woman should turn and see her—Maggie, the little spoiled daughter of the wealthy old father, who passed in and out of the cottages, it is true, brightening them up with her shining dark eyes, but who had little or nothing in common with their owners. But now she thought and thought. "Oh, baby—baby!" the red lips moved, "how could the mother bear to let you go?" And the evening mists stole about the flowers, and the great purple moths sank to rest on the ground, and still the dumb girl thought on. Voiceless, what could she do? and, low down in her heart, a voice that need never be lost whispered to her old words, "Jesus wept;" and all that was truest in Maggie answered to the touch. Flashing and sparkling little brook, flow steadily now, for Maggie has learnt the whole lesson. There are other gifts lent us than a voice. High on the hills, the red and the gold faded out of the clouds, the last rays of sunlight slanting on Maggie. Ah, Maggie—Maggie! my dear little dumb girl, what can you do? What can you not do?

Voiceless! Your eyes speak, your lips quiver, and the dead baby's mother comes to cry in your arms.

Kind old father of a wayward little daughter, do you miss some of Maggie's many flowers? But the room is still sweet, very sweet, though some lilies and roses that used to be there are giving out their perfume in a little darkened cottage. There is more colour there now than the red on the stones. And the gift of the flowers is amply repaid. At home, at nights, in the fanciful room, that verse in the Psalms comes round in its turn, no longer now but half understood. Where the flowers are gone, the mother had taught it: "But thou continuest holy: O thou glory of Israel."

THE BUIYER

— Saturday, July 11. 1868. —

(Drawn by M. ELLÉN EDWARDS.)

"Is that the world, Aunt Judith?"—p. 675.

THE STORY OF AUNT JUDITH'S LIFE.

CHAPTER I.

I HAVE an idea that we date our recollections of the past from the first real impression made on our childish minds; at any rate, I know that my first real notion of life began when, in a fit of violent passion, I had exceeded the very bounds of reason, and, seizing a footstool, hurled it with all the force I could muster at the opposer of my will. Whether it was the few minutes' calm which succeeded this act of frenzy, that in its direct contrast to my feelings impressed the circumstance on my memory, or whether it was the gentle tone of Aunt Judith's voice breaking the calm, I cannot tell; I only know the impression was made, and I can now distinctly recall the feeling of awe with which I glanced round me to see what destruction my violence had perpetrated, as well as the silvery cadence of Aunt Judith's voice, as she said—

"I must send you away, Esther, if you treat me again in this manner."

If I had seen Aunt Judith's head lying at her feet, the result of my escapade, I should probably have felt proud of it: but, as she spoke, I saw her standing before me in her majestic beauty, and shuddered, as I should do now, if I had narrowly escaped mutilating some finely-chiseled statue. I knew nothing of statues or pictures then, but I remember that my admiration of Aunt Judith's beauty was parallel to that which works of art have since drawn from me.

"Aunt Judith!" I exclaimed, as soon as I could command my breath, "Queen Esther's face could not have been more beautiful than yours!"

I do not recollect the words of her answer. I was too much absorbed to heed them, but I have an indistinct perception that she applied the term "strange child" to me. No sooner had my passion subsided than I yielded my will to hers, gave up the Bible, as she had desired me to do, without waiting to finish reading its record of Queen Esther, and proceeded to work out the mathematical problem which was included in the list of tasks for that day. Aunt Judith had a decided taste for mathematics; she had Euclid at her fingers' ends, and was more inclined to think that I had shirked the problem through idleness than distaste. That the story of the beautiful Jewish maiden, so graphically narrated in the quaint measure of the inspired poet, could charm a child of thirteen years to such a degree as to cause an infringement upon time allotted to other studies, was incomprehensible to her! Yet Aunt Judith was not a persistent character, and I believe she felt on this occasion that she had misunderstood me, which induced her to regard with leniency the ill manner in which I subsequently worked out the problem. I remember, too, on the same night, after I had read the evening lessons to her and the maids, as usual, that she said to me, when the servants had withdrawn—

"Esther, tell me what made you break the rule this morning."

"It was the story of the Jewish Esther," I answered. "Oh, Aunt Judith, how I should like to have been King Ahasuerus! then she would have belonged to me."

Aunt Judith looked at me calmly, almost sternly, and then said—

"Poor child! there has been a mistake in your education. Your library has been too limited. The Bible, Esther, you should remember, is no mere story-book, nor its characters fictitious. Valuable as its historical records are, their value even sinks into insignificance by the side of those incomparable truths embodied in them."

As Aunt Judith spoke, I felt a degree of reverence creeping into my mind, probably the effect produced by her manner, and the sweet tones of her voice. I had no answer to make; if she had continued speaking for hours, I could have been content to listen, watching her lovely face lit up by enthusiasm; and, when she paused, I stood still looking at her,

"Have you ever wished for other books, child?" she asked, evidently puzzled at my silence.

"What other books do you mean, Aunt Judith?" I returned; "and where are they to be found?"

"You must know, Esther," she said, "that there are a great many other books in the world, besides those you have seen."

"And are there a great many more beautiful faces like yours in the world, Aunt Judith?" I asked. I had sorely puzzled her then. Some minutes passed before she spoke, and when she did, she took my face into her hands, and, looking full at me, said—

"Esther, my child, your aunt has meant well; but she sees her mistake now—the seclusion has tended to cramp a naturally intelligent mind. The mistake, however, can be rectified; only be a good child, and try to control your temper."

She kissed my forehead, and I went to bed full of wonder concerning the world that contained so many books that I had not seen, and probably, too, owned as many Aunt Judiths as books. The world! Was it, then, something more real than the big ball which I had been accustomed to roll round and round with my fingers twice a week, puzzled by the lessons I had received at the same time, and often inclined to believe that the numerous places, whose names taxed my memory to such an aggravating degree, were as imaginary as the circles, whose distances I had learned by rote, yet always failed to comprehend? The world! In which direction did it lie? High hills encompassed Aunt Judith's house; beyond those hills I had never been; might not they shut out from view this mighty world? Aunt Judith had said she would rectify her mistake. Perhaps she intended putting an end to our seclusion, and taking me beyond the hills.

These were my cogitations as I lay in my little white-curtained bed on that night, while the pale light of the moon was streaming in through the window, and reminding me, in the midst of my cogitatio, of the light which shone in Aunt Judith's eyes. I had no recollection of my parents, or of any other member of my family, and simply knew that I had been an only child, and left when quite an infant, to Aunt Judith's care. He was my father's aunt, and it had never occurred to my mind to ask why she had chosen to reside in such a lonely spot, so far away from any other habitation, and with even the parish church at an inaccessible distance. I do not remember now how many days elapsed before there was any noticeable change in the monotonous routine of my daily life, but I can well recall being startled one morning in the midst of some strange speculative imaginings, which I was prone to indulge in during the half-hour's recreation which intervened between my lessons and my daily walk, by Aunt Judith saying—

"I shall take Nina's place this morning, Esther, and walk with you."

Nina was my own maid, my faithful slave, and the chief victim of my self-willed and violent temper; and the idea of her weak rule over me being supplanted by Aunt Judith's inflexible one during my walk, was quite sufficiently displeasing to me to cause me to bounce out of the room, and slam the door after me with my utmost force, when I went to prepare for going out. Aunt Judith did not expostulate with me on my return, nor seem to notice the perverse silence I maintained as we went on. My rage had not been violent enough to exhaust itself, and, therefore, I was so occupied with my angry feelings that I failed to notice that we had left the valley in which Aunt Judith's house was situated, and were struggling up one of the high hills, beyond which I supposed the world to lie. I can remember how I threw off the hand which Aunt Judith entreatingly placed on my shoulder when she was fairly exhausted by the steepness of the ascent; and, as I did so, I made some rapid strides onwards, determined that nothing should stay my progress. But the words, "Esther, stay one moment," in my aunt's musical voice reached my ear, and like a spell arrested my steps. I stopped, and turned round. We were only half way up the hill, but still far above our valley home. The sun was at its meridian, and all around was bathed in a flood of light. I could see distinctly Aunt Judith's cottage in its nest of trees, and the little white-railed bridge at the entrance-gate, with the glittering stream which was pursuing its winding course through the valley with a low, gurgling sound. It was my first glance at one of Nature's pictures, and any description would be inadequate to convey the exaggerated idea I entertained of its surpassing beauty; as I gazed I exclaimed—

"Oh, Aunt Judith! I wish I lived on this hill, that I might always see our home look like that!"

My aunt made me no answer; she only said, after a very long pause—

"If we can manage to reach the top of the hill, Esther, you will see another picture on the other side."

This prospect drew me on, and the summit was reached at last. The declivity on the other side was much more gradual, and terminated in a beautiful plain, which seemed to extend over many miles of land. Far away in the distance I could discern a church tower, a noble turreted house, and several smaller ones, dotted here and there amongst the unvarying green of the plain.

"Is that the world, Aunt Judith?" I asked; "if so, it is very flat."

My question seemed unheeded, and I was too much occupied in my own imaginings to repeat it; I had even ceased to care for an answer, when Aunt Judith unexpectedly said—

"Yes, Esther, that was my world, and I never thought it flat."

"And did you find a great many books in it, and persons like yourself, Aunt Judith?" I asked.

"Not one exactly like myself, Esther," she replied; "but many far superior, and one better and nobler than all the rest."

"Shall I see all these superior persons, and the one better and nobler than all the rest too, Aunt Judith?" I demanded, eagerly.

"All are married; some are dead," said my aunt, in a very husky voice; then, clearing it, added, "Your world, Esther, I hope, will be a much larger one than mine was, and your circle of acquaintances more extensive."

"Why should it be, aunt?" I asked; "it was large enough for you."

"Yes, Esther, I was content with its circumscribed limit, and basked in the sunshine it contained; but time has wrought great changes at Nonsfall Towers, and, excepting a few servants, the bats and the owls are its sole occupants now."

"How they must hoot and cry at night, and flap their wings in that large house!" I observed, adding, "Your world, Aunt Judith, is left, then, to the owls and bats. I wonder what the end of mine will be."

Here there was a long pause, giving me time to indulge in the supposition that there was a separate world for every individual, yet failing to reconcile my supposition with the geographical idea impressed on my mind, that we all inhabited the same sphere.

"Esther," said my aunt at length, as she laid her hand impressively on my arm, "unless you would wreck your own happiness, and that of others dearer, may be, than even your own, learn to govern your temper while you are young, then if your world is left tenantless, and a mere haunt for bats and owls, their hooting and flapping will bring no sound of reproach to your ears."

Aunt Judith's manner was too solemn to admit of any attempt at reply, and we soon after went down the hill into the valley.

CHAPTER II.

"How long has Miss Shapcote been ill, little maiden?" and the kind old doctor patted my head as he asked the question.

"Ever since we walked to the top of the Norse," I answered, although I cannot remember now how many weeks had intervened since that walk had been undertaken.

"And what induced her to scramble up that hill, I should like to know?" returned the doctor. "One would think she was old enough to refrain from playing such pranks."

"Aunt Judith did not scramble up," I replied, with great dignity; "and, besides, she never plays pranks. She went up that hill for my sake, and because she wished to show me the world."

"The world!" exclaimed the doctor.

"Yes—her world," I answered.

"Her world!" the doctor repeated, musingly.

"In which there was not one person exactly like herself," I continued, "but many far superior, and one better and nobler than all the rest."

"Pshaw!" said the doctor, petulantly.

Not daunted, I proceeded, "Some are dead, the rest are married, and Aunt Judith's world is inhabited now by owls and bats."

"But I am neither married nor dead," interrupted the doctor.

"Was Aunt Judith's world yours as well?" I eagerly asked.

"Yes, child, mine as well," he returned.

"And does the hooting of the owls or the flapping of the bats bring any sound of reproach to your ears?" I asked.

The doctor knit his brows, as he sternly replied, "Child, I hear no other sound than the wail of a broken heart; of one too gentle and lovely for earth, crushed by the being whom she also thought better and nobler than all the rest;" and, not waiting for any further remark from me, he immediately went up-stairs to my aunt.

It might naturally be supposed that I was now furnished with additional material for speculation; but I recollect that I began to clear away my lesson books as soon as Dr. Heathfield had left the room (having gone through my customary routine of study by myself before his arrival), and, perseveringly trying to banish all thoughts of my conversation with him, got out Aunt Judith's work-basket, and sat down to darn stockings. The basket was full of clothes waiting to be made or mended, which, when done, would be sent to the clergyman at Norsfall for the benefit of the poor. Aunt Judith always contrived that a good-sized parcel ready for the first Miday in every month, when Thomas, our man-servant, invariably went to Norsfall to pay bills and lay in fresh stores, and I could not bear the idea that Thomas should go without the usual parcel, more particularly as the winter was threatening early approach, and I knew that the warm stockings and flannels were becoming needful; I therefore resolved to make up the parcel for Aunt Judith. I well remember what a weary task it was to me; and after concentrating my whole thought and attention upon the darn I was making, how sorely perplexed I was to find my lines of worsted as irregular as possible. I was just beginning to draw them out again, with the intention of making another trial, when Dr. Heathfield returned.

"Your aunt is very ill, little maiden," he said; "fever threatens. I have ordered your maid to pack up a few necessities, and accompany you to my house."

"Nina is quite at liberty to go," I said, with the stocking still on my hand, "but I shall not leave my aunt."

"Tut—tut!" he exclaimed, "you will do as you are bid."

"Dr. Heathfield!" I said, removing the stocking from my hand, and standing erect before him, "what right have you to bid me do anything?"

"I am not going to argue with you, my little maiden," he answered; "it is for your safety, and therefore I am determined to take you and your maid with me."

A mad fit of fury followed. I have a distinct recollection of coming to myself, and finding that I had succeeded in thrusting the doctor from the room, locked the door and sprained my wrist. And I can also distinctly remember the long hours I afterwards daily spent by Aunt Judith's bedside, while she was too ill to recognise me, as I sat, darning those worsted stockings, and with my right wrist stiff and swollen. Whenever the sound of Dr. Heathfield's carriage fell on my ear, I immediately retreated to my own room, where I remained until his visit was over.

One evening, Aunt Judith was alarmingly ill. I was seated as usual, with the last of the twelve pairs of stockings on my hand, suppressing by a great effort the groan which the increasing pain in my wrist almost forced from me, and wondering why I felt so giddy and faint, when suddenly I seemed to lose all consciousness, and a long and strange time ensued, the only perception of which I retain being a delirious fancy that Nina was darning my right hand and arm, and disregarding the excruciating pain she was causing me in her great desire to get them ready for Dr. Heathfield to take to Norsfall for the benefit of the poor. But this long and strange period came to an end at last, and I remember waking as from some quiet dream and seeing Aunt Judith standing by the fire in conversation with Dr. Heathfield.

"There is more hope for poor Esther than there was for me at her age," my aunt was saying; "I was never half as much in earnest as she is; and I feel persuaded if any one could convince her how deplorable such a temper is, she would shrink from nothing, however much pain it might cost her, that would help her to conquer it."

(To be concluded in our next.)

A WORD UPON KEEPING UP THE FIRES.

BY THE REV. W. M. STATHAM.

THAT multitudes of steam-vessels are crossing and recrossing the Atlantic at this moment! There are our enterprising American brethren visiting England, and our English statesmen, students, and merchants visiting the New England shores! May God in his mercy speed the mutual peace and prosperity of two nations, who, one in blood, and speech, and religion, should be one evermore in love and good faith, emulating each other in all that tends to the material and moral progress of humanity; and in all that aids in the destruction of despotism and wrong. But what has this article on fuel to do with America? Nothing much; except that when there is any difference between two high-spirited nations, you may help to feed the fire, or by keeping the fuel of angry words away, help to put it out. That is all. But what has the subject to do with those ships on the bosom of the broad Atlantic? just this: Have you ever been aboard, when all in a second the paddle-wheels cease their swift revolutions, and the ship suddenly comes to a pause? For a moment, she seems to have received a crack on the head from Old Neptune, which has stunned and stopped her. If so, you will know what I mean when I say it is most mightily unpleasant thus to come to a dead stop. It may be that something is out of gear in the machinery, or it may be the result of a stern word of command from the captain, who sees some sudden danger ahead; or it may be because the stokers have neglected the fuel, and the fires are out. It is not enough to light fires, or to tend them fiercely at first, as boys do new rabbits, and as girls for a few days pet canary birds—for, as we all know, there is the danger of their starving afterwards. No; fires must be kept alight—whether they be fires of duty, home affection, or religion. Now the grand old Book has in its Proverbs this very teaching. We are told, "Where no wood is, there the fire goeth out;" and that has mainly suggested this word upon fuel. We too often forget that in the Divinely-inspired sentences of the book of Proverbs, we have golden words for our present life. Only very superficial minds confine them to the express point of their application. They are as many-sided as human life and duty. This one is a remarkable instance of the kind; it reminds us, indeed, forcibly of Paul's injunction to Timothy, to stir up the gift that is in him. The Greek word used is a compound of three little words: ava, meaning up; ζωη, meaning life; and πυρ, meaning fire: so that, put together, they mean—"stir up the fire," or "give life to the fire."

Now, we know when, in material things, we do this, that we soon require a fresh supply of coal; and the analogy holds good in the spiritual world. We must get while we give, or the fire of early enthusiasm will soon decline and die out. We must have fuel before we can have fire; fuel of thought before we can have force of conviction; fuel of motive before we can have force of endeavour. There is all the difference between an engine half-supplied, and panting along with difficulty, as if it were suffering from asthma, and the engine well-regulated and well up to its work. And there is all the difference between the man who never animates his zeal by the contemplation of noble examples in the senate, the camp, and the church, and the man who is wise enough to feed the fire of his spirit by the fuel of good biographies. Energy is thus gained from pondering the histories of great and good men, which any who have read Dr. Arnold's life will well understand. Many men only work at half-power, or quarter-power, simply because they are too lazy or indifferent to tend the fires which feed the mysterious spirit of man. Where there is little wood the fire declines, and where there is no wood the fire dies out. We can easily see how related this teaching is to the maintenance and development of all kinds of life—the evil as well as the good. Most especially does it adapt itself to the beginner in the Divine life, warning him to give due heed to the feeding of the fires of his faith and love, and reminding him that the prayer of the renewed soul is, "Give us this day our daily bread,"—that beautiful recognition of our constant need of daily strength, "to none that ask denied," so that we may be "filled with all the fulness of God."

But to keep the fire alight we must have suitable fuel; and we have a plentiful storehouse of it in the Word of God. We are not left to feed the fire of the soul by fancies about God, or by mere intuitive conceptions of our own. We see how the students of old philosophy fed the fire of thought with ever fresh researches; but in vain did they essay to keep up the motive-power of obedience. We have a more sure word of prophecy; to which we do well to give heed. Take the book of Proverbs. How wonderfully they are related to our woe! how their setting in human character would brighten and beautify it! But in the Gospel of Christ, what fuel we have for a holy life! what motives to obedience! what quickenings of the sense of accountability! what ever-recurring thoughts of the judgment! what sublime views of the fatherhood of God! what constraints of the cross of Christ! what prospects of honour, glory, immortality, and eternal life! Why, the fuel for intellect and heart is INFINITE! If we neglect the Book-study, the means of grace, and sanctuary associations, by simple letting alone, the fire gets dull, spiritless, and dead. As the Cunard steamer ploughs the sea, while the coal is yet all aglow with heat, more fuel is placed upon it. As we speed along our iron railroads, we push on our way only by the stoker's unwearied work. God has not left us to any kind of want. There is much variety in the fuel for the necessities of the inner life,—food for the conscience, the mind, and the heart. There are doctrines, precepts, warnings, promises, and motives, all adapted for our manifold necessities. God will not work a miracle to keep us alive. He has promised all things necessary for life and godliness, and he has commanded us to look to ourselves—to be careful concerning the earnest activity of all mind and heart forces. Experience itself shows us that "where there is no wood, the fire goeth out."

But we have an application of this fact in the sphere of all human relationships. It is not enough to confine it to the Divine side of our life—to love to Christ, growth in holiness, and meetness for heaven; it is equally true of the human side of life, in relation to all social and civil ties. Think of the amazing number of means and appliances which men must bring to bear if they would be successful in trade; how they must keep alive enterprise, attention, courtesy, variety, constancy, and efficiency. They know this well, as witness the system of advertisements ever-renewed, and fresh shop-fronts, one superior to the other every few years. "The children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light." We may notice the fact also in all the aspects of human relationship. Love, for instance, is not such a perfectly self-sustained thing that it can do without constant and kind attention. What makes some married lives shorn of tenderness and beauty but this, that all those minute and precious attentions and kindnesses, once solicitously shown, have become neglected, or altogether discontinued? And what makes home affection weak, but inattention? Depend upon it, those who come to great cities from country places, and have left father and mother there, if they want to preserve the fire of affection burning in their own hearts; if they wish to cherish all tender and holy remembrances of dear ones left behind, they must keep the wood on the fire, they must often write to their loved ones, pray about them, and keep their chairs well filled in the chambers of the memory. Distance, indeed, does not cool, if we keep the fires of remembrance burning; but even the Divinely-implanted instincts of affection, mighty as they are, may become weakened if we forget to nurture and care for them. To all of us the motto is not inapplicable: Take care of the wood! In church life, home life, married life, as sons and daughters, husbands and wives, masters and servants, take care of the wood; feed the fire with holy, kind, and thoughtful remembrances! If there are ashes nearly white, we can restore the fire yet with painstaking care; but it is possible that while we delay the last sparks may go out. Ah! how many could stand before us and say, "Would to God I had been more mindful of others! They are dead now." Well does the poet, speaking of the monarch Death, say—

"Nor to the streaming eye thou giv'st them back, Nor to the breaking heart."

We have the distinct relation of the idea to talebearing: "Where no wood is, the fire goeth out: so where there is no talebearer, the strife ceaseth." We are curious beings, and amongst our many propensities there is the Athenian-like one of hearing something new: if startling, of course so much the better. We should most of us find it almost impossible not to relish a bit of scandal. We pretend not to like it, but we do; we shrug our shoulders, and say, "Dear me! it can't be;" but we are eager to hear it. This belongs to all races! That picture in the late Royal Academy, "Telling it on the Housetops," was a very beautiful representation of Eastern tale-telling. There is always a temptation, greater or less—alike in north, south, east, and west—a temptation greater or less, of course, according to circumstances, to recount anything stirring and strange. There is a pleasure in giving a thrill of excitement to a friend's frame, as though we carried a small galvanic battery in our pocket; and, oh! to watch the surprised countenance! We are all pretty much upon a par concerning these things. It is idle to talk of women gossiping so much. My experience of life tells me that men like gossiping, and do gossip, every whit as much as women. But the idea here is very specific: it is bearing a tale—that is, going about with it, and that often means garnishing it too, putting some parsley in the dish as we go along. Strife often comes from these tales; they injure business, reputation, character, and make life a scene of suspicion. Oh! what wonderful words those are concerning exclusion from heaven: "Nor whosoever loveth or maketh a lie"—as if this, which is one of the saddest experiences of earth, could have no place in the sweet rest of heaven. Supposing, however, there were no wood; suppose that any one has lighted a base idea of another in our hearts—then let it burn out. Then there's an end on't. But if A. goes to B., and B. to Z., and then Z. walks back with B., and tells all the other letters on his way, then there is wood, wood, wood, and it cracks and kindles for a long, long time, until, perhaps, it burns away a reputation or character. What a splendid answer it would be if, the very next time any one comes to you with a bit of slander, you say, "Good sir, I don't keep wood!" How the tale-teller would stare at you. Say, further, "I'm quite out of it; I don't sell it, or keep it." With much disappointment he would bid you "good-day!" And what a refreshing remark to one who tells you some good thing about your poor anxious neighbour, or your pushing, energetic, young friend, "All right, I keep wood, sir—lots of it; I'll help him by a cheering word or two to keep his hope and resolution alive!" Very funny and extraordinary: I keep wood, and I don't keep it! Never mind, friend, there's a glorious inconsistency in that! The tale-bearing view is doubtless the direct application of this proverb, and that is why I have said so much about it. It is good sometimes to be short of fuel, and depend upon it the worst feud will die out in a nation, a church, or a family if you and the devil do not keep putting sticks of remembrance upon it. What a precious Gospel that is which tells us to cease from anger! and what a touching prayer we often use, that God would "have mercy on our enemies, persecutors, and slanderers, and turn their hearts."

Doubtless, this proverb stands in direct relation to our Christian life. Many religious people, now-a-days, content themselves with one attendance at church on the Lord's day; the result, too often, is a languid and lifeless religion. Christian truths are so capable of adaptation to our hearts and lives, and are so stimulating to our spirits, that we none of us feel just as we did before, when we leave the sanctuary. It is often—very often—the gate of heaven to our soul. There is a self-consuming power in religion, as well as in all other things; and concerning Christian enterprise, how true it is that we need ever fresh and fresh supplies of fuel. All the great lives which have been the glory of Christ's Church, have been the outcome of constant fellowship with truth, as revealed in the Word of God, and embodied in the lives of men. It was so with Oberlin, Martyn, and Brainerd. How strange it seems that all our earthly enterprises are carried on by this fuel-feeding process! Thoughts of daily necessities, of our children, of our future, all come before us, and keep alive the stress of enterprise and the fervour of duty. Well, enough; but then we are heirs of eternity; we have a great and wondrous future before us. Shall we not feed our higher nature, too—add thought to thought concerning the grandeur of the soul and the glory of immortality, until the higher part of our nature glows with lofty aspirations? Thus we shall understand the mission of the Redeemer into the world, and the meaning of his sacrifice; and thus shall we, on the shrine of our hearts, have something akin to the Hebrew altar-fire in the grand old Temple of Jerusalem. "The fire shall be ever burning on the altar: it shall never go out."

PILLAR SAINTS.

AMONG all the curious forms of mortification that were practised in the early ages of the Church, there was none more remarkable than the habit of residing on the top of pillars. The persons who practised this extraordinary penance were called Stylites, or "Pillar Saints," their patron being St. Symeon Stylites, the original founder of the order. It is sad to think that any persons could ever have imagined that by such self-inflicted tortures they could merit heaven and the favour of God.

The utmost ingenuity was exhausted in the fourth and fifth centuries, in devising such means of torture; men considered that thereby they could arrive at a high degree of sanctity, and leave behind them a memory redolent of Christian virtue. The impression everywhere existed that by such sufferings they would, in the first instance, punish their bodies, which were the seat of sin, and, in the next, offer to God an atonement for their manifold transgressions—to such a degree had the Church thus early lost sight of the great principles of the Gospel, and the way of acceptance with God through Jesus Christ. The closest ties of affection were ruthlessly burst asunder in order that men might more unreservedly and without distraction give themselves up to contemplation and prayer. Thus we read of one monk, by name Pior, taking a vow upon him, that he would never again look on any of his relatives. After he had spent fifty years in the desert, his sister hears of him, and prevails upon him to visit her. He appears before her home with closed eyes, which he continues to keep obstinately closed throughout the interview. Another monastic devotee, after fifteen years of separation from his home, receives a bundle of letters, which he forthwith casts into the fire, lest their contents should distract his mind.

The teachers of the Church, instead of seeking to restrain such unnatural devotion, only fanned the flame the more. We find St. Jerome thus writing to one who was thinking of becoming a monk:—"Although your little nephew should hang about your neck; although your mother, with hair dishevelled and garments rent, should show you the breasts at which she nourished you; although your father should lie on the threshold, trample on your father, and set out! Fly with dry eyes to the banner of the Cross! The only kind of piety is to be cruel in this matter."

One class of these ascetics, whose highest ambition it was to reduce themselves to as perfect a level as possible with the brute creation, were called boscoi, or "graziers." These ecclesiastics lived in the deserts and mountains, without any roof to shelter them, while they exposed themselves, almost entirely naked, to all the severity of the weather. They learned to browse on the grass of the field until, both in body and mind, they lost the semblance of human creatures, and fulfilled their desires by becoming undistinguishable from the cattle whose pastures they shared.

We sigh as we read over the exploits of modern fakeers; but we must remember we have their archetypes in the history of a Christianity, alas! too early corrupted. It seems to be the natural tendency of man everywhere to believe in the power of propitiating God by self-inflicted tortures: and may we not see here an unconscious evidence of the deep conviction, in the first place, of indwelling sin, and, in the second place, that that sin needs an atonement? Man will give "the fruit of his body for the sin of his soul," or else will offer up himself in wounds and scars, in the hope that such a sacrifice will be accepted of God.

No self-inflicted torture took so strange a shape as that which was practised by the Stylites, or Pillar Saints. The founder of this order of ascetics was a monk named Symeon, a native of Syria. In his infancy he was employed to feed his father's flocks, but, resolving on assuming a religious life, at the age of thirteen he entered a monastery, where he resided for nine years. His mortifications here excited the admiring wonder of the other monks. On one occasion, being sent to draw water, he took the rough palm-rope and bound himself with it tightly round the waist, and then pretended he could not find it. After some days, drops of blood oozing down revealed the secret, and it was found that the rope had become so tightly fastened round his body as to be almost entirely concealed. The young monk bore without a murmur the exquisite pain of having it removed, and would not allow any remedies to be applied to the wound. At length the abbot begged him to depart, as his austerities were too severe for the weaker brethren, who might desire to emulate him.

Symeon now removed to a place about forty miles distant from Antioch, where he lived for some time in a kind of narrow den. He next devised the most original idea of taking up his abode on the top of a pillar. Some say that his intention, in the first instance, was to escape the crowds who were continually pressing round so holy a man, seeking to touch him, in order to be cured of their diseases. His first pillar was about a yard in diameter, though some say it was not so wide by half. He removed successively from one pillar to another, always increasing the height, until at length he attained an altitude of forty cubits. In this position he spent the last thirty-seven years of his life.

In the eyes of his deluded followers, Symeon became as it were an angel lifted up above the ordinary level of mankind, as he certainly was in the literal sense. His pillar became a kind of altar, before which prayer was perpetually offered; he was regarded as a kind of intercessor, evermore pleading with God for the people, and from his elevated position bringing down heavenly graces upon them. In offering up his prayers to God "he bent his body so that his forehead almost touched his feet; a spectator once counted 1,244 repetitions of this movement, and then lost his reckoning."*

As before, so now also, Symeon's devotions excited the jealousy of the surrounding monks. They sent to ask him why he could not be content with ordinary mortifications, such as had suited former saints? Their messenger was to command him to leave his pillar, and if he would not do so willingly, they were to pull him down. Symeon, on hearing their order, made as though he would step down quietly from his lofty home—a movement which was regarded at once as a signal instance of the Divine favour; and so the messengers returned without accomplishing their object. His fame now spread in every direction; pilgrims came from the most distant regions to see so wondrous a saint. From Persia, Ethiopia, Spain, Gaul, and Britain, they flocked to the Stylite, to receive his benediction and witness his

* Robertson's "Church History," vol. i., p. 352.

(Drawn by J. D. WATSON.)

"Pass sweetly to thy rest."—p. 632.

miracles; little models of him were manufactured as charms to keep away the evil spirits; kings sent ambassadors, who held interviews with him, and with whom he condescended to speak from his elevated position. He corresponded with bishops and emperors, and influenced the policy both of Church and State, while by his life and exhortations he converted multitudes of Saracens and other nomads of the desert.

But Symeon was not to be without those temptations which from time to time had befallen other eminent saints. The devil appeared to him on one occasion, and invited him to ascend to heaven, after the manner of Elijah, in a chariot of fire, surrounded with saints and angels. Symeon was betrayed into yielding to the temptation, and lifted his foot as if to ascend into the waiting chariot, at the same time he happened to make the sign of the cross, on which the tempter vanished. As a punishment of his presumption, he was afflicted with an ulcer in his thigh, and, by way of penance, he determined never again to touch the pillar with the member that had offended. For the remainder of his days he continued perched, like a stork, on one foot, on the summit of his pillar.

At length his self-inflicted tortures were over, and Symeon died, A.D. 460, in the seventy-second year of his age, having, as his last act, sent his cowl as a legacy to the Emperor Leo. "We are told," says Robertson, "that around the spot which had long been his abode all nature mourned his departure: the birds wheeled about his pillar, uttering doleful cries; men and beasts filled the air with their groans to a distance of many miles, while the mountains, the forests, and the plains were enveloped in dense and sympathetic gloom. An angel, with a countenance like lightning, and in raiment white as snow, appeared, discoursing with seven elders in awful tones, of which the words could not be distinguished; and as the precious body was carried to Antioch, to serve the city as a defence instead of the walls which had been lately overthrown by an earthquake, a multitude of miracles marked its way."

On Symeon's death, a disciple named Daniel undertook to perpetuate the order of Pillar Saints. He set up his pillar at a spot revealed to him by a dove, about four miles north of Constantinople. For thirty-three years he continued to occupy the same position, until he died, at the age of eighty. By constantly standing, his feet had become covered over with sores. It was in vain that his disciples endeavoured to discover by what means his life was sustained as he appeared to take no nourishment. Sometimes the high winds that swept down from Thrace stripped him of his clothes, and almost blew him from his pillar. Sometimes he looked like a great icicle, covered as he was for days with ice and snow, until, at length, the emperor, very much against his will, had his pillar covered over with a shed to protect him from the inclemency of the weather. Daniel, too, like his predecessor, had the reputation of performing miracles, and his pillar was the resort of admiring thousands. He was regarded as an oracle, and, like Symeon, was courted by bishops and emperors.

Stylites continued to exist in Syria and Greece up to the twelfth century; but we do not read of them elsewhere. On one occasion, when an attempt was made to introduce them into the West, the bishop of the diocese ordered the pillar to be destroyed. Thus this extraordinary practice died out in the Church, and now only leaves with us a sentiment of wonder that such a system of mortification should ever have been permitted, or have been observed by persons outside the limits of a lunatic asylum. But what will not the mind of man be capable of originating, when under the influence of the spirit of superstition?

Instead of all such mortifications, true Christianity presents to us an atonement for our sins already perfected in the death of Jesus Christ, whose blessed Gospel has been well characterised by a converted Brahmin as "Peace-to-day." "Being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ."

Such histories as that of the Pillar Saints show us what men will do and suffer to obtain this peace while they seek it in the wrong way.

F L E D !

MASS softly, O redeemed soul!
 Pass sweetly to thy rest;
 Feel not again these tears that roll
 On thy bereaved breast.
 Fly, happy bird! nor in the skies
 Think on thy saddened nest.

So short I heard thy simple lay,
 So short I had delight,
 And looked upon thy rising day,

Nor thought of early night;
 But even then a little cloud
 Was seen by clearer sight.

Sometimes a sadder dream would come,
 Like shadows on the sod;
 Thou didst but wander from thy home,
 And from the feet of God,
 A little to the school of earth
 To feel life's bitter rod:

And bore His mandate in thy breast
 Thou shouldst return again;
 Nor seek in weary lands thy rest,
 Nor joy midst joyless men.
 Thy little task was swiftly learned,
 And nought might keep thee then.
 Farewell! that saddest word on earth,
 Above is gladly heard;
 Who lost thee at thy lower birth

Are now with rapture stirred,
 When thy pure wings shake off the dust
 Of life, thou cageless bird!

They beat not long on golden gates,
 Which ope and take thee in;
 The song that thine approaching waits
 I cannot tell, whose sin
 Dulls my conceit; I only dream
 The glory thou shalt win.

J. S. W.

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE SWEETS OF INDUSTRY.

IN this period of her history, Alice Sylvester might be said to live in a world of her own. She was tasting, for the first time, the sweets of employment. The lazy laggard, who drones away his hours, and can scarce accomplish anything, might have envied the swiftness and the deftness of those busy fingers of hers: might have admired, and done well to emulate her untiring energy.

Every moment she could snatch unobserved, and without fear of detection, she gave to her work. When night came, she would steal more time than the day could give her, and prosecute her task till after midnight. This was not well, and these stolen hours would have their effect upon her health, ere long; but in her zeal and eagerness, she never thought of that. She cared for nothing, so she might do some act of recompense to one of the many whom the Sylvesters had wronged. If she had let herself be discouraged by the thought of how small the recompense would be, in the face of all the wrong and evil, her busy hand would have been slackened. But she did not. She thought, instead, of instances recorded in the sacred Book of women, like herself, who had done what they could.

Her efforts were to be directed to one object for the present; that object was to relieve, or rather to repay, the wretched woman who has been mentioned before, and who had come to ruin, because the ladies for whom she worked had never found it convenient to settle with her. The thought of this woman never failed to bring a blush of shame to Alice's cheek. Till something was done, she might well forbear to sleep.

But industry gains in the race. Her work was done at last, and to-morrow she could carry it home. Yes, and be paid!

The spirits of her ancestors might vex themselves in vain. The Sylvester dignity might weep and wail, as though its grandeur had departed. We rather think it had waxed glorious in Alice!

She was very tired when her work was done. Midnight had passed, and so had some of the small morning hours. Her face was white; her hands and feet deathlike in their coldness; but her heart was warm, and full of gladness. She could not sleep, even when she had put out her light, and the weary head was resting on the pillow. She was so eager to pour out her earnings; yes, every farthing, into the lap of wretchedness and want!

The next day she was on the watch for an opportunity of going out alone. She soon found it, for her mother and Raymond were closeted together, as usual, all the morning. How eagerly her trembling hands tied on her bonnet! how swiftly her feet sped along the crowded pavement! how her heart beat with a sensation entirely new and strange; and half of pain, and half of joy. For she, a Sylvester, had stepped from the pedestal of the family greatness, and was here, down in the arena of common working-day life. She had been earning money!

But, on the whole, the sweetness preponderated; when the people for whom she worked, paid her; when she had the money in her hand, honestly and honourably earned, then conscience smiled, and whispered an approval.

It was not much she had gained; but she let no feeling of discouragement or discontent creep in. She thanked Heaven, and took courage. Holding the money in her hand, she turned her steps to a part of the town she had rarely been accustomed to visit. It was the part where, among courts, and alleys, and crowded streets, the poorer inhabitants of the town were herded together.

There was a vast amount of poverty and distress in Newbury. Alice knew this; but she was about to single out one solitary object—and that not for charity. "Oh no!" she thought, with bitterness; "we have not attained to that; we must first be just."

When she reached the most crowded and miserable part of the district, she began to ask for the person she was come to see. Jane Hubbard was the name of the woman, and Jane Hubbard lived up a wretched alley, where a number of squalid houses were huddled so close, that the least strip of sky was visible overhead.

"Not that she'll be here much longer," said the neighbour of whom Alice inquired. "She's just at death's door—that's what she is."

"Is she worse, then?" asked Alice, a chill dread creeping to her heart.

"Well, she can't be much worse than she has been, this long time," replied the woman. "She's worked herself to death—sitting, stitching, day and night, too. You gentlefolks know nothing of that!"

Alice did not speak. The woman looked at her with more curiosity than civility.

"The great folks she worked for never paid her—some of them, at least. I'm not going to say all were as bad; but I'm thinking her death will lie at the door of them as didn't!"

"I will go and see her," said Alice, turning pale, and the tears gushing to her eyes.

When she reached the top of the alley, she stopped. It was a wretched house, with the window broken, and stuffed with straw; and, as Alice knocked, a hollow, wearing cough sounded from within. She knew whose cough it was, and she opened the door softly, and went in.

It was a chill, bleak day, but the grate was almost fireless. There was no furniture, beyond a chair or two and an old chest, which served for a table. Jane Hubbard sat by the grate, stitching—yes, stitching! Her wasted hands could scarce hold the needle. She had to stop, every few moments, when the cough seized her. She was bent almost double with what she called the tearing pain of that cough. Her face was deathly pale, her cheeks hollow, and her whole look like that of a person who is dying by inches. Yet she could not stop, or rest; she must work on, till she died!

She looked up, when Alice came in. She had a kindly nature, and, in her better days, had been as sprightly as you please. A touch of her old cheerfulness lingered yet.

"Oh, Miss Sylvester, how good of you to come and see me!"

Alice shuddered. "Do not use the word good to us, or any such as us," said she, bitterly. "God knows we ill deserve it!" For the sight of the woman had half made her mad!

"I am sure you are good, Miss Sylvester! I always said so. If the rest had been—— But, there, we need not mention names."

"Jane," said Alice, standing before her, and speaking in a voice tremulous with feeling—"Jane, I have done what little I could, not to help, but to do you the barest, commonest justice. Do not thank me"—for the woman had eagerly taken the gold, and was bursting into exclamations of gratitude—"I cannot bear it. I should scarce have been surprised if you had cursed me!"

"Oh, no, Miss Sylvester; never think it. And how good you are! Only think! Is all this for me?"

Alice sat down by the poor dying woman, and took the wasted hands in hers.

"You shall work no more, Jane—I will work for you!"

The woman did not often hear the voice of sympathy. That sweet face—those compassionate eyes—touched her to the quick. She had not wept, lately. Her life had seemed to lie through a bitter waste, where no fountain of tears could spring up. But the fountain was unsealed. She wept like a child.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

JOHN HUMPHREYS DOES NOT STAND THE ORDEAL.

"Now, my good fellow, it is of no use your stopping me any longer. My horse will run over you."

"I don't care, Mr. Carlton! I must get speech of you, and I will!" said John Humphreys, recklessly.

Mr. Carlton had just cleared the town, and was setting off for his constitutional ride. It was unpleasant to have his placid enjoyments so interfered with. He was really very sorry for "poor Humphreys," as he called him; but, sorry or not, it was no easy matter to shake him off. John Humphreys's hand was on the bridle, and John Humphreys's face had an expression with which it would not be safe to tamper.

"I can do nothing for you, you know," said the lawyer, peevishly, and heartily wishing to wash his hands of the whole matter.

"You can answer me a question or two, I suppose," replied John Humphreys, fiercely.

"Certainly, I can answer you a question," replied the lawyer, meekly. He was really in a very unpleasant position.

"Well, then, how is it you came and tied me off? How dare you, when you must have known how things would go?" said John, hotly.

"In the first place, my friend, I did not know. I did the best I could. I am in the Sylvester interest, and have been these many years. They came to me to tide them over a difficulty, and I did it."

"How dared you tell me that Mr. Raymond was going to be married?" cried John, taking no notice of the lawyer's speech.

"I thought he was. You must make allowance for slips of that kind, you know, Mr. Humphreys."

"Ah! you have all conspired against me, every one of you!" said John, bitterly; "but why cannot you tide me over, as well as them. I deserve it more. I am an honest man, and they are rogues!"

"In what respect tide you over? What do you want me to do?" said the lawyer, blandly.

"Take up that wretched bond, and lend me money on it. You roll in wealth, all the world knows it!" said John, in the same bitter tone.

The lawyer smiled placidly. "You see, Mr. Humphreys, that would scarcely suit my purpose. The bond is worth little more than waste paper."

"What!" thundered John, excessively excited; "what!"

"The fact is," said the lawyer, confidentially, "you have been sadly taken in, my friend. I mention no names; but we know what we know!"

"Speak plainly if you please, Mr. Carlton," said

John, giving such a pull at the bridle that the horse reared, and almost threw its rider.

"Softly, Mr. Humphreys," said the lawyer, turning pale; "softly! or we shall have an accident."

"Never fear that, sir. What was it you said about the bond?"

"Well, in the first place, some grand people that we know of, are very hard up indeed. I suppose you can understand that."

"Well?" said John, moodily.

"And there will be a crash, and soon. When the crash comes, I can calculate, to a nicety, what there will be for the creditors. A dividend after some time—some long time, mind—of perhaps sixpence in the pound."

John's face looked very blank indeed.

"I am sorry for you, Mr. Humphreys; but I assure you that your case will not be the worst, by any means. You are young and strong, and can soon right yourself. I advise you, as a friend, to give up all idea that the money is owing you—for the present, at least. Learn to work your way without it, and then it may come when it likes."

John had let go the bridle. He stood like one stunned or stupefied. The lawyer cast on him a look of pity. But what was the use of harrowing up his feelings, and spoiling the pleasure of his ride? There were hundreds of such cases, yea thousands!

"In this world one must get a kind of hardness, or else one could not live," thought Mr. Carlton. He thought it, as he trotted up the hill, the open country before him, and behind him the figure of John Humphreys.

There are some characters that cannot bear the test of adversity. We read, in Holy Writ, of the seed that sprung up, but in time of temptation fell away.

The seed had sprung up in John Humphreys's heart, and had been fair to look upon. He had kept an even, unruffled course, and had been exempt from trials of any kind. Now the trials were coming thick and threefold, and behold, how the seed languished! It had no root in itself, and was falling away!

He walked slowly back to his house. There was no pleasure to him now in the sight of the trim garden and the well-kept premises. All he had was slipping from him, thanks to the Sylvesters!

He sat down by the fire, in an attitude of dejection; he had got into that habit just lately, and Rachael was sorry for it.

She brought her work, and sat by him.

"You must not be down-hearted, John," she began; "I have been thinking what to do."

Somehow, from the first—the very first, it seemed to be apparent that the burden would lie, not on his shoulders, but on hers.

"It is no good thinking, Rachel," said he gloomily; "I have thought, till I am about tired of it."

"But I have thought to some purpose," said she, cheerfully; "and I don't see any reason to despair. If we have to leave the farm——"

He interrupted her, with a start. "Rachel, how can you speak so lightly of what will half kill me?"

"Oh, no! John, you must not fancy that. There is no disgrace; only misfortune, in having to leave."

He relapsed into his dejected attitude.

"I have heard of a nice place for you, John; and I think it is so providential," said Rachel, wiping her eyes, for she was anything but indifferent to the trial before them. "Do you know, Colonel Heywood wants a bailiff?"

"Colonel Heywood!—what have I to do with him?"

"Nothing now, but you may have, if you choose to try, and get the situation. I am told he is an excellent master."

"What's the use of being a bailiff, for a man who has had a farm of his own?" said John, sadly.

"Every use, dear. It will be an immediate help. And there is a pretty little cottage; and we can soon make it comfortable. I mean to try my hand at dressmaking, John. I used to do a little at it, once on a time," said Rachel, cheerfully.

"Ah!" and John gave a sigh.

"You don't know how many coins I may not bring to the till," continued she, striving all the more to cheer him; "only have patience, and we may get on and do famously."

John sat a few moments, in a moody silence.

"I don't mean to be anybody's bailiff," said he, at length. "I mean to go round the town to-morrow, and raise money on that bond."

Rachel laid down her work; her face had an anxious expression. "John, dear; I wish you would be ruled by me, and give up all hope of the bond."

"Never! Rachel. I tell you, I'll hold by the bond, in spite of all the lawyers. I'll get the money of somebody. Why, one year in this place would right me. It's first-rate land; and an infamous shame," added he, bitterly. "I wish——"

She laid her hand on his. "Hush, John! don't say anything you might wish afterwards unsaid. Let us be patient, dear, and trust in God."

John did not look patient; and, I fear, at this juncture, that he did not trust in God.

CHAPTER XXXV.

HAROLD'S INTENTIONS.

MR. MAPLESON had been as good as his word; and Harold Blake's prospects were improving considerably. The house had been taken, at the half-quarter, and great preparations were being made for getting into it as soon as possible. Harold's requirements were very simple, and he had a certain tact in making the most of his resources. By degrees, he told Charley, he meant to make the house a little palace; and so he did, but not for the reasons Charley supposed.

All the time Harold was busy fitting up his new home, he kept referring, in a mysterious manner, to the future.

"Ah!" he would say, "it will do very well, Charley, for us, as we are now;" and then he would turn very red, as if the words had slipped out unawares.

"How else shall we ever be, Harold, but what we are now?" said Charley, peevishly. He was tired that day; the mere preparations, as he said, knocked him dead up.

Harold did not answer, except by a few random observations, about the great difficulty of furnishing houses to one's mind; and then he said he had a letter to post, and went out rather in a hurry.

It was a bright sunshiny afternoon, with a touch of spring in the air. Harold walked briskly, and his letter was soon posted. Then he turned his steps to the mill. He had not nearly cleared the town, when, on turning a corner, he saw, only a few paces before him, a figure that made his heart flutter, as it always did, on such occasions.

He was on the point of overtaking Alice Sylvester. He had not seen her for a long time. She had not paid Charley another visit, as he feared she would not. What a blissful circumstance it was, that he should have the chance of meeting her! He had longed ardently for such a chance; he wanted to say a few words to her. He knew, by this time, the position the Sylvesters were in; it was current everywhere—not that he meant to allude to it.

He had no time, just now, to think what he should say. He was close by her. Her black garments touched him.

"Miss Sylvester, I am so glad to have met you!"

Again that smile, which seemed like an illumination. Harold's whole face was in a glow of happiness.

He held out his hand, and she gave him hers. She did it with that shy, fawn-like gesture, that was characteristic of her, when in his company. And though she did not say so, she was glad also; there was a look in her dark eyes which told him as much.

For a few moments, he walked beside her on the pavement. It was very sweet to have her so near him. In his own mind, he made himself her champion and defender; no matter what wild storms might beat, he thought his arm would shield her. He loved to think of his home, as of a nest to which the dove might fly, and be secure. He was very blissful in his musings, and he never once thought of the Sylvesters!

"You have forsaken poor Charley," said he, at length.

She blushed a little. It was evident she hardly knew what to say. The corner of the street was coming, and then this interview might end. Harold went on—

"I shall not ask you to come more than once, to our present home," he said; "but I must plead for just that once."

"What! are you going away?" She said it hastily, as in spite of herself. There was no mistaking the look of anxiety and alarm in her eyes.

"No, no! Heaven forbid!" said Harold, fervently. She looked down and blushed. She was evidently ashamed of the interest she had expressed.

Then he told her what had happened. He described his new home minutely. He dwelt on his improved position, on its security, its independence. He tried to make her feel as if, amid all these ebbs and flows, he had got a quiet anchorage. And she knew why he said all this. Her own heart kept telling her word by word; and this, too, without her once thinking of the Sylvesters!

She listened with downcast eyes, and without making any reply. An uninitiated person would have said she did not take the slightest interest, and that Harold was wasting breath. But that person did not see the tremulous light that flickered now and then from her half-closed eye-lid; did not know that her whole soul was rapt in the sweetness of hearing him talk to her; did not guess the quick apprehension of the heart that loved!

It was not long it could be so. The corner of the street was the point where it would end.

Sometimes, in the dark stormy day, there comes, from behind the cloud, a gush of sunshine, and passes, and then the cloud comes hurrying up again.

This was Alice's sunshine, and there, close behind her, was the cloud!

She did not say much in reply. She walked on quickly, and with downcast eyes. When the spot was reached at which they must part, she stopped. He stopped too. His way led out yonder to the mill; hers, in as opposite a direction as could be. It was incumbent on her to say something, for she had hardly spoken. She would not, for the world, have had him think her rude or inattentive, or without sympathy: for she had known him in far different days to these; in the days of his prosperity, when nothing seemed too much for him to hope or expect; and she revered his principles and the gallant manner in which they had borne him out. Her heart told her how good and noble he was; it told her there were few like him in this selfish world; that here was a true diamond shining in the dark!

When she did speak, her words seemed formal and constrained. She was glad, she said, to hear of his success. She naturally took an interest—here she stopped, and then went on again: and she hoped the change would be beneficial to Charley. It seemed a relief to her to say no more than this.

Harold's ear devoured every word. He was looking into her sweet face with its downcast eyes, and the flushes of colour that went and came. He did not think there was a face like it in the world.

When she had finished he said, "Will you come once more to see Charley?"

She looked embarrassed. He knew she did not like to come because of him.

He had made up his mind what to do, as soon as his home was ready. Grim and ghostly the long line of Sylvester ancestry seemed to gather round his path. But he saw them not!

He knew what he could give her, if she came to him—home, peace, security; the truest love that woman ever found. Yes, he could give her these and with Heaven's help he would!

But, though he saw them not, there were the Sylvesters!

(To be continued.)

"AFTER MANY DAYS."

FOUR years have elapsed since the kind lady became the means of saving poor ill-used Mally from distress and misery; and, it is certain, one more steady and grateful was never snatched from a bad life—perhaps a shameful death. And that's the end of the story," said Mrs. Woodford, closing the book: "and I hear your father's step on the other side of the hedge, so it is time to go in to supper."

"Hallo!" said Mr. Woodford, stopping short, with his hand on the gate, as he was entering the garden, where his wife sat in the still evening sunshine, a row of curly heads pressing closely round her, to hear the story she read from the book in her lap; "hallo, my girl! what are you doing here?" and he looked down at something like a bundle of coloured rags, crouched closely against the outside of the hedge, where Mrs. Woodford was sitting.

The children ran pell-mell down the little garden-path, to see what their father was addressing. Mrs. Woodford, with the book in her hand, followed more leisurely.

"Dear—dear!" was all she said, as she laid her hand, involuntarily, on a curly head near her at the moment—her only daughter, a girl of nine or ten years perhaps.

"Come, child, what are you doing here?" repeated Mr. Woodford. "This is not the public road, you know; what were you doing here?"

"I was listening to what she was a-readin'," said a voice from amongst the rags, whilst a grimy little forefinger was pointed in the direction of Mrs. Woodford.

"Dear—dear!" said the compassionate wife of the farmer once more: "only think of that, George!"

And while she looked at the forlorn object, whose wild, bright eyes were glancing rapidly from one to the other of the little group regarding her, she moved her hand softly over the golden head beside her.

"Listening to a story-book!" repeated Mr. Woodford, contemptuously; "you don't believe that, I hope. Look after your clothes-lines, and your hen-roosts, I tell you, wife, for this looks to me uncommonly like one of that caravan lot up at Springhope."

"Do you live with the gipsies, my dear?" asked Mrs. Woodford, gently. "The child has not a gipsy face," she added.

"I live with them; they beat me, and I run away whenever I can. I ran away this morning, and I crept in there to hide; and then I heard you read the book about a girl that was bad; but a woman took her, and was kind to her, and learned her to be better."

"That was the story, or very like it," said Mrs. Woodford. "She really was listening, George."

"And came for nothing else, I suppose," said Mr. Woodford. "There, my girl! get up, and clear yourself off my premises; and don't let me find you here again."

The bundle of rags slowly elevated itself into the stature of a child of ten or eleven years of age—"Susie's age," thought Mrs. Woodford, with her hand still on the golden head—and, with another of those wistful, and yet searching, glances at the faces regarding her, was moving away, when Mrs. Woodford called out—

"Stay an instant. Ah, George!" she added, with an appealing look into her husband's face, "we must not send the child away so. How can I teach our little ones presently to ask God to give them daily bread, having turned her hungry from our door?"

"At that rate, you might take in every lazy vagrant that would rather beg or steal what honest men work for," answered Mr. Woodford, gruffly, yet, all the while, relenting under his wife's kind eyes, and the pinched and starved child's face he was looking at. "There, give the girl a supper, and send her off," he ended, finally, and walked off to the house, with some of his younger children frisking and skipping beside him. Susie and her brother George waited to hear mother talk to the "little beggar," as they called her. "Peggy," as she presently told Mrs. Woodford, was the name given to her by the people she lived among.

Probably for the first time in her life—certainly for the first within her remembrance—Peggy was addressed in terms of gentleness and compassion by the kind, womanly voice speaking to her now. It was curious, and yet pitiful, to see how the little human waif responded to it;—doubtfully, wonderingly, at first, with something of the watchful, apprehensive look of a snared, wild creature, yet momentarily gaining confidence, as witnessed by the half-unconscious approach, the gradual anchoring of the wandering eyes on the kind face looking at her.

Peggy had not only a plentiful supper of sweet, home-baked bread and new milk, that night, but, with only a single grunt of disapproval from Mr. Woodford, a bed, also in the new barn, and a breakfast next morning. When that was done with, Mrs. Woodford knew that she ought, in deference to her husband, to have sent the little waif forth once more. Yet, when Peggy presented herself, presently, with hands and face duly washed, her rags arranged as neatly as was possible to such woeful substitution for decent garments, and said, imploringly, "Please don't send me away! I can work—I should like to work for you. I aint big, but I know how to do a many things. I can weed—I can—" Mrs. Woodford stopped the child's eager catalogue of her capabilities, turning suddenly away to seek her husband. When she came back, Peggy's fate was so far decided, that she might stay near the first friend she had found in this world;—was to weed in the garden, run of errands, and do anything else she could in the way of usefulness. She never seemed to have the slightest apprehension of the people she had hitherto lived with seeking or claiming her. "They didn't care what she did: they would be glad to be rid of her!" she told Mrs. Woodford; and this seemed to be true, as they certainly did neither one nor the other, though their caravan was still at Springhope—not two miles distant.

So Peggy stayed at the farmhouse, doing all sorts of little odds and ends of work, getting kind words and teaching from the farmer's wife, and even, after a while, not dissatisfied looks from the farmer himself; for the child seemed willing and industrious, as well as quiet and inoffensive. Mrs. Woodford was beginning to entertain a sincere liking—almost affection—for her little protégée, when an event occurred which seemed to justify all that Mr. Woodford had said in the beginning, about the imprudence of taking on the place a child avowedly belonging to thieves and vagrants, and left her sorrowfully silent before his—"I warned you!—I told you so!" for the farmhouse was broken into and robbed, one dreadful night, Peggy was nowhere to be found the next morning, and the caravan at Springhope had disappeared. It was impossible not to connect the circumstances; and Mr. Woodford always concluded that the child had been sent to try and get leave to be about the house, till she had learned the ways of the household and the whereabouts of valuables, and could guide the thieves to them. It seemed only too probable, and Mrs. Woodford could only sigh and be silent as she listened. Only pretty Susie lifted up her voice in passionate defence of Peggy. "I won't believe it of her. She loved us; she was grateful; she wanted to be good; we talked about it often, mother. Every one else may believe it of her—I never will!"

Every one else most certainly believed it—even kind Mrs. Woodford, though she never tried to disturb her little daughter's conviction by a word.

Years went on, Peggy had almost ceased to be a remembrance among them, except as a justification of Mr. Woodford's summary treatment of all beggars and vagrants who ventured into his sight, when one evening, as Mrs. Woodford was sitting in her usual place, beside the bed where now Susie's golden head lay day by day, only—ah! only—to be lifted thence, as the poor mother well knew, into its coffin, the sick girl started from a short dozing sleep saying, "Peggy, poor Peggy!"

"You have been dreaming, dear," said the mother, softly, arranging the bed-clothes as she bent tenderly over her.

"Yes, and of Peggy. I thought we were children again in the garden, and that I was telling her a story while she weeded the strawberry-bed. Mother, I sometimes think, as I lie here, that if she had not gone—been taken away so strangely, she would have been a good daughter to you when I am gone. I wish Peggy——"

She broke off and looked towards the door, which opened gently, to admit some one at the instant. Not the father or brothers, though they habitually softened step and voice on entering the room where Susie lay ill so long; not the rough serving-maid, who tried to do both, and always failed; but a tall, well-dressed young woman—a stranger, it seemed—who stopped, hesitatingly, a moment on the threshold till she met the glance of those bright dying eyes fixed on her, and then came swiftly in and dropped on her knees by the bed, crying—Oh! Miss Susie, Miss Susie! oh, dear Mrs. Woodford!" and then lost utterance in tears.

Mrs. Woodford drew back astonished, almost dismayed, but Susie put up her wasted hands round the head bending over her, drew it down to her and kissed it.

"It's Peggy, mother," she said, with a strange, tranquil smile; "it's poor Peggy, come back to us."

"Yes, dear Miss Susie, it's Peggy. Dear Mrs. Woodford, it's the poor little lost creature you took in, and sheltered, and taught, and were kind to! Do you think I've ever forgotten it; that I haven't prayed to God on my knees to help me to show you some day that I remembered it? Oh! I am afraid many a time you must have thought me only a base ungrateful wretch!"

"Susie never thought so," answered the mother, with a sad quivering smile.

Peggy softly pressed her round fresh cheek against the poor wasted one on the pillow, and went on more gently—

"On that dreadful morning when they robbed the house, and took me away by force, lest I should betray them, I prayed to God to help me to get away from them again, and let me never forget what I owed my first friend. I never have, dear Mrs. Woodford! God gave me others, and they taught me more and more what I owed you. I should have come long ago. I have thought of, oh! so prayed for it; to think that I should come now to see you lying here, Miss Susie."

"It is best so," said Susie, gently; "you will be a comfort to my mother. But why did you not come before?"

"I waited till I could say, Here is the money those men took that dreadful night," answered Peggy. "I worked hard to save it, it is all honestly earned, dear Mrs. Woodford, justly mine, and so justly yours. I have so looked forward to this day! I never thought I could be so little glad when I laid this purse in your mother's lap, dear Miss Susie. But you will get better—will get well again. Oh! Mrs. Woodford, when you missed me that morning, you must have thought all your goodness thrown away?"

"Susie never thought so," said Mrs. Woodford again, her hand on the patient head.

"Because, mother, you always taught us that a good deed is never done in vain, though our poor blind eyes may fail to trace it," answered Susie, with a bright upward glance into her mother's face.

There was a little silence, and then Susie said, softly, "Mother, do you remember the verse you read this morning?—'After many days; and thou shalt find it after many days.' It is found; it has come back to you, dear mother. I know Peggy will never leave you, and you will still have a daughter when I am gone."

J. R. M.

THE QUIVER

Saturday, July 18, 1868.

(Drawn by M. ELLEN EDWARDS.)

"This is not the way to gain strength, Miss Esther,"—p. 690.

THE STORY OF AUNT JUDITH'S LIFE.

CHAPTER III.

I DID not recover from the effects of the fever as quickly as Aunt Judith had done, but remained a decided invalid all through the winter, and when the spring set in I became languid and depressed. It was then that Dr. Heathfield renewed his invitation to me, and feeling too weak to rebel, I found myself, a few days after—wards, propped up by cushions, with Nina by my side, in the doctor's carriage, and on the way to Norsfall Grange. I can distinctly recall my first introduction to the doctor's sister, who was his sole remaining relative, and remember the impression which her dull brown hair and prominent bright eyes had upon me; but I seem to have no recollection of any other circumstance connected with the earlier part of my visit. Towards its end, a letter was brought in one morning at breakfast, and the servant as he handed it to the doctor said that the bearer was waiting for an answer; and well do I remember what a start the doctor gave as he opened it and exclaimed, "Arthur Nugent has come home!"

VOL. III.

Young as I was I could not fail to contrast the emotion betrayed in his voice, with the cool tone in which Miss Heathfield answered, "What a strange fancy!" And while the doctor read the letter and wrote a reply to it, he frowned and sighed audibly several times: but his sister smiled, and her eyes preserved their invariable brightness. When the doctor had dispatched his answer he came back to the breakfast-table, but the contents of his plate and cup remained untouched. I longed to slide my hand into his in token of my childish sympathy, but a fear of intruding withheld me. Miss Heathfield, however, made no remark until the doctor rose, then, ere he could leave the room, she said, with no lack of accent—

"You are going to the Towers, Charles, I know. May your renewed visits there bring you more happiness than your own quiet home is able to afford."

"Alice," said the doctor, sternly, "if you were jealous of the mother, you might at least exempt the son."

"I jealous!" she retorted; "Ida Grayson was my own chosen friend."

"Let it be so then," said the doctor, with a sigh as he left the room.

"It will not do to let Charles have his own way entirely," she said to me, in answer, I suppose, to my reproachful look of inquiry. "I know better than anybody what an effect Norsfall Towers will have on him."

"There must be a charm in any place inhabited chiefly by bats and owls," I remarked.

"I have no fancy for the society of bats and owls, nor any wish to enter the Towers again," she returned, and, although she smiled as usual, there was evidently a sign of annoyance in her voice.

I remember that she was absent from the room for two hours after this conversation, and that I ensconced myself in the sofa-cushions, and read, becoming at length so lost to all externals, that I was quite startled when a hand was laid on my shoulder, and the doctor's voice exclaimed—

"This is not the way to gain strength, Miss Esther."

In a moment I was on my feet, and then perceived a grey-haired stranger standing in the doorway. It was Arthur Nugent I was told in the introduction that followed; but before I had time to scan his face, Miss Heathfield's bright eyes appeared. The doctor seemed like one awakened from a dream; not unnaturally excited, but as if the dream was over, and life was becoming interesting to him. He sat down by me, and taking the book from my hand, pointed out to me the hidden beauty of its best passages. Miss Heathfield appeared to be occupied with her guest; but I always caught her bright eyes intently watching her brother. Something in her glance provoked me, and, at length, before I was aware that I was losing all control over myself, I had gone and seized her by the shoulders; but I know not what chastisement I intended to inflict, for, strong as my grip was, it was loosened by a firmer hand than mine, and which drew me away from my victim. I could not then account for the calming effect which the retention of my hands had upon me; but I can remember feeling my passion gradually subside as if lulled by some strange power, and looking up at last into Arthur Nugent's face, and saying, "Thank you" with a sigh of relief.

CHAPTER IV.

ARTHUR NUGENT remained at Norsfall Towers, and Dr. Heathfield grew young again in his society; and I suddenly awoke to the conviction that the spirit of our home was changed. It was on my seventeenth birthday, and I was standing amidst brick, stone, and mortar, watching the quick movement of the builder's trowel. Longfellow's idea of man being the architect of his own fate, and Time furnishing him with materials in to-days and yesterdays, was uppermost in my mind, when my train of thought was interrupted by the unexpected appearance of Arthur Nugent.

"Why so serious, Esther?" he asked, as he extended his hand to me.

"Because," I answered directly, "the blocks life has furnished me with are so misshapen and crooked, that I fear for the safety of the building."

He understood my meaning at once, and quietly returned—

"If the foundation is a rock, Esther, why should you fear? Besides, you have at least to-day to improve upon."

"To-day," I said, "I am afraid will be but little better than the yesterdays of seventeen long years. But," I added, after a pause, "the fact of beginning to care about it is a step, I hope."

"You have begun to care before to-day, Esther,"

he said, taking both my hands in his, and looking straight into my face; and it was then, as I met those eyes, so full of earnestness and truth, which seemed to read me so plainly, that the conviction came upon me that some unacknowledged influence had brought about changes in our home which had not failed to affect me.

"Esther," said Arthur Nugent, again interrupting my thoughts, "your aunt sent me to bring you back; she objects to your being so far from home unattended."

I felt the blood rush to my face, and the veins in my temples distend, and I turned away from him as if I would resent the attempt to control me by a most precipitate retreat. I clenched my hands as I rushed away, till the action became painful; then I stopped, and Arthur Nugent joined me again. "Oh, Arthur!" I said, as soon as I could speak, "it is as I said, to-day is no better than yesterday."

As I raised my tearful eyes, he returned me a grave but kind smile, and answered—

"St. Augustine says—'We make a ladder out of our faults, if we trample on the faults themselves.' Is there not, in that thought, encouragement to persevere, Esther?"

I made no answer; he needed none. He spoke, I knew, only to help me to rise again; for Arthur Nugent rarely indulged in this style of conversation. Yet it was he who had stirred up our home—had put fresh energy into Aunt Judith, and pointed out to me the way to rise above my natural self; but the influence emanated from his example of the faith which works by love, not from his words.

"The builders are getting on fast with the church now," I remarked, after a long pause, as we walked back. "I shall be glad when it is finished. I suppose if you had not come back to Norsfall, it would never have been built."

"Yes, Esther," he said, with a grave smile; "another instrument would have been found, I have no doubt; these benighted people would have had somebody else sent to care for them. But now, you see, it will be far enough from your home."

"But so much nearer than the parish church," I returned; "and you know I am used to long walks and rides."

"Yes, I know you are," he said, "and I shall propose that you ride with me to the Towers this afternoon. The picture gallery is finished at last, and I want you to see it."

I had often been to Norsfall Towers, Aunt Judith's depopulated world, but had never been admitted into the picture gallery: at first, on account of its dilapidated state, and latterly because it had been under repair. I can remember well how the sun streamed in through the lancet windows on that afternoon of my seventeenth birthday, and how, despite that summer sun, when I thought of Aunt Judith's friends, the wind seemed to play round every turret of the house, whistling "Where?" And I can remember also the tone of pride in which Arthur Nugent said, as he uncovered one of the pictures, "This is my father's portrait, Esther."

The picture fully justified the tone; I felt that, as I stood gazing on the brow of marble whiteness, shaded by the raven black hair. A smile played round the firmly-set mouth, which harmonised with the soft expression of the dark and searching eyes, while it imparted no idea of a vacillating or weak character. I could not withdraw my eyes from the picture, and I suppose my silent admiration betrayed itself, for Arthur soon said, "The artist did him justice, but nothing more. You do not recognise any likeness to him in me?"

"None," I answered at first; but as I turned to him I caught the same expression about the eyes. I did not, however, like to say so, therefore added, "But you are so much older."

"Yes; perhaps there was more likeness before my hair turned grey," he said, reflectively.

I did not turn again from the portrait until I heard him say, with a sigh, "And this was my mother."

It was the likeness of a young girl, very fair and pretty, and that was all.

"My recollection of my mother," he continued, "does not at any time correspond with this portrait, but Miss Shapcote affirms it to have been a very correct likeness when taken."

"Was Aunt Judith her friend as well as Miss Heathfield?" I asked.

A grave, sad smile passed over his face as he said, "Esther, your aunt would like you to know the story of her life, and at her request I will tell you now as much as I know of it. My mother became an orphan at the early age of ten, and was left to the sole guardianship of my grandfather, who was her father's cousin. She was, in consequence, brought up here, and by Mrs. Heathfield's desire, educated with Alice, who, being an only girl, needed a companion, and whose brother shared the same tutor as my father. Just as they were ripening into man and woman, the Shapcotes came to reside at Norsfall; they were old friends of the Heathfields, and, accordingly, had a warm welcome to the neighbourhood. Often have I heard my father describe the peerless beauty of your aunt as she first came amongst them—a description confirmed not only by our friend Dr. Heathfield, but by the perfect outline of face and figure which at sixty-five she retains. Her mind, too, was as marvellous as her beauty, for she had voluntarily shared in all the deep studies of her eldest and favourite brother, who was your grandfather, Esther, and who was married and settled before the family came to Norsfall. Wherever she appeared she was the centre of attraction, dazzling all alike, and most especially my mother, whose gentle and confiding nature found in her something worth resting upon. Alice Heathfield alone was proof against her dazzling qualities, nor could she once be persuaded to admit their existence, affirming instead that pride and violent temper were the characteristics of the Shapcotes, and that she could trace both in every line of your aunt's face, and in every one of her actions. Time went on; my father loved your aunt with all the ardour of a first young love, and that it was reciprocated, nobody but Alice Heathfield thought of doubting. There had been no declaration, for both knew that any premature act on their parts would lead to their immediate separation. At Oxford my grandfather had quarrelled with Mr. Shapcote, and the breach had never been healed, therefore an alliance was desired by neither. Esther, I am coming to a very sad part of my story. Our friend, Dr. Heathfield, had gone to London, having just made choice of the medical profession, and he was directed by my grandfather to send down some celebrated artist to decorate this room for a picture gallery. The artist came, and then Mr. Shapcote suddenly discovered how attractive the Towers had become to his daughter, and peremptorily forbade any further communication, not only frustrating her plan of joining in the lessons which the artist was engaged to give, but also refused to allow her to give any reason for her withdrawal. In vain did Alice Heathfield endeavour to sustain the interest in the artist's progress, by coming daily to the Towers, and striving to make my mother believe that both of them had a passion for drawing; but my father was entirely engrossed in the thought of your aunt's unaccountable absence, and the sudden tidings of her having gone abroad with the rest of her family which followed. The Shapcotes returned to Norsfall in the following year, during the London season, when the Towers were always supposed to be shut up. That year, however, my grandfather's gout rendered the journey to town impracticable. The Shapcotes were not aware of this fact, and your aunt, immediately on her return, determined to resist her father's authority, and satisfy her longing desire to see this room in its finished state. Accordingly she came here secretly, and on her arrival was admitted, without discovering that the family was at home. At her request, the servant brought her into this gallery, and it was standing before this portrait of my father that she was found by him, with tears in her beautiful eyes. Alice Heathfield was close at his elbow, and exclaimed, before he could speak—

“Tears are even becoming to the stately Judith!”

“The thought of her father's violent anger, and the fact of being found in tears before this picture, goaded your aunt beyond control; and a few ill-directed sentences from Alice Heathfield, succeeded in turning her wrath suddenly upon my father, who could not afterwards recall the words which passed between them, although he never forgot that in her madness, she struck him.”

Arthur Nugent paused awhile, then added—

“That same day, Esther, a letter from Alice Heathfield conveyed to her brother the intelligence of my father's engagement to my mother—my gentle mother!” and he fixed his eyes lovingly on her picture. “How she pined for that love which she had to learn by degrees was never hers! It crushed her, Esther, although she outlived her husband.”

“Both died abroad,” I ventured to say.

“Yes, both,” he answered. “My father's death was sudden. My mother had received a letter from Alice Heathfield, announcing your father's death. Your aunt had nursed him through a long and trying illness, during which, except for her, he would have been homeless, having been disinherited on account of his marriage, in a fit of fury, by your grandfather, Miss Shapcote's favourite brother. ‘Judith Shapcote proposes to devote herself, now, to his orphan child,’ said Alice Heathfield, in her letter; ‘and I am glad she should have an object for life. I have my devoted brother Charles; you, dear Ida, have your noble husband; and Judith her dear little great-niece. How well it has all ended!’ After my mother had read this passage aloud, she said, in an undertone, ‘Was Alice blind, I wonder, or did she really never know?’ ‘We will not inquire,’ said my father, solemnly. ‘She is satisfied; and you forgive me, Ida.’ I rose with the intention of leaving the room, but was just in time to save my father from the floor. He never spoke again, and died a few days afterwards.”

There was a long silence, then. I had sat down on one of the chairs, and, burying my face in my hands, wept uninterruptedly.

“Esther,” said Arthur, at length, “has it been too much for you?”

“Oh, no,” I answered; “but I might well say that to-day would be no better than the yesterdays of my life. How can I ever expect to conquer my temper?”

There was a pause, followed by, “Esther—

“Not with a sword by bloodshed stained,
Not for a wreath that, soon as gained,
Shall fade upon thy brow;
But with the sword of God's good Word,
And for the ‘Well done!’ of thy God,
Go forth and conquer, now!”

BRUTALITY TO BRUTES.

BY THE REV. J. B. OWEN, M.A.

THE amount of gratuitous suffering inflicted on the lower animals in London was a disgrace to a civilised community until the Legislature interfered. It is still an unchristian scandal. That interference of the law exonerates the public, and leaves the guilt of cruelty on individual delinquents. Lord Erskine, in an admirable address, which he delivered in the House of Lords, in the year 1809, on the second reading of a "Bill for Preventing Cruelty to Animals," set forth its preamble in the following judicious and solemn terms:—

"Whereas it has pleased Almighty God to subdue to the dominion, use, and comfort of man the strength and faculties of many useful animals, and to provide others for his food; and whereas the abuse of that dominion by cruel and oppressive treatment of such animals, is not only highly unjust and immoral, but most pernicious in its example, having an evident tendency to harden the heart against the natural feelings of humanity"—therefore, his lordship maintained the interposition of a Christian Legislature was called for on behalf of animals, and that "in the name of that God who gave to man his dominion over the lower world, he would acknowledge and recognise that dominion to be a moral trust."

This proposition cannot be gainsayed without denying the whole foundation of all our duties, moral as well as social. Mark the proof of this assertion in the Word of God. Some readers of THE QUIVER may not have noted how fully and distinctly God has pronounced upon this subject, or how frequently and prominently the destinies of the lower creatures are mixed up with the brightest prospects of the saints of the Church of Christ. I hope to show this theme presents topics of interest to the most spiritually-minded man, as well as materials for grave consideration to every class and age of society. Let none allow themselves to turn away with a sneer or a yawn from an inquiry, which, lowly as it is, the Spirit of inspiration has deemed of sufficient moment to include within the canon of Scripture. As in ancient Rome, in the triumphal procession of the returning general, his servants led his war-horse caparisoned with the insignia of the conqueror, the dumb comrade of his perils and fatigues always an interesting feature in the train; so in the future triumph of the true Hero of all human kind, the Prince of Peace, when He shall reappear in all the glorious consummations of that victory which overcometh the world, and sin, and death, the prophet writes, "In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses, Holiness unto the Lord!" Isaiah, in his magnificent details of the results of Christ's second coming and kingdom of peace, includes the mutual reconciliation of all the inferior animals in the delightful reign of joy and happiness. By the graphic link of "the child playing at the hole of the asp" and leading the lion and the lamb feeding together, the prophet connects the pacific influence of the Redeemer on reptile, bird, and beast, with man in his millennial state, dismissing the swelling strain of prophecy with the parting note of triumph—"They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain." Zechariah, in the passage just quoted relating to "bells on the horses," delivers the ruling motive and ground of the universal peace and mutual kindness—viz., that everything shall be then regarded as the Lord's property, devoted to him, and owned as his. On all our merchandise, goods, and chattels—on all our gifts and talents—on all the minutest secular and domestic concerns of life, will be recognised "the mark of the Lord Jesus; even the horses as they pass to their daily labours shall ring their bridle bells to the sacred melody of "Holiness to the Lord." If it be the duty of professing servants of God to be ever looking for and hasting to the coming of the Lord,—if it be their mark and privilege to be at once cultivating those sentiments, habits, and tastes which will harmonise with the anticipated reign of grace and amity; then, among other feelings of a higher and holier order, the sentiment of pity and kindness to the brute creation is clearly one—so clearly, indeed, that it is laid down as one index of the spiritual character, that "the righteous man regardeth the life of his beast: but the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel." In arguing the claims of the brute creation, I assert—

Firstly, their right, as the creatures of God, in common with ourselves, to these three things—viz., to their natural food, necessary rest, and uniform kindness.

Secondly.—I found their claim on three arguments—viz., on the law of God, on the example of Christ, and on the nature of the case.

Thirdly.—I notice the demoralising influence of cruelty on the cruel themselves.

May the Lord, who "is very pitiful, and of tender mercy," enable me, in the touching language of the sacred proverb, to "open my mouth for the dumb," and create a just impression on my readers' minds of the combined humanity and imperative obligation of obedience to the Divine injunctions of kind and considerate treatment for the brute creation.

When Captain Jenkins, in the reign of George II., exhibited before the House of Commons his mutilated ear, and the barbarous wounds with which the Spaniards had tortured him at sea, accompanying their treatment of him with insulting language against our King, he said, when they threatened him with death, "I commended my soul to God, and my cause to my country." His barbarous treatment so aroused the indignation of the members that war was proclaimed with Spain. Could we exhibit the torn, scourged, and mangled body of many a poor dumb brute among our useful, patient, and laborious domestic animals, and detail the blasphemy against God with which their tortures are usually inflicted, the spectacle would be sufficient, we think, to induce us to declare war against cruelty in every form, as an insult to the Creator, and barbarity to his creatures.

We claim for every animal that breathes, under the first department of the question—

(1) their natural food.

"The unfledged raven and the lion's whelp
Plead not in vain for pity on the pangs
Of hunger unassuaged."

It is unjust to deprive any creatures of their liberty, or, in other words, of the opportunity of procuring the food that suits them, and then feed them with what may induce disease and abridge life. If we require their services, the least we can do is to "feed them with food convenient for them," i.e., proper to their natural habits and organisation. They ask no other wages, except their humble board. They are our cheapest servants, requiring neither money nor clothes. On the contrary, we are not above wearing their cast-off clothes, and what our Lord said of the lilies that "toil not, neither do they spin," is equally true of the natural raiment of the humblest creature, that "Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." Their lives are spent in our service, at their deaths they bequeath us their little all, and can there be a just excuse for starving, or even stinting them in their food? There can be none, not even the sacredness of the Sabbath, as our Lord taught us: "Doth not each one of you on the Sabbath loose his ox or his ass from the stall, and lead him away to watering?" The faithful servant of Abraham, Eliezer of Damascus, when he reached Rebekah's household, first fed his camels before he refreshed himself. The magnanimous Sir Philip Sidney, who handed the cup of water from his own parched lips to the dying soldier, accompanied it with an exclamation directly applicable to the weary beast who has borne for us the heat and burden of the day: "Thy necessity is greater than mine!" Many a poor exhausted horse would be saved the hungry pangs arising from the omitting of his meal, if this generous rule of first feeding our dumb fellow-traveller before we fed ourselves were conscientiously pursued.

(2) We claim for animals their share of rest. The cattle have as clear a right to the Sabbath as ourselves, because they are included in the same Sabbatic law, or provision of rest, with "thyself, thy son, daughter, man and maid-servant, and thy cattle," and the reason given in Exod. xxiii. 12, is, "that thine ox and thine ass may rest; and in Deut. v. 14, that all our cattle, included in a right of repose equal to our own, "may rest as well as thou." Hence it is evident that the man who gives his cattle no regular weekly and daily rest, is a Sabbath-breaker in their persons, and in the consequent abridgment of their lives—a result which was proved in the abolition of the Sabbath in the great French Revolution, when their domestic animals died by tens of thousands—such a trespasser on animal rights is convicted as a murderer under the Divine statute, "Thou shalt not kill." I have no more right to tamper with the life which God gave his dumb creatures than with my own, or my fellow-men's.

(3) The brutes are entitled to kindness. When Jacob built a tent for himself, he made booths for his cattle to shelter and lodge them. I have been often struck with reading among the rigorous and fearful things of the law of "the letter that killeth," the many tender and humane directions which are given as to the treatment of the lower orders of animals.

Secondly.—We claim this provision of food, rest, and kindness to the brute creation on the law of God, on the example of Christ, on the precedent of saints, and on the nature of the case.

There is (1) the law of God. Deut. xxii. contains a rich and suggestive variety of humane directions on behalf of animals, which deserve to be written in letters of gold. Some of the following are among them, which we may call the Decalogue of the Rights of the Beasts of the Field. They are virtually the Ten Commandments, issued from the same authority, and, being in their nature moral, presenting the same sanction and perpetuity of obligation, as the Commandments given on Sinai. Let us briefly pass them in review. There is:—

I. "Thou shalt not see thy brother's ox or his sheep go astray, and hide thyself from them: thou shalt in any case bring them again to thy brother."

II. "Thou shalt not see thy brother's ass or his ox fall down by the way, and hide thyself from them: thou shalt surely help him to lift them up again." Not as we frequently see them, flogged, goaded, and tortured, to compel them to rise with a burthen which the fact of their having sunk under it, was the cruel evidence of its excess beyond their strength to support. A horse would no sooner fall on purpose, than we should ourselves.

III. "If a bird's nest chance to be before thee in the way in any tree, or on the ground, whether they be young ones, or eggs, and the dam sitting upon the young, or upon the eggs, thou shalt not take the dam with the young." Wanton, idle boys never think, when robbing a bird's nest, that their attempt to take the dam with her young ones, is not only a crime against humanity, but an actual sin against God. The precept makes use of the mother bird as a living diagram by which to inculcate a lesson of filial tenderness and honour to human beings.

IV. "Thou shalt not plow with an ox and an ass together;" evidently lest the unequal yoke gall both—a kind of cruelty perpetrated in many other forms, all of which are hereby condemned.

V. "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn," a precept on which St. Paul founds the minister's right of maintenance, as he who provides spiritual food for others should himself be fed. How many of us are indebted for food and comfort to the labours of the horse! It is neither justice nor common humanity to starve or stint the generous creature, who has forsaken its own means of subsistence to exhaust its energies in securing ours.

VI. "Thou shalt not see the kid in his mother's milk" (Exod. xxiii. 19). A tender injunction, obviously intended to promote respect for the natural yearnings of parental instinct, and, through them—a fortiori—to sanction the like law in its human relations.

VII. Against a selfish preference of our own ease and comfort to the lives of our cattle, God rebuked Jonah: "Thou hast had pity on the gourd: and should not I spare Nineveh, wherein are more than sixscore thousand persons that cannot discern between their right hand and their left hand; and also much cattle?" Here, it seems, the Lord made the presence of innocent cattle an additional reason, like the inhabitation of righteous persons in Sodom, why he should spare the city.

VIII. "Thou shalt not let thy cattle gender with a diverse kind," as if an unbroken succession of their species were to be held as sacred.

IX. "Six days thou shalt do thy work, and on the seventh day thou shalt rest, that thine ox and thine ass may rest as well as thou."

X. In prohibition of the infliction of all unnecessary pain in the slaughter of animals for food, or for sacrifice, the Levitical law is express and repeated: "Thou shalt kill the bullock," and, after that, "cut it into his pieces." Cowper sung:

"On Noah, and in him, on all mankind,
The charter was conferred, by which we hold
The flesh of animals in fee, and claim
O'er all we feed on power of life and death;
But read the instrument and mark it well;
Th' oppression of a tyrannous control
Can find no warrant there. Feed then, and yield
Thanks for thy food. Carnivorous through sin,
Feed on the slain, but spare the living brute."

These passages comprise what I venture to call the decalogue of the birds of the air, and of the beasts of the field. If any higher sanction for respecting their claims than the Law of God be needed, let there be added that beautiful prediction of the tender mercies of the Gospel, where Isaiah (xl. 11) paints the symbol of what a good shepherd in the fields should be to his irrational flock, by the pastoral emblem of Christ's tender mercies to his people: "He shall feed his flock like a shepherd: he shall gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and shall gently lead those that are with young." The parallel implies that these acts of consideration should as uniformly characterise the ordinary herdsman, as they served to illustrate the covenant mercies of the Good Shepherd who laid down his life for his sheep—which was our 2nd point—viz., the example of Christ, not only in a spiritual sense, but in the shape of secular humanity. His tender recognition of the claims of the lower animals may be discerned in his touching references to the "hen gathering her chickens under her wings," as the image of his own protecting love for his people; in his not separating "the colt, the foal of an ass," from its mother, but specially ordering both to be brought, even for the occasion of his triumphal entry into Jerusalem; in his declaration of God's providence of food for the sparrow, not one of whom "falleth to the ground" for its prey, without finding it there; in his admonition, "Consider the ravens, for they neither sow nor reap, which have neither storehouse nor barn, and God feedeth them;" and in his benediction on the tried faith of the Syrophenician mother, when the expression of her faith meekly assumed the form of a maxim of humanity, that "the dogs eat of the crumbs that fall from their master's table."

There is (3) the precedent of the saints. David, like his illustrious Descendant, borrowed some of his sweetest and most striking metaphors from the instincts and habits of the dumb. Would he express his humility? his image is, "I am a worm; or his patriotic yearning to spare his people? "As for these sheep," he cried, "what have they done?" or his devotion to the sanctuary? he could envy even, "the sparrow that hath found her an house, and the swallow a nest for herself, even thine altars, O Lord of Hosts."

Would Job illustrate the mighty power of God? he deduces his evidences from the lion, the raven, the wild goat, the hind, the wild ass; the unicorn or rhinoceros, the peacock, the ostrich, the horse, the hawk, the eagle, the behemoth or elephant, the leviathan or crocodile. Shall these humbler forms of animal life be deemed beneath the just attention of man, whose names are counted worthy of insertion in the Book of God? God, their Creator as well as ours, teaches us otherwise; and if man should boast himself as the lord of creation, a day of reckoning comes, when the manner of his rule and lordship shall be required at his hands. Cruelty of any kind is utterly incompatible with the Christian spirit. It is an unseemly violation of the law of love and pity, which entails upon its transgressor the Divine and righteous retaliation, "He shall have judgment without mercy who showed no mercy."

"Learn of me," said the Saviour, "for I am meek and lowly." "If any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his; for the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance." Cruelty involves a frame of mind at open war with all these, and demonstrates a man, whatever his religious profession may be, to be "still in the gall of bitterness, and without part or lot in the matter."

The final point we reserve for a future paper. We close with the humiliating thought that, but for our sin, there would have been no suffering at all in the inferior creatures. The shriek of animal pain is an echo of that first transgression which "brought death into our world, and all our woe." God surrounds us, on all sides and in every shape, with abasing evidences and painful illustrations of the fall of man from the grace, innocence, and happiness in which he issued from the creative hand of his Maker, as if to deprive us of every excuse for overlooking the fact, and not applying at once to the only remedy for sin and all its consequences, "the blood that speaketh better things than that of Abel." Thus the discussion of every point of moral duty inevitably brings us round, like the law in general, to Christ, "for Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth." Believing in him, the soul grows sensitive, lies open to lessons from any, even the humblest teachers, like the heart-smitten Peter, to whose already broken spirit the crowing of a cock was homily enough to send him out to weep bitterly. The Lord soften every hard heart, and bring us to "that repentance that needeth not to be repented of!"

FATHER AND FIRST-BORN.

BABE, little babe of my own true wife,
Lie you close on your father's breast—
Flesh of our flesh and life of our life—
Till I have lulled you to rest.

Nay, you will sleep not yet, do you say?
Weary of laughter and weary of play?
Dance, little bird, upon father's arm,
Dance like a bough that is tossed in the storm:
Beat, little feet, as hard as ye list,
Beat on my breast, little feet; little fist,
Strike on my shoulder with palm and wrist;
Strike as you dance, keeping time to your dancing,
Strike, keeping time to your elfin prancing:
Pout, rosy lips, for a kiss and a kiss;
Kiss, till the face is a-glow with your bliss:
Push at my brow, tangle my hair:
Gurgle and laugh as you leap in the air—
Who is it calls for a kiss from you now?
Prattle to mother, lay mouth to her brow;
Press mother's face with a tiny palm;
Blow on her cheek with breath of balm;
Look in her eyes with eyes of mine—
I have seen hers in your glances shine,
Seen her smile on your baby-lips,
Felt her touch in your finger-tips—
Child of my maiden of lovesome days,
Child of my dove of the winsome ways,
Babe, little babe of my own true wife,
Flesh of our flesh, life of our life!

Ah, you would go to her bosom, I see?
Weary of dancing, and weary of me.

Leap on her breast in a new delight;
Stretch little fingers dimpled and white,
Stretch to me, telling 'I love you still';
Smile at me pleadingly, 'Judge me not ill.'
Nay, for with both is your soul inwove
With an even joy and an even love.
Dear, as he sits on thine arm, I feel
He is claspt in my own; as he lies on thy breast,
'Tis just as on mine he lay caressed.
Mine and thine in woe and in weal,
Clutch him, and kiss him on brow and on cheek;
Pat little limbs that are frail and weak;
Sway him and swing him to left and to right,
Toss him and whirl him, so frail and light,
Laugh to him, sing to him all the sweet day,
Play with him, fondle him long as we may.

For baby-limbs grow strong and stout;
And years run by as fleet as wind;
And knowledge dawns, and gathering doubt
Bursts like a storm across the mind;
New fancies throng the wakening brain;
The soul that long hath blindly lain
Lapt in a sweet confiding joy,
Dependent on the parents' hands
That nurse the babe, that lead the boy,

(Drawn by RAPHAEL NEWCOMBE.)

"Prattle to mother, lay mouth to her brow;
Press mother's face with a tiny palm;
Blow on her cheek with breath of balm."—p. 696.

Awakes, and breaks the straitening bands
That bind it, feels its inborn power,
Its splendour, its divinity,
And in some wild adventurous hour
Flings down the dreams of infancy,
The lessons learnt at nursing knee,
And claims of God an ampler dower,
Far-searching, yearning to be free.
God comfort us when first the eyes,
The babe's sweet eyes grown firm and bold,
Frown on us, and reproaches rise
To lips that only smiled of old!
God cheer us, when the soul we hold
Part of our own two spirits blended,
Falls off like some dissevered limb,

And all the light of life grows dim,
And all life's bliss of love seems ended!

Nay, but, dearest, let us be glad—
See, the babe laughs, and can we be sad?
Now when the soul in its tiny shell
Lies so merry, so gay in our grasp,
Ours to kiss and ours to clasp,
Hold him, love him, cherish him well,
Make him a plaything, a toy of our loves,
Fresh as a bud in the dew of the groves;
Sway him and swing him to left and to right;
Toss him and whirl him, so frail, so light;
Laugh to him, sing to him, all the sweet day;
Fondle him, play with him long as we may!

G. F. A.

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

RAYMOND'S MOTHER HOLDS OUT A TEMPTATION.

"HAS Mr. Sylvester returned yet?"
"No, my lady. I will let you know the moment that he does."
The butler made this reply, because her ladyship, as he had been saying down-stairs, had rung to ask the selfsame question three times in half an hour.

She was alone in the drawing-room, but she was not in her usual place by the fire. She had been walking slowly up and down the room, and every now and then, she had drawn the threadbare curtain, and had peered into the darkness. She was so anxious for Raymond to come!

Her thoughts could not be very pleasant ones, during that lonely hour. She must have felt that the foundations were giving way. And she must have been haunted, you would think, by what was beneath: years of wrong; the tears of the widow and the orphan; all the woe and misery attendant on that word—which might have been the watch-word of the Sylvesters—debt!

But she had not given up the game. She would hold by the old ruin till it fell, and she fell with it. Hark! that step must be Raymond's! Her face brightened, and she stood with a look of keen expectation. Yes, it was Raymond.

He came in, travel stained, and just as he had dismounted from his horse. He began to apologise. He was courteous to his mother as if she had been an empress. He began to apologise for appearing in such a guise, but she stopped him. Gradually, the stately ceremony that had existed between each other, was giving way.

"Never mind, Raymond!—never mind anything! Just tell me what you have done."

"I have not done anything, dear mother, except reconnoitre," said he.

"Well?"

"It is a sad desolate place, mother. I do not wonder that our tenant was driven out of it."

"Is it past repair?"

"Yes, I fear it is. It wants rebuilding; nothing short of that will do."

"But how can we rebuild?" she spoke pettishly; "you speak as if we had a fortune to fall back upon."

"Then the old Grange must fall down, mother, and the sooner the better."

He had gone to the fire, and was warming himself. She was still standing in the middle of the room. She bit her lip, as if vexed.

"You have not your usual quickness, Raymond. Can't you understand why I sent you on this journey?"

"I suppose to see if anything could be done, dear mother," said Raymond, soothingly. "And I have seen; and I know that it cannot!"

"Raymond," and she came up to him, "could not we live at the Grange?"

"Goodness forbid!" cried he, hastily; a vision of the wretched place he had left rising up before him.

"But it is our own," she said, "it has been an heirloom in our family for centuries. Knights and nobles have lived in it."

"All that is past, dear mother," replied Raymond, in the same soothing tone; "the house has been a pretentious one, I grant, and well tenanted. It has an imposing aspect even now, but it is in ruins."

"Surely some of the rooms must be habitable, and you say it is imposing," she persisted, catching eagerly at the words. "Anything would be better than to have the eyes of all Newbury upon us in our fall. Think of that, Raymond!"

"I do think, mother. But, still, do not let us attempt the Grange. The very thought is horrible! And there is Alice——"

His voice softened as he said it. Alice! his young and beautiful sister! Oh, no! They could not condemn her to the desolation of the Grange!

Lady Sylvester did not look convinced. There was a wonderful amount of persistence in her nature. But she passed to another topic, or rather another phase of the same.

"Something must be done, Raymond, and that soon."

Raymond did not answer for a little space. There was a blank silence in the great room; at length he said, "Perhaps Mr. Carlton would tide us over—"

"I would not ask him," she interrupted; "and I know if you did, it would be a fruitless humiliation."

"He is rich enough, mother, and he would scarcely like—"

"But think what we owe him," she again interrupted; "besides, I did ask him—"

"You, mother! you—"

"Yes, I—Lady Sylvester, asked him, and was refused."

"Oh, mother! mother!"

And the proud head of Raymond Sylvester was bowed in the bitterness of this new degradation.

"Raymond," said his mother, all the old indomitable fire sparkling in her eye, "are you going to fail me? I am firm, if you are. From the wreck, on which we stand, I have the energy to look round, and scheme, and deliberate. And I—am a woman, Raymond."

He roused himself. There was a sting in the words, that forced him from his dejection. He knew that his mother had no other ally, in the wide world, but himself, and he never meant to fail her: he would be loyal to the last. But he was not so strong as she was, nor so enduring. To look at her, as she stands erect, and grand, in spite of her years and sorrows, you see she is not made of the material that succumbs. There is no yielding in her stern, handsome features, nor ever will be. The light in her eye is unquenchable, till death shall put it out!

"What we want, Raymond," and she came and touched his arm; "what we want, is some piece of fortune, such as happens, now and then, to desperate men and women. Fortune has a wheel, you know; well, we want it to go up!"

"Where is the fortune to come from, mother? It is too late to earn it!"

"Earn! Whoever talks of earning to us?" said she, scornfully.

"I can think of no other way, mother; we have no rich relations to make us their heirs. We are not likely to find a treasure, such as we read of in old legends," said Raymond, with a short bitter laugh.

She was silent a moment; then she laid her hand again on his arm.

"There are times, Raymond, in the lives of the young, when treasures come to them unasked. How do other families build themselves up from ruins? Look round and see!"

A bright colour flushed into his face; he knew what she meant, but he did not speak.

"They do it, Raymond"—she spoke the words deliberately, and with great meaning—"they do it by marriage!"

Still he did not speak. It was a subject fraught with such intolerable pain that he wondered she should allude to it. But she continued; she was a relentless woman, this high-born Lady Sylvester—

"It has come to an issue, my son; there is no disguising the fact. We are on the very brink of ruin: we cling, as it were, to the verge of the precipice. There is no place for the sole of our foot, but where we have last planted it. What are we to do? Are we to be saved or lost?"

Her clear, unflinching voice thrilled through him. He bowed his head in silence. From out the darkness and the despair there shone upon him the sweet, mournful eyes of Josephine. Yes, and it might be for the last time! He was too much agitated to speak.

"Raymond," and she bent over him, like another temptress intent on weaving her net, and making it strong, "Raymond, my son, let me tell you what is in store for you. I can see it more plainly than you can. It is either this, or that: to be rescued; to be built up; to be once again the Sylvesters; to be saved by you, Raymond; or to sink down, down! But I shall not sink. No; I could not live to see the ruin consummated; my heart would break!"

"Mother!" his white face was raised to hers, "mother!"

It was an appeal to her mercy; but he might have spared it. She did not care about his Josephine—she never had. What did she know of love, or of those sweet passages in a young life, when one heart vows to be faithful to another; when heart blends with heart? She had never loved. Her own marriage had been one of policy, and cold ambition. Talk to her of love! He had better talk to the winds.

"And what is it, after all, Raymond? Has not the past tended to it? The steps you have taken—nobly and generously—would have no point without this. And it is to be happy—"

"Happy! Oh, mother!"

The intense bitterness and sadness of the tone, cannot be described.

"Yes, happy; I repeat it," said she, relentlessly. "Those early infatuations are often disappointments; and poverty is a bitter heritage, my son: we have learnt that, too well!"

Bitter! yes, this poverty was bitter. But with Josephine, there would have been no poverty. That would have been a life calm and blessed, and full of resource. She would not have sat in slothful misery, as they did. He did not speak his thoughts aloud. He knew all that was over; he knew he had made shipwreck of his treasure, and was drifting helplessly on the wild waves, without helm or compass. Let her do with him as she would! He had lost Josephine!

But she was resolved that he should answer her. It was time he made some response.

"Is it not so, Raymond?"

"Mother! what can I say to you? You are very hard upon me. There should, at least, be some interval——”

“Interval! what, with the wolf at the door? Interval!”

He bowed his head lower and lower. It seemed as if the burden were heavier than he could bear. She put her arms round him. She had a variety of weapons she could use. Her touch was soft and motherly; her kisses were on his cheek.

“Raymond, you will not fail us! You are all we have to cling to. We are two poor helpless women: we cannot work; we cannot beg—you would not have us starve. We cannot shelter here much longer. Even these bare walls refuse to befriend us. Pitiless faces hem us in on every side. We shall have no sympathy; they would raze the old walls even to the ground; we shall be tossed to and fro like waifs on the ocean. We shall have but one refuge, and that is the grave, Raymond!”

She had sunk gradually on her knees—she, Lady Sylvester! his mother, was kneeling before him! He was touched to the very quick; he raised her tenderly; he pressed her in his arms; he told her how dear she was to him; how he was bound to defend and cherish her till the last; how he would make any sacrifice. He wept as he said it, and she wept too. But it was the point to which she had been striving to bring him. She was glad, in her secret heart even while she wept. She knew, now, that she could bend him to her will. She had touched the right chord at last!

CHAPTER XXXVII.

FRANCIS HEATHERLY FALLS IN LOVE.

WHEN Francis Heatherly returned from his visit to Josephine, he was prepared to regard the interview as, on the whole, successful. He was one of those individuals who, if they wish a thing, are resolved that it shall be. He was not in the least daunted by Josephine's point-blank refusal. Indeed, he did not recur to it, even in thought. Whatever she might have said, on the impulse of the moment, it was certain that, in her sober senses, she would not be likely to persist in rejecting him.

Him! Francis Heatherly Esq. Why, it would be madness!

She had not been what he expected. We made this remark before. There was something about her that attracted him. No; she was not handsome; yet what beautiful eyes she had! And how very graceful she was! There was character about her, too. He admired energy and decision, and he was sure that Josephine had both. On the whole, she would be well fitted for the honour he intended to bestow on her. He might—as he wrote down in his note-book—have gone farther and fared worse.

All this settled, he began to look about, and consider what step next he should take. He was very prompt, and he lost no time. He sent for the paper-hanger and the painter.

These two branches of industry were united in the person of a Mr. Hopkins, long resident in Newbury, and who had, as he assured Francis Heatherly, the honour of serving all the best families in the county.

“Now, Mr. Hopkins,” said Francis Heatherly, “I had better tell you, in a few words, what I want doing. I just want the house doing up, from the top to the bottom.”

“Papering and painting of course, sir?” and the man of business threw a knowing glance round.

“Yes. I may take it into my head to build by-and-by. There's land, I hear, likely to drop into the market, that it might suit me to buy. But, in the meantime, I am a domestic man—I want a home.”

“Exactly, sir—exactly.”

“Well, you see the state of the house. I could not bring—I could not be comfortable in it myself,” hastily substituted Francis.

“Exactly, sir,” and Mr. Hopkins rubbed his hands and looked very knowing.

“In fact, I want it done up in first-rate style. There are the drawing and dining-rooms, library, study, boudoir. I must have papers suited to each. I'm a man of correct taste, and I am convinced that—— However, perhaps you would go over the house with me,” added he, again hastily breaking off his communication.

Mr. Hopkins, nothing loth, went over the house. When they came to the boudoir, as it was called, Mr. Hopkins looked very knowing indeed.

“I see, sir—I see! Lady's room, in fact, I presume?” with a smile and a bow.

“Well, yes!” said Francis Heatherly, coolly.

The result of these few words was, that in the space of twenty-four hours, the news was bruited from one end of Newbury to the other, that Mr. Heatherly was going to be married, as soon as Mr. Hopkins had finished papering the house.

Francis Heatherly himself heard the news, as well as the rest of the Newbury world; but he did not care. In fact, it was quite true. He did mean to be married.

Nobody could imagine who the lady was. Some said she was an old love, whom he could not marry before for want of means; others set a report afloat that she was a West Indian heiress, who had just lost her father; some declared she was young and handsome; others that she was old and ugly. Some conjured her up from the north, some from the south. In fact, public opinion was never more divided in its life.

Francis Heatherly took all this very coolly. He was carrying on the courtship after a fashion of his own. He did not want, he said, in his note-book, to pester Miss Graham. But, once a-day, he walked backwards and forwards before the house where she lived, to bring himself to her remembrance. He thought nothing more was needed.

He told his note-book many private bits of gossip: how Josephine sat at the window working, and he was convinced she saw him. Indeed, he felt sure she chose that spot for no other purpose.

Her appearance pleased him more and more, he told the book. He was daily convinced that she would adorn the sphere for which she was destined. He noticed the smooth gloss of her hair; the element of neatness and of comfort that seemed to surround her. He grew quite poetical once, and talked about a halo! But this was a form of speech not much indulged in by Francis Heatherly.

Once he said he saw her weeping, and he longed to dry her tears. But for some reason or other, before he could decide the point, she had vanished from the window; nor had she appeared there since.

In spite of this temporary cloud, Francis was still on the alert. Mr. Hopkins had finished his part of the contract, and the new paint and paper looked all freshness and beauty. Now came the furnishing.

He meant to have a great deal of new furniture to mix with the old. As a rule, he did not like old furniture. He was a new man, with a new fortune, and new connections. Everything about him was new; and so were his tastes.

Many precious heirlooms were consigned to the broker's without a sigh. In their place were put modern articles of use, or ornament, that scarcely looked so much at home as the old ones had done. Then came bran-new carpets, bran-new curtains—in fact, the ancient house was dressed in as youthful a style as could be, and with the usual effect.

People said it was not a success. But, then, a man could not bring a wife to such a place, unless he did furbish it up a little. And the old wonder began, as to who the wife might be.

One part of his establishment Francis had left intact. The fat housekeeper was still queen regnant. But it was intended to depose her immediately on the advent of Josephine.

And that advent, he began to think, need not be delayed much longer. His house was ready.

He pleased himself with treading softly over the bright carpets, and catching the sight of himself in the shining furniture. Yes, it was quite ready; why not fetch Josephine?

He meant to have a quiet wedding. He was not a man for show, he told his book. He was a domestic man, with simple tastes, and no fuss about him. Yes, he meant the wedding to be very quiet indeed. He would go the next day and ask her. He had been very considerate. He had waited patiently, and, like a practical man, set his house in order, ready to receive her. Well, now she might come!

It made him rather nervous too, though he said nothing to his book on that score.

When he had put on his best attire, his glossy hat, and polished boots, he did not feel quite so courageous as he expected. But, then, it was rather a delicate piece of business, and the sooner it was over the better.

In as short a time as the cab could rattle him there, he was at Prospect Cottages. Well! it was disagreeable to feel his heart going thump, thump, and to have his tongue cleave to the roof of his mouth. But the strongest nerves and the coolest intrepidity are apt to quail at such times as these.

She was at home. There she was, at work in her neat, pretty room, an odour of violets and early primroses scenting the air. There she was, calm, grave, and handsome. Yes, assuredly she was handsome.

She smiled when she saw him. She could not help it; but the grave expression came back again, and, after she had risen to receive him, she sat down, and took up her work.

"Ah, working for her bread!" thought Francis Heatherly.

He sat and looked at her. It was a pleasant little nest she had made for herself, amid all the wrecks and storms around her. There was an atmosphere so pure, so calm, so good, that the man felt a few sensations such as he had never before experienced. Her patient industry, her cheerful resignation to her lot, the absence of all complaint, her energy, her independence, commended themselves to his better feelings. He forgot, for the moment, to be arrogant and boastful; and he thought—yes, he felt sure—that if he had ever loved a woman, that woman was Josephine Graham!

All this time her busy fingers never ceased their toil. Her sweet, grave face, was bent over her work. She was perfectly composed; indeed, not a nerve or muscle stirred, or ever would do, at the sight of him.

It was very awkward indeed to know what to say. We hear of optical delusions—of the lake in the desert, that is only sand; of the castle in the air, that is built on a myth. What a great castle he had been building! Would it stand or not? However, it would not do to lose heart; he had never yet been brought to a nonplus; and, really, she was very beautiful.

"I have ventured to pay you another visit," he began, at length; "I hope you are pleased to see me."

She smiled again; that sudden, involuntary smile, that was gone almost before it came. She raised her eyes to give him one look, and then her busy fingers began again. He could not tell whether she was glad or sorry; he could not tell anything. The perplexity vexed him. He was determined to come to the point at once. "Faint heart," he thought, "never won fair lady."

"Miss Graham," he began, nothing could be more strained and unnatural than his manner of wooing, "Miss Graham, will you kindly give me a few minutes' attention?"

He was horribly nervous; more so than he could have believed. But, come what might, he would go on.

"Miss Graham, will you have the kindness to remember the turn the conversation took the last time I did you the honour of visiting you?"

A quick, angry flush came into her cheek. She was about to reply, but he prevented her.

"I told you then, that the only reparation I could make, was to——"

She rose. There was no mistaking her feelings now.

"Excuse me," said she, "if I remind you of your promise: that the subject was never to be renewed—" that, on those terms only, would I allow any kind of friendship between you and myself."

She spoke with an energy and determination that, for the moment, shook his fabric to the very foundations; and he was afraid she would leave the room, and not enter it again till he should have taken his departure.

The aspect of things was by no means encouraging. He began to be alarmed. He thought he had better bring the whole of the argument to bear upon her.

"You will change your mind," he said, "when you know what I have been doing. I have had the house papered and painted from top to bottom; I have bought new furniture, without any regard to expense; I have made the old place look quite magnificent. It was done entirely for your sake—that is, when you should do me the honour to become Mrs. Heatherly."

He brought out this as the culmination. He could do no more. Her face had undergone several changes while he spoke. At first there was the flush of annoyance and displeasure; then this passed, and there came an expression of amusement, and a smile. She would not have smiled, if she could have helped. It was really a serious piece of business, but she could not help; and she did smile. When he had finished she said, quickly, and she was grave enough now—"I am sorry that you should have taken so much trouble. Why did you not give me a hint of your intention? I could then have prevented you in time."

Prevented! Surely she was not going to refuse him again—him and his house!

"I hoped," said Josephine, earnestly, and grieved at the look of blank disappointment in his face, "I hoped I had set that matter at rest for ever."

"No, you had not," replied he, with a simplicity that was absolutely ludicrous; "I never imagined you could have been so mad as to refuse me!"

Josephine laughed; it was impossible to deal seriously with such a character as Francis Heatherly. She thanked him for his good intentions, and softened the refusal as much as she could. But white is white, and black is black. There it was, a refusal as point blank as ever.

He liked her more and more every minute. Gradually, though he knew it not, an interest had been springing up in his mind, that was very near akin to love. At this moment, as he looked into her face, it would be difficult to map out the boundary-line between the two. He liked her face; he began to think it unlike any other he had ever seen. Her voice, how musical it was! There was an abstract pleasure in being in her society; she was just the woman he had, now and then, dreamed of, but never found. In fact, why do we trifle on the verge of a disclosure? Francis Heatherly had fallen in love. He was in love; for once, his own integrity and pure code of morals slipped a little out of sight, and into his horizon there came looming up—nothing but Josephine!

"Pray consider the matter over a little, now," he said, pathetically. "You have no idea what a cruel disappointment you are inflicting on me. Surely you will relent."

"No," said she, softly, and yet with firmness; "in this case there can be no relenting."

It was very strange! The fortress seemed so easy to be taken. Just a woman's caprice—that was all—and a woman in need and obscurity, earning her daily bread! A woman disinherited and cast out of society; and he, rolling in wealth and with the world on his side. It seemed unaccountable! Yet, there the fortress stood, secure and inaccessible; no argument of his could shake it. Again she had refused him! What could he do? He began to be in real distress. He could not endure to be thrust out from the sight of her. He must come again—and would she let him come as her friend? But her terms had not improved. She declined his visits, using mild and courteous language to him; but she declined them altogether.

"I am living alone, and the fewer visitors I have the better," she said.

He could not force himself upon her, even as a friend, though he was Francis Heatherly. There was nothing for him, but to take up his hat and depart.

At all events, there was one woman in the world, who could not be bought for gold!

(To be continued.)

THE BETTER LAND.

ADAPTED FROM THE GERMAN.

HERE was a fearful storm at sea: the wind blew, the waves rolled mountains high. In the midst of them laboured a small vessel; on board of her were, besides the crew, a family, consisting of a father, mother, and two little children, who, after a long absence in foreign countries, were returning to their home. After a time the storm lulled, but the vessel had suffered so much in the tempest, that it seemed impossible for her to hold together long enough to reach land. Under these circumstances the crew decided on abandoning her, and taking to the boats, which, though small, were seaworthy, and they knew that the sea in which they were was thickly studded with islands. They announced their determination to their passengers, who readily agreed to the proposal, but the next difficulty was how to divide the party. The boats were so small that they could neither of them hold above three or four people, and the husband would not consent to be separated from his wife, nor she from her children; as, once launched on the stormy sea, it was not probable the boats could keep together. It was, therefore, arranged that the family should take the smaller boat, while the larger one was to be occupied by the crew. For a time they kept near their companions; but night came on, and when daylight reappeared the unfortunate family were alone in the midst of the waste of waters with no compass, and no means of knowing where they were. They could only pray that a merciful Providence would guide their frail refuge to some friendly shore.

After many hours of anxiety, the welcome sight of land greeted them. Thither the father steered. It was but a low, rocky, barren island, uninviting in appearance, but it was land, and as such appeared a paradise to the poor shipwrecked ones. With much difficulty the father contrived to land his precious freight, but the boat was knocked to pieces amongst the rocks, and with it perished all hope of leaving the island, unless some passing ship observed their signals.

Years, however, rolled on. No ships neared the island. The family found a shelter in a cave, and the few plants that grew in the interior of the island, the sea-birds' eggs, and the turtle which frequented its shores, afforded them sufficient food. The children grew up strong and hardy. They had been so young at the time of their shipwreck that they could recollect no other home; they had all they needed, and cared for no more; but the parents pined after their friends, their home, and all the comforts and (to them) necessities of life of which they had so long been deprived.

At last, after five or six years had dragged slowly on, a small craft, hardly larger than the boat in which they had reached the island, was descried approaching them. In it were four dark-complexioned men; whence they came, or to what nation they belonged, could not be ascertained, but they contrived by signs to make the father understand that their vessel was not large enough to rescue the whole family, but if he would trust himself to them, they would conduct him to their home, whence he could send assistance to his family. The parting was heartrending; the mother and children clung to him, for where he would be taken to, how long he would be absent, and if these people were friendly, they knew not; but still the parents felt this opportunity of escape—the first they had had during all these years—was not to be neglected, and there was but little time for hesitation. The strangers were anxious to leave; they tore the father from the arms of his weeping family, and hurried him into the boat.

"Oh, why does father leave us," cried the children, "to go with those frightful, dreadful men?"

"He goes to a better country, my darlings," answered the mother, "whence he will send for us, and there you will have nice clothes to cover you, warm houses to live in, and good food to eat."

"Nay, dear mother, why should he leave us for that? Have we not here all we want? Does not our cave give us shelter from the rain and sun? Have we not soft beds of feathers to lie on, and as much food as we want when we are hungry?"

"See, my children," replied the mother; "you have never known otherwise; but in that good land to which your father has gone, and to which we shall follow him, people build houses, in which you can walk about. Light is let in through openings which are filled with a thing called glass, which keeps out the cold, whilst it allows the warm sun-rays to enter; you have soft woollen and linen stuff to clothe you and keep you warm; sweet milk to drink, and delicious fruits to eat;" and so she continued to try and draw her children's mind away from the loss of their father, from whom they had never before been separated, and at the same time, to reconcile herself to her husband's departure by picturing to them the luxuries from which she had been so long debarred, and which were to them unknown.

Anxiously did the mother and children during the following days scan the horizon from the highest point of the island. At last a small sail again approached; it was the four friendly strangers, who brought the mother a letter from her husband. Alas! a fresh trial awaited her! He wrote that he could not procure a larger boat; that the intricate and difficult navigation of those seas required at least four experienced sailors, and that she must, therefore, resign herself to trust the two children to the hands of the strangers; that they had brought him in safety to their home, which was only a small village, but whence, when she and his children joined him, they would be able to make their way to a sea-port, and thence travel homewards.

Bitter was the mother's grief at this fresh separation. Her husband vouched for the fidelity of these men, but the sea—the treacherous sea, which in those latitudes was so constantly disturbed by sudden tempests. Should she ever see her precious boys again? Heartrending were the children's lamentations when they found they were to be parted from their beloved mother to go with these black strangers. To calm their grief she mastered her own, and encouraged her boys, telling them that a few hours would see them safe in their father's arms, and that in a very short time she, too, would rejoin them.

The poor bereaved mother watched the little sail until it gradually sank below the horizon. Her ear was strained to listen for every sigh of the wind, and her eyes watched every cloud; but how her heart beat with joy and thankfulness when she again caught sight of the little sail nearing the island, and with what a grateful heart did she return thanks to Almighty God, when she again folded her beloved ones in her arms!

The reunited family again started on their journey to that home from which they had been so long divided. This time they reached it in safety. How happy the children were when they first found themselves under shady trees, and walking on soft, green grass; how they admired all the pretty animals by which they were surrounded, and how they enjoyed all the sweet fruits and other country luxuries which their new-found friends lavished on them!

"Darling mother!" said they, "how wrong we were to fear those good black men who came to fetch us away from that horrid, barren island. We ought rather to have rejoiced that they first gave us the means of reaching this beautiful country, and seeing all our dear friends."

"Dear children," answered the parents, "let our journey from the island always remind you of that other journey which we must all take, and in which no one can accompany us. We told you that the separation from us, bitter though it was, was but for a time, and for your good; that you would thereby derive advantages of which you then knew nothing. You were unwilling to believe us; you were contented with what you had in the island, and could not imagine that you required or could procure greater comforts than you enjoyed there. The island is like this world: we enjoy ourselves here, and think we have all we can require, and are surrounded by all that is dear to us, and when Death—that messenger who conveys us across that dark, unknown sea—comes, we tremble, and shudder, and implore that we may be left longer, and yet a little longer here below. Let us, therefore, always remember that for those who love to do the will of our Father in heaven, there is a land prepared which surpasses all that we can imagine; and may we so live, that when He sends to summon us away we shall, indeed, realise that we are but going to that 'better country' where there is neither sorrow, nor weeping, nor parting more. Keep this ever in your mind, dear children, and when the time comes for us to leave you, remember that we only go before you to that happy land; and God grant that when a few short years are past, you may also be found ready and willing to follow us thither."

L. L. C. B.

KEY TO ENIGMA ON PAGE 608.

"Then cometh the end,"—1 Cor. xv. 24.

1. T irzah	1 Kings xvi. 15.
2. H adoram	2 Chron. x. 18.
3. E lizur	Numb. x. 18.
4. N ineveh.....	2 Kings xix. 36.
5. C arpus	2 Tim. iv. 13.
6. O nesiphorus.....	2 Tim. i. 16.
7. M esha	2 Kings iii. 4.
8. E kron	1 Sam. v. 10.
9. T innath-serah	Josh. xxiv. 30.
10. H ebron	Josh. xiv. 13.
11. T atnai	Ezra v. 6.
12. H ebron	2 Sam. iii. 27.
13. E kron	2 Kings i. 2.
14. E ndor.....	1 Sam. xxvii. 8.
15. N ahshon	Numb. vii. 12.
16. D elalah	Jer. xxxvi. 25.

SCRIPTURE ACROSTIC.

A MOTHER gazed on her first born child,
And called him a gift from Heaven;
Her heart must have swelled with thankful pride
When a second son was given.

Alas! that sin should have entered in
To mar that mother's joy;
Her spirit must oft have been sorely grieved
As she watched her elder boy:

For he ran a career of sin and crime,
Placed under Jehovah's ban;
But the younger son, by his righteous life,
Though dead, still speaks to man.

1. The town where Christ's first miracles were wrought.
2. This month was Israel forth from Egypt brought.
3. An individual of the chosen race.
4. A churlish man, whom God swept from his place.

"THE QUIVER" ORPHAN-HOME FUND.

(TWENTIETH LIST.)

We shall be glad to receive any Lists which may still be out, as our account must be closed within a few days. A statement of the Fund will shortly be issued.—ED. Q.]

£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
Brought forward from List Nineteen	S. B., "Poplar Tree," Buck- ingham Road	N. Dand Brandon, Coventry	Sarah and Mary Paves, Bristol
Mrs. E. Newton, 13 Church Street, Birmingham	M. S. H.	Miss Eldick, Wimbledon	Birstall
Harptree	John S. Mersfield	Harriette Bishop, West Street Road, Boston	George Philp, Coventry
W. Thompson, Paddington A Thank Offering, N. and A.	Edwin Perry, 58, Norfolk Street, N. Shields	Three Scamps, Liverpool	J. K. Wain, Hanley
Onstothley	E. C., Bowdon	J. B. Atherton and Friends, Alderley, Yorkshire	Mrs. N. Le Pelley, Le Jardin Castel, Guernsey
Pine Fly	E. Haider, Newchurch	J. D., Newcastle-on-Tyne	C. B. Clapham
In remembrance of a dearly- loved Son, Heckington	E. Davies, Beaufort, Brecon	Edwin Gough, Penn Street, Birmingham	A. H. W., Manchester
James Emile, 10, Cam- bridge	C. S. S. Thomas, Court Farm, Gloucestershire	Eliza Hill, Sutton S.	Susan A. Trianter, 55, Stanley Buildings, Old St Pancras Road
Pickford & Co's Office, Bridge- water	W. D., Harwich	"Mendham Subscription," per D. Shearman	Collected by a Lady
P. A. H., Ringwood	E. A. Rose, White Hill, W. J. M., Pickford's Office, Ply- mouth	M. C. Eye, Suffolk	Carrie Smith, St. Leonard's T. C. G., Bell Farm
Q. O. H.	A. Ketter, Ulverston	William Bent Welwag, Driffild	E. Crush
A Mother, of Dewsbury	Walter Mitchell, Clitheroe	Churchfields	E. Mary, Eastbourne
Jonathan B. Heat, N. Pen Street, Little Bolton	May Pickard, South Wil- liam Street, Worthington	Robert Henderson, 313, Gal- lowgate, Glasgow	A. H., 10, r Norwood
G. B. F. Lee, Exley, near Halifax, Yorkshire	C. Schofield, Kington	"Dot," Hertingfordbury, per T. A. Smith	Jas. Grimshaw, Blackburn Mrs. Tatem, Preston Rec- tory, Uppingham, Rut- land
William Darling, 6, Cran- ford Terrace, Plumstead, S.E.	Katie and Annie James, Birmingham	E. B. Strand	land
M. A. Carr, Whickham	James Gale, jun., St. Peter's, Marlborough, Wilts	H. A. H., Shopley	Mrs. P. Brenard, Hal sex
Miss H. Gray, Bow, London The Coopers and Hoopers of the Gutsbeck Gunpowder Works, near Malthorp, per Thomas Henderson	A. M'Leod, Fort William	H. W. Great Grimshy	Frederick W. Rolfe, 13, Gl. Marylebone Street
	lizz'e	Mencham, Second Subscrip- tion, per Mrs. Miles	Miss Giddett, 1, Tavistock Street, W.C.
	Three Little People	W. M. D. J.	A. D's Gr. Singing Class, Edgeland, Springfield, Glasgow
	Mit Terry	A. Well-Wish
	W. Ouston, Wakefield	Lily, Dorchester, Dorset
	Fanny Keules, 7, High Street, Eton	For John, Heathfield, Ring- wood, Fifth Collection
			£820 9 9

THE QUIVER

— Saturday, July 25, 1868. —

(Drawn by A. B. HOUGHTON.)

"Oh, William, William!"—p. 709.

AN HOUR'S REVENGE, AND WHAT CAME OF IT.

A TRUE STORY WITH MANY MORALS. IN FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

WELL, master, and you too, Jim, 'tis an old story enough; and yet sometimes, watching the stars at night, I fancy the like of it never was before. There were many people and many things entangled in it, but they might all be untwisted except two. A boy and a girl, and then a man and a woman; they wove the thread of my dark and changeable life since I was six years old, fifty-four years gone by. My first cousin, Harry Austin, and my second cousin, Alice Day: the loveliest boy and man, and not far from the loveliest girl and woman, that ever I saw in this world, or yet in pictures, or in dreams. And yet I never greatly cared for Harry—perhaps because his Italian mother gave him the cunning of her nation along with the black hair and the eyes that burned like coals; perhaps because he was too clever, and then too changeable, so that whatever game or study he took up, you were sure to get beaten hollow; and just when your relish was blunted by defeat, Master Harry Austin turned upon his heel, and away for some new caprice. That was not fair.

I was a sturdy English boy, proud to lead, or proud to follow a better leader than myself, but never liking to go behind one that was certain to gibe. Now, at lessons we were the leaders, first of our own class, and presently of the whole school: and in the playground I was sure to be called upon as captain, when Harry had had the honour of being elected first. So I got most of the prizes in school, only every one whispered that Harry could have had them if he pleased. Perhaps we were too jealous to quarrel; but we never really loved each other to the bottom of our hearts, and no people could be more unlike. He was tall, dark, and thin, and very fleet of foot; while I was stout and fair, and the best boxer for many a mile around. He was vindictive, as I thought, and cunning, as now I know too well. I never was either, except once, and that once brought me to this place to-day, a disgraced, miserable convict, whom you, sir, if you were like scores around, could tie to the next tree and flog as if I were a brute beast.

But if I thought little of Harry Austin, I made it up with Alice Day, the daughter of our master, and the sweetest little maiden for three counties round. So fair, so lithe, so merry, so blue-eyed, so bashful, and yet so clever and so kind. We schoolboys all fell in love with her together, raved about her with one consent, and wondered how such a being as our head-master could be the father of such an angel. At least, they all raved except—what was the name I called him? yes, sir, Harry Austin—except him and me. You see, names make no difference to you, and one does not like to mix them up with a convict's doings; so I take those—Harry Austin, Alice Day.

Harry and I were cousins of the Days, and knew them, and we both, it seems, were too really in love to talk about her with the strange set. But I told him everything, and he never told me a word. If I knew that he loved her, do you think I should have gone on saying what would grieve him to the heart? For I told him joyfully when she called me her best of cousins; and so that huge dandy, Tom Maguire, was cut out. (So was Harry Austin, but he never told me a word.) Then I told him what happened once when I found her reading deep in the hazel-woods, beside the little fall—how triumphantly I had come away, and how deep was the carnation on her cheeks! But he did not tell me a word.

At last—the year that I came there on a visit, after leaving school—I told him how we had exchanged locks of hair and rings, and plighted our troth to each other even unto the death; and how I was to ask for her next year, as soon as my uncle had bought a farm with the money left in trust for me, and I was independent—for my uncle would not like me to marry a penniless girl, even if she were not only an angel in my eyes, but could show her wings in proof. Still he told me nothing—but he wrote to my uncle, and told him all my plans, and bid him question me, but keep the secret of his treachery. And then he rode over to old Day, and managed to let him also know, in the simplest manner you could fancy, how deeply he loved Alice. But he knew her heart was not for him. Oh, no! every one knew where it was gone.

Poor old Day, suspicious for his girl, because she had no mother, was quite bewildered.

“And, indeed, it was not for a distant cousin to speak, nor would he, if things were honestly meant, or if he loved the sweet girl less.”

Then, I believe, her father began to tremble, for he was quite nervous about protecting his motherless child, and besought and commanded Harry to speak out.

And Harry told him that I boasted of my conquest in a very reckless way, such as he thought quite unbecoming; and he asked whether there was any concealment in the case, for that always ended badly; and wound up by hinting to Day that I had lent the poor girl, to his own knowledge, a copy of the worst poem of the day.

Now that poem he had carried with him, having first written my name in the front, and laid it in the little ante-room through which he was shown into the study.

Then he begged him not to betray his confidence, or dear Alice never would forgive him. And growing bolder by success, he put him upon the notable plan of searching for some relic of me which would give him a fair excuse for taxing her with all. Of course, the poem was found where he laid it, and so the father's worst suspicions were confirmed. Poor old man!—so wise in books, so ignorant of men! I could forgive anything to the lover of my love, except such tampering with thy kind parental fears—teacher of my boyhood!—one parent of Alice Day!

There was, of course, a dreadful scene between Alice and her father. She denied having ever seen the book, or even heard of it; but she would not deny anything else, for she loved me, and knew that I loved her too well to change; and she told him truly that I never would love or marry another girl, and so for her to renounce her engagement would be to doom me to a lonely life. But the old man was inflexible. It gradually transpired that he had loved me almost like a son, and not only wished for our marriage dearly, but proposed it himself to my uncle and guardian, who repulsed him with cruel and unmanly taunts. Then his heart had been turned against me. He now felt sure I might have spoken out straightforwardly, if I were in earnest, and, at all events, he never would give his child to an underhand intriguer. So all my misery came upon me from a single act of cowardly concealment.

Sir, it is always the same story. I have known dozens of happy marriages to which the parents were opposed at first, but being treated honestly, as they ought to be, came round to think better of their children's choice; but I never, never knew one happy marriage that was planned and carried through in the dark. Many a one is broken off that need not have been; and many more end in misery and late repentance, just because the parties know each other's powers of concealment and treachery too well to be at ease together. If I had a son—as, thank God, I never had—my first advice to him in such matters would be, rather marry a sempstress openly, as a man should, than run away with a princess.

Alice gave me up when her father cursed me, and promised never to see me more.

Ah! how the light of life sank down into its socket, and instead of golden-coloured flame was noisome and sour smoke; how the music of hope changed to a dull wailing, as of tired waves breaking upon a cruel shore lined with the bones of mariners; how the grand intoxication of the sparkling wine of love changed to the headache and the nausea of the drunkard's wretched morrow; and how I loathed the life, and the hope, and the love together, when, breaking the seal that had come upon so many a tender scroll, my astonished eyes read this:—

It is all over. My father considers your conduct unworthy of a man; and against his express commands I shall never marry, nor wish to love. For this misfortune, if you count it such, thank the literature you chose to carry into my presence.

Of course, I wrote to protest against this cruel and abrupt letter, and deny all comprehension of the charge in its last line. Of course, also, my letter came back unread.

CHAPTER II.

WHAT happened after Alice and I were parted was told me long, long afterwards. Her temper varied strangely. Sometimes she would break out into wild bursts of passion, upbraiding me for crimes that were entirely false, and scouting the idea that I ever loved her; but at other times she would cry out against herself for being hard and faithless, and breaking her lover's heart.

Both moods, however, were equally against my chances, for after one of these softer intervals she was sure to add, "Well, I have made another promise now, and if one cannot be mended, the other shall not be broken too. I will never see my poor boy again—never, never again, until he leaves his grave and I leave mine. What shall I say when he bears witness against me then? Not one word—not even to beg forgiveness."

Poor girl; her mind was in danger for months, and it was only saved by carrying her off to the Mediterranean for two winters. And here was Henry—what? yes, Austin—Henry Austin's great chance. He had money enough to go with them, and he spoke Italian like a native. His smooth Southern ways, too, were very soothing to an invalid; and perhaps pity for the victim of his own fraud made him gentler than ever, and more winning. As regards me, he must have acted mercilessly, for she came back with a set, stern look upon her lips, that used to be so soft; an open vaunt that her old weakness was entirely gone; and a very obvious leaning toward her dark-eyed, handsome cousin.

And now, strangely enough, her father began to hesitate. He begged her to think well before she gave herself away again, and even seemed unwilling to countenance Austin's visits. It was only by coaxing and determination that he was brought to say that, if her mind was set upon him, she might have her will. "I came between you and your love once, because I thought it right; but I will not do so again."

It seems, from what happened afterwards, that he had noticed the insincerity of his plausible young friend, and began to feel suspicions which he dared not put into words. Suppose he were to shake the reason of his daughter altogether! Suppose this wretched distrust were a sign that his own brain were going?

Now, sir, I must tell you a little about the times. The Napoleon wars had just begun, and all Europe was trembling. In England some men were giving great trouble, setting workmen against their masters, and persuading them that to hold property was a crime. Every now and then a farmer was shot at, just as in Ireland still, but far more commonly his ricks were set on fire, and hundreds of pounds' worth of property lost at a single stroke. It was a fearful time. Wellington was just fitting out his little expedition, from which no person seemed to hope much, and the French were as great a terror to all the world as ever the Turks used to be. And I have heard people in a distant county say that from a high hill, at midnight, eight or ten incendiary fires could have been reckoned blazing away at the same time. Afterwards, I believe it was still worse.

But the farmers, on the whole, throve wonderfully, for corn was almost at a famine price; and while the wretches who burned so much had either to starve or enlist, we got just as much money for what remained. People will pay a great deal for bread. And in our country, where these troubles did not come, we were all making fortunes. I put away money enough in those years, besides living well and paying war taxes, to make up for any loss that a fire could possibly inflict upon me. But, ay me, I was a single man, and had no one to share it with, or enjoy saving for, since Alice broke her faith.

Now you can understand how fortunate the young people thought themselves, when they had the offer of a good farm that lay almost midway between old Day's residence and mine. It was a fine large place, but the buildings and ground had both been neglected, and every penny they could get together was laid out in stocking and renovating it, and repairing the long, straggling, thatched, old farmhouse, and they had also to advance money to pay for the standing crops. Old Day even resolved to sell his little place, and go to live with his daughter and her husband, putting the money it brought with what he had already given them.

But, sir, on their wedding-day, when all was over, and they returned to his house for a little feasting and toast-drinking, as Day stepped out of his gig and hobbled into the parlour, he looked wildly around him, and cried out, "Oh, Harry Austin, Harry Austin! Will some one give me a drink of water quickly?" and before the water came, he lay upon the ground in a fit.

No one will ever know what he meant, but I half suspect that to his excitable, suspicious eyes—eyes, remember, that had watched his new son-in-law since he was ten years old, first as a school-boy, and then as an intimate acquaintance—there was something dishonest seen in the unguarded moment of his triumph. A look or a word might be enough for his morbidly acute sensibilities; and if so, he might well be overcome, as he thought of me, and what he had done, and of his only daughter's future. And yet I must say that a more loving husband than my worst enemy turned out, as far as I could judge, was never seen.

For a week the old man's life was in danger, and his children—there were now two—could not leave his side. But no sooner had they both gone home, expecting him to follow in a few days, than he sent off his favourite old servant, begging me—me, whom he had outraged and robbed of hope, and, from a generous, gallant youth, converted into a grasping, hard, dreaded man of the world—begging me, I say, "to go and see him without an hour's delay, for the love of the old times, when he had been an indulgent master to his uncle's grandson."

Something within me said with a prophetic instinct that my hour had come. It was long since I had ceased to pray, ceased to read my Bible, ceased to think of anything soft or lovely, lest it should blunt the one evil purpose of my blighted life. Revenge was what I lived for. Often when my brain grew numb, and small pulses, that many people never feel or know of, beat hotly and fast about my forehead, in utter weariness, and hopelessness, and loneliness, I have whispered the bitter word into my own ears again and again, to beat off the threatened sickness and stimulate my drooping powers. In my very dreams I used to watch Austin and old Day sinking into the sea, or over a precipice together, without any one to save them from death. For revenge I hoarded money, because money was power, and would help me some time. For revenge I crushed down my temper, and forced myself to seem kind among the workmen, that if ever public sympathy was needed, it might be upon my side. . . . Or else, perhaps, I wrong myself: perhaps, looking back from the comparative happiness of my penal servitude upon the absolute wretchedness of my freedom and wealth, everything upon that dark horizon seems darker than it was. My only reason for this faint hope is, that I never formed a definite plan of operation, and when a word from me would have prevented their obtaining the farm, I looked on sullenly, and let them have it.

But at receiving this message my heart leaped within me. Yes, I would go, and hear what he wanted, and perhaps wring an apology from his reluctant soul; and then he should verily hear what I could say, for I had thought over an answer long enough, and he should not lose the benefit of my meditations. I would go at once, upon my fleetest horse. "Not so!" I answered to my boiling passions, "lest over-eagerness should weaken the effect. Let me be deliberate and calm." So I carelessly told the man that I would be riding in that direction in a week or two; and it was only as a concession to his earnest entreaties that I promised to go to-morrow. But I went the same night, for my eagerness would not be restrained, and was rewarded by the unsuspecting domestic with a blessing. "And, indeed," said he, "every one says you're the kindest man for twenty miles around."

The old man was so sadly changed that, for a moment, my heart smote me. His fingers played restlessly with the buttons on his coat as he went on to speak, after vainly stretching out his hands to me, and just as vainly motioning me to sit down. His mind, he said, was sorely troubled, and he wanted to tell me all, trusting firmly that I would not deceive a dying man, but deny or confess frankly, as I used when a boy at school. Here I broke in with a haughty interruption. What right had he to cross-question me now upon affairs that he so harshly settled without me at the time? They had been painful to me once, but now they were so utterly indifferent that I would not undertake to correct his better judgment upon any point that he had decided. Poor old gentleman, his meekness should have moved a stone. He would at least beg me to listen to his tale, and then I would please to judge him according to the circumstances. And he told me the particulars of Austin's treachery; dwelt much upon the motherless inexperience of his girl, and his own want of advice, and fixed an appealing look upon my pale face. But the pallor was from rage. Slowly and bitterly I hissed a malignant answer out. "He was once a great admirer of Queen Elizabeth. Perhaps he remembered her words to the woman that had blighted her existence. If not, he might easily find them out."

With that I turned away, and never saw him again, but riding fast over the clattering pavement, urging my horse until the sparks leapt out of the flints, and, hurrying wrathfully through the darkness towards the pale gleam that looked like a ghost of the day that was dead, ever and anon his agonised cry smote upon me like the buffet of an iron hand—"Oh, William, William, William!" I cannot tell whether these were the last words that good man ever spoke. In my sleep he speaks them to me still, for his spirit has tracked me out, and haunts me under these Australian stars.

ALEXIS.

(To be continued.)

BALAAM.

HE history of Balaam is one with which are connected many difficulties, and from which may be deduced many lessons. But it is in one aspect only that we would regard it now—that all we have recorded of him is but one long account of an attempt to increase, or secure, his own worldly prosperity at the expense of his conscience; one continuous proof of the utter impossibility of serving both God and Mammon.

There are, perhaps, few of those who are held up to us as warnings, beacons placed upon some dangerous rock where others before us have made shipwreck rather than harbour-lights, to guide us safely into port,—there are few of these for whom we express feelings of more entire condemnation; and with these there mingles not a little contempt. Successful villany, successful sin, the man who, by a life of grasping avarice and extortionate usury, or possibly of dishonourable treachery, has secured to himself a comfortable competence, we may indeed profess to hate and abhor, but the world cannot afford to despise him; and as it receives him with open arms into its place of honour, it glosses over the past with the oft-repeated and much-abused Scriptural salve, that he was wiser in his generation than the children of light, and we are half inclined to go back to the heathenish notion that success is a sign of the favour of Heaven. But unsuccessful villany—the man who has notably done evil from greed of gain, who has sacrificed upon the altar of Mammon all the best principles of his heart and conscience, and then has failed after all to gain the world, though he lost his soul—for such a man as that the world has only contempt and scorn, and it drives him forth without pity from that pale to which success supplies a passport which honesty and honour alone should give.

But ere we thus condemn the character of Balaam, it behoves us all to search well our own consciences and see whether there lurk not in us some vestige of a similar nature; whether we, too, have not at some time of our lives been tempted—yes, and yielded to the temptation—to warp the voice of conscience within us till at last it seemed to favour our own desires; whether we, too, have not at first cried, in the vivid conviction of a conscience as yet unseared by self-deceit, "Though Balak should give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the commandment of God," and then, soon after, so persuaded ourselves that we go to do that very thing which the Word of God had expressly forbidden. And it is more especially the office of the minister of Christ to come with the narrative of such sins as these of Balaam, and when the voice of conscience within them has condemned them utterly, and the sentence has gone forth, "The man that has done this thing shall surely die," then to throw back the covering, and tear off the disguise, and reveal its own sin to the self-satisfied heart,—"Thou art the man."

There comes, then, to every man, at some time of his life, a temptation such as that which presented itself, by the mouth of the princes of Moab, to this solitary prophet in his home amongst the mountains of the East; and it finds him strong, apparently, in faith and reliance upon God. His life hitherto has been calm and undisturbed. He has floated down the stream of time so smoothly that he has well-nigh forgotten that there may be rapids ahead; but now he is nearing them, and the time has come to see whether there be such a pilot at the helm as will steer him clear of danger, or whether he will be dashed in hopeless shipwreck ere he reach the haven beyond. At the first all seems well. "Tarry ye here, and I will see what the Lord shall speak unto me." So is it that we seem to make up our minds to act as God would have us act. So is it that we shrink back with horror even from the thought of acting in defiance of his will, however great the gain may be; yet how often, when the voice within us, the calm conviction of the midnight colloquy with God has pressed upon us the impossibility of stretching out the hand to grasp the coveted prize, how often is the answer such as springs from an impatient and unwilling obedience! How often does the spirit chafe at the unwelcome restraint, and find its utterance in the words of Balaam, "The Lord refuseth to let me go!" We have said that the spirit shrinks back with horror and aversion from the thought of acting in defiance of God's will; but there still remains in the discontented heart the longing for the coveted rewards. The power of the conscience within has compelled the answer, "I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord," and obliged us unwillingly to serve God; but the service of our hearts is still given to Mammon, and so we turn, like Balaam, to devise some method of combining the two. We cannot act openly in defiance of God's will; but there is no harm, we think, in using our every effort to make God's will seem like our own; no harm in pressing upon him, again and again, for the permission we so much desire, until, at length, the voice of God within seems changed from what it was, and at length we persuade ourselves that God has given his sanction to our own desires. Nor does the self-deception stop there. There is yet a further step—yet another restriction placed upon ourselves: "Only the word that God shall speak." Doing wrong, and knowing that we are doing wrong, yet we would still keep up appearances, and seem to resume again that check upon our actions which lately we have so utterly disregarded; forgetting the utter impossibility of serving God just so far as may suit our own desires, and deserting that service so soon as it clashes with the service of the world. We are ever desiring, as it were, to make an agreement with the Almighty. If he will but allow us the indulgence of some darling sin—if we may but serve Mammon in this one point, we will serve God in all else—if we may but go with the messengers, then "only the word that God shall say unto us, that and that only will we speak."

Thus is it that we ever persuade ourselves that the voice of God permits us to walk in that one path which we so ardently desire. The ambitious man convinces himself that, provided he commit no actual offence against God's law, he may yet give up the whole of his time, and life, and energy to the pursuit of fame. The covetous man convinces himself that if he keep within the strict letter of honesty, if his hands be unstained by what the world calls dishonourable action, he may yet indulge his avarice to the very verge of extortion. The worldly man thinks that if his outward life be decent and respectable, and his tithe of time and money be given to God, then all the rest may be given to the pleasures of the world. And surely in these days, when all the veins of social, and political, and religious existence seem to have been filled with the fiery blood of a new life, such as no other century ever saw; when every edifice that God or man has built upon earth is being shaken to its very foundations by the raging blast of democratic or rationalistic innovations; when time-honoured ceremonies or institutions of church or state are being cast aside as out of date, and useless to this more advanced age; surely in such times as these it becomes us all to look well to ourselves and our own motives: and when the messengers come to us with the apparently large temporal rewards in their hands, let us not suffer the conscience within us to be bribed as Balaam's was; let us not place the gold and silver of the King of Moab so close to our eyes that it shuts out the view of all else; let us not attempt the utter impossibility which Balaam attempted, and failed to accomplish—the service of God and Mammon.

Let us notice, further, the issue of the attempt. It has been well said that in matters of duty, second thoughts are almost invariably wrong. To a conscience not utterly seared and rendered callous by sin, the path of duty is seldom doubtful; and though in matters of worldly expediency it is well to act with all cautious deliberation, yet, in matters of right and wrong, there is rarely room for question. Thus was it with Balaam. The answer of God came clear and distinct, "Thou shalt not go with them." But in his heart there was little real conformity to the Word of God, and he asks again for a permission which had already been clearly refused. And now he succeeds in persuading himself that at length that refusal is withdrawn. Yet, even here the goodness and mercy of God will not forsake his erring servant. Yet another attempt shall be made to turn him back from his evil ways, and as, in mad and passionate displeasure, he smites the unoffending animal who for so many years had borne him safe, the angel of the Lord stands before him in the way with one last word of warning and advice. Go back, he could not; go on, he must. Once started on that dangerous road, retreat was impossible. But one chance is left him: let him be true to his religion and his God. Let him speak out to Balak with bold and unflinching confidence the word of God; let him cast behind him all thought of the house full of silver and gold, and do his duty manfully as a prophet of the Most High, and all might yet be well. But the love of Mammon is too deeply ingrained within him, and so he drags the irritated king from mountain to mountain, seeking by every means to stifle within him the all-powerful voice of Divine truth; till at length its influence is in wrath withdrawn, and he becomes the author of a fiendish device, which, indeed, should curse Israel more than all the incantations which Balak could have desired. And is there one wandering soul who has started on the high road to ruin whom the mercy of God has not thus checked on his onward course? Has God ever left one soul to perish for want of an obstacle to meet him in the way? Has not God come to each one of us, when we have deserted his service and are rushing blindly on our way to the coveted service of Mammon, and withstood us in his infinite mercy? Can none of us look back upon a time when his all-provident hand has hedged up our way with thorns, and placed a pit before our feet in that path which now we see was leading unto death? Alas! that so many will meet the obstacle as Balaam met it, with the mad passion of disappointed avarice, or the discontented avowal of a false-hearted compliance, "Now, if it displease Thee I will get me back again," when we know all the while that it is impossible to go back, when we know that the past cannot be undone. And if we would accept the last warning which God in his mercy gives us (for even his opportunities of mercy towards us may have an end), we must accept the position we have made for ourselves. "Going on," indeed, but going on to speak with unflinching boldness the word of God. Resigning at once and for ever the service of Mammon, upon which we had so rashly started, and in which we had so nearly perished, and resolving to carry the service of God into those scenes of earthly occupation upon which we entered with such different intentions.

And, in conclusion, is there not a special and more particular application of this subject? Are not these the temptations to which all the ministers of religion are more especially subject? Do not the messengers of Balak often come to them with the rewards in their hands? If they will but change some unpopular opinion; if they will but conceal or disguise some unpleasant truth; if they will but teach more comfortable doctrine, or, at all events, wrap up the nauseous draught in some palliative medium of honied words, such and such rewards shall be theirs, such and such popularity, such and such favour. And though the voice of God come clear and distinct, "Thou shalt not go with them," yet the temptation will come, too, of examining again the objectionable doctrine, or the unpleasant advice, to see whether it cannot be warped into compliance with the tempter's wish, and the way be made smooth towards the coveted gain. It is a temptation which a strong mind, and a stout heart, and God's help alone can resist. Ministers of Christ cannot help being influenced by their congregations, as well as the congregations by their pastors, and that influence will only be exerted for good when it is totally independent of all worldly concerns. But let us remember that there would be no Balaams to fall if there were not first Balaks to tempt. Many a one there is, both amongst clergy and laity, who would have gone on still in a pure and honourable career, had he not been tempted to warp the voice of conscience within him by the offer of some enticing reward. And if there be a successful device in the hands of Satan to draw an upright man from his path of duty, it is surely this: to make him think the wrong way right, to warp the voice of his conscience and his God within him, till he thinks he hears the coveted permission to go with the messengers, forgetting that what God has once spoken can never be altered, and that it is an unchangeable truth for time and for eternity, that "Ye cannot serve both God and Mammon."

LUTHER AT WORMS.

GREAT Protestant festival has been held this year in Germany in celebration of an event for ever memorable in the annals of the Christian Church. The ancient city of Worms, famous in ecclesiastical history, has at length done honour to itself by erecting a statue to the monk of Wittenberg, who dared to maintain the truth in the presence of the kaiser, and at the imminent peril of his own life.

The imperial crown of Germany had only a few months encircled the brow of the youthful Charles Quint, when an august and solemn Diet, attended by all the mightiest princes of the empire, was opened at Worms on the 28th of January, 1521. Primarily this Diet had been convened to nominate a council of regency to act in the absence of the emperor, and to regulate various other matters of high state import; but the attraction which drew together two hundred and four princes and potentates, kingly dukes, potent margraves, archbishops and bishops, ambassadors, counts, sovereign barons, and papal nuncios, was neither a sense of public duty, nor even a natural desire to welcome to Germany the most powerful monarch of the age. One greater than Charles was expected to be present. One of those remarkable men, who rise from time to time to herald in a new order of things, and commence a fresh era in the history of human progress, was at that epoch stirring up the stagnant waters of the Pool of Bethesda, and proclaiming war against ignorance, superstition, and priestcraft. This man, it was generally believed, would be summoned to render an account of the strange doctrines with which he had perplexed and agitated Europe, from the simple peasant to the Pope of Rome. This man was Martin Luther, and to see and hear this tonsured monk, the mightiest and noblest of the land had gathered together in that ancient city.

The abuses of the Roman Church, the corrupt lives of the priests, and the mingled profligacy and arrogance of the Popes, had inspired all classes with a longing desire for a general reformation, though few contemplated anything more than a purification of the existing establishment. It was not the religious teachings of the Papal See that gave offence, but the immorality and cupidity of its ministers. A list of one hundred and one grievances was accordingly made out by the secular princes attending the Diet, supported by a large majority of the ecclesiastical princes, and presented to the emperor, with a prayer for their prompt redress. "We have a pontiff," said they, "who spends his life in hunting and pleasure. The benefices of Germany are given at Rome to huntsmen, domestics, grooms, stable-boys, body-servants, and other persons of that class, ignorant, unpolished people, without capacity, and entire strangers to Germany."

The emperor, though desirous, for political considerations, to secure the favour of the Court of Rome, was thus constrained, in spite of the nuncio's remonstrances, to yield so far to the current of public opinion as to recall the edict he had issued condemning Luther's writings to the flames, and even to invite the monk himself to appear before the Diet under the protection of a safe conduct. Luther's friends, however, dreaded the machinations of his enemies, and essayed every argument and device to dissuade him from complying with the emperor's invitation. But that brave man never for a moment hesitated as to the course he was bound to pursue. Commending himself to the over-ruling guidance of Providence, he at once proceeded with such haste as the imperfect means of travel which then existed would permit, and entered Worms, amid the acclama-tions of the people, on the morning of the 16th of April.

So great was the popular enthusiasm that some of Charles's counsellors urged him to put Luther out of the way, or at least send him to Rome to answer there for his recreancy, for that no faith need be kept with a heretic. Charles, however, shrank from the violation of his plighted word; nor, indeed, would it have been quite safe to have ventured upon any overt acts of violence. Thus it happened that during his stay at Worms the reformer was treated with the respect due to his singular courage, his unstained morality, his fervent eloquence, and honest convictions.

At four in the afternoon, of the 17th April, Luther was summoned to appear in presence of his imperial majesty and the states of the empire. As he proceeded on foot from the Hotel of the Knights of Rhodes, where he lodged, the throng was so great that the soldiers could with difficulty fray a passage through the eager and excited multitude. At length the hall was reached, and, the doors being opened, the monk of Wittenberg presently stood before the most puissant sovereign in Europe, surrounded with all the pomp and circumstance of almost unlimited power. For an instant his presence of mind seemed to fail him. The exalted rank of even the humblest members of that august assembly, the splendour of their robes, the consciousness of the deadly enmity of many of them, the appalling stillness, his own solitary and almost unfriended position, the instinctive shrinking from danger inherent to humanity, the sense of the awful responsibility he had assumed—all these things weighed upon his spirits, and, for a moment, filled him with distrust and incertitude. But the weakness soon passed away, and with a calm, respectful demeanour the accused—for such he was—acknowledged himself the author of the books imputed to him, but asked for time to prepare his answer to the question, whether he still adhered to their contents or was willing to make recantation. This request for delay he proffered with such seeming timidity, and in such a subdued tone of voice, that many thought he meant to give way, and the young emperor contemptuously exclaimed, "Assuredly that is not the man who would ever make me turn heretic!" An interval of twenty-four hours was accordingly granted, and the imperial herald reconducted Luther to his hotel through an immense concourse of people.

As the momentous hour approached, the stout heart of the reformer quailed as he thought of the incalculable importance of the work he had taken in hand. Strange doubts and misgivings possessed him. For a brief space, the flesh prevailed over the spirit; but, in the end, his faith

(Drawn by J. D. WATSON.)

"Slowly on by fount and tree, Sadly rode the knight, and pale."—p. 715.

triumphed, and great peace and sense of power filled and strengthened his wavering mind.

Laying his left hand upon a copy of the Bible, which was lying on the table before him, he raised his right hand towards heaven, and swore to fulfil the task that had been allotted him, though it should cost him his life.

After waiting two tedious hours in the midst of a swaying and surging crowd of eager, but generally respectful, gazers, the doors of the hall were opened, and Luther again stood in the presence of that unsympathetic tribunal. But all traces of his recent trouble had disappeared. He had resolved to do his duty at all personal hazards, and, meek, but fearless—humble, but self-possessed, he declared his fixed intention to stand by every line he had written, until it could be proved to him, from the Holy Scripture, that he was mistaken. On being more closely pressed for a definite answer, he replied, "I cannot subject my faith either to the Pope, or to councils, because it is clear as day that they have often fallen into error, and even into great self-contradiction. If, then, I am not disproved by passages of Scripture, or by clear arguments; if I am not convinced by the very passages which I have quoted, and so bound in conscience to submit to the Word of God, I neither can nor will retract anything; for it is not safe for a Christian to speak against his conscience." Then, looking around him, he uttered those simple, pathetic words, which go straight to every man's heart: Hier stehe ich. Ich kan nichts anders. Gott helfe mir. Amen. ("Here I stand. I can do no otherwise. God help me. Amen.")

His hearers were touched to the quick. Charles himself was moved by his noble courage, his unwavering faith; while the creatures of Rome were filled with rage and dismay. For a little while the monk rose superior to his judges; for he derived not his authority from man. Presently, the Chancellor of Trèves again addressed him: "If you do not retract, the Emperor, and the states of the empire, will consider what course they must adopt towards an obstinate heretic." It was a sentence of condemnation, but Luther remained unmoved. "God help me!" was all he answered, "for I can retract nothing."

It was not his fate, however, to attest his sincerity at the stake. Here was yet much work in store for him. His calm intrepidity was sufficient evidence that he was no mere enthusiast, still less an impostor. The brave words he had uttered with such Christian humility, with such Christian boldness, moved many to inquire into the truth of the doctrines this lowly monk so steadfastly professed. His own friends were confirmed in their previous convictions, while not a few who had hitherto regarded Luther with an evil eye, found their sentiments of aversion changed to respect and admiration. Of these, however, Aleander, the papal nuncio, was not one. Neither was Charles indisposed to sacrifice the refractory monk, in order to gain the alliance of Leo X. against his great rival Francis I. of France. Accordingly, on the very next day, the Emperor sent a message to the Diet, declaring Luther and his adherents to be interdicted and excommunicated heretics, and as such doomed to destruction.

Some few of the prelates and ecclesiastical princes would have gone much further, and again urged the Emperor to disregard the safe conduct he himself had given. "Let the Rhine," said they, "receive his ashes as a century ago it received those of John Huss." But the Elector Palatine, the princes of Bavaria, and Duke George of Saxony, insisted that faith should be kept even with a heretic; and Charles finally declined to mark the commencement of his reign by an act of perfidy.

Other means were then tried to work upon Luther's genial disposition, or to surprise him into unguarded admissions. It was all in vain, Luther took his stand upon Holy Writ. By that he was willing to be judged—to that he referred his opponents. At last, a General Council was proposed, and the proposition was readily accepted, but with one condition—that it should decide according to Holy Scripture alone. It is needless to add that this condition put an end to all idea of convening a council.

A few days more, and Luther had turned his back upon Worms and its splendid Diet. On the 25th of April, he received the Emperor's command to return to his home, and abstain from disturbing the public peace by the way, either by preaching or writing. Next morning, therefore, at an early hour, Luther set out for Frankfort, attended by a party of gentleman on horseback, and accompanied beyond the walls by a large portion of the population of the city, who bade him God speed with tears and benedictions. Such, briefly, is the glorious episode which the magistrates and burghers of Worms have sought to commemorate.

JUDGMENT AND MERCY.

SLOWLY over hill and dale,
 Slowly on by fount and tree,
 Sadly rode the knight, and pale,
 Stooping 'neath his misery.
 For his lance, though keenly aimed,
 Failed him still in deadly need;
 Still the erring point he blamed,
 Wrathful with his steel or steed.
 Shame pursuing close behind him,
 Scorn flung on him from the foe,
 Clutched his heart, and strove to bind him,
 That he should his cause forego.
 Now, his purpose faint within him,
 Now, it brooked not of delay,
 Striving fair before to win him
 Better deeds than those to-day.
 Heavy-hearted, rode he slowly,
 Till he reached a cottage door, -
 Where, his great soul failing wholly,
 Stayed he that low porch before,

Calling, one came, calm and coldly,
 With a face of wrath and age.
 "Ho! sir knight, hast served me boldly,
 Warring like a lady's page?
 "Where is now thy tribute needed,
 That I should thy debt forgive?"
 But he answered not nor heeded,
 Ghast as one that scarce can live.
 "Go, and take not rest for ever,
 Till such deeds be won and weighed;
 Earth and time 'twixt us must sever
 Ere the plague from thee be stayed."
 Then that knight knelt lowly, weeping,
 "Unto God alone I call;
 This dread weight my soul is keeping;
 Let thy mercy bear it all."
 Like a happy dream came o'er him
 Light and calm, and swept away
 That stern image, and before him
 Shone far off the eternal day. J. S. W.

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

ROTTEN SECURITY.

SO this is all that comes of your fine marrying, John!" said the old lady, peevishly.

"Mother, I tell you, that has nothing to do with it!" said John. "You never could be made to understand!"

"I do understand. I can see through a milestone as well as anybody. I always told you, you ought to have married a bit of money. Now, if you had married a bit of money, you need not have had to leave your farm."

"Mother!" said John, all his old manliness and spirit flashing up, "mother, I won't hear a word about it! Rachel is worth her weight in gold! Many a wife might have whimpered me to death; but she's never said a single word—never a single word!" And his eyes filled with tears.

The old lady gave an expressive sniff. It would not do to push John too far. But to be silenced was not to be convinced.

"Now, mother," said John, after he had wiped his eyes with the cuff of his coat, "all this is nothing to the purpose, and not what I came about. I don't mean to give up, mind! I'll have another try with this bond. There's two or three I haven't asked yet. I'll raise the money, if I can. But if I should not raise it in time, will you do me one service?"

"What is it, John?"

"Give us house-room for a bit, mother, when we have to leave the farm."

His voice gave a pitiful quaver as he said it; in fact, he could hardly say it at all.

"Oh, yes! I'll give you house-room, John."

"And you'll be kind to Rachel, mother, and not hurt her feelings?"

"As if I ever hurt anybody's feelings, John," said the old lady, beginning to cry. She was about as heart-broken as he was, at his having to leave the farm.

"I know you don't mean anything, mother," said John, kindly; "but it always seems to me that you have a grudge against Rachel, and this is not the time for showing it: that's all!"

"I'm sure I'm the most peaceable body that ever lived!" sobbed the old lady, still deeply aggrieved; "and I haven't a grudge against anybody. All I meant was, that a hundred pound is not picked up every day. No more it is!"

"Who wants it? I'm sure I don't!" said John, a trifle impatiently. "Then I may tell Rachel that you will take us in?"

"Yes, you may tell Rachel."

Her cue, now, was to sit with an air of profound resignation and meekness, that was enough, as John said, to provoke a saint.

He took leave of her in despair; and before he had gone very far, he met Rachel.

"John," she began, in a brisk, hopeful tone—such a contrast to his mother's—"John, I have been as busy as a bee! You can't guess what I have been doing."

"You have not been doing anything about the bond?" He said it eagerly. The bond was uppermost in his mind.

"No, not about the bond."

"Ah!" There was a world of disappointment in his tone; and a cloud came over his face.

"I have been looking for a little home for us to pop into, John; and I think I have found one—such a——"

"You might have saved yourself the trouble, Rachel. You won't get me into lodgings!"

A kind of chill came to her heart. It had been so warm and hopeful a moment ago.

"Only for a little time," she said, gently, "until we have found something more permanent. That cottage of Colonel Haywood's——"

"I tell you I will have nothing to do with Colonel Haywood!"

She was silent. The chill grew more painful. There was a feeling creeping over her of dark days to come.

He saw he had pained her, and he felt a touch of repentance.

"We shan't want lodgings, Rachel. There is no need to trouble about them. I'm going off with this bond. It shall go hard with me but I'll get it turned into money. In case I don't, I suppose we must turn out: but my mother will take us in—I've asked her."

"Your mother!"

"Yes; where should a man go to, when he's hard up, but to his mother?"

He spoke irritably. He knew from the tone of her voice that the proposal was disagreeable to her, and the least opposition, though tacitly implied, jarred upon him.

The proposition was disagreeable. Rachel felt it was no less than the harbinger to many troubles and vexations from which he might have spared her. But this was not the time to argue the matter, and, like a wise woman, she held her peace.

Very soon the husband and wife parted; she returned to her home, and John Humphreys went on his way. At first, his wife's look of silent grief had checked him a little. He had half a mind to follow her advice, and call on Colonel Haywood; half a mind not to take her to his mother's. But the wiser impulse passed when he thought of the bond. Why should he not go a more spirited way to work? He did not believe a word the lawyer said. Had he not been deceived again and again? Mr. Isaacs had caught greedily at the bond. Did he not say that if the crash came, there would be enough and more to settle it? Women were always timorous; and what was the good of going down in the world? One step in that direction, and it would be hard work to get back. No, no; he knew better what he was about than his wife did!

Encouraged by these views of the case, he set off to see what could be done. There were three persons to apply to. Two of them were old friends of his, and the third was under obligations to John's father. John's father had lent him the money to set him up in business. Surely the remembrance of this fact would have some weight. It soon appeared that this latter person was John's sole chance. The two old friends shook their heads, and called the bond a rotten security. "The very name of Sylvester," they said, "was suggestive of bankruptcy."

John now turned to his last resource; but here he was just as unsuccessful.

"Why, you could not have the face to ask me!" cried Mr. Larkins, the well-to-do grocer in the Market-place, whose prosperity had dated from the time a sum of money had been placed in his hands by the elder Humphreys.

"I remember you once had the face to ask a favour of my father," replied John, who was getting worked up into a state of exasperation.

Mr. Larkins put his hands in his pockets, and leaned back against the counter. "Do you call it a favour? Now, really, I never regarded it in that light. Your father had good interest for his money; and I paid it back, every farthing. It was a business transaction, that's what it was."

"And what's this but a business transaction, pray?"

"Excuse me; it's a swindle!"

"A what?" gasped John.

"A swindle! You bring me a bit of paper which is worth just that!" and he snapped his fingers in the air; "and you want to raise money on it! I might as well throw my savings into the river!"

"You use queer language," said John, putting back the bond, and buttoning his coat up tight.

"I use plain language. I'm a plain man, that's what I am. And if you take my advice, you would keep that bond out of sight, else maybe you'll get into trouble."

John made no reply to this speech. Very much crestfallen, he stepped out into the street. He had not walked many yards before he found himself face to face with Mr. Isaacs.

"Humphreys, you are just the man I wanted. A word with you."

"Well?" said John, moodily.

"You'll clear out of that place, will you? I don't want to make a fuss, but I take possession at Lady Day."

A few words slipped from John's lips that would have startled Rachel.

"It's no good using rough language, my man. You had best go quietly, and make no fuss, else I might be forced to take the law against you, for giving me rotten security."

"Rotten security! You did not think so at the time," said John.

"But I think so now; and you must have known it all along. So the fewer words we have about that the better;" and Mr. Isaacs turned on his heel and walked away.

John did not attempt to follow him; he had had his quietus!

CHAPTER XXXIX.

A FATAL IDEA.

It was quite dusk before John Humphreys reached home. Rachel had been expecting him a long time. She had got his dinner for him, and had watched at the window for a couple of hours, thinking every moment that he would come. Then when the clock struck four she gave up hoping, and put the dinner things away. She had not sat down herself to the neatly-spread table; she had no heart for her dinner. It was a relief when all belonging to it had been put away, except the dish in the oven, where the piece of steak was keeping hot for John. Then she swept the hearth, and put on the kettle, and sat down to her sewing.

Her heart ached very sorely. It was sad to think of the happy hours she had sat sewing by the fire, looking up now and then to see if John was coming; of the peace, the security, that seemed likely to be uprooted and destroyed; of the wreck, and woe, and misery that had been brought about by that one false step—the bond. Rachel's tears dropped on her work; and as the dusk came creeping up, she laid down her sewing, and sat quietly weeping. She did not mean that John should see her weep. When, presently, she heard his step outside, she got up, and began to reach out the cups and saucers from the corner cupboard, and to prepare for tea. Before he came in, she had set the tea-things on the table, and made the tea, and put it inside the fender to brew, and reached out the savoury dish that was in readiness. And she had lighted the lamp, and closed the curtains, and made everything as snug as she could. And then she conjured up a smile—the old familiar smile. Whatever else he missed, she would take care he should never miss that. He came in just as she had seated herself at the table.

"Well, John, I began to think you so long," said she, cheerfully. "Pray have you had your dinner?"

"No, Rachel."

"I thought perhaps you had not, and I saved you some steak. And here's your tea, nice and hot. Dear me, we are quite fashionable to-day, in our hours!" added she, handing him the toast.

He did not answer her, or give her smile for smile. It would not have been kind if he had. He ate his meat and drank his tea in silence. Now and then, Rachel tried to rouse him, but he only answered by a monosyllable. This was harder to her to bear than anything. Still—for she had a vast share of quiet fortitude and heroism—still, she made no complaint. She took it patiently and lovingly. And when the meal was over (she herself had scarce touched a morsel), she again busied herself in the few domestic duties which devolved upon her. For she had dismissed the servant at once; such an indulgence was not to be thought of.

Her husband was not cheered by the social meal. He drew his chair to the fire, and sat brooding over it. Rachel would have been thankful if he had spoken, even to tell her some ill news. She could see that he had done nothing with his bond. But she was suffering as well. Why did he not speak? He did speak at last. He said, without turning round, "After all, we must go, Rachel."

She knew what that meant. She put down her work, and came and sat close by him. She put her hand on his.

"Dear John, take courage; we need not let this thing be our ruin."

"It's like to be," he said, moodily. And then he was silent again.

Rachel sat by him patiently. She did not want to chafe the wounded spirit by words. By-and-by he began again—

"That fellow Isaacs means to turn us out at Lady Day."

"Lady Day!" She said it in a quick tone of alarm. "What are we to do, John?"

The question was forced from her by the suddenness of the exigence.

"Do! why, as we can. He don't care; no more does the other."

The other meant Raymond Sylvester.

Rachel threw a distressed look round the room. John saw it.

"You need not be thinking of your nice new furniture, Rachel; it's doomed!"

"Doomed?"

"Yes; it will have to be sold for debt."

"Oh, John!" and she burst into a pitiful little cry; she could not help it.

"Of course, if I'd been dealt fairly with, it would have been different," he continued; "but they've all gone against me, Rachel. I'd the furniture to buy, and I couldn't pay ready money then and there. One year in this place would have settled everything—only one year; but it wasn't to be."

"Never mind," said Rachel, drying her eyes; "let us sell the furniture. At all events, we can start again; and we are both young. I can bear it, John, if you can. Let us look the misfortune steadily in the face, and be resolved to master it."

"Ah!" It was all the response she could gain.

By-and-by he got up, and said he had to go down to Newbury. He did not come back till very late. And early the next morning, a man came up with a roll of papers from the printer's, just struck off, he said. Rachel opened them, and a kind of faintness came over her. It was an advertisement of the sale. She did not faint, for she subdued her weakness with all her might. She went to the kitchen door, and stood breathing the fresh spring air. Her husband came to her.

"Rachel, you must see to the things. It will drive me mad!"

He was turning away, but she caught his arm.

"What things! what am I to see to, John?"

"The furniture. He is going to take an inventory. Those bills are merely a preliminary notice. It is the catalogue he wants to make.

"But, John, had you not better stay?"

"I tell you, I cannot! I shall go to my mother's; I'm half mad, now!"

She let go his arm. Again came the burden on her shoulders. It was not kind, or fair. But she took up the burden bravely. She still felt faint and ill, and as if she must sit down and weep, and weep again; but she did not sit down and weep. She thrust back her tears heroically, and prepared to act.

The man was very civil and considerate; but it was weary work. It took several hours, and Rachel felt worn out and ill. She felt almost forsaken too, for when the man was gone, no one was in the house but herself.

She wept now, passionately and hysterically. She who was so tender to others, wanted soothing and tending herself. But there was no one to do it!

Quite late at night, John came back. In spite of her heavy grief, she had roused herself to make some little preparation for his return. She had put some wood on the fire, and had set out his supper. He looked strangely haggard and altered. He had not the heart to come home before, he said. He had been wandering about, thinking what was to be done. She did not reproach him. But she was so spent and weary, so heart-sore and sad, that she could not make an effort to be cheerful. She sat, for once, silent and dejected. He was silent, too, for a time. He had his supper, and then he turned his chair to the fire, and looked at her. He might have been touched with pity at the sight of her wan face, but he was too preoccupied to notice it. He had one more scheme as regarded the bond; and he was thinking of that.

"Rachel," said he, at length, "I have about made up my mind what to do."

She raised her head with an inquiring gesture. He did not speak.

"I've heard tell a great deal about those grand London lawyers who can do almost everything. Now I've half a mind to run up, and see whether they would lend money on the bond."

A look of alarm came into Rachel's face.

"Oh, John! don't—pray don't!" cried she, eagerly; "it would do no sort of good. Don't, pray don't!"

"It's very fine your stopping at home, Rachel, and crying 'don't,' while there's a chance for the farm being saved."

"There is no chance that way," she replied, still eagerly. "The expense would half ruin you, if you tried it. Oh, John!" added she, pathetically, "do be advised, and let us get back the farm, if we cannot save it. Let us get it back by patience and industry; we can do, if you will only let us."

Her face flushed with anxiety; but he did not notice much about her just then. That one idea had hold of his mind, to the neglect of all others—that fatal idea, the bond!

He did not make any reply to her arguments, though she urged them with all the skill and earnestness she could; but she knew he had not dropped the subject. He was silenced, but not convinced.

The cloud came looming heavily up that threatened to obscure Rachel's sky.

The next day her husband seemed preoccupied and abstracted. He sat all the morning over the fire, as if lost in thought. He did not attend to anything, nor was it possible to rouse him. Rachel tried again and again, but in vain.

She knew he was thinking about the bond. Oh, if he would but cast it aside for ever, and forget its very existence! It was the millstone round their necks that would sink them!

When dinner was over, he got up and prepared to go out. He fetched his best coat from the chest under the bedroom window, and put on his Sunday hat. Rachel looked on these preparations with undisguised alarm.

"Where are you going, John?" she asked.

"Never do you mind, Rachel: it's a bit of business—that's all."

"I wish you would tell me," said she, anxiously and tearfully.

The pain and distress of her position was beginning to affect her in no small degree.

"Women are not to know everything," he replied, as he turned to go.

"But, John"—and she held him tightly and looked eagerly into his face—"are you going to London?"

He put her aside, not roughly, but resolutely. He did not want, he said, to be bothered with questions; and then he went out.

Rachel sat down and burst into tears. He must almost have heard her, and I think he did, for he stopped a moment, but he went on again. A certainty came full upon her mind as to where he was gone. He was gone to London about the bond!

CHAPTER XL.

COMFORT.

"AND if it should please God to take me, still, you will have made my last days very happy."

"There is some comfort in that!" replied Alice Sylvester, with feeling.

She had done what she could for the poor dying woman whom the Sylvesters had wronged. The aspect of things had undergone a change since we saw it last. A few bits of furniture had found their way back to the poor home. The fire burned brightly. Food and wine had been forthcoming. The invalid sat in an easy chair, her head supported by a pillow. The thin, white hands were at rest. They had no need to work while those other hands were so busy for them. Alice had brought this change about. It was the earned money that had replaced the furniture, and supplied the comforts which Jane Hubbard enjoyed. How happy the thought made her! How precious was the one sweet drop that fell into her bitter cup! How healing the balm to her sore conscience! If but one sufferer were made happy—if but one pillow were smoothed—but one sad heart comforted, then welcome, days and nights of toil!—then she would not have lived in vain.

But the days and nights were telling upon her. You could see it in the worn face, more beautiful than ever, in its pallor and delicacy. You could see it in the trembling hand, the figure that was beginning already to waste slowly away: for health and strength are not always equal to their task. The spirit, indeed, is willing, but the poor, frail flesh is weak!

She had a Bible in her hand. She knew where to direct the sick and suffering for consolation. She had been to that spring herself, and had found it ever fresh and flowing. In these visits, she would lead the thoughts of the dying woman away from earth, to that better land where none shall say, "I am sick." The woman, in her struggling life, had been apt to forget that other life, so fraught with interest to us all. But as she lay and listened, in these quiet moments, the better impulses came back. She heard the Word of God with thankfulness. She, so weary and heavy laden, was glad to learn where to find rest!

She knew she had not long to live. Every day the lamp burned more feebly. And she had grown to love the sight of Alice Sylvester, to listen for her step, to cherish the memory of her visits, and many times, in the long, sleepless nights, to pray God to bless her.

"When I am gone," she said, the hectic spot deepening on her cheek, "there is one thing I want you to promise me, dear Miss Sylvester."

"What is it, Jane?"

"That you will never cast a thought to what has been, or let it vex you any more," said the woman, earnestly. "You have made it up more than double. I shall thank you with my last breath."

"You are kind to say so, Jane," said Alice, gravely and sadly.

"It is you who are kind, ma'am! Oh, how good you have been to me! God bless you again and again!"

They were almost the last words Alice heard her speak. Before her next visit, the poor sufferer was gone. Alice did not know the end was so near.

(To be continued.)

"LITTLE BLACKCAP."

A FACT.

LAST week I went to call on my friend M. M. is one of the best fellows living; and having plenty of money and time on his hands, and being moreover easy of persuasion, he has a constant succession of bird-fanciers, dog-fanciers, &c., affectionately following on his heels and tracking his steps, and to whose cajoleries he falls an easy prey.

I do not mean to say that anything happens to the man; simply this: his house is crowded with all kinds of things which he never did want, and which he perfectly well knew, when he bought them, he never should want. Animals, birds, pictures, and china—the most of them execrably ugly and hopelessly useless—find their way safely to him when no one else will have them.

From the first moment I step into his house until the time I come out, I am in one continual fear and trembling. Directly one gets into the hall, one is sure either to step on some of the dogs, which are springing about in every direction, or to tumble over some new purchase laid down there "for the present."

In the rooms there is not a chair to sit down on, owing to their being all occupied with every imaginable thing, and, unwittingly, one is sure to do an immense amount of damage before leaving; so that, although there is not a nicer fellow going, I am always glad to get safely out of his house, but which I never accomplish until my nerves are thoroughly shaken.

Last week I went to call on M., as I was going to tell you, and having safely passed through the hall, I arrived in his study to find him peering into a small wooden cage, which contained an evidently dying bird.

"Tell me what you think of this bird," said M.

I plainly told him I did not think much of it, and that the bird had in all probability only another half-hour to live.

"You don't say so!" said he. "What a pity!—I have just given two guineas for him."

"Well, you have been taken in," was my remark.

"Why so?" said he; "they told me it was a beautiful piping bullfinch, and worth the money."

"I can only repeat that you have been taken in; the bird is a female one, and only worth a shilling."

"You don't say so! Poor little creature, let us take it out of the cage."

"Don't touch it," said I, laying my hand on his arm. "It hasn't half-an-hour to live; and if you put your hand in the cage to catch it, the very exertion of struggling away from your hand would probably kill it on the spot."

But he did not seem to think it likely, and very gently took the wretched little sick bird out of its cage, and offered it different things to eat, which of course it would not take any notice of. He then put it back in its cage, and, as I had predicted, it immediately had a sort of fit, and died.

"And I gave two guineas for it, only about an hour ago," said he. "I wonder the fellows always take me in so."

"Because they see you know nothing about it."

"Well, as I made up my mind for a piping bullfinch, I shall go at once and get another."

"And be taken in again," said I.

"Well, what am I to do? I suppose I must take my chance?"

Here a sudden thought struck me, so I said, "Come with me; I understand more about birds than you do, and I will take you to a man I know very well, and I will undertake that you do not get cheated."

M., having as usual nothing in particular to do, put on his hat and accompanied me. Going along, I told him some particulars of the man whom I was taking him to see. "He is very poor," I said; "a shoemaker by trade; but so miserably poor that he is sometimes obliged to go into the workhouse; he is glad to get a day's work at almost anything, and in summer he sometimes does a good deal of business catching birds. In May he is in his glory catching nightingales." By this time we were working our way into the neighbourhood of Seven Dials, where my poor friend Jacques lived. We happened to meet him in the street, so I stopped him and told him that my friend wished to obtain a piping bullfinch, and that he had been taken in by having a female bird sold to him, which had died an hour after he had bought it.

Jacques was a tall and exceedingly thin, pinched-looking man, with hollow cheeks and deep-set eyes, with hollow lines round them too, plainly telling the want and hunger his whole appearance showed. Notwithstanding the quick, eager look of his eyes, there was a gentle and kind look in them, a look which at once predisposed you in his favour.

"You had better let me get you a nightingale, sir," said he.

"Well, I don't much care what it is," said M., "so long as it sings well."

"Then I shall see about getting one at once, sir;" and Jacques's eyes positively glistened with the prospect of the little job.

"How do you catch them?" inquired M.

"Well, sir, I have a little trap with a net attached to it, which I bait with a meal-worm—they can't resist meal-worms, sir; well, and I hear them singing in the hedges and hawthorns, and then I put down my trap and go away, and he goes in after the meal-worm, and the trap falls down, and the poor fellow is caught in the net, and he flutters to try and get out."

"Then you always bait the traps with meal-worms," said I.

"Yes, sir; because they like them better than anything else. Sometimes gentlemen, having favourite birds about their gardens which they don't want to get caught by bird-fanciers, just catch them themselves several times in the trap with the meal-worm, so that the bird gets to know the appearance of a trap, and hates the very sight of a meal-worm. You see it's a very good way, sir."

Jacques told the story in his own way, and with such intelligence beaming in his face, that I could see M. began to get much interested in him.

"Jacques," said I, "how is little Blackcap?"

"Oh, sir, he's very well, thank you. I have him with me."

"Show him to this gentleman," said I; "he would like to see him."

With a bright smile, which lighted up the hollow-eyed face, Jacques brought from under his coat a very small box, which he opened, whilst M. and I peered inquisitively into it.

"What kind of bird is that?" said M., regarding the funny-looking little bird which was so quietly sitting at the bottom of the box, that was only just large enough to contain it.

"It is a blackcap, sir."

How he managed to keep it so well was a marvel, in that tiny box; its plumage was unruffled and perfect, and the bird as tame as it was possible to be. Although the box was open it did not attempt to get out.

"It knows it mustn't, sir," said Jacques. "It used to have a pretty cage, with its food and water so managed that when it wanted either, it just took hold of a little chain with its claws, and pulled it up about six inches, and took what it wanted, and then let it fall again;—but that was more than three years ago, sir. I've had to sell that cage since, and little Blackcap is quite happy in his box. It flies about in the room when we are at home; but I will give him a meal-worm." And Jacques put his hand in his pocket and brought out a tiny box, in which he kept the meal-worms.

Little Blackcap immediately frisked on to the side of his box and chirped, and watched eagerly and impatiently, evidently knowing perfectly well what was going to happen when he saw the box.

Jacques, having cleared off the boys who were about, placed on the pavement of Seven Dials one of the meal-worms. Little Blackcap was on the pavement after it in a second. No sooner had he disposed of it, than he flew straight back to his box. Jacques gave him two more, and each time he had eaten them he came back immediately to his box.

"You see, sir, he's fond of me, and wouldn't fly away; and I have taught him several things."

"And you've had him three years?" said M.

Yes, sir; three years we've starved and been happy together. Whenever I have anything there's enough for little Blackcap. I am very poor, sir," he said, simply; "and sometimes when I am starving I have to go to the workhouse, and little Blackcap goes with me. The keepers don't know anything about it, you see, for he stops in his box under my coat, and we couldn't be separated."

Poor fellow! he said it all so simply that one could not but be touched by his little tale; and thoughtlessly, but meaning well, M. said, "Will you take two guineas for little Blackcap?"

"No, sir; I wouldn't take five for him. I couldn't sell him, thank you, sir."

"Well, then, you must get me no end of other birds," said M., with his usual kindness.

"I am very much obliged to you for your kindness, sir," and again the bright look lighted up the thin face; and, shutting the bird up in its box, he hurried down the narrow street—the two firm friends, Jacques and his little Blackcap.

THE BUIYER

— Saturday, August 1, 1858. —

(Drawn by A. B. HOUGHTON.)

"Poor Austin fairly cried."—p. 721.

AN HOUR'S REVENGE, AND WHAT CAME OF IT.

A TRUE STORY WITH MANY MORALS. IN FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER III.

SO I rode away in passion and scorn from the presence of that suppliant old man, unmoved, or scarcely moved, by his last appealing words.

Down into the dark woods, that rustled and hissed as if an evil spirit were mocking me among the leaves, or flung their dense shadows across the road, as if to sympathise with my gloomy heart. Out into the open fields, so flat, so dreary-looking in the glimmering light, and under the struggling stars that were so often eclipsed by the stealthy, creeping clouds. The barking of a farmer's dog, the screech of an owl, was enough to make my heart leap. I was galloping madly homeward, and yet had no wish to get there. Home! There was no such place; there was a den where a wounded wild beast might hide himself and die, or else lash his anger up to some ferocious deed; but that is not home, as people used to employ the word. Why should I hurry back into my lair? Who was waiting there for me with a wife's embrace or a daughter's welcome? None, and none ever should. And I understood now what I so long suspected, that it was all done by the selfish treachery and foul fraud of my schoolfellow and only confidant. I tell you that I cursed him—I cursed him before God, with clenched hands and a parched tongue; and my evil prayer came back upon my own head, but not until he too felt its malignant power. Now I know that a malediction is a fearful thing, and withers no victim with a blight so deadly as falls upon its own author's heart. But I would not have believed it then, nor would I have paused if I did. That night the bad passions indulged so long had their own wild way, and wrought their unholy will without restraint. My horse rushed at his frantic pace up a little eminence, and unconsciously I drew bridle, and paused to gaze. For one mile to the left, on the opposite hill from where I was, the farmhouse of the newly-married couple peeped out through the intervening woods. There, in ease and gladness, with his happy and confiding bride, was the villain who had spoiled my life, and here was I—lonely, desperate, unpitied. The burst of moonlight in which it gleamed so fairly, was a type of the bad man's life; the dense shadow that brooded over me was a fit emblem of his victim's. Something should be done—some blow struck—some deadly vengeance wreaked; but what it should be I knew not. But it was not likely that the devil would leave so tempting a tool without employment, and I suppose he sent the chance straggler who came up to me. At all events, a strange man hailed me from the roadside, and said he was tramping homeward, and wanted to be there by noon to-morrow, thirty miles away. His lantern was out, and the road was strange to him, and he begged me to give him a light, if I happened to have a tinder-box. Poor fellow, he never accosted any one less disposed to be accommodating.

"A light!" I thundered back; "no, surely, that would be a likely thing. Whose ricks do you mean to burn, scoundrel, asking help of an honest man?"

He turned away sullenly enough; but my angry words were a revelation to myself. For now, instead of poor old Day's lamenting cry, "Oh, William! William! William!" that taunt of my own rang incessantly in my ears, in all manner of times and tones, now whispered softly and slowly, now shouted with such a clamour as if a legion of fiends were behind me on the horse—"whose ricks do you mean to burn?"

Slowly, slowly the horse went onward now, for I was thinking. One thing was clear, that if I were caught I should be hanged; another was, that every blow I struck at my foe would fall as heavily upon Alice. Fool! Was I not then to strike at all? or could I not take an exquisite revenge by telling her everything her lord had done, and then giving them charity, if they came down so low as to need bread. Low they should fall, or else my influence in the county was far less than I supposed. And I was glad that I had not moved against them until now, for all my weight should come upon them at once, in the hour when they could least bear up against it. My purpose never wavered from the time it was conceived. "Whose ricks do you mean to burn?" said the voice in my ear again; and I seemed to answer it like a stranger, "Why, Austin's ricks, of course; whose else? Did he not beat me in the school and the meadows; slander me to the old man who loved me; steal away my love by lies?"

It was all over in ten minutes. At the end of his private road I leaped the horse over a fence and tied him to a tree, and then crept along so cautiously that the dogs never growled, till I found a gap in the half-mended fences that let me into the homestead. Then I sat down, with the bludgeon across my knees which I always carried at night, ready, and quite resolved, to stun with one blow whatever mortal interfered with me. My hands were as firm as ever, but deadly cold; yet my brain boiled, and the beating of my heart was felt up to my very temples, making it impossible to think, if any more thought had been required. But it was all quite easy. I crouched up against a haystack, with my face toward it, and kept off the soft breeze by my back. I kindled a light with steel and flint, blew it up in the tinder-box, and lit a handful of straws. How fast it spread! I sprang back aghast when the glare lit up my face, and then flung the fiery tinder-box into the hay, and ran for life. Mounting my horse, I ventured to look back, and saw the ring of fire glowing bright and clear upon the rick-side, and looked no more for a quarter of an hour—that seemed like a lifetime. How fast we flew over the ground! Hist! the breeze is rising; that will help my work more than twenty men can hinder it. Hist again! the church bells are ringing—the alarm is given already, just as I am safe at my own door. The housekeeper started at the ghastly paleness of my face, and asked if I were ill.

"No; but Mr. Austin's house is on fire. Turn out every man in the place, to show that I bear him no ill-will at such a time. I wish I would be welcome myself."

So they turned out, and worked well; and I, from an upper window, watched the flames raging furiously for hours. At seven in the morning they came back to tell us that a strolling rascal had set fire to the hayrick, and it spread to the roofs of the outhouses; from that it caught the thatched dwelling-house, and burned it down to the ground. The cattle were destroyed as well as the harvest. Mrs. Austin was lying at the rector's house in hysterics, and her husband was going about crying out like a madman that they were ruined, beggared, without a roof to cover them or a bed to lie in.

"And, sir," said one, "I heard him say that he deserved it richly; but the punishment ought not to have come upon his poor wife."

"And aren't you glad, sir," said another, "that the villain who did it has been caught?"

"Caught!" shrieked I; "tell me how, when; what's the proof?"

"Proof enough," said half a dozen voices at once; "he was found hiding behind a hedge, with a lamp in his hand, and the flame quenched, to pass unseen. And when he was taken, he trembled so that he could hardly speak, but muttered out something about his fear of being accused. What business had an honest man thinking of that?"

My eyes were opened in one instant, and I knew what a crime I had committed. My beautiful, lost love cruelly struck down to the ground in the hour of her crowning happiness; the support of a family snatched away: God's right of judgment usurped by my presumption; a new crime imported into this peaceful neighbourhood; and an innocent man drawn into deadly peril. All these things crowded upon my mind at once. I crept away from the noisy crew, and fell upon my knees and wept. The over-wrought system gave way in the revulsion of feeling, and I vowed to save the accused man, and to recompense the Austins, even at the cost of a confession, and of my whole fortune.

My remorse was deepened when I heard that old Day had a relapse that night, and could scarcely move, much less speak. Conscience told me that the cause was my violence, though every one else set it down to agitation, caused by the alarm of fire on his daughter's premises. In any case, the fault was mine.

Next day a new and terrible dread seized me. Two men of bad character, that I had turned away, and whom Austin had foolishly employed, came up to me very impudently in the fields, and demanded a hundred pounds a-piece!

"We saw you, master, jump your horse over the hedge, and then we thought something strange was going on. So we followed you through the gap, and watched, and the light showed us who you were. And you'd better pay down the money, and be done with it."

Oh, how sick my heart was! But they would have been very keen to see it, as I turned around and threatened them with the police, if ever they dared repeat the trumpery lie, that no person would believe if it were true.

"Remember, villains, the peace-officers found two men's footprints close to the spot. Suppose your tale were not believed, and they happened to fit your shoes? But I don't choose to denounce either of you; so be gone, and never look at me again. If I find you in the county, I shall give you up."

This was plainly a new idea to them both; and they drew off and took earnest counsel for a minute; then one of them came back, opened his hand, and, with a stupid, triumphant grin, held out my tinder-box! And I remembered that my name was scraped upon the lid.

"Show me that," said I. And he handed it to me to examine.

Everything, as I knew well, depended upon that minute. So, never hesitating what to do, I looked him sternly in the face, put the box in my pocket, shouted to the bewildered pair to mind what I had said, and was among my workmen in an instant. The next moment I had fainted.

It was six full weeks before I could go about again, and then I learned that the suspected man had been acquitted, my old schoolmaster was dead, and the Austins had sold off their farm at so ruinous a sacrifice that every one thought Day's house would have to follow it, and little or nothing be left them after all.

I rode across, as soon as I was able, and pressed the most liberal help upon Henry Austin. But he sadly and firmly declined, saying, "There were reasons why he could not possibly accept aid from me, and that if I knew all, I would not offer it." I looked upon his melancholy, faded face, and wondered was it partly remorse for the wrong that he had done, or entirely his own calamity that made his cheek so pale and wan. And I longed to tell him everything, although I could not guess how much more misery and guilt a confession then would have averted.

With an awakened conscience, and the ruin I had caused perpetually before me, my punishment was begun. I had long neglected prayer; but now I wished to pray, and dared not. Confession was the one thing far from me, and without confession I could not approach God, nor pretend to trust in Christ; but I used to brood remorsefully over the various steps by which I fell, and think how easy it had been once to pause, and how impossible it was to turn back now. First, I had deceived and taught Alice to deceive her father. That was the blot which Austin hit with such fatal effect in my otherwise blameless love. Then I had nursed vague but fierce desires of vengeance against all who were concerned in my disappointment, and in the supreme hour of my destiny those lawless desires hurled me into a dreadful crime, as irresistibly as the rapid above Niagara hurls its victim into the gulf. And now I could do nothing to repair my guilty deed, for Austin's remorse would not allow him to accept aid from me. Suppose I told him that I knew all, that I had spoken to his father-in-law that fatal evening, and had promised to forgive everything? Why, then he would begin to suspect me, and my sickness since would confirm him, and the two labourers might turn up and make all sure. Well for me that the fire had driven all thought of my visit from every person's head who might have told him. No, I must stay quiet and look on. I found no place for repentance, though I sought it carefully with tears.

And now that my revenge was sated, I could not fail to lament its effects upon both Alice and her husband. She grew more and more nervous, and wasted visibly away; her fine large eyes lost their former brilliance, and began to look swollen and red, and have dark rings underneath them, as of one who slept restlessly and little. Her husband strove in vain to find respectable employment, and compulsory idleness joined with his bitter disappointment to make him sullen and morose to every one but Alice. I more than forgave him everything, when I saw afterwards how completely his worst mood was subdued by her very presence, much less by her lightest word.

My opportunities of observing them more closely began when Alice's first sickly child was born. Knowing how his mood must be softened at such a time, I found him loitering outside their miserable lodgings, and began to speak to him as kindly and gently as I could, telling him that if our quarrel were ten times as bitter as ever it had been, he should not think only of himself, but of his family. To them, if I might not say to him, I now made an offer, not of help, but of fair employment, in which he would be of use to me as much as I could be to him. For my health was shaken, and I wanted a confidential man—half a steward and half a superintendent—to take my place whenever I could not go about, and to put his hand to anything whenever I was strong enough to do my own part. If he would come, I should buy in some new fields, and if not, I should deny myself the wish to have them. They were good and cheap land. Poor Austin fairly cried, and said he would do anything to serve me, and that I little knew how much he had to make good, and it would save his wife and child from beggary.

(To be concluded in our next.)

RELIGION IN THE HOME.

BY THE REV. W. B. MACKENZIE, M.A.

IT is a remarkable testimony respecting Obed-edom, a Levite, of the city of Gathrimmon, in Manasseh, that when the ark of the Lord was lodged in his house for three months, "the Lord blessed Obed-edom, and his household. And it was told King David, saying, The Lord hath blessed the house of Obed-edom, and all that pertaineth unto him, because of the ark of God." The ark was the most sacred emblem of the Jewish service. Its form was that of a chest, overlaid with gold, surmounted with angelic figures, bending reverently forward towards each other, as if contemplating its mysterious contents; while the glory, betokening the Divine Presence, irradiated the sacred symbol.

On a disastrous battle with the Philistines, the ark was carried off the field in triumph, and placed for a while in an idol temple. After many years of national neglect, David removed it to Jerusalem; but owing to some in-cautious irreverence in its passage thither, which God severely visited upon Uzzah, the ark was placed for three months under the care of Obed-edom. This devout service was repaid by the singular measure of blessing enjoyed both by himself and his household, inasmuch that public attention was called to the fact, and notice of it even reached the ears of the king—"The Lord hath blessed the house of Obed-edom, and all that pertaineth to him, because of the ark of God." This same Obed-edom is afterwards mentioned as ministering before the Lord with harps, cymbals, and psalteries, and was selected as one of the doorkeepers of the ark; and it would seem that his descendants long occupied places of some importance in the house of God. At this day, there are three or four acres of land distinguished for their abundant fertility, called now "the Abode of the Blessed One," which are said to be the site of Obed-edom's house; and if so, afford a testimony, even to our own day, of the observable and abiding blessing with which the Lord distinguishes the families which faithfully serve him.

Thus Obed-edom's household became remarkable for its unusual and long-continued prosperity. There is a great difference in this respect. Some families scarcely know what the brightness of prosperity means; now and then some fitful gleam of sunshine passes over their gloomy threshold, but not often even that; while others seem to luxuriate in ease and abundance, as if the original taint of sorrow were somehow suspended in their favour. Some begin well, and enjoy the unbroken recurrence of daily comforts for many years; but by-and-by, the wheel of life changes; new elements are introduced, and the aspect of things becomes less bright. But after all, these things are not chance. There are certain elements which, if cherished or neglected, tend to multiply or diminish the permanent prosperity of family life. What those elements are, the case of Obed-edom which we are here considering, reveals at once. Doubtless he stood well, previously, in social estimation, and gained golden opinions. Habits of family virtue were already maturing, and no small share of prosperity had fallen to his lot. When the ark was passing through his neighbourhood, and the visitation upon Uzzah made its removal difficult, men were not surprised at the proposal of Obed-edom to receive it into his house; it showed his enlightened confidence in God, and desire to honour him before the world; and the exuberance of his domestic blessing was dated from the time that he received that sacred symbol into his care.

It cannot be repeated too often, nor can any amount of illustrations be reckoned superfluous to deepen the conviction, that the presence of God diligently sought for and enjoyed in a family, is the only source of its abiding prosperity. Obed-edom distinctly aimed at this. He might have secured other things, and striven, as thousands now strive, to construe them into blessings; but he would have found that something else was wanting. Families may seem prosperous without religion; they may seem to have as large a share of comfort as usually falls to our lot, and fewer disadvantages than others; they may "live in perfect love and peace together," and seem to lack nothing; but somehow or other, it is evident that their cup is not full. They cannot account for it, but each day makes them more conscious that some element is wanting. It is not that any grave calamity has befallen them. Happily, no blank as yet mars the integrity of their home circle; no face is missing to create daily sorrow among survivors; no voice, once always cheering, now, alas! to be heard no more; but still there is something lacking which they ought to have; something which meets deeper wants, abides unaltered amid change and decay, adds reality to what seems to become every day more vain and empty, and will give brighter hopes hereafter when the vision of life is over. Obed-edom fully found out the secret of all this, when he opened his house to receive the ark of God; and though now God has given us no such visible symbols, yet does he now come to dwell in the houses and the hearts of his people; and wherever he is, he comes with all spiritual blessings in heavenly things in Christ Jesus, and makes even the trials and changes of this world to work for good, and augment the felicity of his chosen people.

The presence of God confers signal blessings on the children of the family. You will readily understand how the well-being of a house depends on them, when you recollect what a large place they occupy in its anxieties and affections. What unselfish love, what pure joy, what constant care and solicitude, what vigilance and forethought, what maturing of plans, what guarding against evils, what joyous anticipations of successful results, what clouds darken the sky from any suspicion that all is not going on well, and what heart-breaking disappointments if the plans and prospects of the children should even seem to end in failure! But nothing is so certain to bring down God's blessings upon them as the consciousness that He dwells as the "Ruler and Guide" of their home. It may not be perfect; but they have found the secret of making it so. Events are sure to disturb the joyous aspect of the brightest household; but they no longer repeat the world's vain question, for some one to show them any good; they can now look upward to their Father which is in heaven, and say, with devout and grateful satisfaction, "Lord, lift thou upon us the light of thy countenance."

It is true that the Holy Spirit alone can give spiritual life to our households; but we can mould the character, and make the temple ready for the Divine Presence. We can build the altar and lay the sacrifice in order, and then wait in confident assurance for the promised blessing from heaven. We can train our children up in the way they should go; seek to bind their will to submission to the Divine will; cultivate filial and confiding communion with Him about everything; train them to believe in Him, to fear Him, to love Him with all their heart and mind and soul and strength, to worship Him, to give Him thanks, to put their whole trust in Him, to call upon Him, to honour his holy name and his Word, and to serve Him truly all the days of their life. A family thus brought up in the devout habits of Christian life, at church, at home, and in secret, studying his Word, and praying in the Spirit day by day, will surely at length receive manifest tokens of God's approbation and blessing.

The Divine Presence in a family will ensure the cultivation of filial obedience. It is impossible to overrate the extent to which disobedience mars and hinders the blessedness of families. It was "man's first disobedience" which "brought sin into the world and all our woes;" and it has continued to multiply and darken the world with woe ever since. Admit this prolific evil into home life and everything goes wrong. The parent makes himself partaker of the child's violation of the Fifth Commandment, and both must pay the penalty. Disobedience destroys all parental reverence, and soon loosens all the links of mutual endearment; the opinions of parents will be rudely questioned; their will disregarded, and every day make some fresh inroad on the sacredness of the parental relationship. The parent who connives at filial insubordination is training his child to a life of self-torment, and, perhaps, a death-bed of sorrowful remorse. The greatest blessing which can be bestowed upon a child is to subjugate and wisely discipline the will. A man that never learnt to obey is never fit to rule. A fiery, ungoverned temper, that never yielded to the curb of just authority, but plunges on at the impulse of any passionate caprice—how is it possible for him to wear the harness of common life, and with "a quiet mind" and patient fidelity to "learn and labour truly to get his own living, and to do his duty in that state of life unto which it shall please God to call him?" Could you go into the private history of the thousands who squander their useless lives away in vanity and indolence—a drag upon the wheel of others' progress, and a heavier burden upon themselves—you would find that the secret mischief originated in their defective habits of early subordination. They never learnt subjection while under their parents' roof, and ever after, when circumstances changed, and the stern necessities of life demanded them to deny themselves, a thousand murmuring complaints betoken the revolting disloyalty of the heart, and life becomes one incessant conflict between the demands of duty and the restless inclination to rebel.

The presence of God in a house is likely to promote steady, settled habits in daily life. Everything will be maintained in order, harmony, and wise arrangement. Each member of such a house will have his own work fixed and settled, and ever after regard it as the employment which the Great Ruler of all things means him to do. Then, I say, go on with it, and go through with it. "Give thyself wholly to these things." Have a position and power of your own. Some people are like an oak that has grown for ages till it has become a shelter and an ornament, leaving, when it is removed, a blank that surrounding trees seek in vain to fill up. Others never seem to root themselves thoroughly—they have no hold, no leafy adorning, no welcome expansion to shelter or nourish feeble efforts, but may be pulled up any day and not missed. Remember how the business of life was regarded by the Great Example, "Lo, I come to do thy will, O God. I delight to do it: thy law is within my heart."

Few have any adequate idea how much may be accomplished by habits of persevering diligence. The cuttings and embankments of our railroad systems were made by spades and barrows. Birds build their nests straw by straw. The islands of the South Seas are due to the labours of coral insects. "Whatever I have done," said Sir Isaac Newton, "is due entirely to patient thought." The successful rescue of the Abyssinian captives, imprisoned four hundred miles from the sea-coast, by an army compelled to make roads and transport their own provisions and heavy implements of war, on the backs of elephants and camels, over lofty mountains and through perilous defiles, is an instance of the persevering conquest of difficulties, by the power of patient labour, which fills the world with admiration. By continued and progressive efforts a man's powers are expanded and strengthened, and he attains a degree of proficiency that leaves his less persevering competitors far behind. There is no ingredient in character more valuable than this "patient continuance in well-doing." Still, it is not to be acquired without strong effort and resolute determination. The consciousness of God's presence and blessing is a great incentive. "I have set the Lord always before me; he is at my right hand: therefore I shall not be moved." A young man who has not this grace of perseverance, is fond of novelty, ease, change; he loves to riot among new scenes, to indulge the wantonness of caprice, or stretch himself on the couch of indolence, and then expects that success will come to him without an effort. These are weeds of noxious growth that must be uprooted. The hardy plants of real prosperity for either world are not to be found beneath the shade of such baneful indulgences. Selfish propensities must be counteracted, wayward humours dispelled, and habits of self-discipline must be cultivated; then, through God's blessing, we may expect the duties of life will be fulfilled, neither interrupted by the allurements of folly, nor abandoned amid the temptations of sin.

A man of great eminence and worth obtained a good situation in London for a son of his, a youth of unsettled, changeable disposition. Soon after, this remark occurs in his diary—"I see that in my poor boy which almost breaks my heart; his instability is continually appearing. He must leave London; and what to do with him I know not." Another situation was obtained elsewhere, but his restless disposition again showed itself, and he enlisted in the army. Discharged from the service, he enlisted a second time, and his father procured a second discharge. A new situation was found, and this again speedily forsaken. With no hope of settling him on land, his father obtained some situation in the merchant service, which he deserted, and was severely punished. For the third time he enlisted in the army, and his family never saw him again. He died off Lisbon, there is some reason to hope, confessing and lamenting that he had so grievously sinned against Heaven and his earthly parents, added to their life-sorrows, and brought his own days prematurely to an end. "Let us not be weary in well doing: for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not."

The presence of the Lord diffused prosperity throughout the house of Obed-edom. It is a promise too "exceeding great and precious" for most men's degenerate faith to embrace, that "godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." Having found it to be true, this faithful Levite has recorded his experience for our learning; and the history of modern Christianity could furnish many similar instances of exemplary fidelity to God being recompensed by the accumulation of earthly prosperity. Why not? It is true that religion puts its veto upon many practices which the world adopts as indispensable to prosperity. The King of Moab, annoyed by Balaam's refusal to accept his bribes for cursing, taunted him with the reproach that "the Lord had kept him back from honour." Conscientious men are kept back from temptations to iniquitous worldly advancement. But these losses, if losses they be, are more than compensated. The Obed-edoms of our day still find that the Lord blesses them and their house, and all that appertains to them. Whatever things go to form their earthly prosperity—bodily health, vigour, and cheerfulness—competent income to meet their moderate wants—social estimation giving them a place in the good opinion of others—affectionate endearments at home—mental cultivation affording personal resources and occupation—these things continued for large portions of life, and crowned with the veneration which gathers round good men in the evening of life—all these are enriched and sanctified by the blessing of the Lord. His blessing augments the value of earthly comforts, and more than compensates for their loss. No man, however godly, can pass through life without tasting its sorrows and feeling the burden of heavy cares; he is exposed to the storms that spread desolation and change everywhere, but "he is like the tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not wither, and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper."

There are faint historic notices that the blessing of this pious Levite was not lost after his death, but was preserved for his sake among his children's children. Posthumous fame may be an empty object of ambition, but posthumous blessedness—to receive the tokens of Divine favour ourselves, with the assurance that it shall be continued to our children—no higher felicity can be enjoyed on this side heaven. The time will come when earthly parents must gather their households around them to receive their farewell blessing—some, perhaps, still young and ill able to bear the rough storms of life, and stand firmly against its assaults and evil; but he "who has set the Lord always before him," counting the Divine Presence his best inheritance, bequeaths a legacy which may exalt his children to riches and honour in both worlds. Other names may lose their endearment, and bright visions of earthly comfort begin to fade, but the NAME that is above every name, and the glimpse of His coming glory, will sustain the soul in its last conflict, and light up the future with hopes unutterably radiant. And if, when just standing on the threshold of another world, we can look forward with calm assurance to the crown of righteousness laid up for us, and have a good hope that those whom we may leave in tears shall one day join us in the "everlasting habitations," then every trace of death's sting will be extracted, and the tomb becomes a lighted valley, peopled with bright attendants, and leading to the Father's house.

"CASTLES IN THE AIR."

COME here to me, my child, and say what you have been about,
Sitting so long in the window and looking dreamily out;
With hands so idly folded, and those far-off looking eyes,
As if you saw strange secrets writ in gold upon the skies.

Come here and sit with granny, by the firelight's fickle glow,
How like her own life's waning flame—burning quite pale and low.
My child, an anxious fear for thee, like mist from the earth's chill breast,
Rises and hangs in shadowy folds, dimming my looked-for rest;—

A fear that my darling is dreaming the fair morn of her life away,
And heeds not the Master's word—to "work while
'tis called to-day."
Oh! comfort me and promise—it may be my parting prayer—
To give up these idle dreams—these poor "castles in the air."
You think, perhaps, that I am old, and querulous, and cross;
How could a wrinkled granny rightly value such a loss?
Yes, true, I've more than numbered my threescore years and ten;
I cannot now be courted—cannot now be young again.
I now have nothing left to do, heroical or grand,
Save to sit still and strain dim eyes on towards a promised land.
Yet think not that the meaning of such thoughts I cannot know,
I, too, built castles, darling, in the old days long ago.
Yes, rich and radiant castles, that arose, and shimmered, and fell
With a hopeless crash, that even now my heart recalls too well.
And it is just because I know the charm is subtle and strong,
That I would counsel you to-night of its folly, pain,
and wrong.
Your castle now looks brilliant, as the crown of a moonlit cloud,
Bright hopes, like glistening stars, round it in clusters crowd.
Nay, dear, it needs no magic to read your face aright;
Is it not flooded, even now, with your wayward fancy's light?
But in suspicion's dreary dawn, when those fickle stars have paled,
And the costly things of First Love, of Trust, and Faith, have failed;
When in the chilling twilight the world itself looks grey,
And your moonlit cloud has wept itself in opal tears away,—
You will turn then from its ruins with a sense of want and pain,
And go with a sad and aching heart to the task of life again.
God gives to those who wait on Him his peace—but only sorrow
To those who, in their madness, boast of an unknown to-morrow.
The future, with its secret things, belongs to Him alone;
The present, with its blessings and its duties, is our own.
Let us then ask, as workmen, every morn our Lord's commands,
Perfect the work he gives each day, with love-inspired hands.
Then come at night, and, kneeling, give it back to Him in prayer,
And leave no time for building foolish "castles in the air."
How can my darling sit each day, thus ever idly dreaming,
While God's own world with sin, and woe, and ignorance is teeming?
Will she not now go forth to work and consecrate her powers,
To bless God's sick, and poor, and weak, and brighten lonely hours?
Oh! leave to God your future—let Him shape it as
He will;
Yes, trust, my child, a Father's plan—a Master
Builder's skill.
Your treasure is in heaven; Christ has gone there to prepare Bright mansions far excelling your poor "castles in the air."

I. C. P.

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XLI.

ALICE'S "GOOD-BYE."

 Alice walked away, she remembered another invalid whom she had half promised to see. A little flush came to her pale cheek, as she thought of Charley Blake. Should she go, or not?

It would be unkind not to see him once before his departure. His departure was close at hand, and would put a barrier between them. She could never go to Harold Blake's house. Oh, no! of course—never!

But Harold would not be come from the mill. It wanted a full hour to the time of his return; and she was very near the spot. Well, she would step in just a few minutes, and say good-bye to Charley. That word good-bye was always a painful one, she thought. But she would get it said, and herself at home, before there was the least chance of Harold coming back.

At that precise moment, as it happened, Harold was not at the mill. He was at Mr. Mapleson's house, and was holding a conversation with his employer. The subject of the conversation was the Sylvesters.

"It is just what one might have expected," said Mr. Mapleson, from his easy chair: he had the gout again; "those people have been driving at it for two generations back. Come, Mr. Blake,

(Drawn by M. ELLEN EDWARDS.)

"Come here and sit with granny, by the firelight's fickle glow."—p. 727.

have a glass of wine, will you? There it is, on the table."

"Thank you! I do not drink wine. What were you saying about two generations back?"

"Oh! the Sylvesters. They are a bad lot; as proud as Lucifer, and as poor as beggars!"

Harold's whole frame tingled. He might have had an electric shock.

"In fact, they are just on the crash now. My lady keeps it up bravely—a plucky woman, Harold—but, bless you, they will be in the Gazette in a month."

Harold's frame tingled again. He could scarcely bear it; but Mr. Mapleson went on—

"And serve them right too. Why, they've ruined half the town; and would the other, if they had the chance, with their debts!"

"You are very severe, Mr. Mapleson."

"No more than there is warrant for. The young man is as bad as his mother, every bit. He is a Sylvester to his heart's core. I know nothing of the daughter."

The daughter!—that was just it. Harold's cheek was in a flame.

"I'll be bound her dressmakers' bills——"

"Oh, hush—hush!—that is not charitable," cried Harold, reprovingly.

"My dear fellow, I judge from inference. However, she will have to come down a peg, that's very certain, and get her own living—perhaps by stitching."

"No!" thought Harold—so vehemently that he could scarce help speaking the words aloud—"she shall not get her own living, Mr. Mapleson, nor stitch either, while my name is Harold Blake!"

"Now then," continued Mr. Mapleson, who was having his afternoon's chat with Harold, "we have had enough of the Sylvesters. How goes on the house?"

Harold could hardly recover himself enough to say that it was going on well.

"I am glad to hear it. When do you get in?"

"Next week, I believe," replied Harold, still absently.

"And a good thing too. It will set poor Charley up—eh?"

"Yes," said Harold, for once disloyal to his brother, and thinking of something else, "I hope it will set Charley up."

"I tell you what, Harold Blake; that cottage is the prettiest place about Newbury. It will get you a wife in no time!"

Harold's face flamed again.

"It will, mark my words. And the Newbury young ladies might do a worse thing. I shall tell them so, if they come to consult me."

"Thank you," said Harold, drawing on his gloves. He had had enough of this conversation. He wanted to go home.

He had heard rumours about the Sylvesters; indeed, he knew pretty much how things stood with them. But this knowledge did not prevent the words

"crash," and "gazette," from giving him a kind of panic. It had come very near that dread crisis, when the old walls could no longer hide the misery that was within. These people, tenderly and proudly nurtured, would be turned adrift on the world—a world that hated and condemned them; at least, with one exception.

Who could hate Alice? who could condemn her? How terrible to think of her being whirled over the edge of that abyss! He did not mean she should. He meant, with his strong arm, to pluck her back. He meant to make his home so that it could be her home. He meant to ask her, in this hour of storm and peril, to come to him and be secure.

Would she come?

Oh, yes; he thought so! He never once remembered the Sylvesters!

When he reached his lodgings, having thought of these things by the way, the landlady came out of her room.

"We've had the most beautiful music overhead, Mr. Blake," said she, "that ever you heard in your life."

"Music!" cried Harold, quickly and sharply; "what music?"

"Miss Sylvester has been, and——"

"Gone is she?" exclaimed Harold, with a blank face.

"No, she isn't gone. She won't be long, I'm thinking. It's past her time, but Master Charley was fretting, and she just stayed a bit to comfort him."

Harold stole up-stairs, but he did not enter the room. He heard the well-known voice speaking earnestly and kindly. Then he stole down again into the street.

He walked backwards and forwards on the pavement before the house. He was waiting for Alice.

She came out presently, and then he went up to her. He meant to walk home with her. He did not tell her so, for she looked a little frightened when she saw him. She spoke to him hastily, and hurried a few steps forward. But he kept pace with her. When she slackened her pace, which she did presently, he was close by her. It was evident he did not mean to be shaken off.

Though he was silent now, amid the noise and bustle, he had plenty to say presently. He had considered every word. He had thought of it, by night and day. And all his musings, and his considerations, ended in one simple question, fraught with the weal or woe of a lifetime:

Would she come?

She had found out, by this time, that he meant to stay. She had not spoken any more than he had. She walked along, her eyes cast down, her heart full of vivid consciousness. She knew—she had known these months past—that he loved her.

And when she had wanted to picture to herself any one good, or noble, or worthy to be loved, she had thought secretly of Harold Blake.

They had cleared the town. The still spring evening was sweet and balmy. There were violets growing on the bank, and here and there a bunch of primroses. It was here Harold meant to ask her to come. He whispered it to her very gently. He told her of a home, of security, of a love that would be hers till death. He smoothed from her path the rugged hardships that lay there but an hour ago; and he ended with the words repeated again, and with deeper emphasis: Would she come?

She listened to him, every word. At first she was very pale, and then the blood rushed to her face and neck. She hardly knew what to say or to do. It was her first offer of marriage.

It would be very sweet, that home, that security, that good man's love. But her mother and Raymond?

She had heard them speak of Harold Blake, and also of the mythical person, on whom they hoped to bestow the hand of their daughter, and their sister.

"Alice must not look lower than a coronet," Lady Sylvester had said.

"He cannot expect us to notice him, now he has become the overseer of a silk mill," Raymond had said, slightly, when alluding to Harold Blake.

Alice remembered these speeches, and they seemed to pierce her heart through and through. She was still remembering them, her mind abstracted and distressed, when Harold spoke again.

He was not the man for anything clandestine. He was going to woo her openly, not by chance meetings and secret communications. He said he should ask her hand of her mother and her brother. Yes, of Lady Sylvester and of Raymond!

Oh, it could not be believed how these words startled her! There was the abyss down deep at her feet. She was not a hair's-breadth from its brink. An abyss down which so much that was precious had been sacrificed. Honesty, peace, happiness—all had gone; and think you they would spare love?

She could almost hear what they would say, and see how they would look—her mother and Raymond!

She had never set herself in opposition, open and direct, to the great Sylvester dignity. Adamantine as a rock it stood, and all who struck there, went down and perished.

CHAPTER XLII.

THE ROCK OF ADAMANT.

SHE stood at the gate after he had left her. He was obliged to go. He had far outstayed his time. He walked away full of hope; for, though she had not said it, it had been implied as clearly as could be, that his affection was returned. And then, what hindrance could there be to their happiness?

So thought he, as he went back to Charley.

His home was complete. It was as snug a nest—as peaceful a retreat—as any home could be. It was not grand or pretentious like her own, but she would like it all the better for that. And he wanted her to come before the old fabric fell with the crash it would do, presently. And he thought she would come.

For a few blissful moments, Alice had thought so too. This bright gleam seemed to come to her across the dark, troubled waters. This peace, this rest, this security—it was as if Heaven had held it out to her. Should she do well to trifle with a good man's love; to fling away the jewel which shone in the dark, and was so precious? Her heart spoke loudly on the subject. She could hear its voice above all the tumult of her thoughts; and it said, No!

It told her there were few like Harold Blake. She knew that she had never seen another. Why should she not accept the blessing? Why should she not come?

But her mother? and Raymond?

She knew how desperate their fortunes were. It could not be hidden from her. Their daily life had become one of terrors and evasions. Yet Pride would hold its own to the last. They would despise her lover, and try to wrest her jewel from her; and have out the rotten arguments, she had heard from her very cradle. She knew all this, as well as could be.

How should she tell them? By word of mouth? Oh, no! that would scarcely be possible. She had discovered the plan, by which ruin was to be averted. She shuddered as she thought how love's pure faith was to be bartered for gold, and a shameful victory obtained over their reverses.

And if this happened—if Raymond married Mrs. Brooklyn—a thing which made her cheek tingle and her pulses throb—she knew what would be expected of her.

That she should flaunt in the gay circles of the world, and, as Raymond had said, openly, "Find her fortune there!"

How her soul recoiled at the very thought! Better for her the profoundest obscurity. Better to eat the hard-earned bread of honest labour—better to be cast out, and utterly forgotten; since, in her lowly lot, she could, at least, have a conscience void of offence: she could, at least, walk humbly with her God!

She mused on these things as she walked slowly up to the house.

She would write, and tell her mother. She would put it down in black and white, that she loved Harold Blake.

She went to her room, and closed the door. She sat a little time considering. But her considerations all led to one issue. The idea gained upon her. It would be better to write, and at once.

There was great happiness to her, in the thought of this good man's love. Her heart, amid all its conflicts, rested here with content and satisfaction. She would not barter or gainsay that love, come what might.

But her hand trembled as she wrote. When she had finished, and the fact lay before her, looking her in the face, with all its maze of difficulties, she trembled.

As she wrote, she had wept and smiled. It was a kind of April day—smiles and tears.

She dared not delay. She would not have her lover come too soon, and take the Sylvesters by surprise.

She would fold up the billet, and lay it on the dressing-table in her mother's room.

By this time, her feelings were wrought up to a painful state. She trembled from head to foot. Her lips were parched and feverish. She stood some minutes, before she dared to go.

If she had but one to deal with, she thought, as she stood—but her mother, or but Raymond—she might prevail. But together, these two, who were of one heart and one mind, might crush her. Only that she would be firm, and hold her jewel with the strength of life!

Hark! a door opens in the distance. She must do it now or never. She stole along the passage, and her white face showed another just as white, in the mirror over her mother's table.

The poor tempest-tossed heart beat fearfully, and then she had done it. She had told her mother that she loved Harold Blake!

Back to her chamber, trembling like some guilty thing, and weeping for very terror of what she had done.

Hearing, as it were, the ghostly phalanx of her race wail and shriek down the dreary passages, with the blood surging to her temples, and every pulse tingling with excitement, she sat down and hid her face in her hands.

Then she became cold and chill as marble. An icy sensation crept to her heart and brain—a presentiment, if you like to call it so.

By this time her mother would have read the letter! Would she come to her—the mother? And the least sound made her start and tremble. But the old house is still as ever. She does not come.

Then Alice rose. The worst, perhaps, was over. She must brace and nerve herself for the next scene in her life's history; and she would not brood here any longer in silence and loneliness. She would leave her chamber, and go.

The drawing-room was empty. She went in, and stood by the fire. She tried to reason herself to calmness, and she had but half succeeded, when she heard footsteps along the corridor.

They were both coming—her mother and Raymond. She knew it would begin directly. She knew the Sylvester dignity was all in arms—that the abyss was deep, the rock adamantine, as ever. She guessed it, by the silence that brooded after they had entered; she knew it by their faces. Just so pitiless had they looked, when Raymond broke faith with Josephine!

A rustling sound disturbed the silence. Lady Sylvester had the letter in her hand. She was opening it for the second time. She read it aloud, word for word, to the very end. Alice, with burning cheeks and downcast eyes, stood and listened.

Then her mother spoke to her. She wished, she said—and there was a touch of mockery in her tone—she wished to know for certain whether this letter were written by her daughter.

While the letter was being read, Alice had been telling herself to be brave and firm. Her heart echoed it, word by word.

It was all true, she replied, in a low, distinct voice: she did write that letter.

A brief silence followed the confession. You might have heard a pin drop.

Then the silence broke up. She spoke out boldly. It was her time to be bold. She did not mean that they should trample her love to the ground. She spoke of Harold Blake, that he was a man of gentle birth and breeding as they were; that he had behaved nobly; and she told them how heroic he had been; and—here the crimson flush dyed her brow, and face, and neck, and her voice became tremulous—that she loved him.

Bold words to utter on the very verge of the rock and the abyss!

Lady Sylvester was not demonstrative, as we know. It was against her creed to be betrayed into anything approaching a scene; yet, when this egregious insult was offered to the Sylvester grandeur, the iron grip, with which she held down her feelings, had almost given way. There was an ominous flash in her eye, that boded no good to Harold.

She threw the letter into the fire. She had twisted it into a strangely contorted shape. While it blazed and consumed to ashes, she said, calmly—

"You have had my answer, Alice. I beg the subject may never be referred to again."

"Never," echoed Raymond, fervently; "never!"

It was, as she thought, between these two—one mind, one resolve.

Still she was bold. She spoke out again. She said her happiness was at stake. She begged they would be merciful, and delay the decision until they had had opportunities of judging more about the matter; till Raymond—and she turned to him, as though appealing to him—till Raymond had seen Harold Blake.

But he did not respond to her appeal. He set his face against her like a flint.

They had not been watchful enough, he said; they had forgotten that Alice was no true Sylvester, else this disgrace—how the word stung her to the quick—this disgrace had not happened. They had far other thoughts for her, than a marriage with Harold Blake.

No words can express the disdain with which he brought out the name.

Again she spoke. Her courage waxed higher, as her case grew more desperate.

She could not give him up, she said. They had no power over her affections. She would not disobey them—her mother, and Raymond—but they should not force her into disloyalty to her love—to Harold Blake.

She did not blush this time, nor was her voice tremulous. Her face looked white and resolute. She was chafing against the sharp edges of the adamantine rock.

Singularly like each other, at this moment, were the mother and daughter.

It would not do to oppose force by force. Lady Sylvester sought out her other weapons.

"Alice," and she went near to her, and put her arm round her, "you know not what it is you covet. I, who am older and wiser, see what the end will be. Marry this man—so far beneath the requirements of your position and your race—marry him, and what then? We shall not acknowledge either yourself or him; you will be separated from us for ever—from us who have loved you so tenderly, and been so much dearer to you than he can ever be; we who have suffered so long, and been so true to each other, will be divided and split up at last. But be it so! Your marriage-peal will wring a knell in our ears, my child. We shall never see you again; nor will you see us. The grave could not so rend us apart, as this fatal marriage with Harold Blake!"

The girl trembled. This was the thing she dreaded most of all.

"I had hoped," continued Lady Sylvester, her voice becoming soft and caressing, "when the struggle is past—a struggle you have not appreciated, because you could not understand it—when the old house stands firm again, and we are saved—I had hoped for peaceful days to recompense this evil. And the days may come; and I shall look round for Alice, but she will be gone. I shall stand alone. She for whom I have done and suffered so much will have forsaken me. I shall have no daughter!"

It was very terrible. Alice hid her face in her hands and wept.

Yet why need it be so? She gathered courage to ask the question; and she checked back her tears. Why need it be so? Why should not the new tie bind the old ones but the closer?

It could not be! They spoke at once, and with a vehemence that startled her. She did not understand the nature of her own position, nor the requirements of her house. They had wedded with equals—the Sylvesters—from ancient times till now; and, on occasions, they had known how to suffer.

It was Raymond who said this; his voice sharp and bitter exceedingly.

Besides, was the sacrifice to be all his? Had he crushed his life's-blood out, as it were, that she should fling herself into the arms of a nameless adventurer? Had he done so much to build, that she should destroy? Was this a time—when the battle was so sore against them—was this a time to dally with an idle whim—a love of a day old? Was not every energy—every thought—required to save themselves from a shameful ruin?

What could she say to these arguments, advanced so stoutly against her? She knew they were unsound—nay, rotten to their very foundations—and she clung to Harold Blake. The light still came across the troubled waters, and she would not give it up. There was as much persistence in her nature as in theirs.

If for the moment she was silent, it was not that she yielded. She was true and loyal to him in her heart. "Home," "peace," "a good man's love," rang their sweet changes in her ears. She would abide by the blessing a kind Heaven had sent her. And when the storm had passed, and the Sylvester dignity had sufficiently asserted itself, perhaps they would bid her go to him, and be blessed!

(To be continued.)

HOW MINNIE BECAME A GIPSY.

WAKE up, Minnie, dear! the sun has been shining this long while—and if you do not get up, you will lose your rosy cheeks and all your pretty looks, which would never do, would it, my darling?"

"I don't care about the sun; I don't want to get up, and I won't; I like staying in bed best."

"Oh! but my pretty little one would not like to be an ugly fright, would she?"

A torrent of peevish exclamations followed this last appeal, which, however, had the desired effect. Minnie jumped up, and began dressing herself, during which process her well-known friend, the glass, was by no means forgotten.

Minnie Langdon was the only child of wealthy parents. She was very pretty; but, unfortunately, she was too well aware of it, and, though only seven years old, had formed very decided notions as to what was due to her personal appearance, thinking, as vain little girls are apt to think, that "looking nice" entitled her to no end of petting and indulgence.

Minnie's vanity had been greatly fostered by her nurse, who, being very fond of her little charge, showed her affection by the most absurd flattery, which, though very palatable, was anything but beneficial to the little thing. It was not until lately that her mamma had found this out, and when she did so, her efforts were apparently useless to eradicate the effects of the nurse's foolish conduct; so much more quickly are evil impressions received and retained than good ones.

Minnie lived in a country village, and a most beautiful place it was. There you could obtain as large a bouquet as ever you could carry without even asking for it, and no one need desire more lovely or sweet-scented flowers than those wild ones. The birds, too—such a variety, and how sweetly they sang! they made you feel so musical that you could scarcely help singing yourself, at least so Minnie felt; and, to add to the attractions of the place, there was a splendid wood, which you could by no means fully appreciate until the very middle of the summer, and then, when it was so unbearably warm that you could do nothing but grumble, how delightful it was to wander about in the refreshing shade! This wood was Minnie's favourite resort, and she found very little difficulty in persuading her nurse to walk there, instead of in the hot, dusty lanes of the neighbourhood. A great source of speculation to her, were "those funny red and yellow carts," as she called the gipsy caravans which were dotted about the barer part of the wood, and very great was her desire to see the inside of them; but her nurse, though usually so indulgent in gratifying her slightest wish, could never be won over to grant this one: for she said she should never forgive herself if her darling caught any disease of those dirty little gipsy children; and who could be sure that she would not?

One lovely summer's day Minnie awoke, as we have seen, in a very cross humour, and grumbled so much while dressing, that her nurse told her she must have "got out of bed the wrong side," but this remark only had the effect of increasing her ill-temper. She found fault with the bread-and-milk provided for her breakfast, wanting to know why she could not have some coffee in a cup like papa and mamma did. After breakfast, when told to fetch her lesson-books, she refused to do so, and it was not till her nurse had called Mrs. Langdon, that she could be reduced to anything like obedience.

Mrs. Langdon—although she loved her little girl dearly—was very strict with her if naughty; and when told by her mamma that she should not go out until she had said every lesson, Minnie knew it would be so, and as it was a great punishment to her not to be allowed to go for a walk, she began, very reluctantly, to open her books. But her ill-temper was by no means dispelled, and she found—though she would not own it—that it was a great hindrance to her: for learning a lesson badly, stumbling through it, and having to learn it again, took much longer than learning it thoroughly the first time would have done; so that, when she had finished, she found it so late that she would now have to wait till after dinner before she could go out.

That afternoon, as she walked along by the side of her nurse, she felt very revengeful indeed, and thought to herself, "I wish I could serve nurse out. I will, if I can;" but, before she had found an opportunity of doing so, they had arrived at the wood, where Minnie, as was her wont, set off in search of wild flowers. When she had gathered as many as she could conveniently carry, she ran back to show them; but her nurse was fast asleep on the grass.

The idea darted into Minnie's mind, that this was a fine opportunity to serve nurse out. Thought Minnie, "I will run away and hide myself; and, when nurse wakes up, she will begin to look for me, and perhaps call me, but I won't answer her, and then she'll think I'm lost, and she'll be in such a way!" And without further reflection, she darted away at her utmost speed, and, winding in and out among the trees and bushes, was soon quite out of sight of her nurse.

She had run a considerable distance when, catching her foot in a patch of tangled weeds, she fell heavily to the ground; and speedily forgetting, in the pain of the moment, her resolve not to speak, for fear of being heard, she—without attempting to raise herself from the place in which she had fallen—began crying, and calling out, "Nurse!—nurse!" as loudly as she could. The grass just here being very long and soft, and her face being turned in the opposite direction, she neither heard the sound of approaching footsteps, nor perceived the owner of the feet which caused them. Great, therefore, was her astonishment as she felt herself lifted from the ground; and facing sharply round, she exclaimed, as she perceived who it was, "Why, Mary, is it you? how did you know I was here, and that I had fallen down?"

"Yes, Miss Minnie," replied Mary, "it is me. I was walking in the wood, and I heard some one crying. I thought it sounded like your voice, and I wondered what could be the matter, so I came here, and seeing you lying on the grass crying, I picked you up. But how is it, Miss Minnie, that you are here by yourself; where is your nurse?"

Minnie then related the whole of the day's adventures, winding up with the details of how finely she was serving nurse out, at which Mary laughed heartily, evidently regarding it as a great joke.

But in order fully to understand what followed, we must here give a short account of who this girl Mary was.

She had formerly lived with Minnie's mamma as nursemaid; but being convicted of theft, Mrs. Langdon had dismissed her. Her mother, who was a widow with a large family depending upon her for support, was so distressed at her daughter's conduct, and begged so hard for her to be tried once more, that Mrs. Langdon, deceived by a professed repentance on the girl's part, again employed her; but when she found that instead of requiting her kindness with gratitude, the girl was continuing in her former course, her indignation knew no bounds; and this time Mary was discharged, with an intimation to the effect that she might think herself decidedly lucky to have escaped a prison.

Finding that no one would take as a servant a girl who could not have a "character" from her last place, Mary, in a fit of desperation, joined a band of so-called gipsies, who were at that time stationed near the place where she lived. She never forgot the grudge she bore to Mrs. Langdon, for having, as she reasoned with herself, deprived her of the means of gaining an honest living: for she, like many another, quite lost sight of the fact that she was reaping what she herself had sown, and was only too ready to satisfy the little conscience she possessed, by persuading herself that it was not her own, but entirely Mrs. Langdon's fault, that she had adopted this dishonest mode of living.

Minnie having thus been thrown in her way, she determined not to lose so good an opportunity of revenging herself on her former mistress, or, as she termed it, "paying her out." Her plan was to carry the child off to the gipsies, who the day before had left the forest for another part of the country, Mary having remained behind for the purpose of carrying on a little scheme which was more profitable than honest. This commission she had now executed to her satisfaction, and was on her way to rejoin the caravan. She, therefore, set about persuading the child to accompany her, which she found no very difficult matter, for knowing Minnie's love of flattery, and her great desire to see the inside of a gipsy caravan, with a skilful wielding of these weapons, and sundry promises of nice things, she soon gained her point, and they started off, Minnie's hand fast locked in hers.

They had not gone very far when Minnie began to grow tired and sleepy, and wanted to rest; but Mary told her they would "never get there" if they stopped; so taking the child in her arms, they continued on their way. In this comfortable position she soon fell asleep, and upon awaking, was surprised to find it quite dark. Frightened at the darkness, and feeling very hungry, for she had been asleep a long time, she began to cry to be taken back to her mamma, on which the hard-hearted girl told her, if she was not quiet, she would put her down and leave her there in the road; which threat had the desired effect, and after a few rebellious sobs, she again fell asleep. When she next awoke, a very different scene presented itself to her view; she was in what appeared to her a very dirty little room. A very dirty woman was standing at a little stove frying some bacon; and, on making a closer survey, she found that, instead of being in her own pretty little bed with pink and white curtains, she was lying on a bundle of straw.

The woman turned round at this moment, and, seeing the child awake, said to her, "So you've woke up, little un, 'ave yer? I think it's 'igh time. Just dress yerself as quick as yer can." With which injunction she threw Minnie some dirty, patched garments.

"Those are not my things," said Minnie, her indignation overcoming the fear which she felt towards the strange woman.

"Dear bless me! we're mighty partickler, I'm sure. If those aint your things, they're the only ones you'll get! So you'd better look sharp and put them on, if you want any breakfast."

This mention of breakfast had a greater effect than any other threat could have done. Poor Minnie was very hungry indeed, for she had never before gone so long without food; and she began slowly to put on the clothes which the woman had given her.

When she had, with some slight assistance, finished dressing, the woman, bidding her follow, opened the door; and Minnie, to her surprise, found herself in the open air. Here a little gipsy girl was preparing breakfast, and the woman, setting down the plate of bacon which she carried in her hand, shouted out, "Hi, there! breakfast!" Upon which Minnie heard a sound of several persons running, and looking round, she perceived several men and boys coming towards them.

They all sat down on the grass, forming a circle; and the little gipsy girl, who had for the last few minutes been busily engaged watching the contents of a tin can which was suspended over the fire from a tripod, after the trae gipsy style, now proceeded to detach the can from the hook on which it hung, and present it to an old man, who, having drunk from it copiously, passed it on to his next neighbour.

During this time Minnie had not remained unnoticed; the remarks made on her appearance were numerous, though not always of a very complimentary character. When they had finished their meal, Minnie was not sorry to find that none of the contents of the can remained, and, therefore, she must have water for her breakfast. How gladly would she have exchanged the hard crusts and water for some of the once despised bread-and-milk! but there was no chance of that, and she must eat what she had given her, or starve. As soon as she had devoured the scanty allowance of food, the woman sent her with the little gipsy girl to pick up sticks; which Minnie was very glad to do, if only to help to drive away the miserable feeling of loneliness she felt.

During the day, whenever any people passed within sight, Minnie was made to run after them and beg halfpence. The first time she was sent on this errand, she returned without having been able to summon sufficient courage for the purpose; but the woman beat the poor child so unmercifully, that she dared not do so again.

Before the end of the day, Minnie had become quite friendly with her little companion, who opened her heart so far as to tell Minnie to call her Polly.

That night Minnie's slumber was disturbed by the sound of men running about, and, on asking her little friend Polly what was the matter, she was told that one of the boys had been caught in the act of stealing and taken to prison, but he had managed to send a messenger (who had just arrived) to inform his friends they were in danger, and, as no time was to be lost, they were then preparing to leave the forest.

In about half an hour they had started; and by dawn next morning were many miles on their way.

The next time they encamped, it was in a field, on the outskirts of a little town, where, as Polly informed Minnie, they were to perform in about a week or so.

During the week which intervened between the encampment and the performance, Minnie was taught to walk upon stilts by the gipsy woman and little Polly, who was quite an adept at the art, and who gave Minnie many valuable hints on balancing herself properly, and other important points in stilt-walking, and which were of such great assistance to her that, at the expiration of the time allotted, she had become quite proficient.

The performance, which took place every day, consisted of all the latest juggling feats, to melodies on the Pan-pipes, with a rather heavy drum accompaniment, dancing, and stilt-walking.

To Minnie this acting was worse than any of the other hardships she had to endure; and no amount of blows could induce her to carry round the tambourine, which office therefore fell to Polly's lot.

While Minnie was thus being carried from place to place, made to beg, and even taught to steal, what were her friends doing?

When the nurse awoke, and did not see her little charge anywhere in sight, she jumped up in great haste, and began looking about the forest for her; but when the sun went down, and no Minnie appeared, she was in a panic of alarm. She rushed frantically about from place to place, searching behind bushes and trees, with a lingering hope that the child might be in hiding; and it was not till it began to grow so dark that to stay any longer was time lost, that she left the forest and turned her footsteps homewards.

When, after arriving there, she had told her sad news, the utmost consternation prevailed. Mr. and Mrs. Langdon were so overwhelmed with apprehension, that the nurse's carelessness remained unreprieved; and the poor woman's agony at perceiving the sorrow she had occasioned was so great, that a sharp rebuke would have been a relief.

In a very short time, a number of men had been collected, and provided with lanterns; and headed by Mr. Langdon himself, they set out in search of the child. Arrived at the wood, they scattered, appointing a meeting-place at the other end of it; but their efforts, like those of the nurse, were without result. Mr. Langdon, before leaving the wood, made inquiries concerning the gipsies, a party of whom he knew to have been for some time stationed there; but learning that they had left the day before, he at once gave up all hope in that quarter.

After looking up every nook and corner in the village, Mr. Langdon, having sent messengers in every direction, weary and dispirited, returned home, in order to prepare a description to send to the constabulary. Here fresh trouble awaited him. Mrs. Langdon, who at the best of times had delicate health, had sunk under the terrible blow, and was now very ill. Mr. Langdon endeavoured to soften the tidings of his failure, by telling her of his plan of sending a description to all the town-criers in the kingdom, which he said could not fail to find their lost little one.

But though large rewards were offered, and a minute description given, yet, so far, they had been unsuccessful; and, indeed, had any one passed her by, he would hardly have recognised in the little brown gipsy-child—for the woman had stained her skin and hair with a preparation she always kept by her—or the gaudily-dressed street-performer, the child of the wealthy Mr. Langdon.

As day by day passed, and no news could be obtained of her child, Mrs. Langdon's illness so rapidly increased as to seriously frighten her husband, who determined to call in the family doctor instead of the village apothecary, who was now attending her, and in order to prevent delay, for he lived at a great distance, resolved to be his own messenger.

At the time of which we write, the post was very slow, and, also, not very certain.

After a journey of two days, Mr. Langdon arrived at the town where the doctor lived. As he was passing through one of the streets, his attention was attracted by a crowd of people, and by sundry exclamations, such as, "Poor child! Why, she's fainted! Don't she sham well?" and many others in the same strain.

Moved by a feeling of compassion, which was heightened by his own troubles, he made his way through the crowd to where a little child was lying, surrounded by several persons who were decked out as acrobats, and to whom the child, judging by her dress, evidently belonged.

Her friends seemed very unwilling for Mr. Langdon to interfere, but, without noticing their compunction, he lifted her in his arms, and—could it really be?—in the little cold form which he embraced, he recognised his lost darling.

Turning abruptly towards the man and woman, who appeared the leaders of the party, he demanded of them when, where, and how they had obtained the child; and they, seeing the turn affairs had taken, began a long tale of their having found her, and claimed the reward that had been offered—although they had detained her, hoping the amount might be increased—all which Mr. Langdon cut short by giving them in charge to a constable, who at that moment came up to know what the "row" was.

The physis which Mr. Langdon carried home with him, in the shape of his little Minnie, worked a marvellous cure in her mamma. As to Minnie herself, she soon recovered her strength under the different treatment she received at home; and though she had meant to "serve her nurse out," at the same time she received a lesson which she did not easily forget.

L. M. C.

ANSWER TO SCRIPTURE ACROSTIC ON PAGE 704.

"CAIN. ABEL"—Gen. iv. 1, 8, 14; Heb. xi. 4.

1. C anA John ii. 11.
2. A biB..... Exod. xiii. 4.
3. I sraelitE
4. N aBaL..... 1 Sam. xxv. 3.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

1. Who Jeremiah to the princes brought?
2. Whom God and Rimmon both to worship sought?
3. Whose son was over those who tilled the land?
4. What wandering race to drink no wine were found?
5. The town where Solomon a navy made.
6. A king whose call five other kings obeyed.
7. What Syrian captain fell with all his host?
8. Who brought to Hezekiah Rabshakeh's boast?
9. Where dwelt the priest, father of Joseph's wife?
10. What priest to Egypt fled to save his life?
11. The place where David took a golden crown.
12. To whom was Paul, with care, by night brought down?
13. Who in his exile help to David brought?
14. What giant fain would have with David fought?
15. The land where Jephthah from his brethren fled.
16. Who angered Asa by the words he said?

We ask not worldly fame or wealth,
No earthly vain reward;
This one petition we present,
"Increase our faith," O Lord!

THE WIFE

Saturday, August 8, 1868.

(Drawn by A. B. HOUGHTON.)

"Then Alice had to be won over."—p. 733.

AN HOUR'S REVENGE, AND WHAT CAME OF IT.

A TRUE STORY WITH MANY MORALS. IN FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER IV.

SO Austin became my confidential servant, and well and faithfully he did my work for more than two years. He was still rather sullen to the men, and they sometimes complained of having two masters instead of one; but I was firmly resolved that nothing should prevent him from keeping the post, and being as happy and well off in it as I could make him. Yet I don't pretend to say that it wasn't giving away money, or that he was really required in the least about the place, nor yet that I should not rather have served him in any other way than one which brought my sin under my very eyes perpetually. As for Alice, she soon held up her head again; but we kept as far from one another as we could. I had installed them in a snug little house that came along with my new farm, fully a mile from where I lived. Austin managed that side almost entirely; but whenever I went across for appearance' sake, she would slip quietly up-stairs, to rock her baby's cradle, or lie down to sleep away a headache.

At the end of two years, when the poor fellow's first soreness had nearly passed away, his old farm came under the hammer again. Over-improvements, building stone walls where wooden fences would have done, and all kinds of fancy work, had eaten away the new owner's capital; and just when it was in good order, and the house beautifully rebuilt, he found himself unable to reap the fruit of his enterprise. It was a sore disappointment to him, but it was good news for me. I went to Austin and implored him not to let the chance pass. The place had got a bad name and would go cheap; he should repay me whatever it cost within ten years at the farthest; and although I had spent a good deal lately, both in buying land and in building, my credit alone would bring in as much capital as we should require.

When, when had I been so happy as his grateful consent made me? I rode home that evening on the same horse and along the same road as after firing his hayrick, but everything seemed changed as by an enchanter's wand. The smell of the honeysuckles and the meadowsweet, the ripple of the trout-stream a field away, the occasional sheen of the moonbeams on a tree, the light of innumerable stars—all these mingled with one glad thought, that I should be almost innocent again, for Austin and Alice would go back to their old house, and as for the money they would have to pay me, it might go by and bear compound interest until their daughter's wedding-day. Neither of them would be likely to refuse her leave to have it, and so all would be right again. I was so glad and relieved, that it seemed impossible to go to bed, so I turned my horse's head, and rode to the little mount that overlooked the coveted farm. There lay the new house in the sheltered hollow beneath where the old one stood, and the gables, and red bricks, and slated roofs made me actually laugh aloud, they were so much better than ever the old one was.

But it is a false idea that we can shuffle off either our crimes or their consequences so easily, or bring a clean thing out of an unclean. Just when we wanted to borrow money, came the crushing tidings of Napoleon's great victory at Austerlitz, that left the paralysed Continent at his feet, and enabled him to turn all his strength against England, which his own fleet and that of Spain were then combined to assail. Credit was hopeless for a while. Timid people buried their money in their back-gardens, until the glorious news of Trafalgar came like a burst of sunshine in the dark sky. But it came too late for us. I rode all round the country-side, reminding the richer people of Austin's misfortune, and begging them not to bid against him. Many people promised out of the inherent goodness of their hearts, and a few more because they were afraid to bid for anything. But, sir, this is so dark a story, that I am glad to say that far the most were influenced by genuine kindness, and two or three even lent me fifty or a hundred pounds to help our object.

We should have been quite secure about the result, but for one old acquaintance and school-fellow of ours, whom we both disliked even then, and had entirely broken with long since. A libertine, and yet a miser—an ignorant, short-sighted, and yet most cunning man—he had never been known to spend a penny except for the indulgence of his own bad passions, and then he would go to any length. He was rich, too; and when we had requested a third party to call upon him and explain the case, he had replied, with a sinister smile, that Austin and Austin's master had always been dear friends of his, and he should certainly take this opportunity of obliging them both at once.

Sir, to shorten the story, he bought the farm over our heads; and Austin went up to him, with a livid face, and muttered between his clenched teeth, "Mr. Gillespie, if you repented of all your sins as heartily as you shall repent this one, it would be good for you by-and-by."

Just three weeks afterwards, Gillespie's ricks and farmhouses were all burned to ashes, and thousands of pounds' worth of property were consumed. A stick and a handkerchief of Austin's were found in the next field, and, as he would have been suspected in any case, he was arrested at once, and lodged in the county gaol.

Poor Alice sought me out for the first time since she broke with me, and implored me to save him, if I could. I asked eagerly where he had been that night, and learned enough to convince me that he had done the deed, and that Alice knew it.

"But," said she, "he never would have thought of such an act, if some one had not done the same to himself, and filled his mind with bitterness that was not natural to him."

This plea was quite enough for me, and I bade her be perfectly at ease, for Henry Austin should be rescued at any cost.

Then I hurried up to London, engaged the services of the shrewdest practitioner at the Old Bailey, and was rewarded with the assurance that only a miracle could save my friend's life, the case being so clear, and the resolution to put down arson—so the crime is technically named—so strong.

Wild, wild was the storm that raged within me for two days. If things took their course, Austin's punishment would be strictly legal, and I might, perhaps, marry Alice Day after all. Yet that was impossible, indeed, for even now I scarcely dared so much as to look her in the face. But if things took the course I was silently pre-meditating, then his life would be saved indeed, but only at the cost of mine. No matter; I deserved that long ago; and I had no young children to live for, nor any Alice Day. With the third day came determination and calmness, for I had fixed upon a course that was indeed fraudulent and false, but not so utterly base and malevolent as the deed I had done two years ago. At least, my repentance for it before my God has never been so crushing and remorseful.

The first thing to do was to draw the lawyer into my scheme, and he consented, with many exclamations of astonishment, as well as a shrewd stipulation for a large extra fee. Then Alice had to be won over, which was a much harder task, and only managed by telling her everything from the beginning. Her chief duty was to inform her husband that something very strange would happen upon the trial, but no person would really be in the slightest danger, and he must remain perfectly silent. This he promised more readily than if he had been entrusted with the details of our simple plot.

The day of the trial came, and our counsel fought every inch of ground with the invincible courage of a first-rate lawyer, doing battle against deadly odds. But his skill and perseverance were utterly powerless to shake the evidence, to convince the judge, or even to hoodwink the jury; and when the evidence for the prosecution was complete, he handed me a slip of paper with these words: "There is no way but your own. Do you repent?" I added one word—"No," sent it back and was called as a witness for the defence.

Did I know how Austin's stick and handkerchief came into Mr. Gillespie's field? Certainly I did: it was I who dropped them there. When? The night of the great fire. It was I who kindled it. Gillespie had behaved like a brute, out of personal spite toward me, and I had resolved to punish him. I took Austin's things to puzzle the police, thinking he would easily prove his innocence, and their attention would be distracted. I confessed, because I would not see him hanged for my deed; I did not confess before because I wanted to see would he escape.

All this time the court was as still as death, and when I ceased there was a heavy sigh, as of men who had lost their breath. Every one looked at the prisoner, who had once seemed about to speak, but been hushed by a warning gesture from Alice, who was standing opposite, and he had now leaned down upon the front of the dock, with his face between his hands.

I was instantly taken into custody, and hurried off; and a verdict of acquittal was at once given in for Austin. A week afterwards I formally pleaded guilty, but my sentence was commuted to transportation for life. The Crown could have seized the property of a felon, but was forestalled by my wary lawyer, who had drawn up a deed of gift, by which everything was settled upon Alice and her children long before the trial began.

I have often heard from them since, and learned that a heavy narcotic was administered to Austin to keep him away from my trial; that the children are thriving; that they have bought the old farm for the second son, who is named after me; and that Gillespie was so frightened when Austin got out of gaol, as to sell everything, and settle in the south of Ireland. They send me every possible comfort.

But it is not from them, nor from my self-sacrifice, which was a lie and a sin too, that I have my best comfort now. I am waiting to be called home to One who understands our temptations, and forgives every one that trusts Him.

Look, sir, the sun is rising just as my tale is told. And wasn't that the bleating of a sheep? We shall catch them before an hour is out. Let us eat a good breakfast, to make us strong.

ALEXIS.

ABOVE THE GRAVE.

IN the sleep that seems of death,
In the calm of heart and head,
Faintly breath pursuing breath,
Deathlike dreamed he o'er the dead.

Slowly o'er him, one by one,
Came the watching stars through night;
Slowly with the parting sun,
Faded life and fading light.

From the grave did that cold clay,
Through the sod beneath his breast,
Fix on him the spell that lay,
O'er it of eternal rest.

Who can tell the moment when
That above and that below,
Shrines, or shells, or shreds of men,
Did to fatal kindred grow!

Slowly o'er them, one by one,
Went the watching-stars from night;
Slowly in the east, the sun
Touched him with its harder light.

Ere that sun again had set,
Ere those stars could look again,
Those two parted forms had met,
Shrines, or shells, or shreds of men.

J. S. W.

THE ABIDING COMFORTER.

BY THE REV. H. V. H. COWELL, B.A.

OUR blessed Lord, anticipating his return to the Father, said to his disciples, who were about to be bereaved of his loved presence, "I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever." And we know how, in accordance with this promise, the Holy Ghost came, at the season of Pentecost, with mystic flames and mighty wind, and filled the chamber where the apostles were assembled. He came not to sojourn, but to stay, as the Teacher, Strength, Solace of the Church.

Let us think a little of this Abiding Presence, thus graciously given. Notice, then, that it is a person, and not merely an influence, that was promised by Christ. Jesus spoke of the Holy Spirit as another Comforter, thus likening him to himself, and lifting him to the same level.

And, indeed, the very name implies personality. The gentle zephyr, murmuring among the trees, and fanning the fevered brow, can refresh; the dying falls of some sweet strain suffice to soothe; the impressive architecture, softened light, and majestic music of a cathedral may be able to "Dissolve me into ecstasies,

And bring all heaven before mine eyes;"

but only a living, loving person can comfort.

We ought to think of the Holy Ghost, then, not as a vague, diffused principle, imparted to the Church, but as a tender Friend dwelling with us; as one whom we may "grieve;" one against whom we may sin.

But now let us learn what the title given Him by our Lord implies. There is a richness in it on which we shall do well to dwell.

The word "Comforter" connotes more than Consoler, which is the only sense attached to it in modern usage. In older English, it was equivalent to Strengtheners. Thus Wickliffe renders, "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me," by, "I may alle thingis in him that comfortith me." Even this word is narrower than the original Greek term, Paraclete

(or Advocate, Counsellor), one who stands by the side to advise, encourage, prompt. But, as Archdeacon Hare remarked, in his "Mission of the Comforter," "If we understand the word Comforter, not merely in its secondary and common sense, as Consoler, but also in its primary and etymological sense, as Strengtheners and Supporter, it would be difficult to find any word in our language so well fitted to express a range of meaning corresponding to that embraced by the Greek Paraclete." While, then, we need not regret the employment of the word "Comforter" by the translators of our version of the Bible, we must attach to it the fuller meaning I have indicated.

We will look, then, at some of the ways in which He assists us. He comforts and helps those who mourn over their sinfulness by revealing the Saviour, and applying his grace to their souls. It seems strange that He who bears the title "Comforter" should be the source of sorrow. But so it is. He convicts of sin, and so causes "godly sorrow." But he produces sorrow only to prepare the way for the influx of a deeper joy than has ever been felt before. He only breaks the heart that he may open it to receive the balm of Gilead. When he finds a soul subdued, either by a general sense of sin, or by "one fatal remembrance" that flings its shadow over life and mars all happiness, he reveals Him to us whom he anointed "to comfort all that mourn." He comforts the distressed sinner by showing the Saviour. As I sat meditating on this subject, a beam of light broke suddenly through the clouds and fell on a head of our Redeemer that hangs in my room. As it brought into distinctness the deep traces of agony on that marred countenance, and revealed to my mind the words, "Surely he hath borne our griefs and carried our sorrows," I saw a striking illustration of the work of the Spirit. He brings into prominence the mediatorial work of the Saviour, and fixes our attention on it, as the ray of sunlight flickering on the face on the wall flashed it into view.

But there are times, when it is not so much the guilt as the power of sin that appals. At such times the Holy Ghost strengthens us to resist evil, and helps us to overcome, as we could not do unaided. As the Evil Spirit, possessing the demoniac, made him so strong that he could not be bound physically, so the Holy Spirit, strengthening us by the infusion of his grace, renders us so strong that we cannot be held by the fetters of sin—cannot be led captive by Satan at his will. So are we endued with power from on high.

But again. The Holy Ghost comforts those who groan under perplexed emotion, by enabling them to articulate their feelings. There is a relief in the very translation of sorrow into words. We speak rightly of giving vent to our feelings by putting them into speech. It is a great relief to tell our friend our troubles—a greater still to confide them to our God. But there are times when we are stricken with a spiritual dumbness; and this when we most need relief. We often sympathise with the poet, as he sat on the shore of the Bristol Channel, within sight of the churchyard where his friend lies in the cold grave, and sang—

“Break, break, break,
On thy cold, grey stones O sea!
And I would that my tongue could utter
The thoughts that arise in me.”

We would that our feelings could be shattered in sobs and speech; but silence binds them as a frost. At such times the Holy Spirit, who knows us better than we know ourselves, comes to our aid. Our fellow-men cannot do anything for us; vain comforters are they all at such periods, for there is no medium of intercourse between us. Then the Spirit “helpeth our infirmities,” and “maketh intercession for us with groanings that cannot be uttered.” Lips may be mute still, but the heart has its own voiceless language, which can be heard on high; and in this our Paraclete speaks in us, while Jesus stands “an Advocate (Paraclete) with the Father,” pleading for us. For there are two kinds of advocates—one sort pleads, and another acts only as chamber counsel. The Saviour corresponds to the one, the Spirit to the other. While Jesus stands in the most holy place to give efficacy to our prayers, the Holy Ghost, the Comforter, prompts those prayers, and brings into our souls, agitated by the crowding of a multitude of thoughts, a delicious peace.

Moreover, He comforts those who mourn over the common sorrows or special sadnesses of life, by giving his personal sympathy, and by imparting a supernatural strength. St. Paul, in writing to the Corinthians, describes himself as “sorrowful, yet always rejoicing.” This description is applicable, not only to the apostolic state, but also to that of all Christians. The children of God are not exempt from the ills that flesh is heir to. David lost his child, Job his estate, Daniel his liberty. Our Lord prepared his disciples to expect distress. “In the world,” he said, “ye shall have tribulation.” He added, however, “But in me ye shall have peace.” That peace he imparts through the Spirit.

When the heart is flooded by bitter griefs, the blessed Spirit rises through our sadnesses

“Like fountains of sweet water in the sea.”

When the heart aches with a sense of solitude, and a man feels isolated, by reason of his idiosyncracies making events impinge on his personality with some speciality that separates him from human sympathy, the Comforter can relieve, because he searches into our spirits, and brings to bear on them his tender solace according to our circumstances, applying to our hearts his own deep personal sympathy, witnessing to our sonship, sanctifying to us our trials, and bringing to our remembrance all the words of love that the Saviour has spoken.

When we have to bid a long farewell to a friend, or to some nearer one still, linked to us by the strong bond of family life—when the world’s hollow commonplaces strike cold upon our hearts, the “love of the Spirit” can lessen that loneliness which nothing earthly can alleviate.

When we are worn by the ordinary trials of life, or when our strength is sapped by some special sorrow, the Holy Ghost, the Comforter, can fill us with a fresh power. Cast on his strength, a new might is given us; so, with St. Paul, we learn to glory in our infirmities, because when we are weak, then are we strong, through the promised Strengtheners.

I would put, then, to my reader the question of Eliphaz: “Are the consolations of God small with thee?” I would point out to any one in such a state that he must answer in the affirmative the promise made by our dear Lord, and would urge him to seek the gracious presence of the Comforter.

Other helpers may fail us, but the Comforter is omnipotent; other friends may be separated from us by space or death, but the Holy Ghost is given to abide with us for ever. He is ready, with his intimate knowledge, abundant love, delicate gentleness, all-sufficing power, to stay, encourage, strengthen our souls, till the earnest which he gives us of the rest and joy of heaven passes into the fulness of blessedness in that home of our souls where “all tears are wiped away from all eyes.”

ROUND THE WALLS.

I.

O life upon the landscape,
No sound within the camp;
But round about the city walls
A weirdly rumbling tramp;
And now and again a solemn strain
From horns of sweetness rare,
With tones as soft as distant bells
In the evening hour of prayer.

On went the Pilgrim Children
With a gladly-solemn mien;
So silent and so mighty
A throng had never been.
Forward marched the armed men,
Far back the rereward trod;
And amidst, the white-robed trumpeters,
And the golden Ark of God.

The forty years of proving
Have crawled them slowly past;
Of those that lived the first of them
Scarce one hath seen the last:
They only know from mould'ring lips
The ever-living lore:
The wonder-worked deliverance,
And all the woes before;

The pestilence and darkness;
The ministry of death;
The throng between the walls of wave,
Then freedom's first long breath;
The food of angels daily rained,
The march—the foe—the din—
The cross uplift, and the slow wild drift
Through the Wilderness of Sin.

And now their journey endeth
Those broad old walls about;
The trumpets blare exultant blasts,
With joy the people shout:
Great Jericho is fallen,
And last, a voiceful band,
With eager haste they spurn the waste,
And tread the Promised Land.

II.

A march as of the ages,
A ceaseless beat and roll,
For now a vision weird awakes
Slow throbbings in my soul.
I hear the wondrous tunes of Time
That round me faintly float;
Those melodies whereof a life
Heareth but one stray note.

I see the Pilgrim Children
March round a city's walls,
And o'er that vast and lowly throng
A heaven-sent halo falls.
Forward, a band with sword in hand,
Rereward, the peaceful-shod;
And ever amidst, the Holy Men
With the Covenant of God.

The weary generations
Have plodded and gone by;
So many, that the time is near
When death of them shall die:
And life of them shall live afresh,
And lie in chains no more,
For they shall have deliverance
From all the woes of yore.

The past, a sombre landscape,
Shall loom beneath their eyes,
And plunging seas of troublous mood
In gleaming seethe arise:
The daily-needed strength of Heaven,
The foes without, within;
The bright cloud-rift, and the Cross uplift
In the wilderness of sin.

Soon will the round be ended,
The sands of Time run out,
The trumpets sound the city round;
And saints of God shall shout,
"Great Babylon is fallen!"
And crowned, and harp in hand,
They, jeyful-paced, shall leave the waste,
And gain the Promised Land. B.

THE EXPLORATION OF PALESTINE.

CHAPTER VI.

WHEN, on a memorable occasion, the apostles directed the attention of their Divine Master to the magnificence of the Temple, as then it stood before them in all the freshness of its renovated dignity, "See," one of them exclaimed, "Master, see what manner of stones and what buildings are here!" (Mark xiii. 1.) That disciple, in his brief exclamation on behalf of the Temple, pleaded two distinct claims for the admiration of all beholders: "See," he said, "what manner of stones" are here; "see," also, "what buildings are here!" He distinguished between the "stones" that had been used by the builders, and their "buildings" as works of architectural art; and he claimed for the "stones" themselves their own distinct and independent tribute of admiring commendation.

The walls of Jerusalem, as they appear at this day, were rebuilt almost from the ground about the middle of the sixteenth century by the Ottoman sultan, Selim I. In the long interval—nearly fifteen centuries—between the capture and destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, and this rebuilding, such walls as the Holy City may have possessed at various periods of the Christian era, were the productions of a succession of reconstructions and reparations. Now, when in ancient times Jerusalem was destroyed, the object of the destroyers unquestionably was to prevent any possibility of its reappearing in history in the character of a formidable and almost impregnable stronghold. The victors, accordingly, were careful to raze to the level (or, perhaps, in places even below the level) of the rock-plateau on which they stood, the stupendous walls that had enclosed and fortified the city. This overwhelming destruction, however, did not necessarily imply the complete demolition of the walls throughout their entire range, from their very foundations. And exactly on spots of supreme interest and importance to students and lovers of the Bible, the unconscious conquerors of Jerusalem would most readily permit the lowermost portions of the ancient walls to escape the general catastrophe. This is particularly the case with the walls that enclosed the southern and the western sides of the Temple area—the “Haram” of the modern city, shown in the shaded portion of the accompanying diagram (No. 1), of which the southern and the western walls in question would severally stand on the lines D E and E F. The foundations of these walls were scarped in the solid rock at a great depth below the level of the surface of that portion of the plateau of rock which the walls themselves were designed to enclose, within what may be designated as a facing of solid masonry. We have already seen (page 634) how Lieutenant Warren has followed the wall, at the angle E, downwards, nearly 100 feet below the present surface of the ground, till he came to the foundation on the solid rock. At angle E, and both to the east and to the north of it, the walls, from their rock-foundations upwards till they rise to the level of the enclosed Haram area, form a case to the rock itself; and, consequently, they could not take any part in the construction of fortifications, until they should be raised above the level of the rock which was thus enclosed within them and faced by them. The lower portions of these walls, accordingly, were left standing by their ancient destroyers, as the rock within them was left standing. And, it may be added, that the western enclosing-wall of the Haram—of the Temple area, that is, which is the wall on the line E F of the diagram No. 1—being a wall within the city, and, therefore, a wall which could at no time take any part in the circuit of the external defences, would naturally be regarded with less jealousy than the external walls themselves; and hence it is easy to be understood how it has come to pass that the lower portions of the wall E F, below the level of the Haram area, together with portions of ancient structures immediately connected with it, should be found still existing, and in such admirable preservation.

Here and there, near the present surface of the ground, the existing wall which encloses the Haram is partly constructed of blocks of stone of enormous magnitude, which indicate what “manner of stones” they were that were quarried and wrought into their noblest masonry by the masons and architects of Israel. And the indications thus given by the visible portions of the Haram walls, have been confirmed and developed in a truly remarkable manner by the explorations that Lieutenant Warren has carried on so successfully by means of his deep shafts and his prolonged galleries. Buried far out of sight, long forgotten, and yet all the time carefully preserved beneath the accumulations of ages, the grand old walls that alone were considered worthy to enclose the rock which should sustain the Temple still remain, in their ancient massive strength and solid magnificence, from their rocky foundations upwards, at one point almost to the height of 100 feet. The stones that form this wall vary from 3 feet to 4 feet 6 inches in height, and many of them are upwards of 20 feet in length. Close to the south-west angle (at c in diagram No. 1), one stone measures 38 feet 9 inches in length, by 10 feet in depth and 4 feet in height. The manner in which these gigantic blocks were dressed by the ancient masons, gave to masonry constructed with them a very bold, and, at the same time, a very peculiar appearance. The face of each stone, having been levelled, was either left rough, or so finely picked as to be almost smooth, or sometimes even chiselled over, according to the taste of the time or the amount of labour that the destination of each stone was considered to require for it; then a narrow border, or “draft,” in breadth from 2 to 6 inches, was chiselled round the four sides of each stone to the depth generally of from one-quarter to three-eighths of an inch, and wrought quite smooth. The term “bevelled” has been applied, but incorrectly to masonry constructed of stones having these marginal drafts, in advance of which the central area of each stone has a slight projection. “Lieutenant Warren found that in some of the lowest courses of the Haram wall, near the south-west angle, the stones differed from any that had been seen higher above the rock-foundation. Speaking of the buried courses of the masonry of the Haram wall near the south-west angle, which he had exposed, Lieutenant

Warren says: "The first three courses are similar to those above ground at this point, that is, they are great squared stones without bevells (or sunk drafts), in height about 3 feet 3 inches. The courses fourth to ninth appear to be similar to those at the Jews' Wailing-place, but the first five are very much worn, though their bevel can be distinguished: their height, 3 feet 9 inches. The face of the ninth course projects 3 inches beyond the draft. The tenth and remaining courses differ from any seen aboveground at the present day. The faces of the stones appear as when they were brought from the quarries, roughly dressed into three faces, and projecting in some cases 18 inches beyond their drafts, which are about 4 inches to 6 inches wide, and most beautifully worked. The stones are fitted together in the most marvellous manner, the joints being hardly discernible."

The extraordinary excellence of the workmanship bestowed upon these immense blocks of stone, and the admirable skill displayed in setting and fitting them together, are amongst the most remarkable characteristics of this magnificent old masonry; and they do not fail to bear a becoming testimony to the grandeur of the ideas entertained by the men, who could project and mature such a style of building as this.

The "draft" chiselled about the margins of the bevelled stones is shown in the annexed sketch (No. 2).

Brief but very significant notices of the true character of the "stones" that the explorers have found still forming the lower courses of the Haram walls, are given by the sacred historians. Thus, in 1 Kings, v. 17, 18, it is written: "And the king commanded, and they brought great stones, costly stones and hewed stones, to lay the foundation of the house. And Solomon's builders and Hiram's builders did hew them, and the stone-squarers." Again, in 1 Chron. xxii. 2, when making his preparations in anticipation of his son's building, David is said to have "set masons to hew wrought stones to build the house of God;" in the 15th verse of the same chapter also, "hewers and workers of stone" are particularly specified; and, in 1 Chron. xxix. 2, David declared to his people that, together with other precious and costly materials, he had prepared for the "holy house" that Solomon should build, "all manner of precious stones, and marble stones in abundance."

In like manner, when speaking of the Temple which he had "determined to build," Solomon himself said: "The house which I build is great: for great is our God above all gods." And again, in explanation to Hiram of Tyre of the magnitude of his own preparations, the wise king of Israel added — "for the house which I am about to build shall be wonderful great" (2 Chron. ii. 5—9). With true Oriental feeling, the surpassing grandeur of the sacred edifice was to be symbolised in the grand scale of the constructive masonry: the "holy house," that should be "wonderful great," could be built worthily only of blocks of stone of such wondrous size that the most simple-minded observer of them would involuntarily exclaim—"See what manner of stones are here!"

of stones are here!"

(Drawn by J. D. WATSON.)

“And now their journey endeth
Those broad old walls about.”—p. 742.

Whatever difference there may have been, both in architectural style and also in their dimensions, between Herod's Temple—the Temple of the New Testament, and the original Temple erected by Solomon, it may be accepted as certain that both edifices stood upon the same site, and that they differed from one another rather in their architecture than in their magnitude and grandeur. To both buildings, without doubt, the words of Solomon were equally applicable, since both certainly were "wonderful great." And this greatness becomes in no inconsiderable degree enhanced when the extent of Jerusalem itself is taken into consideration. Josephus tells us that Herod's Temple was a square, measuring 600 feet on each side; this would represent an edifice quite three times as large as our York Cathedral. At the present time the Haram area at Jerusalem contains 35 acres of ground, and is nearly one mile in circuit; and the area of the entire city, including the Haram, now is 209½ acres, or about one-third of a square mile. Thus the Haram now occupies one-sixth of the whole area of the city. If one-half only of the Haram area be assigned to the actual site of the Temple, that sacred edifice still would have occupied one-twelfth of the area of the present city. And Jerusalem within the walls certainly was not much larger than the present city, either in the time of Herod the Great, or at the earlier era of Solomon.

I may here give the exact measurements, taken in straight lines from angle to angle, of the walls of the Holy City as it now exists, such measurements, of course, not including any projections of the walls. These measurements, in straight lines, are: along the northern side, from A to B in the diagram No. 1, 3,930 feet; the eastern side, from A to D, 2,754 feet; the southern side, from D to C, 3,245 feet; and the western side, from B to C, 2,086 feet. Thus the whole circuit of the city walls, measured in straight lines from point to point, is 12,015 feet, or 4,005 yards—that is, 2½ miles and 45 yards. The longest diagonal line within the walls is from A to C, from north-east to south-west, and this measures 4,795 feet, or 162 yards less than one mile. The principal street, three-fifths of a mile in length, runs from the Damascus Gate in the north wall to the Zion Gate in the south wall, from H to K in the diagram.

(To be continued.)

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XLIII.

CAPTAIN JACK'S COURTSHIP.

THE best thing we can do, under the circumstances, Alicia, is to get married."

This bold proposition was made by Captain Jack, as he and the widow sat at breakfast.

"Considering how long I have been attached to you, Alicia," continued he, helping himself without stint to the good fare on the table, "and how faithful I have been, it seems to me as if it were the least thing you could do."

"Really, Captain Jack, I think you are more audacious than ever!" replied Mrs. Brooklyn, with a little giggle.

"I was always bold, my dear. Just hand me the mustard, will you? Thank you. Now then, when is it to be?"

"As if I had not a whole host of lovers!" cried the widow, still giggling.

"So much the worse for them, Alicia; and the better for me."

"That is as it happens, Captain Jack."

"Who are your lovers, Alicia? Sir Hugh Macbriar, of course. I always thought there was no end to that poor old gentleman's folly."

"Old gentleman, indeed!" exclaimed the widow, bridling, and nodding her head.

"When I knew him," said Captain Jack, calmly, "he was exactly ten years older than my father."

The widow bridled, and nodded furiously. Captain Jack took no notice.

"Wants a nurse—that's it, Alicia. Well, let him go to the hospital and find one!"

"Really, Captain Jack!" again began the widow; but he cut her short.

"Then I suppose there is another fellow on the carpet—a young man just on the eve of bankruptcy."

"I tell you what, Captain Jack——"

"Don't interrupt me, Alicia. I know what I'm about. His name is Raymond Sylvester."

The widow could not gainsay it.

"Well, his motive is apparent enough! It does not require any great shrewdness to see through him!"

"I am sure he is a very nice young man!" exclaimed the widow.

"Very nice! and his family are all very nice!" replied Captain Jack. I am told their debts are, perhaps, under fifty thousand. Of course, it would be a flea-bite to you."

"What do you mean? What have I to do with anybody's debts?" cried the widow, angrily.

"Only that when you marry a man, you would not like his family to be bankrupt, Alicia," said Captain Jack, with the utmost gravity.

The widow munched her toast in indignant silence.

"There has been no question of marrying," said she, at length; "only you are so very ridiculous!" and she broke off in a giggle.

"So much the better; because, you see, Alicia, it is my duty to protect you from those designing individuals, who are on the scramble to get your money. Now look at me. I want nobody's money; not I!" and he threw himself back in his chair, and folding his arms, sat—about as good-looking and audacious a specimen of humanity as could be found anywhere.

The widow could not forbear a little glance of admiration.

"My motives are as pure as the driven snow!" continued Captain Jack, waving his hand aloft. "I have loved you, Alicia, all my life. The moment I heard that you were free, I flew to your side. No matter whether you were rich or poor: I should have come all the same. It was you I wanted, Alicia—your own dear, beautiful, enchanting self; yes, it was you!"

Strange to say, the widow believed him. The effect of this little peroration was a gentle sigh, which sounded hopefully in the ears of Captain Jack.

"I am brave," continued Captain Jack, in the same high-flown manner. "I stand at nothing. I could board an enemy's ship amid a storm of bullets; I could stand at the cannon's mouth. But, alas! what can I do? The laws of our country forbid that I should shoot Mr. Sylvester through the head!"

"Mercy on us!" cried the widow, with a little scream.

"Which I would do for your sake, Alicia," added Captain Jack, tenderly.

"I am sure I want no bloodshed on my account. I am all for peace and quietness," said the widow, with another of those hopeful little sighs.

"That's right, Alicia, and so am I. ~~But~~ your heart, the British lion is as good-tempered a fellow as ever lived, when you don't run in his teeth!"

The widow thought it best here to munch her toast in silence.

"As for me," continued Captain Jack, again throwing himself into an attitude, "defeat is death, in a case like this. Here is my poor hand, Alicia. Take it, and I am blessed; refuse it, trample on my years of devotion, and I am gone—gone in the twinkling of an eye."

The widow looked up in alarm.

"Gone," continued Captain Jack, still in his most telling attitude, "to the Antipodes!"

"Really, Captain Jack——"

"From which bourne," continued Captain Jack, rhapsodically, "it is not likely that I shall ever return!"

"Oh, Captain Jack, pray don't go!" exclaimed Mrs. Brooklyn, clasping her hands, and becoming hysterical.

"Do you say so, Alicia, and will you take my hand?" cried he, stretching what he called his sun-burnt paw, out to her.

The widow blushed, and giggled, and cried a little, and was evidently very much wrought upon.

"Take it, Alicia, take it!" cried Captain Jack, tragically.

The widow giggled louder, but she did not make any movement.

"The Antipodes," continued Captain Jack, in the same tragic tone, "is, in fact, the farthest point on the terrestrial globe. When I have reached the Antipodes——"

"Oh, you must not go! I shall not let you!" cried Mrs. Brooklyn, in a voice of alarm, and approaching her hand just half-an-inch in the direction of the sun-burnt paw.

"Then you take my hand?"

"I did not say that. I have had no time," faltered the widow, looking down.

"Alicia, you have had heaps of time. What have you had but time?"

The hand approached still nearer.

"My feelings will not bear to be trifled with. There is no knowing what may be the result. I may shoot——"

The widow screamed again.

"Oh, pray don't shoot anybody!" cried she, eagerly, and approaching dangerously near to the precincts of the "paw."

In another minute her hand was in the grasp of Captain Jack.

"Bless you, Alicia!—bless you!" and he kissed it rapturously. "Then you will be Mrs. Jack?"

CHAPTER XLIV.

JOHN! JOHN!

"I THOUGHT the poor lad would be driven half crazy amongst ye."

This venomous little speech was aimed at Rachel by Dame Humphreys, who had brought her knitting, and was keeping Rachel company while her husband was away.

Rachel sat on the opposite side of the fire. Her work was in her lap. She had not the heart to answer Dame Humphreys.

"You see, it's not what he's been used to," continued the old lady, the pronoun it having no especial antecedent; "he's been used to things going easy like, and if he had but——"

She stopped. There was a look in Rachel's face which stopped her.

"Anyhow, he's sore cut up, and there's no knowing what turn he may take," concluded Dame Humphreys with a sniff.

Poor Rachel was sick and sore at heart. She had not so much fortitude as usual. Her troubles seemed to come upon her like a rushing torrent, and, for once, she burst out weeping.

Dame Humphreys was not a bad-hearted woman, in spite of her stings. She was alarmed at what she had done.

"I am sure I did not mean anything, Rachel," she began to say—a form of speech much in vogue among the stinging tribe of individuals. "Pray don't cry. But there, you're just worn out, that's what it is!"

Rachel dried her tears quickly. The least word of kindness made her forgive in a moment.

"I think I am worn out," said she, taking up her sewing with a trembling hand.

"I'm sure I am, what with John's worrets, and the trouble of his having to leave the farm, and the thing altogether. But there, it's no good greeting after spilt milk. We must e'en take it as we find it!"

Rachel's trembling hand went on with its work; but her heart was very sore indeed.

She could have met the trouble bravely in itself. The mere fact of the misfortune would not have unnerved her. But there was another shadow that flung its dark length upon her heart.

That was the real sorrow!

She would not whisper it to any one. When Miss Graham came, as she did, directly the news reached her, and when she said, as innocently as could be, "And your husband, I suppose he bears it bravely?" Rachel made an evasive answer. Not to her dearest friend would she have hinted the existence of any defalcation in John!

But in her heart she knew it! Between herself and her secret soul, the gaunt spectre stood up and proclaimed its existence. She knew she had been deceived in the character of the man in whom she had trusted. She knew he had been weighed in the balance, and found wanting.

These are sad crises in the lives of men and women, and it had come quick on Rachel!

But her heart was full of its first love. When, presently she heard him coming, she got up and hurried out to meet him.

"John, dear John."

Her voice was full of affection. She was so rejoiced to have him home. But her joy clouded over when she saw his face. She knew then, that he had come home a disappointed man. She did not say so. She slid her hand into his, and they walked in silence to the house.

He might have spoken. It would have been kinder. But the expression of his face was that of black and sullen dejection. Even the sight of his mother did not rouse him. And when, at length, he did speak, he cursed his ill-fortune, and used language that made both the women tremble.

Dame Humphreys looked pale and frightened, and cried a little, and gathered up her knitting to go home. She had no moral influence with her son, or it might have stood in some stead at this juncture. As it was, she thought only of getting out of his way.

When she was gone, and John's passion had expended itself, Rachel hoped he would be himself again; but her hope was not realised. He sat brooding and sullen. He would not tell her anything, except that the London lawyers had made a fool of him. He would not eat, though she set food before him. And then he declared that he would go to Newbury, and have it out with one or other of them!

By "them," he meant either Isaacs or the Sylvesters. Rachel would have stopped him. She would have put her arms round him, and held him, while she prayed and besought him to be calm. But her strength failed her. A faintness came over her when the danger was the most imminent.

Perhaps he did not see it, or it might have been the turning-point when the wave of misery began to recede. As it was, he went out, and Rachel was left alone.

If ever she had felt deserted, it was now. For a time she wept abundantly. Then she laid herself on the little sofa, and rested her aching head on the cushion. She thought he would soon come back. She thought his passion would soon be cooled; and she did not apprehend any worse evil than what had happened in his leaving her. When it grew dark, she lighted the lamp, and took down a well-worn volume, and began to read. It was the volume in which Rachel had long been used to look for comfort—her Bible.

She was greatly comforted as she read. They who tamper with the Scriptures, little think of the mourners who must go away unconsoled, should these waters of comfort be dried up.

It was getting late, but John did not come. Surely he would not leave her all night alone? Should she go to his mother's and inquire? But it was eleven o'clock, and Dame Humphreys went to bed at nine. And if she were to go, and John were to return meanwhile? Besides, the night was dark and rainy. She had gone outside the door to listen. How silent and dreary it was! She called "John! John!" as if she would bring him back. But no John answered.

It grew later and later still. The clock struck—one—two—three—four. Rachel sat and heard it. Still John did not come!

How very terrible it was to sit there alone, hour after hour, a prey to every imaginable conjecture. Her fire had gone out, and she shivered; and it was dark. Still she sat on—listening, watching, waiting. Would the morning never come? Heaven only knows how she passed through that night!

But it came at last, the first blessed streak of dawn! Now she could see the familiar objects round her. Now it was day; and the day rarely fails to bring hope, even to the most wretched.

Oh, how unlike the mornings that used to be!—the bright fire, the clean hearth, the cheerful breakfasts. Now, what confusion—what desolation—what despair!

She got up, and tied on her bonnet. Her limbs were cramped—her head ached. A kind of numbness had come over her. But she sped along, as swiftly as her feet could carry her.

Soon she had reached Newbury. A few minutes after, she was at Dame Humphreys's door. She opened it. Her nerves were strung up to the highest tension. She called out, in a shrill, eager voice, "John! John!"

Surely he would come to her. It was cruel and wicked to have left her. But she would forgive all—forget all—so she might once more see his face, hold him in her arms, and feel that he was safe.

It was quite early, and Dame Humphreys was still in bed. When she heard the cry she got up quickly, and throwing a shawl round her, opened the door and looked. The face she saw was Rachel's, as she stood in the passage: and she knew something was sorely amiss, to make Rachel look like that.

In a few minutes she had hurried down-stairs. She guessed, by the kind of intuition that happens to people at such times, what it was Rachel wanted. Ere Rachel had time to speak, she had said, "No, no; he is not here! I have not seen him! He is not here," repeated she; for Rachel's eyes were glancing into every corner, as though she disbelieved it—as though John must be there!

When the whole truth stared her in the face, with all the evil suggestions belonging to it—when she knew that her husband was not there, then her strength, almost her very life, seemed to fail her. She sank down, and became for a few moments unconscious. She was roused by the outcries of Dame Humphreys: for Dame Humphreys had not the self-control that she had. Even in this dire distress, Rachel, as by instinct, assumed the character of comforter. When her agitation had subsided enough to let her, she proposed that she should go back to her home.

"He may be come," she said, her heart misgiving her while she said it—"he may be come."

She hurried away; her poor aching feet could hardly bear her along; but she made shift to reach her once happy home. There, it was all desolate and lonely. Everything was just as she had left it. The fireless hearth, the neglected room, the silence, the dreariness, caused her a bitter pang. No; he had not been! As if impelled by the anguish of suspense, she called out his name again and again; but he did not answer: he had not come back!

CHAPTER XLV.

"HE MIGHT POSSIBLY BE A MURDERER."

JOHN HUMPHREYS left his own home in no very pleasant state of mind. He had not done well, or wisely, in letting misfortune goad him into a kind of madness. He had better have met it bravely, and like a man. He hurried on, scarcely knowing what purpose he had in view, or on whom he should first wreak his vengeance: for vengeance was in his heart, like a black drop that poisoned his whole moral system.

"If I could meet with him, I'd just give him a piece of my mind," muttered he, as he strided along; and the him, in this case, referred solely to Raymond Sylvester.

It even occurred to him, at this late hour, to attempt to bully Raymond into a concession. He had not strided along any considerable time, before he came in sight of the house on the common. Then, I grieve to say, his rage seemed to get the mastery over him. He clenched his fist, and muttered furious words, and was as much unlike the kindly, genial John Humphreys of better days, as possible. Revenge is an ugly companion for a man to take to his bosom!

It was a lonely spot where he stood. There was the bare, bleak common, without a creature in sight. The road that wound by, at a distance, was lonely too. Few persons passed by that way. Yet, as John Humphreys looked, one solitary individual was approaching. He scarce noticed the circumstance at first. But when the individual came nearer, a strange light leaped into his eye, a strange expression came into his face; for here, solitary, unprotected, and at his mercy, was Raymond Sylvester. He stood and waited. There was a gate close by, and he went and leaned against it, his arms folded. He fancied, if Raymond saw him, he would turn out of the way. Much did he know of the Sylvesters!

Nearer he came and nearer. John could see him now, quite plainly. Yes, it was Raymond!

The light blazed fiercely in the eyes of John Humphreys; but he tried to be calm. When Raymond was close at hand, he stepped forward and confronted him. He thought Raymond would be alarmed, and seek, at once, to make terms. But Raymond merely raised his eyes—they had been fixed on the ground, as if he were thinking intently, and said, "Good night to you."

Then he would have passed, without caring for an answer; but John Humphreys had planted himself in his way.

Would he be alarmed now? Would he scent mischief? I think not. A look of irritation came into his face. There was all the imperious ring in his voice, as he said, "Will you stand out of my road?"

"No, sir," replied John, in a tone it was impossible to mistake; "no, sir; not till you've listened to what I have to say."

"What is it?"

The proud head was never raised more proudly. Fear! There was not an atom of it.

In spite of himself, John felt it was hard dealing with the Sylvesters. Force might have met with force, and grappled with it; but the unquenchable light of that dark eye made him quail. Did he think he could bully Raymond? Never was there a greater mistake! "I shall settle the matter when I please. I shall not be dictated to by you, John Humphreys!" and the mouth was set like iron.

What could he do but let him pass? He was furious, but he was held in check. There was a something opposed to him, harder than adamant, and that he could not deal with, with all his *thw*s and sinews. It was mind against matter.

By this time it was getting dark, and perhaps some thought of home softened him. Perhaps he remembered Rachel, and his heart smote him. At any rate, he had turned towards the place where Rachel was. The road was still lonely; but one other individual was in sight—not Raymond, he had gone his way unscathed. The person now in view was Isaacs.

The black drop began to bubble up again. The dignity of the Sylvester had been his safeguard. But Isaacs had no dignity about him; he was on John Humphreys's own level.

"Well, Humphreys, a pleasant night to night! Going home?"

"Yes, I am going home."

John spoke in a surly tone; but the other did not take warning.

"Got anything out of him?" and he pointed with his thumb in the direction taken by Raymond.

John made no answer.

"I'd have done some business, if I'd been you. Bless you! surely you weren't afraid of him."

"Mr. Isaacs," said John, trying to speak calmly, "I am going this way, and you was going that. Perhaps you'll hold to your first plan, will you?"

"Not exactly. You see, I want a word or two on business. There's no getting sight of you now-a-days."

John held his peace.

"About the sale of your furniture," began Mr. Isaacs, coolly.

John made a quick movement forwards. It was getting very dark, or the man might have seen the extent of his folly.

"Mr. Isaacs, I tell you plainly, I am not in the mood for business. Let me alone, will you?"

Again John quickened his pace; but the burly man kept close at his heels.

"It is your own fault, John Humphreys. All you had to do, was to hand me over the money. You could not expect me to be the loser."

"And what have I lost, pray?" asked John, in a suppressed tone; "house, and home, and everything!"

The burly man laughed.

John turned round upon him. The expression of his face was getting dangerous.

The burly man laughed again.

"You've no pluck, that's where it is. Now, if it had been me——"

"Mr. Isaacs," cried John, fiercely, "you had best not hang on to me. My blood is up."

"Nonsense! Do you think I am such a coward as you are?"

Coward! The word fell like a live coal on tinder. All the pent-up fury blazed forth.

John Humphreys had been a peaceful, well-conducted man, from his youth up. He had never raised his hand against his fellow, or broken any of the laws of human society. But human nature is frail, and it is not wise to tamper with evil.

The Scripture says, "Resist the devil, and he will flee from you." John had not resisted, and, for the moment, he was in the power of the Evil One.

And now see what follows.

There was a blow struck fiercely, and without reflection or warning. There was a sound of something falling heavily to the ground, and then there was a silence more appalling than can be described: for in the silence something whispered to John that he might possibly be a murderer!

(To be continued.)

"FALLEN THROUGH A ROCK."

PART I.

LITTLE boy and girl were at play on the sea-shore, gathering shells and pebbles, and building wonderful castles of sand, which, when raised to a certain elevation, were sure to slide slowly down, leaving only a sandy mound to mark where they had been; like the hopes of more mature years, often built on less substantial foundations, which glide from our grasp as soon as formed.

The boy was about eight years old, his sister two years younger. Being at length tired of their quiet play, and forgetting that they had been desired by their mother not to go out of sight of the house, they ran along the shore for a long way, pursuing one another, until they found themselves further from home than they had ever before been in the same direction. After a long time the level strand ceased, and they were obliged to ascend a bank gradually leading to the verge of high cliffs, down which the children feared to look, lest their heads should become giddy.

The clouds grew dark, but in the excitement of the race they did not observe the increasing gloom, until a few heavy drops of rain warned them that it was time to seek shelter. Immediately they turned, and tried to retrace their steps; but having wandered so far, it was now impossible to discover the path which led towards their home, and soon they lost themselves amongst the huge cliffs and rocks overhanging the sea, whose waves raged and foamed beneath in a terrific manner.

"Edward," said Helen to her brother, "what shall we do? Everything looks dark and frightful, and we are not getting nearer home."

"I do not like that low moaning sound from the sea," replied Edward. "Let us sit down under this great rock, and think what we shall do next."

Accordingly they seated themselves under a shelving rock, which afforded some shelter from the rain, now falling in torrents.

"Oh! how I wish we were at home," cried little Helen. "Will it soon be over, Edward?"

"I do not know," he answered; "but I wonder where we are, and which is the way back."

"Call out very loud; perhaps some one would hear, and take us home."

"No, Helen, the winds and waves are making such a noise, no one could possibly hear our call; but don't be frightened, I'll protect you, and when the storm is over, we'll try to find our way among the rocks; but, indeed, I do wish we had remembered what mamma told us, and not left the beach where she said we might play."

As he spoke, a loud peal of thunder crashed overhead, and reverberated among the surrounding cliffs. Helen, in an agony of fear, threw herself into her brother's arms, and burst out crying. He tried to comfort her as well as he could, but did not feel very happy himself as to their situation. Presently a vivid flash of lightning was seen, then another and louder peal of thunder rolled above. Helen trembled violently.

"Oh! dear Edward, do let us hide from it, it is so terrible."

He rose, and taking her hand, they left their place of shelter. Wearily they clambered the slippery rocks, each moment fearing to see another fiery flash, or hear the awful roll of the thunder. On, on, vainly supposing they could fly from the tempest which was raging around them, over barriers which at another time they dared not have crossed, until their way was impeded by some broken branches of trees, thrown down in an apparently careless manner between two rocks. Edward advanced and hastily pulled some of them aside, in order to make room for his little sister to pass, when a few loose stones on which he stood gave way beneath his feet, and he disappeared through a chasm between the rocks. Helen heard his scream as he fell, and saw him vainly clutch at the branches, which broke in his grasp, and in a moment he was gone from her sight. So quickly did it all occur, that she only knew he was in danger by that scream, which long afterwards rang in her ears.

She called as loudly as she could, "Edward! Edward! where are you? Oh! come up again to Helen! What shall I do without you, and where—where are you gone?"

It was useless; her cries were drowned by the noise of the tempest. She advanced as near the fatal spot as she dared venture, and saw an opening in the rock partially concealed by branches and brushwood laid across the top, on which were placed a few loose stones. She was too much frightened to attempt looking down this horrid pit, but continued calling her brother's name, until, becoming more and more terrified as she felt herself utterly alone, she set off in the opposite direction from that by which they had come. Each succeeding peal of thunder caused her to quicken her pace. She scrambled over the slippery rocks as fast as her trembling limbs would carry her, often stumbling and falling, until, at length, fairly exhausted, she sank down, exposed to the pitiless rain and storm.

How long she lay in this condition, she could not tell. It might have been several hours before her father found and carried her home, in a state of insensibility.

But Edward—where was he? Every search was made. His father and uncle (at whose house he was staying at the time of this unhappy occurrence), having left Helen to the care of her mother, renewed the search, sending messengers in all directions, until the darkness of the night obliged them to desist. The last hope was that, when Helen should be sufficiently recovered to speak, she would be able to give some account of the fate of her brother, or some clue which might lead to the discovery of his place of concealment, though it was much feared he had fallen from one of the high cliffs.

When the party of searchers arrived at home they found the little girl much better. She had had a refreshing sleep during their absence, and was able to sit up in bed; but her eyes still had a frightened expression, and her cheeks were flushed with the feverish glow which usually follows a chill and excitement, such as she had gone through. Her father eagerly questioned her with regard to Edward. She related, pretty accurately, how they had forgotten their mother's prohibition, and left their play on the sandy beach, and had been running races, until they strayed so far they could not find the way back; and then she ended with—

"Oh, papa! it was a terrible storm—great heavy rain, and such bright lights, and fearful noise! We ran away to hide. It seemed as if the rock we leaned against would fall and crush us; and when we ran, Edward fell into a rock."

"What do you mean? Did he fall over a rock into the sea? Speak, child!"

But Helen was frightened at her father's vehement manner; she thought she had displeased him, and not having yet recovered the terrors she had endured that day, she commenced sobbing and crying most bitterly. It was long before she could be sufficiently pacified to be spoken to again on the subject, at least with any hope of receiving an intelligible answer. At length her father resumed, in a soothing tone—

"Where did poor Edward fall, dear?"

"He fell through a rock," she murmured; "through branches and stones, down into a hole in the middle of a great rock."

And this was all the information they could gain of the lost boy. When further questioned, she still repeated the words, "He fell through a rock." His friends could only understand this to mean that he had fallen from one of the cliffs; but vain were all their efforts to discover the truth. Helen was brought to the place where she had been found, and shown all the neighbouring rocks, in the hope of ascertaining the spot where her brother had disappeared so mysteriously; but she failed to recognise the place. No branches or stones were to be seen in the position she had described, nor anything at all resembling an opening in the rock. Edward's fate, therefore, still remained in uncertainty. Each day his parents dreaded to hear that his body had been found washed in by the waves, or lying, a shapeless mass, under some gigantic cliff; but they were obliged to remain in a state of suspense, until, as time passed on, all hope of his existence entirely ceased.

Little Helen drooped for a time, her health became delicate, and her joyous laugh was seldom heard as of old; but by degrees she recovered her usual strength and spirits: for sorrow at her age is but short lived. At the end of the summer she, with her parents, left her uncle's house, not having received the slightest intelligence of Edward, and returned to their own now sad and desolate home.

And where was the lost one all this time? As Helen said, he had fallen through a rock. How terrible was the sensation of descending, helplessly, through that deep, dark chasm; but ere he reached the bottom of the abyss, he felt himself seized in a rough grasp, and thus saved the violence of the shock. He was placed on firm footing; but, for a few moments, was so bewildered, he was unable to stand without being upheld by the powerful arm in which he had been caught. At length he became conscious of a dim light glimmering through the obscurity, and several figures moving about; also, a number of large bales of goods, piled round the walls of the cavern—for a cavern it was into which he had fallen, and one well adapted to the purpose for which it was used. At one side, a narrow and winding passage led to an outlet, about halfway up a steep cliff, hidden by a shelving rock, which overhung the sea. A rope ladder, which could be hauled up or lowered at pleasure by those within, gave easy access to the cavern, from a boat at high water. The opening at the top was used by the smugglers for lowering large bales of contraband goods, which they were in the habit of secreting there. One man was, in the first instance, let down in the same way, in order to be ready to fling the rope ladder to those in the boat.

As Edward, in a bewildered state, leaned helplessly against his preserver, he was startled by hearing a rough voice exclaim, in angry tones—

"This comes of leaving the top of the cave open. How often have I ordered it to be closed, after each load is lowered?"

"Well, captain," replied one of the men, "we made it up, as well as we could in a hurry, with branches and stones. The storm was so bad, we thought no one would be passing, and it takes more hands than we had to heave that large piece of rock."

"Go," replied the captain, with an oath, "four of you, and put the cap on the hole quickly. Where that boy came from there are more, never fear; he didn't come alone."

With these words he advanced, and, in a threatening manner, demanded, "How came you here, boy? and who was with you?"

"I fell down through the rock," faltered Edward. "My little sister was with me. We lost our way, and were trying to run from the storm. I was pulling away some branches to let her come on, when I fell, and came down here."

"Where is your sister now?"

"Oh! I do not know, I am sure. She will never find her way. Please put me up again, that I may help her to get home."

"How old is she?"

"Just six years."

"Will she do us any harm, think you, men?"

"No," replied the man against whom Edward leaned; "she is too young."

"Did she see where you fell, boy?"

"I think not, for she was not very near me; but she will wonder where I am. Perhaps she has gone on running—she was so frightened at the thunder—and I shall not be able to overtake her. Oh! take me up quickly, or she will be lost!"

"I don't think it's all safe," said the captain, addressing his men. "When you go to replace the stone, take a look about for the child, and bring her here, if you find her; that will be the surest way, for children of six can talk. Off with you at once. What are you standing gaping at the child for, as if he was a wonder?"

The men left the cave, and soon were heard overhead, moving the large slab of rock over the opening, so as effectually to conceal all traces of its existence. As soon as they had accomplished their task, they rejoined their comrades in the interior of the cavern.

"And now," said the captain, "what is to be done with this boy?"

"Fling him down the cliff!" said a savage voice. "He must not be let live, or we are ruined."

"Perhaps the young one wouldn't prate," said the man beside whom he stood, and who had continued to support him all this time. "I'll be bound he never could find his way here again if we let him off."

"Stuff and nonsense, Bill!" answered another voice. "Do you think the child's a fool, or a dummy? He'd talk, surely, and show the very spot he fell down; or, if he couldn't do that now the stone is on, he'd let out there was such a place about here. Isn't he listening to us now? doesn't he know about the hole? and hasn't he seen everything here? I say with Joe, he mustn't live."

"Fling him down the cliff," repeated Joe, "and have done with him!"

"It might be dangerous," said the captain. "How do you know his body wouldn't drift in, and be found?"

"They'd think he fell in of himself," growled Joe.

"No, no!" replied the captain. "I have kept clear of blood so long: I'm not going to begin now; and with a child, too!"

"Well, then, captain, if you won't chuck the brat over, I say the safest way is to leave him where he is, when we go off to-morrow."

"Ay, ay!" said every voice but one; "that's the plan! We'll have nothing to do with killing him; he'll die soon enough of himself; and his bones will tell no tales."

"Well," observed Joe, "I wouldn't be the first man to come in, in the dark, when we return with the next cargo."

"Ho, ho! Are you turning coward? Afraid the child's bones would jump at you, eh?" and there was a savage laugh at Joe, who had never been known to express a fear of anything before.

Bill was silent. He laid Edward down in a corner; and, after having extinguished the lights, they all lay down to take a few hours' sleep.

Edward cowered, trembling, on the rocky floor of the cabin; until, at length, worn out with terror and fatigue, he also fell into an uneasy slumber.

(To be concluded in our next.)

THE QUIVER

— Saturday, August 15, 1868. —

(Drawn by G. J. PINWELL.)

"There was hardly a patch that had not its associations."—p. 755.

THE HOUSE THAT JACK BUILT.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MARY POWELL."

SO this is the house that Jack built?" said I, meditatively, as I paused and looked at it from the gate.

Jack had early developed an original character.

At three years old, he was seen hard at work in his little garden, and, being asked what he was about, replied, he was digging a pit-hole to bury his aunt. Whether this was with malicious and murderous intent, or from simple imitativeness of the sexton, did not appear; but, probably, the latter.

His next memorable not was more consistent with our usual ideas of benevolence. Hearing his grandfather lament that he was going to be turned out of his house, "Never mind, grandpapa," said he, "I'll build a house with a room for you in it."

"Oh, indeed," said his grandfather, stroking his head, and chuckling; "I hope I may be able to wait for it."

Thenceforth Jack's house became a frequent source of family wit. "Oh, that will be when Jack's house is built!" was tantamount to saying, "When to-morrow comes," or "when the sky falls in," or "when it rains cats and dogs and pitchforks."

The aunt for whose demise Jack had so considerably prepared, had a little girl named Frances, a few years his junior; and these two were great confidants and confederates. Seeing her busily engaged in manufacturing a patchwork quilt, he told her that if she was a good girl, and looked sharp, maybe it would be finished in time for his new house. Frances devoutly believed in this house; and, many a time, sitting side by side on the grass, or on the hearthrug, with their heads close together, did they confabulate on how many rooms it should have, what the furniture should be, and what the style of housekeeping. Puddings every day seemed to be the principal item.

One day Jack found Frances with her dewy eyes surcharged with tears, over a half-sheet of paper, which, to keep her quiet, had been given her to write a letter. She neither knew how to write or to spell: Jack had attained a little proficiency in both; so, with his right arm round her neck, and his right hand guiding her fat little fingers, while his left steadied the paper, he helped her to complete an epistle of two or three lines; and a pretty picture they would have made at it.

At an early age Jack was transferred from the dame-school to the grammar-school, where, in due course, such were his abilities and good behaviour, that he became head-boy. His master, with whom he was a favourite, taught him not only the rudimentary branches of education, but drawing, mapping, trigonometry, and land-surveying. His father being a builder of good repute, these acquirements promised to be very useful to him; and he went through the Latin Grammar too.

Frances now saw much less of Jack, and their relations were less confidential, for he had grown fonder of boys than of girls, and was addicted to rough games; but she kept on at her counterpane. One day Jack saw her at it, and said—

"That's for my house, isn't it?"

"Yes, if you like," said Frances. "I thought you'd forgotten all about it."

"Oh, no; only I don't talk about things. The boys would laugh at me."

"Am I to live with you?" said Frances, timidly.

"Yes, to be sure. That is, if my aunt will let you. But, perhaps, she won't."

"I wonder if she will," said Frances, pensively. Then she asked him to make her a new pattern of a hexagon, because the old one was worn out; and he got his compasses and a card, and did it in superior style.

To her great regret, she soon had to remove with her mother into a new neighbourhood, a few miles off; and strong was the pang to her young heart when she had to say "good-bye" to Jack. For his part, he was jolly; but seeing her cast a wistful look back at him, like a young Chryseis, he bawled out, "Keep on at the counterpane," which much consoled her.

They saw no more of each other for many months, and meanwhile Jack grew into quite a big boy, and was very helpful to his father. When they met at Christmas, Frances sidled up to him, hoping for a renewal of the old entente cordiale. She found at once that he now considered himself all but a man, and her but a child. He was even so derogatory as to give her a little chuck under the chin, saying, "Well, old woman, how are you?" and turned away without waiting for an answer.

Frances's mild nature was outraged; I will not say she resolved to pay him out some future day, for she was too guileless and forgiving to be capable of such a thought; but she was wounded, for she knew she was neither old nor a woman, and that before she could be an old woman, she would be a young one; and she felt it was no matter to Jack whether she were an old woman or not. So there was a certain distance between them: she never so much as named counterpane or house; and as for Jack, his great passion now was for reading such books as "Self-Help," "Lives of Engineers," "Library of Entertaining Knowledge," and "Robinson Crusoe." He read the grammar-school master's library through and through, and invested every spare shilling in cheap editions of popular classics in wretchedly small print.

Eighteen months passed, and effected considerable difference in both. John had grown tall, and broad, and stout, and strong, and was a valuable help to his father, and cared very little for womankind. Frances had sprung up into an exceedingly pretty girl, and, having spent some time with a cousin who was a dressmaker, knew all about the fashions, carried herself well, and was more self-possessed. When she and Jack next met, and he was struck dumb by her altered appearance, it was she who began the attack, by crying, gaily—

"Well, Jack, what about the house?"

"Oh," said he, in some confusion, "I'd forgotten all about it. I've other things to think of now."

"Yes, and so have I," said she, alertly. But she collected patches, all the same, of her female acquaintance, whenever opportunity offered.

"How much less you talk, Jack," said she, "than you used to do!"

"I'll tell you what it is, Fan," said he; "I'm unsettled about my future course. My father wants me to be his partner some of these days, and I know it would be a very good thing for me; but I want to see a little of life first."

"I'm sorry you are going to be unsteady," said Frances.

"There you go now," said Jack, "just like a woman. Flying off at a tangent, with only half an idea in your head. I'm not going to be unsteady; I like sticking to business, but I don't want to be always in one groove, as my father and grandfather have been. I should like to look at the trade in other places——"

"Other parts of England?"

"Ay, and abroad. Now, Frances, why should you be ready to cry? I should come to no harm; it would do me good, if my father would let me try it."

"You won't go without his leave?"

"I hope I know my duty better. So don't look dismal about it."

There was a very good opening in Australia just then, which Jack had heard talked of, and this it principally was which had unsettled him. He was becoming restless and discontented, when something happened which was a great blow to the whole family.

The timber-yard caught fire one windy night, and there being a scarcity of water, and the nearest fire-engine being out of order, not only all the timber was burned, but the house caught fire too, and the family escaped with little but their lives. Jack's father was a ruined man, for he was not insured, and nearly all his substance was gone. The shock was so great to Jack's mother—whom he carried from her bed in his arms, wrapped in a blanket—that she hardly seemed likely to live. Things were as bad as they well could be; but relations and friends came forward to help them in their distress, and though their help was not great, their sympathy was most acceptable. One offered them shelter till they could see their way a little; others advanced small sums of money; Jack's father was energetic, and sure he should by degrees be again able to support himself. Meantime, it was decided that Jack could not do better than go to Australia; and thus the desire of his heart was accomplished with his parents' full concurrence, instead of in defiance of their wishes. What a good thing he waited for it!

Some years passed. Jack thrived, and sent home money. Meanwhile Frances lost her mother, and went to live with an uncle in the seafaring line. The poor girl was not very happy. She had no one near her to sympathise with her much—most of her time was passed quite alone—she never heard anything of Jack. Now and then the fancy would take her to spread the patchwork counterpane on her bed and muse over it—there was hardly a patch that had not its associations, sweet or bitter.

"Fan, when do you mean to marry?"

"When my counterpane is finished, uncle," she would say; but she took care not to finish it, any more than Penelope would finish her web.

"Fan, you'll die an old maid, if you snub all the young fellows so."

"I shan't mind. I prefer being with you."

She had quite made up her mind that Jack must by this time have found himself a wife, and had settled down for good in Australia, and she felt sad and forsaken; but she did not blame him, neither would she forget him.

One stormy January—we generally have storms in January—there was an unusually heavy gale, which caused lamentable shipwrecks and disasters at sea. All the people of the fishing village where Frances lived were out on the cliffs or on the sands, to render assistance if they could to a large ship which drove ashore at the mouth of the bay. Some sailors escaping from the wreck in their boat, had nearly landed, when it capsized, and they were all carried out to sea by a receding wave. Every one was immediately engaged in succouring those who could swim. Not only were heroic deeds done by the mariners, but their good clergyman caused a rope and lantern to be fastened round his waist, and had himself let down the face of a sheer precipice, and by his exertions saved fourteen lives.

The women were not behindhand. One old woman, whose husband was old and past work, but who had gone out that night as pilot to the wrecked ship and been drowned, received into her house, at the very time this sad news was brought her, five shipwrecked sailors, whom she clothed and fed.

Frances, whose bonnet had been blown away, leaving her long, fair hair streaming in the wind, flew to help some other women who, with a rope and lantern, were pulling one of the shipwrecked crew up the rocks. They succeeded; the poor, drenched fellow, his clothes torn to ribbons, was safely raised and set on his feet. He staggered, and looked around, bewildered. Frances gave a scream of joy. "Oh, Jack! is it you!" she exclaimed.

Jack caught her in his arms, thereby wetting her all through, and eagerly kissed her. "To think of your saving me, Fan!" said he. She did not try to save any more after drawing that prize; there were plenty of assistants left to look after the others. Sobbing and laughing, she led him home to her uncle's, made a rousing fire, supplied him with dry clothes to put on while she made him something hot; and, by the time her uncle returned, they were seated by the fire, happier than they had ever yet been in their lives.

Jack had been true to her all along—his affections had never wavered; but he thought it no good to speak or to write about it while he had his fortune to make. He had made it, now—which is to say, he had realised enough to make a new start in business at home, in the old style, with a house and wife of his own.

"As to waiting till I'd got enough to keep my carriage and live like a lord," said he, "I had no notion of doing that. What should you and I do in a carriage? We would much rather go on foot. And if I had waited to double my earnings, who knows but what you would have married, meantime?—there would have been a pretty job!"

"No, Jack, there was no danger of that."

Her uncle took his pipe from his mouth for a moment, and said to Jack, with an expressive look, "It's not been for want of asking. She'd have nothing to say to 'em—leastways, till she'd finished her counterpane, which she's took good care never to finish."

Next day, Jack hurried off to see his father, who had safely received all his remittances, and banked them. How joyful the meeting was, need not be said. Jack was no prodigal son, who had wasted his substance with riotous living, but a real good son, who had lain hard, fared hard, and worked hard for his father, as much as for himself. The foundations of a new business, much on the scale of the old one, were soon and prosperously laid, and Jack, in the very first instance, told his father that he was engaged to marry Frances—the dear, good girl who had waited for him all these long years, and pulled him up the cliff with a rope. Every one thought it just and fitting, and the very least that he could do; so there was nobody to forbid the banns.

Thirdly, Jack accomplished the early wish of his heart, which had accompanied him through life: he built himself a house. "How often," said he, "when camping out in the bush with no bed, no food, no water, no tobacco, have I lain on the hard ground, with a little hollow scooped out for my hips, and diverted myself all night by planning my house, even to the minutest details, till I felt neither hunger nor thirst, nor cold nor sorrow! The fancy sketch would not have been complete, without the 'maiden all forlorn' yonder, to take the head of the establishment."

I burst out laughing, for Mrs. Jack was as unlike a forlorn specimen of womanhood as could possibly be imagined; and she laughed too, and looked prettier than ever. They took me all over the house that Jack built, which certainly was the completest thing of the kind I ever knew.

A WORD UPON SLIPPERY PLACES.

BY THE REV. W. M. STATHAM.

SLIDES on the pavement may be exceedingly amusing to the juvenile community, but they are intensely annoying to ordinary wayfarers. To fall on your back with a sharp smack, to lose your hat and your spectacles, to afford amusement to the bystanders, and to have that momentary flash of sparks in your eyes, which is the accompaniment of a sudden crack on the skull—all this is more than unpleasant: it is dangerous. But far away up the pass of the "Mer de Glace," whilst, in a more dignified sense, walking on ice, you have a danger of another kind—one which, whilst it braces your nerves, and keeps alive all your faculties, has death lurking behind it—death, grim, cold, and awful! Bodies sleep now in silent places, the white snow their shroud, and the descending avalanche the covering of the graves of travellers lost on the ice.

Very often has Alpine climbing been made use of as a symbol of the Christian's pilgrimage. The Christian wayfarer always walks on ice, and has need evermore to use with frequency and fervency that beautiful prayer, "Hold up my goings in thy paths, that my footsteps slip not." Most difficult is it to preserve our foothold, and, as the apostle says, "having done all, to stand." Paul had seen so many fractured souls, so many dashed to pieces on the slopes of self-indulgence, that he looked upon the persistent course of a finished Christian life with thanksgiving and joy.

He who walks on ice should ever walk circumspectly—should remember that up the mountain-steep of his pilgrimage there are very many concealed crevasses, where others have fallen and perished. This life ascent onward and upward, so full of dangers, is apt to be entered on carelessly, because it is sometimes supposed to be an easy thing to be a Christian. There are those who, instead of stimulating to watchfulness and prayer, rather hush anxiety by injecting into other minds the notion that safety is secured apart from personal endeavours after the Divine life. Just as if the mariner letting the vessel drift whither the winds and tides bore her, might feel assured of safely reaching the port at last; and just as if the guides carried men up the Alps, instead of being the leaders who it is the travellers' painstaking duty to follow. Christ, who is "the way, the truth, and the life," has left us an example that we should follow in his steps. Thus it is that God will bless our endeavours, but not our idleness. The toil of the upward pilgrimage must not be eased, inasmuch as we are made perfect through trials and sufferings.

Slight trips are dangerous in this slippery way; the downward path is so easy for us all. The first thing for every traveller to do, is to bind the strong cord of Divine truth about his loins—to ask the great Leader of souls to hold him up, and keep him safe, so that he may be able to say: "When my foot well-nigh slipped, thy mercy, O Lord, held me up."

Accumulative evidence is to be found in the memoranda of every man's experience, that the path of human life is very dangerous. The Bible, in warning us of the slippery places, has its handmaid in human experience. We have all seen many maimed, and some destroyed, on the slippery slopes of pride, vanity, covetousness, sensuality, and vice. The young Christian, like the venturesome mountain-climber in early ages, has sometimes too much enthusiasm patiently to learn; but a little more experience will show that the utmost vigilance is necessary to preserve the soul from the perils of temptation.

He who watches a fleet of vessels put out to sea, may well wonder how many will reach the desired haven safely. He who watches the exploring expedition—whether it be McClintock by sea, or Livingstone by land—may well wonder whether they will attain the wished-for end; and he who watches the beautiful beginnings of the Divine life in the young, may well wonder how many will endure unto the end.

Though the whole of our path to heaven is slippery, it is abundantly evident that some places are more slippery than others; and it may be well to keep our attention on some of these.

Slippery places are our successful places. Adversity makes us wary and watchful. We keep our eye open for the rocks and breakers in the storm. We store our bag with precepts and promises, and toil diligently with the staff up the rugged way. The rain is heavy, the heavens are black, and friends are few—we then depend on God—we then are instant in prayer. But success means a clear day, a crisp air, and a bright sky; with the life-blood bounding instead of crawling through our veins. Prosperity banishes despondency, and often blinds us to duty. We try to do without God! He is not in all our thoughts. Less anxiety makes us feel less dependent; less fear makes us less watchful. We are cheerful, and self-reliant; and the toilers up the hill behind us, hear the merry echoes which accompany our joyous march. We get a check now and then, however; for as we read God's Word, we see two vultures seated on the dead body of Demas, who fell just here, "having loved the present world."

If God grants our requests, satisfies our desires, fills the basket of our plenty, and withholds no good, then we should beware lest we forget God. We cannot pass over those remarkable words—"They soon forgot his works; they waited not for his counsel, but lusted exceedingly in the wilderness, and tempted God in the desert; and he gave them their request, but sent leanness into their soul." How memorable, too, those other words, needful to be pondered by the generation in which luxury so much abides: "Lest when thou hast eaten and art full, and hast built goodly houses, and dwelt therein; and when thy herds and thy flocks multiply, and thy silver and thy gold is multiplied, and all that thou hast is multiplied; then thine heart be lifted up, and thou forget the Lord thy God." Of all slippery places, the glib, smooth path of prosperity is perhaps the most slippery of all.

Slippery places are storm-swept places. See how careful the guides are where the black ice is smooth as ebony, now that the rapid storm has swept all impediments from its glassy surface. What a type of life! When the storm of bereavement, or sorrow, or sickness, or poverty, has swept over us, and we emerge into new health, new fortune, and new relationships of duty, then what a reaction too often occurs in our religious history! It is common, indeed, to think that such passages of personal history must purify us; but how often fresh mercies are seized upon with the avidity of a returning opportunity, in which we forget the dim chamber, and the doubtful question of recovery, and the mystic voices of memory, and the dull, leaden roar of the breakers on the shore of the eternal world, by which our barque veered so closely that the keel almost grated on the sands! The after-time of affliction is full of temptations to renewed indulgences—to the over-zealous pursuit and enjoyment of earthly things; and so slippery is it, that when tribulation has passed away, we need especial watchfulness and prayer.

Slippery places are smooth-trodden places. That path is the smoothest which is the most trodden by the multitude. I do not say that there are not many specific dangers incident to solitude, for when we are alone the world may be shut in with us. The hermitage may contain a heart that is no hermit, but that treads all the forbidden paths of unhallowed thought and desire. Still, there can be no doubt of the exceeding great danger of following a multitude to do evil. Men will cheat, and equivocate, and lie in companies, when they would tremble to do it in their individual capacity. And men will enter upon courses of profligacy in parties, when they would find conscience too much for them if they attempted the course alone. The broad way is a very slippery way; many there be that go in thereat. We have, indeed, such confidence in ourselves that we reason thus: I can go with others without being like others; have I no individuality, no personal power of self-command and self-restraint? Can I not see the dancers in the town of Vanity Fair without becoming giddy with delight?

There is a kind of bumpitiousness in morals as well as in other spheres, and there is no question but that many have fallen into gross sin through an overweening self-conceit of their own powers of resistance. If temptation fell upon us as sparks on the sea; or if we could say, "The prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in me," then the matter would assume a different shape; but, as it is, we need all of us to guard against a haughty spirit of confidence in ourselves.

The path of flattery is a slippery path, and, walking with the multitude, there will be found plenty to whisper to this weak side of our hearts. The path of genius is a slippery path, especially if there are voices tempting us to cease from labour and from care. The path of acknowledged reputation is a slippery path; and if we are publicly complimented on our virtues or our gifts, our very graces will soon become our worst snares. The path of common indulgence is a slippery path. We see multitudes giving little heed in their enjoyments to self-restraint; and it is possible to drain the chalice of pleasure with others before we awake to the danger which lurks in the intoxicating draught. To follow a multitude in dress, demeanour, and pleasure, is dangerous in the extreme.

Yes, the grand old Book warns us that to walk in the counsel of the ungodly, to sit in the seat of the scornful, or to stand in the way of sinners, is to tread on ice so slippery, that our moral downfall is only a question of time! Companionship is good, but it should consist in friendship with the devout and earnest—then it is valuable in the extreme; for the cord which has sustained many souls in the Alpine journey has been the tie which held them to some godly companionship. Yes, such friendships are helpful in the best sense, and they are always to be made in the selecter circles of the self-denying and the devout. The popular path is often one of noisy, talkative, frivolous life, where God is forgotten, and where the senses are the lords of life. Such paths are slippery paths indeed.

Be it remembered that we have none of us immunity from temptation and trial. It is blessed to endure it, far more so than to escape it. Slippery paths may be safe paths to us all. The path of prayer makes them the paths of safety. Nothing binds wool round the feet like prayer. We are never so shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace as when our lives are sanctified by the hallowed influence of devotion. Prayer preserves us from little slips in our conversation, as well as greater delinquencies in our conduct. The path of obedience is also the path of safety.

Some men try to ascend the Alps by opposite sides, and some by short cuts of their own. Thus men try to achieve success in religion, and essay to get to heaven in their own way. There is but one way, and but one guide; and beginning at the cross for pardon, we must take Christ's life for our imitation all through. If we take the footprints he has left in the difficult passes of temptation, we shall never go far wrong.

The path of revealed truth is also the path of safety. In these days, when men are seeking to find, in a philosophical sense, a kind of self-redemption—when the intuitional philosophy is leading men to look to the soul within rather than the Saviour without, it is surely high time to awake out of such mystic sleep, and to remember that it is the hiding of God's Word in our heart which neutralises temptation, and saves us from the fascination and force of sin.

Such are some of the slippery places of life, and such some of the safe ways of escaping danger in them. It will be a blessed thing to get safely home at last, to find no avalanches above us, no ice beneath us, no toilsome ascent, or dangerous pass, or hidden crevasse before us. Safe at home!—what music is there in the sound! And surely there is no sweeter picture of the better land than that which is suggested to us by the soldier laying down his arms, and the traveller putting away his alpenstock and his knapsack, for ever and for evermore!

HOLIDAYS.

BY THE REV. JAMES A. CARR.

HORTLY the subject of holidays will be agitating the whole community. Houses of Parliament shall have broken up, courts of law shall have closed, blinds shall have been drawn down in city houses, because their inmates are off for the holidays! Country houses, with smooth-shaven lawns, will receive some; others will be drawing in draughts of reviving oxygen by the breezy sea-side.

The most exalted personages will have thrown off their importance and reserve. An archbishop will be discovered, with wide-awake and loose necktie, on the Splügen; a lord chancellor will be seen climbing Mont Blanc, alpenstock in hand and a green shade over his eyes: all the world will be off for its holiday.

There are few, we trust, who are pent up all the year round, and who see little of nature save the strip of blue sky that roofs the narrow streets whose very stones they are well acquainted with, who are not able to get away somewhere in the holiday season—to the sea-side and homely pleasures of Ramsgate or Hastings, to the downs of Devonshire, the purple hills of Scotland, or across the Channel to the romantic lakes of the Emerald Isle, should their purse or their ambition fail to carry them farther—to Alpine valleys, the art-treasures of Rome, or the sunny haunts of Naples.

We do from our very hearts sympathise with those whose peculiar circumstances preclude them from taking such a holiday at some period of the year; who are not able to get away from close atmospheres, dusty purlieus, weary miles of bricks and mortar,—away to the fresh flowers and fields, to meandering streams, to the sea-side, with its bright waves running in over the golden sands. We hope, for the sake of our common humanity, for the sake of the innocent and pure joys that such rambles entail, that the number of those who know not what a holiday means, is very small indeed. We are aware there are some curiously-endowed creatures who care nothing for a holiday; whose monotonous life to them is a very pleasant one, spent between their ingle-nooks—nests, it may be, built in the narrowest and dingiest of London streets—and their places of business; whose only exercise, from one end of the year to the other, is the mechanical walk to and from these places. May there be no shades of children, waking the echoes of such homes with their inconsonant laughter—children who never look upon a daisy or a buttercup, who never ask, “What are the wild waves saying?” May such homes be devoted to old bachelors, with their easy chairs, slippers, and pipe, and we leave them to enjoy their holiday after their own fashion.

In prospect of our holiday-time, we would say the first thing is to deserve it. We shall enjoy our recreation doubly if we feel that we have earned it, and thus enter upon it with a good conscience. Hard work for eleven months will make the twelfth doubly dear as a holiday. The very thought that we have worked so hard will enhance our enjoyment, as, free from all care, we are climbing the heathery mountains of Scotland, or making our way across the Grinzel.

Secondly, we should say enjoy it. Let us enter upon it as a piece of business. Let us pack carefully, discarding the useless, and encumbering ourselves only with what we feel to be absolutely necessary. Let there be no starting in a hurry; let us calmly and wisely consider beforehand what our plans are, and having made them, let us stick to them. No small part of the pleasure of holidays is the anticipation of them; the marking out of the tour on the map, the consulting with our friends as to the best route, best hotels, best guides, &c. Long winter nights may be thus pleasantly diversified by chats at the fireside anent the summer or autumn tour.

And when actually off, we should seek for a thorough unbending. No cares of business should follow us; all that is to be settled beforehand, and “black care” left behind. We should determine also to make the best of any little mishap, any misadventure that may befall us during our holiday. Let there be good humour throughout. Wet days will come; guides will disappoint; an extortionate bill will be presented here and there. These are some of the unavoidable accompaniments of a holiday tramp, and provision should be made to meet them. A pleasant book stowed away in the knapsack will often while away the tedium of a rainy day; or such a day may be devoted to notes in the journal, or to the preservation of botanical specimens, the arranging of fossils, rocks, &c., should our taste lie in that direction. As to bills, most travellers can guess pretty well what their expenses will be, according to the character of the establishments where they put up. Now and then we may fall into the hands of the Philistines; but a little arrangement beforehand will frequently enable us to avoid such unpleasantnesses.

We shall enjoy our holiday all the more if we feel we have been the means of giving a holiday to others. By all means let employers strive to give their servants and dependants a run somewhere. It will make their own holiday all the sweeter, to know that Jones has taken his family to Brighton for three weeks; that Smith has gone down to visit his friends in Yorkshire; and they will be all the better servants for the favour. It is a great mistake to spur the willing horse to death. It is a true proverb, that "all work and no play makes Jack a dull boy."

What shall we say of the married man who is content to leave his wife and little ones at home, while he goes off alone to amuse himself? How can he feel happy in the midst of Switzerland, or in the wilds of Norway, when he thinks of the little pale faces peering through the dusty panes; or the mother, with all her household cares upon her, enduring the monotony of the hours? Better far to take a holiday nearer home, engage lodgings at some second-rate watering-place, if needs be, and see the children "playing on the shore," happy and gleeful, as they make sand pies, and the mother recovering her bright smile, as she watches them from some shady nook, her heart glad in their gladness.

The third rule we would lay down for our holidays is this—profit by them. Do not strive to do too much. Let the body profit. Remember it is recreation you are seeking. The bow is to be thoroughly unbent. It is a great mistake that many persons make of determining to see everything—to do everything. What a miserable word is this "do," in this sense! "We did Mont Blanc; we did the Rhine." "We did the three lakes yesterday," said a friend to us lately, in Killarney; "and we are going to do Mangerton to-day."

Take things easy. Let your holiday stand to you instead of apothecary's physic and doctor's bills. Remember you are laying up a stock of health and strength for another year. Do not come home with a fagged body, enervated by overwork, long walks, heavy climbing, and little rest. Short stages, with sufficient repose, and one or two hearty meals in the day—this is the true philosophy of holiday-making.

Cultivate the eye as you journey; cultivate the ear; store the memory with the recollection of things observed and felt, so that you may have lively impressions of your holiday for the rest of the year. How much pleasure did Wordsworth secure from the single remembrance of "a host of golden daffodils" seen once in his travels!

"I gazed and gazed, but little thought
What wealth the show to me had brought:
For oft when on my couch I lie,
In vacant or in pensive mood,
They flash upon that inward eye
Which is the bliss of solitude,
And then my heart with pleasure fills,
And dances with the daffodils."

We have all need of rest. The physical worker needs to rest his body; the mental worker needs to rest his mind. The very institution of the Sabbath-day seems to suggest the holiday. In the mysterious language of Scripture, the Almighty Architect of the worlds "rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made." Our blessed Lord recognised the necessity of rest when he said to his disciples, "Come ye apart and rest awhile." And here we would say to our readers, make it a point to rest on Sundays. In the little secluded church hid away beneath the shadow of the lofty mountain, seek the presence of God. Worship will be all the sweeter because of the associations. When you bend your knee beneath the humble roof, you will feel that you are worshipping that great Being who has given you the evidences of his existence, power, and greatness in the sublime scenery with which you are surrounded.

Give rest to the mind. If your business requires severe mental toil during the year, put up in your knapsack some pleasant literature wherewith to while away an idle hour now and then. Let it be, if possible, a book suited to the scenes of your holiday.

We feel we would be failing in our duty to ourselves and our readers, if we did not say to them, above all books let THE BOOK find a corner in your knapsack, and take it out now and then and read a portion of it—a psalm amid the mountain solitudes, a chapter in the gospels of a Sunday evening. Let some message of comfort or exhortation find you morning by morning, ere you set out for a day of fresh enjoyment and recreation. And thus that highest portion of our being shall profit by our holiday. Determine not to return without some spiritual good, as well as some physical and intellectual good. Let those spiritual powers—

"That in the various bustle of resort, Were all too ruffled, and sometime impaired," be renewed. Take opportunity of some of the lonely hours, that, no doubt, will be yours through your coming holiday, of reviewing the past. Contemplate what progress you have made in your Christian course, what temptations you have grappled with and overcome. Commune with God in the mountain solitudes; acquire fresh spiritual strength; gain higher views of God's character, his power, love, grace; so shall you return from your holiday, renewed in body, mind, and spirit; with fresh zest for your duties, with pleasant memories of your five or six weeks' holiday, and with the bright anticipation, that if health and strength are spared you for another year, you will start off again "to fresh fields and pastures new," in search of change and recreation.

(Drawn by W. L. THOMAS.)

"I taught his lessons, and knew his pleasures."--p. 762.

STRANGERS NOW.

A H me! at twilight I sit and ponder
 Over my path through the days gone by:
 I understand where I used to wonder,
 And sometimes smile where I used to sigh:
 If age knows so much that youth never guessed,
 In heaven we surely shall learn the rest!

Often and often, when days grow chilly,
 When dead leaves shiver and drop the while,
 I sit and think of my brother Willie,
 And then I sigh where I used to smile;
 For youth brings us gold, and we think it dross,
 But age must sit down and bewail its loss.

I carried Willie to mother dying;
 I took him to her when she was dead;
 I lifted him up, and soothed his crying,
 Missing her name from the prayers we said:
 I taught his lessons, and knew his pleasures,
 And kept his prizes among my treasures.

At last, when my head wouldn't reach his shoulder,
 Willie went out from our sheltered nest:
 And his open forehead grew broad and bolder,
 And his blue eyes flashed with a glad unrest:
 And my soul was filled with a yearning pity
 Over my brother in London city.

But my life grew out of its quiet story,
 And broke to melody quick and glad:
 So when Willie came in the sunset glory,
 Though he was touchingly grave and sad,
 I forgot to seek with a tender spell,
 To win the troubles he longed to tell.

Ah, me! but changes were coming slowly,
 A shadow dropping across the sun;
 And very soon it was darkness wholly,
 Near mother's grave was a newer one:
 The Lord had taken away my glory,
 And my life returned to its quiet story.

Then, oh for the love I had checked and chilled!
 But who can gather the faded flowers?
 And who can drink the wine that is spilled?
 And who can ransom the wasted hours?
 Once Willie had sought for my love in vain,
 And he never has turned to my heart again!

He's a little cold, but he's always kind:
 I see him, sometimes day after day,
 But his soul is ever concealed behind,
 And I know his life just as strangers may.
 If our mother's heaven we ever share,
 Will my Willie love me again up there?

I. FYVIE.

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XLVI.

MRS. BROOKLYN'S CONFIDENCES.

A LOME, Mr. Sylvester, let us make ourselves as cosy and as comfortable as we can."

This speech was addressed to Raymond by Mrs. Brooklyn at the commencement of another tête-à-tête.

"It is such a long time since you have been to see me," continued she, plying her needle with great industry; "I began to think myself quite forsaken."

Raymond had before his mind, clearly enough, the thing which was appointed for him to do; and here might have been an excellent opening: but the words did not flow forth with the freedom that might have been expected.

"And how is dear Alice?" asked Mrs. Brooklyn, with a little gush.

"Quite well, I thank you." And then he remembered that the words were not strictly true. Alice was beginning to fade away, like a flower in the chill breeze of autumn.

His mind went back to her and to his mother. He could hear his mother's words repeated to him, again and again, ere he set out that morning:

"It is not a matter of months now, my son, but of days!"

Yet, with all these memories, and with this wealth spread out before him, he was never further from his object than now.

An inward voice, which had haunted him all along, told him that the course he had been pursuing was unmanly and dishonourable. It hinted there was a better path, and a truer policy, to be carried out. And then there came a yearning desire to be free from these trammels, and a loathing of the whole system of the Sylvesters.

He had these moods often, though none knew it; and the struggle would be so great that the manacles which custom had forged were in danger of being broken.

"I am afraid you are out of spirits this morning," said Mrs. Brooklyn, noticing his abstraction.

"Oh, no—no!" said Raymond, making an attempt to rouse himself.

Yet something was amiss, and had been a long time—something grievously amiss.

Why was he sitting here, in idle case, when the voice of Providence was calling to him from that golden field out yonder, and bidding him work while yet it was day? Might he not obey that voice, even though he were a Sylvester? Might he not, by these better means, call down a blessing on the doomed house to which he belonged?

"Everybody has troubles," began the widow, a moment after, in a little gush of confidence. "I am sure, I have had my share. When I was a girl, no one knows what persecutions I went through!"

Raymond looked surprised, as well he might.

"Yes. Of course I don't say these things to everybody," and her work dropped on her lap, "but the fact is, I never should have married poor dear Brooklyn of my own accord."

"Indeed," said Raymond, more surprised than ever.

"I don't say them to everybody," repeated the widow, as if determined to impress the fact upon him.

"All persons have not the delicate sympathy that you have; and it would be casting pearls before swine."

Raymond bowed politely. He could do no less.

"But I did not marry him," again began the widow, "poor dear Brooklyn I mean—I did not marry him for love."

She stopped and heaved a gentle sigh.

Raymond began to feel his embarrassment increase.

"Love, you know, Mr. Sylvester, is—is—in fact," added she, wiping her eyes, "I need hardly describe to you what love is."

Raymond was speechless.

"There was too great a difference in our ages to render such a union desirable," continued the widow, again wiping her eyes. "I did my duty to him, in spite of my trials and vexations; but all that has passed away like a dream!"

And then came another sentimental sigh.

Raymond marvelled to what all this tended. In his perplexity he raised his eyes to the spot where the portrait of the deceased Brooklyn used to look down from his place on the wall; but, to his amazement, Brooklyn was gone! And not only was Brooklyn gone, but a usurper had come into his place.

There was the bronzed, handsome face, and bold, mischievous eyes of Captain Jack—an individual of whose existence Raymond was as yet unconscious.

For a moment, the representative of the Sylvesters thought himself in a dream.

Mrs. Brooklyn saw the look, and it gave an impetus to her communications.

"I don't mind telling you, Mr. Sylvester," continued she, in the same confidential strain, "but long before I became acquainted with Brooklyn, I had a lover."

Raymond's gallantry here made him remark that he did not wonder at it.

The widow smiled, and shook her head, as if to deprecate the assertion.

"Yes, I had," continued she; "and he loved me—oh! I cannot describe to you"—with a vehement gush, and a clasping of the hands—"I cannot describe to you, dear Mr. Sylvester, how he loved me!"

Raymond said there was no occasion. He could quite believe that such would be the case.

"And as for me," continued the widow, with increasing confidence, "I assure you, Mr. Sylvester, that but one person in the whole world has ever won my heart,—my real, entire heart—and that person is Captain Jack!"

Raymond had the greatest difficulty to keep from laughing.

"Captain Jack, the friend of my earliest years, my playmate, my companion, my associate in almost everything. He has come back from sea, you know," added she, with a suddenness that was quite startling. "Indeed," said Raymond, beginning to feel the end of the clue.

"I thought he was dead. My poor, dear, darling Jack!" and the handkerchief was pressed to her eyes. "But he was not," added she, withdrawing it with great celerity, and nodding expressively at Raymond. "He was just as much alive as you are."

The clue began to get more palpable.

"He had gone abroad in despair, because I was not allowed to marry him; my friends did not appreciate his various excellences. But I am my own mistress now, and can do as I choose. Poor Jack!" And here came a sigh of extreme softness and sentiment.

Raymond ventured to ask if Captain Jack was in England.

"In England! I should think he is. He is at Brooklyn, in this very house!"

And the fact was proclaimed with great glee.

"Of course," continued the widow, looking down, and twisting the corner of her handkerchief, "I cannot help the disappointment that will, in fact, be felt. Dear Sir Hugh will take it very much to heart, I am sure; and there are others that I might name who will feel aggrieved. But I am not responsible for the views they may have entertained; I never gave them any encouragement—that I know of," added the widow, ending her sentence in rather an ignominious manner.

"Certainly not," said Raymond, cheerfully; it is astonishing how cheerful he felt. "And you must allow me to congratulate you very sincerely, and to wish you and Captain Jack every happiness."

"Thank you," replied the widow. But there was a touch of pique in her voice, too.

She was a good-natured woman on the whole; but she would have liked him to feel some little sting notwithstanding.

Soon after, Raymond took his leave; indeed, he had stayed too long already. And then he began to think of his mother. He was thinking of the wan, handsome face, and the eager eyes, and the desperate, actual strait to which he and his should be reduced, when, as he crossed the hall, the door opened, and an individual whom he had never seen before, sallied out.

This person was dressed in sailor's costume, and had a short pipe in his mouth, which he did not remove as he made the remark—

"So, I suppose, you are Mr. Sylvester."

Raymond bowed.

"And I—it is quite as well that you should know it—I am Captain Jack."

Raymond bowed again.

"An old lover of Alicia Pierpoint, and who intends to marry her as soon as he can."

"So I suppose," said Raymond, smiling. He did not feel the least inclination to quarrel with Captain Jack. "And I wish you all the happiness this world can give."

Captain Jack took his pipe from his mouth with one hand, and offered the other to Raymond.

"Thank ye. I thought there would be a jolly bit of a row between us two; but I see you're not a bad sort of fellow. Will you be friends?"

"With all my heart," said Raymond, laughing.

"That's right. Beautiful woman, isn't she?" And the pipe went into his mouth again.

"Very," said Raymond, walking towards the outer door of the mansion, and impatient to get home again.

"And as good as she is beautiful. Ah, sweet Alicia!" And he cast his eyes to the ceiling with a rhapsodic air.

They had now reached the outer door, and Raymond's horse was brought by a groom. In another minute he would be gone.

"I say," exclaimed Captain Jack, laying his hand on Raymond's arm, "don't you be downhearted, now, about Alicia."

"It would not be of much use if I were," replied Raymond, trying to speak gravely; "no rival would stand a chance against you, Captain Jack."

"Thank ye," replied Captain Jack, touching his cap; "you are a sensible fellow, Mr. Sylvester."

Raymond laughed. Then he wished Captain Jack good morning, and rode away, leaving him absolute master of the field.

CHAPTER XLVII.

"NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND."

"Now," said the inward voice, getting stronger and louder, "now is your time to cast off your old shackles, and begin life afresh."

"Yes," replied Raymond debating the matter in his own mind, and responding more and more to the inward monitor, "I would gladly begin life afresh. My life, such as it has been, stares me in the face, as a thing to be ashamed of. But how to begin?" And the future, with all its complications, met him, like an enigma to be solved.

"How to begin; and is it not too late?"

"Never too late to mend!" was the familiar phrase prompted by conscience.

Never too late to mend!

Other men had toiled up as steep a difficulty. He could think of some, at this moment—men who had overcome, at last—not by sitting in slothful ease—but by that mighty agent, industry.

Industry was not an attribute much prized by the Sylvesters. But how noble it was! What a precedence it took by ancient right! "If a man will not work, neither let him eat," was the inspired assertion of an apostle.

"Well, then! he would begin at once. In the face of the dangers that threatened him; in the face of poverty, and ruin, and disgrace—he would enlist under the banners of Industry."

This resolution was not so sudden as it seems. It had gradually been ripening into purpose, though no one knew it.

The failure of the Brooklyn enterprise was like some friendly hand that snapped his bonds asunder.

As he drew near the house, he saw a figure in the distance. His heart beat quickly. He guessed, by a kind of intuition, that it was his mother. He could see her quite plainly, now, and he knew that anxiety had led her to come. Tears sprang to his eyes. He was full of loving pity for the proud, cold woman whom many avoided with fear and dislike. If all forsook her, he would not. Yet he was about to shake off allegiance to her creed!

When he came close to her, he was shocked at her appearance. Dark circles were round her eyes. Her face was unnaturally pale. She looked as if she could neither eat, nor sleep, for the anxiety that consumed her.

"Well," said she, trying to speak with her usual self-possession, "is it good news, Raymond?"

"It is not quite as you hoped, dear mother," replied he, soothingly, and taking her hand.

"What!" and she drew away her hand with a quick gesture; "what! not as I hoped? Have you not been to Brooklyn?"

"Yes, mother, I have been to Brooklyn."

He was walking beside her; his horse's bridle over his arm.

"And were you too late? You have been half-hearted, Raymond," said she, reproachfully. "You thought the sacrifice too great! You, who should have shrunk from no alternative, have failed me."

"I will never fail you, mother, God helping me!" said Raymond, with great tenderness.

"Then why have you come back without bringing a hope of succour? when the old house totters to its fall—when it may be too late to-morrow!" And she burst into a flood of passionate tears.

He had never seen her so moved before. His heart was full of sorrow, not regret. Be things as they might, he could not entertain a particle of regret.

He knew she would not regard the matter in the light in which he did. What he considered the depth of degradation, she looked upon as an act of virtue. It was useless to argue in that direction. But he must offer some explanation. He must make some reply to the questions she heaped upon him. And he told her he had a rival.

"Rival!" and she caught angrily at the word. "What rival could stand before my son—and a Sylvester?"

Raymond, even at this distressing moment, could scarcely suppress a smile as he thought of Captain Jack.

He told his mother that it would have been a useless humiliation to press his suit on Mrs. Brooklyn, under the circumstances; and he hinted what those circumstances were.

Still, she was not pacified. She told him he had too much at stake to be easily discouraged; and she said that, "even now——"

But he cut her short. He said she must banish that thought from her mind for ever. And, as he said it, his mouth was set like iron.

She did not speak for a few moments. Once she looked up at the old house. It was a look that touched him to the heart. He could scarcely bear it. But he did not retract. He never would.

"Then we are lost!" she said, at length.

They had entered the house by now, and were in her private room. He had placed her a chair, and taken her shawl from her. Never had his manner been more respectful, or more tender.

"All is not lost," he said, "if we meet the evil patiently, and bear the punishment of our misdeeds." Here he spoke in obedience to the inward voice. Then he told her what he intended to do. He said he had long felt a secret shame and sorrow at the course he was pursuing—a course unwise, and, if he might use the word, dishonest.

She started; but he went on without regarding her. He knew the remedy had come too late to avert the evils of the past. He told her of families, ancient and honourable as their own, who had guarded against the possibility of such evils, by the practice of industry. Homely words in the ears of Lady Sylvester.

Other men, he told her, had risen from the lowest ranks, and taken the first places in the land—all by the means of industry.

Industry was the ladder by which to climb to fortune; the weapon by which to subdue adversity. Industry brought peace, and honour, and independence. It was the very foundation of a nation's greatness.

Raymond's speech was eloquent, but it failed to meet the approbation of his mother. Such sentiments were in direct opposition to her creed. Long before he finished, she had arrayed herself against him with all her might. She would not have the family disgraced, she said, under her very eyes. If he chose to forfeit his birthright, and lose his position, he should do so at a distance. And the tie between mother and son, which no adversity could sever, seemed in danger of a rupture.

He told her he had resolved to carry out his plan—obtain, in fact, employment; only that he forbore to use the word. His object in remaining on the spot would be to afford to his mother and his sister all the comfort and protection in his power. He would get the means, he said, of building up a new home when this should fail them. It was simply right and honourable for him to do so; base and dishonourable to sit with folded hands, and let the ruin do its worst.

She did not think so. Certain ways of conduct were required of persons in their position. When had he ever heard of a Sylvester working for his bread? And she laughed scornfully.

He was silent, but not convinced. He meant for the future to earn his bread; and no one should prevent him!

CHAPTER XLVIII.

DAME HUMPHREYS HEARS THE NEWS.

DAME HUMPHREYS was not a woman who took things greatly to heart. When Rachel was gone, she began to argue with herself that, after all, there might not be so very much the matter. John was "put about"—this was her expression—and he might have gone on some business concerning the bond, and not have been able to get back as he expected.

Rachel was easily alarmed, poor thing. She hadn't the presence of mind that she had—meaning herself—Dame Humphreys.

Comforted by these reflections, the old lady sat down to her morning's cup of tea. She tried to convince herself that, by this time, John would have come back, and that he and Rachel might be breakfasting together at the farm, and talking over the night's panic. She thought Rachel would be sure to send down a messenger, and let her know that it was so.

But no messenger came; and, in spite of her philosophy, Dame Humphreys began to be uneasy. In fact, when an hour had passed, and still no tidings were sent her, she trotted up-stairs, put on her bonnet, and set off for the farm.

She had scarce reached the end of the street, when the ill news, that flies apace, met her. One of her favourite gossips, Betsy Pryor by name, was carrying it in hot haste, and with considerable additions of her own.

"Ah, poor Mrs. Humphreys! And how do you do?" was the opening salutation of this individual.

"Very well, thank you, Mrs. Pryor. Pray have you seen John?" for if John was anywhere in that neighbourhood, he was not likely to escape the prying eyes of Betsy.

"No, indeed! I haven't; and a good thing too," replied Mrs. Pryor, mysteriously. She was bursting to tell; and yet she did not want to frighten the old woman quite to death.

"Why is it a good thing, pray?" asked Dame Humphreys, sharply.

"Because he's every reason to keep out of folks' way, seeing what a dreadful thing has happened," replied Betsy Pryor.

"Oh, Betsy! for the love of Heaven do speak out!" cried poor Dame Humphreys, terribly alarmed.

"You haven't heard, then. Well, I'm sure I'm very sorry; but it's the talk of the town by now, and no help for it. They say he's killed old Isaacs!"

"Killed! My John!—my own boy!" gasped Dame Humphreys, as pale as death.

"Well, he mayn't be dead; and, now I come to think of it, he isn't quite. But John hit him so hard, that he isn't likely to get over it. They say his head—"

"Oh, hush—hush! I won't hear it. I can't believe it," shuddered Dame Humphreys, stopping her ears; "it isn't true!"

"I am afraid it is, Mrs. Humphreys. You see, John left him for dead; but, as soon as he could speak, he sent for the police, and told 'em who did it, and set 'em on hard and fast. John's sure to be took, if he hasn't got out of the country."

"Oh, my son!—my son!" cried the poor old woman, in a tone of deep affliction.

"It's very bad, I know," said Betsy Pryor; "and I was just a-coming to tell you. Now, shall I step up and tell Rachel?"

"Oh, no—no! I am going to Rachel." And, for the first time, a tide of real womanly sympathy set in towards the "girl" whom John had chosen to marry.

How should she be able to break the dreadful news to Rachel?

Trembling all over with agitation, she hurried on as fast as her limbs could carry her. All she thought of at this moment was Rachel.

When she reached the house, at the first sound of her footsteps, out came Rachel. Her face had in it all the misery of hope deferred.

"No, my deary, it's only me," said the old woman, sorrowfully. Her tone of voice was kinder than it had ever been to Rachel.

"Oh, mother—mother! he is not come!" cried Rachel, in a kind of despair.

"I know—I know! but I've got tidings. Now, sit ye down, and don't ye tremble so. There's a good God above us," said Dame Humphreys, solemnly, "and I'll hold ye hand, and just tell ye all about it."

Rachel sat down. Her face was very white, and she shook like an aspen-leaf. But she shook still more when Dame Humphreys told her.

She told her as gently as she could; but such an ugly fact did not admit of much disguise. John had, to say the least of it, committed a crime that might be his ruin.

"I don't doubt but he was provoked into it," said Dame Humphreys, endeavouring to extenuate his guilt as much as she could; "and happen he did not mean to hurt the man; but, you see, his passion was up, and the thing was done in a moment, and couldn't be called back again. That's where it is, Rachel."

Rachel did not speak. She had turned her face away, and hidden it with her hands.

Dame Humphreys thought she would give her a little time to recover. It was no good saying anything, she argued. And there was plenty to be done. Rachel, she dare say, hadn't had bit or drop, and the kettle did not boil. A cup of tea was a great panacea for human woe, in Dame Humphreys' opinion; and she set to work to get it. When the kettle boiled, and the tea was made and poured out, she said—for Rachel still sat motionless—"Come, my deary, try and drink a cup. It will do your poor head good."

Rachel withdrew her hands from her face. Oh! what a sorrow-stricken face it was!

"I cannot, mother"—it seemed a comfort to her to use the word—"I cannot, till I know——"

She shuddered. Dame Humphreys guessed what she meant.

"I'll tell you what I'll do, Rachel: I'll just send Jim down the town, and he shall bring us word."

"Oh, yes—yes!"

She spoke with a feverish anxiety. Dame Humphreys again guessed the depth of her anxiety. It was lest Isaacs should be dead.

While Jim was gone, the tea remained untasted, in spite of all that Dame Humphreys could do. Once Rachel put the cup to her lips, but she could not swallow. "My throat seems closed up," she said. Then she went down the field to watch for the lad's return.

At length a speck in the distance gave hope that the messenger was coming. Rachel laid her hand on her heart. Even when he was near enough she could not ask him. Her pale lips refused to form the words. It was like the sun shining from behind a cloud, when the lad's cheery voice said, "All right, missis, don't ye put yourself about. He aint got half his deserts!" Rachel burst into an hysterical cry.

"I'd have licked him right enough, I know," exclaimed the redoubtable Jim, "if it had been me. But poor master's so tender like, he wouldn't hurt a fly."

"Then it is not so bad! Oh, thank God for it!" cried the poor wife, still weeping hysterically.

"Bad! I should think it isn't. You see, he were stunned like, that was all. But there aint a better man in the country nor master!" exclaimed Jim, conclusively.

(To be continued.)

"FALLEN THROUGH A ROCK."

PART II.

OW long Edward slept he never knew; but when he awoke all was dark and silent around. He was some time collecting his scattered senses, for all that had occurred on the previous day seemed like a fearful dream. At length he became fully conscious of the horrors of his situation, and all the preceding events flashed vividly before his memory. He sat up and tried to listen, but could only hear the sullen dash of the waves against the foot of the cliffs. There were no sounds of human life in that dense darkness in which he was involved; all was silent as the grave. He would have been thankful now to hear the tones of those harsh and savage voices, which had frightened him so much the night before; but, alas! he was left alone to perish in this "living tomb."

Oh, what would his father and mother think, if they knew the situation of their child! They were not far away, and yet would never know of his miserable fate. He lay for a long time indulging these sad thoughts, until he became conscious of a feeling of hunger, and took courage to rise, and cautiously feel about, in the hope of finding some remnants of the supper he had seen the men partake of the night before; but in vain; he could not discover anything with which to relieve his hunger, and sank down where he stood in helpless despair.

A long time passed away, during which he fell into a quiet, dreamy state of half-consciousness, from which he was roused by hearing a step approach;—yes, most certainly, a human footstep! He heard it distinctly, though he could not imagine how any one had entered his gloomy prison.

A new terror now assailed him, even worse than solitude, for he feared one of the savage beings into whose hands he had fallen had returned, perhaps unknown to the others, to murder him. Then, with a sudden feeling of joy, he fancied his father had discovered the secret passage, and was come to rescue him. This hope was speedily dissipated by hearing a strange voice call, "Boy, where are you?" He was afraid to reply, and lay quite still, but for the beating of his heart. Again the words were repeated. The tones were rough and harsh, yet there was a rugged kindness in them which somewhat allayed his fears, and he was encouraged to answer, though timidly, "I am here."

Guided by the sound of his voice, the man approached and placed a piece of bread in the boy's hand, which he ate eagerly.

"Now, come along," said the stranger, as he took him by the arm and led him a little way, until they came to what Edward supposed to be a narrow passage through the rock. Then there was a turning and a gleam of light—how welcome to his eyes, so long accustomed to the dreary darkness of the cave! A little further on, the light increased so much that he could see his companion's face, and recognised him as the man who had caught him in his arms when he fell the night before, and whom the other smugglers had addressed as "Bill." At last they stood on the verge of the cliff, upon a narrow ledge of rock. Edward's head swam as he gazed down the dizzy height; but he caught a glimpse of a boat beneath, as if waiting for them. "Now, my lad, look sharp!" said his conductor, pointing to the rope ladder he had just thrown over the edge, and the end of which was caught by the men below. He assisted Edward fairly to place his feet on the rounds; afterwards he had little difficulty in descending to the boat. Bill then hauled up the ladder, and having hid it away, he slipped a loop of rope over a projecting point of rock, and letting the end trail in the water, slid gently down, and rejoined his companions: they jerked the rope off the ledge, and rowed away. After pulling for a considerable time in silence, they came in sight of a large lugger, lying close in to the shore.

"Now, my boy," said Bill, "I have saved your life. I'm not very particular about most things, but somehow I didn't like the notion of a young fellow like you being left by yourself to starve in that black trap you managed to get into. I don't rightly know why I thought so much about it, unless it's because I caught you coming down; or may be it's that I have a son myself something about your size. However, I got round the captain, to take you on board; so you must come with us now, and make yourself useful."

Edward burst into tears. The prospect of having to go with these bad men, away from his home and friends, perhaps for ever, seemed to him almost as dreadful as death. He looked up imploringly in Bill's face.

"And will you not let me go back to my father, and mother, and little sister? they will all be so unhappy about me. Oh, I cannot live among those dreadful men who wanted to kill me! Let me go home, and I will never tell about the cave or where I have been—I will not, indeed, I promise; and I always keep my word. Oh! pray do let me."

"No, no, my boy; that won't do, so say no more about it. Trouble enough I had to save your life. It's better to be on board with us than starving in that black hole I took you from, isn't it? Be thankful for what I have done for you, and never let me hear a word more out of your mouth about going home. When we get to the other side of the water you shall stay with my wife and boy, and that will be the home you'll have; you'll be well off, and I'll teach you two boys to be sailors."

By this time they had reached the smugglers' vessel. They got on board, and Edward's fate was sealed. Poor child! he was very unhappy, and met with much harsh and savage treatment during the voyage, though Bill often stood his friend, and saved him as much as was in his power from abuse and ill-treatment.

The next three years of his life were spent with Bill's wife and son. He was made useful to them in every way possible for a boy of his age, and met but little kindness, except during the short visits Bill paid his family. Being of a robust and healthy constitution, he endured the many hardships to which he was subjected tolerably well; but his only pleasure was to wander off alone, when his work was done, to think of his distant home, and form plans of escape, to be put into execution when he grew older. This hope it was which enabled him to bear up under his present lot.

The time had now arrived when Bill considered the two boys sufficiently grown to be taken on the next voyage "to learn their business," as he said. Edward was not sorry to quit his present abode; he had a vague idea that any change of place might possibly lead to some opportunity of escape; but soon found that he was not allowed to quit the vessel on any occasion, and his life was so much harder, that he frequently wished himself back in the cottage of Bill's wife.

He made several voyages during the next two years, and twice returned to his native shore, though never permitted to land. On the third occasion, just six years from the time he had been carried off, the smugglers' craft again cast anchor in her usual place, and a boat's load of goods was sent to be stowed away in the old cave, which had still remained undiscovered.

Edward being now strong enough for hard work, went with two of the crew to assist in packing the goods inside the cavern: another party were to remove the great stone from the top, and let the bales down by ropes to those within. When all had been lowered, the men agreed to go back to the vessel for another boat's load; but as there still remained much piling and arranging to be done, in order to make room for the rest, they left Edward to work during their absence, taking with them the boat, so as to render escape in this way impossible. They did not replace the stone, but hauled up the rope, and laid a few branches over the opening, according to the old plan, until they should return. Edward continued his occupation diligently by the light of a lamp always used on such occasions. The men were several hours away; but when he had arranged all as directed, he sat down and fell into a train of sad thought. He pictured to his mind all the misery he had endured just six years ago in the same place—his narrow escape of a dreadful death, and all the trials and hardships to which he had since been subjected. Then his thoughts naturally reverted to his family; he wondered what changes those years had brought to those he loved, and how much little Helen must be now grown, if she still lived.

For a short time we must leave Edward to his mournful meditations, and return to the objects of his anxiety. Six years had, indeed, made some change in his parents, they looked older and more careworn; the loss of their only son was a trial not easily forgotten. Helen had grown a tall girl of twelve, little altered otherwise, still bright and lively as when she was the laughing child her absent brother so often pictured to his imagination. They had resumed the custom of passing part of the summer at the seaside, which had been given up for a year or two after Edward's disappearance. It was the sixth year now, and the very season of his mysterious loss, when one lovely summer evening Helen and her father set out for a walk among the rocks. The sun had set, and it was beginning to grow dusk, when she suddenly exclaimed—

"Papa! there is the very place, I know it so well, for I have seen it in my dreams!"

"What place, dear?"

"Oh! the place where Edward fell; do you not see the branches lying over it to conceal the hole, as I told you long ago? But why have I never seen it since, often as I have been here? Papa, I dreamed the other night that our dear Edward was in that rock still. Shall we try?"

"You know, Helen, that would be impossible; but we will examine the place."

They advanced cautiously, and pulled away with some difficulty the branches laid over the mouth of the orifice. As they looked down, they thought they could perceive a gleam of light in the hollow rocks. Was it imagination, or did they hear a rustling sound, as of some one moving beneath? Helen's father motioned her back, as she tried to stoop forward, for the idea occurred to him that it might be a hiding-place for smugglers, who were supposed to infest that part of the coast; but an irresistible impulse forced her to call out—

"Edward, Edward, are you there?"

"Yes," answered a voice out of the depths of the rock. "Who are you who calls my name?"

"Helen, your own Helen, and our father is here also. Oh, come up to us!"

"Alas! I cannot," replied the voice. "I am in the power of smugglers; they have taken their boat, and left me no chance of escape."

"I shall call help to get you out," said his father, now speaking for the first time; for he was so bewildered by the sudden joy of finding that his son still lived, he could not think of anything else.

"Do not go, father," replied Edward; "it will be too late when you return, the men are coming back soon; they will take me to their ship; now is my only chance. I will try and make a high pile of boxes on which to stand; if we had a rope, you might draw me up; perhaps they have left one there by mistake. Look."

"Yes," said Ellen, "here is one, fastened firmly to the side of the hole, it was hidden among the branches."

"I remember," he answered, "I saw them haul it up, that it might be out of my reach. Now, fling the end down."

In breathless haste they did as he desired. He seized it frantically, as a drowning man grasps his only hope of escape, and was drawn by his father's strong arm in safety to the top. Once more he stood a free boy on his native land.

By what means the smugglers supposed he had effected his escape, we know not; but so much did they dread detection after this time that, though they still continued to visit the coast, they were obliged to give up the use of their favourite and most secure hiding-place.

We may be sure that Edward, his father, and Helen lost no time in making their way to his uncle's house. And who can describe the delight of that happy meeting; the joyful surprise to his mother, as she clasped to her heart the dear one she had so long mourned as dead? And who can describe, also, the air of happy triumph with which Helen said, as she held her restored brother's hand—

"Did I not tell you, six years ago, that he had fallen through a rock? and from that very rock we have now drawn him. Surely, papa, God was very good to have guided our steps there this evening, and at the only time it was possible dear Edward could have been released from the smugglers' cave."

SCRIPTURE ACROSTIC.

ONE SLAIN UPON A ROCK OF THE SAME NAME AS HIMSELF.

1. Another name for Hosea.
2. The father of Hadadezer.
3. A stone of help.
4. One who showed kindness to David at Mahanaim.

THE BIVVER

— Saturday, August 22, 1868. —

WINCHESTER CATHEDRAL.

WINCHESTER CATHEDRAL AND WILLIAM OF WYKEHAM.

DOES modern Winchester remind visitors of Ithen? She wore a rich traditional garland: the days when the city was the queen of the south and the capital of Alfred's kingdom, sitting like a crowned lady on the fair banks of the the ancient Britons had named the place "the White City;" colonists from ancient Germany (Belgæ) had increased her power; the conquering Romans recognised her as the "Venta Belgarum;" the Saxons acknowledged her claims, and made her the capital of Wessex; Egbert, Alfred, and Canute had dwelt within the walls; five kings received the crown of England in the cathedral; and for many ages "the White City" seemed likely to become the capital of Britain. Its castle, built by the "stark" king, William I., might have defied an army; royal palaces, noble mansions, magnificent monasteries, and sixty churches made her an architectural marvel. Prince Arthur's "round table" was lodged in the city, and all curious or credulous citizens might have read thereon the names of the mighty knights who upheld the banner of the great Pendragon.* Great, indeed, has been the change; Winchester has lost her crown, and imperial London marvels at the former ambition of her ancient rival. But the White City still bears the symbols of her early honours. The cathedral retains the beauty and grandeur which have impressed the hearts of many generations; "the college" is a name of power with "Wykehamists," and the ancient hospital of St. Cross still reminds us that a princely spirit of charity is not peculiar to modern times. William of Wykeham, bishop, lawyer, and statesman, the patron of art and promoter of learning, sleeps in his own rich chantry, beneath the magnificent cathedral which owes so much of its splendour to his genius.

Surely such a city can have no low or grotesque traditions connected with her histories? We are sorry to remind the reader that even the White City was supposed to have, at times, one black visitor, at the least. Through her streets and around her cathedral Satan was believed to prowl, in the form of a black dog! The good people of Winchester must not, however, regard this as an unparalleled stigma, for the same fiend, in the like form, was also repeatedly seen in Colchester. We fear that black dogs had a sad time of it in both cities, while such a superstition prevailed. Is it not somewhat strange that this terrible dog should have selected a place crowded with monks and friars? Can it be possible that white, black, and grey friars, to say nothing of St. Swithin himself, were unable to preserve Winchester from such visitations? Something must have been wrong, we fear.

If the Wintonians are ever tempted to regret the departed honours of their ancient city, the cathedral may well console them. The richness of the west front, the combination of massive strength, delicate beauty, and magnificent grandeur, and the east window glowing with rainbow splendours, or subdued to a "dim religious light," may well produce a feeling akin to admiring awe. When was this grand pile erected? A rude timber church may have been raised here by the early British Christians, in the second century; this was destroyed by the pagan Saxons, but rebuilt by the converted Prince Kyngil in the seventh century. Three hundred years later, Ethelwald, Bishop of Winchester, completed a third structure, and dedicated the building to the famous Swithin. The Danes, honouring Odin much and Swithin little, partially ruined the church, which was again restored by Bishop Walkeylyn, about the year 1093, when the rainy saint lost his place as sole patron of the cathedral, which was then dedicated to St. Peter, St. Paul, and Swithin. This change was just, as Swithin had neglected (or was unable) to protect the building from Danish ravages. A succession of alterations, additions, and restorations were brought to a grand finish in the fourteenth century, when Bishop Edyngton, and the more famous William of Wykeham, expended time, money, and skill on the cathedral. The present pile may, indeed, with some exceptions, be regarded as the work of the extraordinary man who was alike courtier, bishop, chancellor, and statesman.

The visitor who wishes to examine the interior of the cathedral, will require days, if not weeks, for such a study. Do tombs and sepulchral memorials bring before him the life of other times? Then let him stand near those six chests, containing the bones or dust of Egbert, Canute, Emma of Normandy, of the red king, William Rufus, and of other once mighty men of old. Bishop Fox, whose pelican symbol may be seen near, collected these bones from their decayed and ruined tombs, and the observer may easily, like another Hervey, make his "meditations" on these receptacles of royal dust. Why is that recess beneath the arch called the "Holy Hole?" Because of the relics of "saints" once preserved there, which were supposed to shed a mysterious sanctity over the whole cathedral. In vain the enthusiastic antiquary now inquires for Canute's crown; the very circlet worn on the day when, in presence of the uncivil waves, he preached his far-famed sermon to flattering courtiers. It has vanished from its high place, and we shall not, therefore, ask impertinent questions about its fashion or ornaments. The niches, empty or occupied, would tax the learning and patience of an antiquarian hagiologist,* so numerous are these small stone lodgings of worthies now almost forgotten.

The once rich shrine of St. Swithin no longer attracts monks to the early mass; but this friend of King Egbert is yet known by name to thousands who might be puzzled to name his burial-place. The famous saint of Winchester has somewhat fallen from his high estate. How many English-

* Signifying "Dragon's head," a title of the chief British prince.

* A writer of the lives of saints.

men can now repeat the list of his miracles? How is this? Did not his very bones once work marvels? Did not the saint, long after his decease, heal the blind, make cripples move as merrily as grasshoppers, liberate prisoners from dungeons, send hungry wolves to sleep by the mere whisper of his name, and perform other feats, so marvellous that we hold our breath in astonishment? When will such days come again? Is it really true that, when officious men annoyed the good Swithin by attempting to move his bones from the north side of the churchyard into the cathedral, on the 15th of July, in the year 971, the indignant saint caused torrents of rain to pour down on the disturbers of his grave? Or shall we believe the other story, that Swithin himself reappeared in ghostly form, and insisted upon the speedy removal of his body, showing his approbation of the good work, when it had been duly performed, by healing such multitudes of cripples, that the church-walls did not afford space enough to hang the crutches thereon? Which is the true account? We really cannot help any of our readers in the matter; but for ourselves, we should like to hold both histories equally established.

Perhaps some lover of the rod and line may look with more interest on the grave of Izaak Walton, than upon the receptacles of Saxon bones, or the tomb of William Rufus. A Fleet Street draper, even if he should write "A Complete Angler," is not likely, in our times, to be honoured with a grave in a magnificent cathedral. No one however, will now quarrel with the respect paid to the memory of the angler, who would fix a worm on the hook "as if he loved him."

The great name associated with Winchester and its cathedral is that of William of Wykeham, and a short outline of his remarkable life must now be given. Our readers will bear in mind the fourfold character of this famous man, as architect, ecclesiastic, lawyer, and politician, whilst we pass rapidly from one event to another. He was probably born at Wykeham, in Hampshire, in 1324, and his name is generally thought to have been derived from his birth-place. As everything, however, must be disputed, there are antiquarians who affirm that the surname was borne by the father, while others are equally certain that this gentleman's name was John Longe; perhaps the most easy conclusion is that all are right. Mr. Longe may sometimes have been described by his place of residence, and his famous son may have preferred such a designation. Should the matter be ever hotly debated in any literary magazine in the year 2000, we hope that we shall be quoted as an example of perfect impartiality on so grave a subject. Young William seems to have early become the pet of Nicholas Uvedale, the lord, or "squire," of Wykeham, and governor of Winchester Castle. The youth became secretary to the soldier, and was thus introduced to the notice of Bishop Edyngton, by whom the clever young Wykehamite was made known to Edward III. The king had a sharp eye for ability, and soon discovered "all the talents" in the secretary of Governor Uvedale. William was at this period about twenty-two years of age, and in the course of the ensuing ten years the watchful warrior-king detected the architectural abilities, political insight, and love of learning, so largely possessed by the son of John and Sybil Wykeham. William received, in 1356, the appointment of superintendent over the royal works, and in October of the same year he became the directing architect of Windsor Castle. His "retaining fee" was one shilling a-day, and when on surveying journeys, two shillings. The pay was not, however, quite so beggarly as it sounds; some readers may remember that two shillings a-day was the sum formerly allowed to members of Parliament for English boroughs, and that certain towns so groaned under the heavy tax as to petition for exemption from the expensive honours of the franchise. Our architect's labours were not limited to "art pure and simple;" he was commissioned to "impress" masons, and other necessary workmen, at certain fixed wages. Imagine Sir Charles Barry, when superintending the erection of the Houses of Parliament, going about the country with warrants for the impressment of all obstinate masons and carpenters!

The royal architect had received the "lower" ecclesiastical orders before entering on his great work at Windsor, and soon managed to obtain from the king so many benefices and clerical offices that we must class him with the greatest of pluralists. He was a country rector, a prebendary, dean of the royal chapel at St. Martin's-le-Grand, a royal secretary, keeper of the privy seal, chief warden of many royal castles, and eventually Bishop of Winchester and Lord Chancellor of England in 1367. Perhaps the architect at one shilling a-day regarded these offices as a fair means of professional reimbursement. But Wykeham's course was not all smooth; he had supported the political views of the Black Prince, and was therefore attacked by the active supporters of the Duke of Lancaster, the famous John of Gaunt. There seems to have been no love lost between the two royal brothers; and their adherents were just as vehement as political parties ever have been, always are, and, we suppose, evermore will be. When the prince's friends were "in," Wykeham was safe; when these became the "outs," and the Gaunt party seemed resolved to expel all clericals from places of power, Wykeham yielded to the rising storm by resigning the chancellorship. For six years the bishop was then left in comparative peace, until the death of the Black Prince, in 1376, when the storm again broke upon his head, in the awful form of an impeachment for illegal conduct while performing his multiplied public duties. Little was proved, but political foes are not very careful about proofs, and the result was, that William of Wykeham was deprived of all his episcopal revenues, and forbidden to come within twenty miles of the king. Things now looked very black indeed, and the bishop, perhaps, thought his sun had set. But after the death of Edward III. daylight came again, foes shook hands, "much regretted" past quarrels, and Wykeham soon regained most of his former honours and revenues. The king died June 21st, and the bishop's pardon is dated the 31st of the same month. The dates show how the power of his enemies fell at the death of Edward. The bishop did not, however, get a pardon for nothing, some profit was extracted from him. He bound himself to equip three ships of war, and to provide 300 trained soldiers at his own cost. The bishop probably grumbled a little, but he could not write to the newspapers; and matters settled down at last after the rough fashion common in the "good old times."

But was this famous man solely occupied for many years in political and party squabbles? Certainly not; amidst all this state warfare he was engaged in a threefold series of labours, as architect, educator, and reformer. The works at Windsor were steadily carried on till their completion, about 1374; his twelve episcopal castles underwent extensive repairs, for which he purchased stone from the once noted quarries near Quar Abbey, in the Isle of Wight. He seems to have had a species of enthusiasm for road-making, bridge-building, and church-restoring. Even the providing communion plate for poor parishes, and rich "vestments" for poorer vicars, cost him large sums. He is said to have given 113 "chalices," and 100 "pairs of vestments" to various churches. The changes made in Windsor Castle under Henry VII., Elizabeth, Charles II., William III., and George IV., have made almost a new structure of the old Norman fortress; but some ancient and time-worn towers will long remind imperially, and less exalted visitors, of William of Wykeham. Perhaps some will regard Winchester Cathedral as more likely to preserve the memory of this architectural genius; but the skill of others prevents him from receiving exclusive honours as a cathedral restorer, in which work he was aided by the taste of Bishop Edyngton and the skill of the architect William Winford.

We have called William of Wykeham an educator. This was shown by the zeal with which he urged on the completion of the grammar-school at Winchester and his New College at Oxford. The plans for these noble foundations were formed in the midst of the bishop's political troubles, and he lived to see both in full operation. The school was opened in 1373, and the college on the 14th of April, 1386, when the warden and "poor scholars" walked in procession from their temporary halls, and entered "the College of St. Mary of Winchester, in Oxford," chanting the Litany. Whenever the Wykehamites have sung the Dulce Domum ("sweetly sing of home") around "the Domum tree," or have meditated on the plain advice written on the schoolroom wall, "Learn, go, or be whipped," or have gazed with sensitive recollections on the school-rod, formed of "four apple-twigs," in each case they have doubtless ever paid high honours to the name of their great founder. The bishop's jewelled crosier, his gloves and episcopal ring, preserved in New College, are far less impressive memorials of their former owner, than the noble foundations originated by his grand liberality.

But, while Windsor, Winchester, and Oxford speak of the architect and the educator, it must not be forgotten that this energetic man was also a reformer of abuses. The princely* Hospital of St. Cross, Winchester, worried this bishop in his day, as it has perplexed the Court of Chancery in our own time. The master of St. Cross had no objection to continue the due number of prayers for the founder's soul, but he grieved much over the jugs of ale and the hundred dinners a-day to a set of shoeless beggars. To appropriate the good things of the charity to his own use and comfort, seemed a natural, if not a highly laudable, proceeding. William of Wykeham took a different view of the matter, requested a sight of the account-books, and even hinted that "the poor of Christ" were being defrauded. This was more than the master of St. Cross could bear; he stood upon his dignity: "it was not the custom" to show the account-books, and he really must, with great respect, decline to furnish accounts. Now there were no Charity Commissioners in those times, so William of Wykeham became his own commissioner, and instituted a suit on behalf of the poor. The master fought like a Trojan for the spoil, battled the case in every court, and finally appealed to the Pope. The bishop at last conquered, and the poor, the halt, and the blind received again their rightful portions.

William of Wykeham combined in a remarkable degree the active and the contemplative habits. Twenty years before his death he began to make special preparations for the event. He selected his burial-place in the cathedral, appointed "chantry priests" to offer up prayers for his soul, endowed a night service, at which "three charity boys" were to chant litanies in his behalf, and for the souls of his father and mother. His will bears date the 4th of July, 1403; all the details of his funeral were described, and the alms to be given to the poor were specified, in August, 1404, and on the 27th of the following September, at eight in the morning, the greatest of Winchester's bishops died at White Waltham. The body was brought by various stages to Winchester, alms were given in the name of the departed to the poor of every place through which the bier passed, and fourpence was bestowed as a final dole to each poor person present at the funeral.

* In 1854 the income of this charity amounted to £16,000 yearly.

The prayers for the dead are no longer chanted for William of Wykeham, or for his parents, in yon triple-arched chantry, where his body rests; but his memory needs not the orisons of monks: Oxford and Winchester are his memorials, and Windsor's "proud keep" still suggests the name of its architect. He was not the head of any great intellectual or moral revolution, but he holds, nevertheless, a high, place among the able and energetic men who quicken the life of nations and elevate the character of a people.

W. D.

LIFE A RACE.

HE comparison of our life to a race is made repeatedly by the Apostle Paul; and nowhere with greater force and point than in the opening of the famous twelfth chapter of his Epistle to the Hebrews, where he exhorts Christians, by the example of the heroes of the Old Testament, to emulate the faithful of bygone days, and run with patience the race that is set before them. In the opening of the celebrated eleventh chapter, the apostle had given a formal definition of what faith is, describing it as the "substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen;" and then, as if he felt the utter inadequacy of any formula of words to convey an idea of the real nature and power of the marvellous principle of faith, he recalls the triumphs it has won in the persons of Old Testament worthies, as the best mode of explaining its operation, and enabling others to appreciate its power: and the conclusion he draws is, an encouragement to the Christian to run with patience the race that is set before him.

The allusion to the crowd of witnesses that surrounds the Christian, as through the dust and heat he presses onward to the goal, was no doubt suggested by the feature in the Grecian games which lent additional honour to the athletic contest. The struggle for the victor's crown took place in the sight of assembled Greece; and not the least incitement to the competitors was the presence of the heroes who, in past times, had won the same honour, and now sat beholding others contending for the coveted prize.

And so with the Christian. He may be running his race in some humble way, where he thinks no eye beholds him, and there are none to sympathise with his struggles; yet all the while he is really encompassed with a cloud of witnesses, who, though passed away themselves from the arena of contest, still look with sympathy on those who now follow the course they once trod themselves in sorrow, and toil, and tears. Now there are three lessons this remark of St. Paul may teach us:—

I. Life is a race to be run. II. We are each to run the course set before us. III. We are to run it with patience, looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith.

I. Life is a race.

A great many people seem practically to regard life as a period of existence to be got through somehow or other—as if humanity were a number of stray created atoms, with power of reproduction, flung upon this globe by chance; and that, finding ourselves here, we must make the best of it, and pass life as agreeably as possible, taking care, however, in some way to put ourselves right for a future existence.

Now this is altogether an erroneous view of human life. Every man and woman has been put here for some great purpose; every one has been given a work to do, a race to run, a battle to fight, and a victory to be won. And that man alone is living truly, and as God would have him live, who is actively engaged in fulfilling the purpose for which God has placed him here. There is no exception. Every human being that has been born on earth has had some race before him to run—some work that he is intended to accomplish. God has given us all our life-work, and it is ours to do that life-work bravely.

II. We must run the race that is set before us: not the race we may fancy would be pleasantest, or easiest, or most attractive, but the race that God has set before us. There are a great many idle, purposeless, workless Christians, who excuse their idleness by groaning over the position in life or society in which they have been placed. They have no opportunities—what is there that they can do? If only they had more money, or higher position, or wider influence, how much they would do! what busy, active, earnest people they would be! Such people want to learn that it is the race set before them they are to run. We might choose some pleasanter race, if it were left to ourselves; but in the end not half so good. Does not the commander on the neighbouring eminence know better how the regiment should be disposed, and where each man can best contribute to the success of the army, than the individual soldier in the midst of the smoke, and toil, and roar of battle? And so it is with us. We individually are bad judges of when it is best for us to fight, and in what course it is best for us to contend. We can each see only a very small portion of the great battle-field, and, surrounded with its din and turmoil, can only faintly guess at the great Captain's purpose. May we not trust Him? Does not He know best? Has He not promised that all things are working together for good? All things together—not each individual, but the whole great aggregate; not each isolated waif for his own good, but all together. We must not look too closely at isolated individual efforts and their immediate results, but to that which God is accomplishing in the Church and the world by the united efforts of all who are striving in the cause of truth, and goodness, and Christ: and that united effort of Christendom will only be successful by each one doing his own work—running the race that is set before him. If only the mist could be removed, and our vision enlarged and purified, we would every one of us see even now that each one has the race to run best fitted for his own moral improvement, best calculated to make him contribute most effectively to the success of the Master's cause. All of us shall see it to be true when the toil is over, and the victory won, and the dust of battle that clouded us and dimmed our sight clears away; for now we see as through a glass darkly, but then face to face.

III. The race must be run by each one of us with patience. Never in the world's history was there a greater need of bearing this characteristic of the Christian race of life in mind than there is now. The whole frame of society seems to be throbbing with a mad passion for success. Ordinary prudence, and ordinary reasonable progress, are considered eminently unsatisfactory. Men must make large fortunes in the smallest possible space of time. We seldom hear them putting the simple question, Is such a course right? and then abiding by the conscientious answer to that question, in their adoption or rejection of the course of conduct under consideration. And this chiefly results from the mad desire of immediate results—the absence of patience in running the race of life. The facts of Nature and the history of the world alike tell us that God gives the grandest results to protracted and patient, and not to spasmodic, work. The growth of a month may be prostrated by the storm that howls in baffled fury through the oak, whose life and power has been developing for years. The popularity won in a day has proved as brief as its acquirement was sudden; while the fame of those who have toiled through thankless years has been immortal. The world's patient workers have been the world's real regenerators. Paul might have accepted the sacrifices proffered to him by a Grecian mob, had he longed for immediate honour; but he loved truth better; was content to run his race with patience; and he has a nobler earthly reward in being enshrined in the big heart of Christendom. Luther might have had high place and honour among kings and emperors and popes, if only he would have given up that mad heresy of his, and let the Church sleep on her sleep of superstition and spiritual death. But it was the right and not the merely expedient course that he resolved to follow; and running with patience the race set before him, he eventually won the crown. It is true all the world over, and this truth—as every other truth concerning humanity—reaches its highest point and displays its greatest power in the life of the Perfect Man. The most patient life that was ever lived on earth, and the most patiently endured sufferings that were ever borne, were the life and death that redeemed the world. It is a grand achievement for any man to learn this—to make up his mind to run the race set before him with patience, and he can only learn it by following Paul's advice, and running the race, “looking unto Jesus.” How many noble lives have been wasted in looking at the others contending in the race, criticising their movements; and speculating on the probabilities of their ultimate success! How many precious lifetimes have been squandered in watching our own running, and thinking of the satisfaction with which spectators must regard the grace of our movements in the race! It is fixing the eye on such things as these that spoils many a life-race. Let our eye be fixed on the Master; he trod the same race before—not a roughness on the way but he has toiled over, not a thorn in the path but has pierced his blessed feet; and as we gaze on him waiting to receive us when the race is done, he gives us a returning glance of sympathy to cheer us in our course. It may be very trying indeed to hear the shouts of applause which greet the sudden and unexpected success of some one whom the world delights to honour, and who had no scruples in running any course that most quickly led to the reward; it may be a hard thing, while others are rushing hotly on and grasping golden honours in life, for us to run our race with patience—but will not the Master's “Well done, good and faithful servant,” make amends for all?

RELIGION IN THE RANKS.

BY AN ARMY CHAPLAIN.

CHRISTIANITY is not without its witnesses in the ranks of the British army as elsewhere. God never leaves himself without a witness on earth.

The good seed sometimes takes root, and brings forth fruit, even in the most unfavourable soil. It is so in the army, where very many things tend to lead the mind away from God, and to check the growth of true religion in the soul. More is being done at the present day for the religious instruction of our soldiers than has ever been done before; nor is the improvement of their social condition overlooked. The number of chaplains has been greatly increased; there is an active body of Scripture-readers, who may be daily met in our barrack-rooms and hospitals; tracts are freely distributed to all who are willing to accept them; soldiers' institutes have sprung up in almost every garrison town; the soldier's pay has been largely increased; he is better fed, better clad, and better attended to in every way than he ever was before. The influences thus brought to bear upon our army have not been without their effect: there is less immorality, less irreligion, among our soldiers than before; their social position is improved; the mortality amongst them is diminished. All this may be freely conceded, and yet it cannot be denied that only a very small proportion of our soldiers make a consistent profession of religion, or have become members of any Christian church.

The causes of this indifference to religion are patent enough to all who are conversant with the habits of our soldiers. There is a kind of traditional belief among them that a soldier cannot be a Christian; and, of course, when the soldier believes that he cannot be a Christian, he will never try to be a Christian. This belief is imprinted on the mind of the young recruit as soon as he joins by the veteran, whose own life tends to prove that the belief is well founded. The recruit is only too willing to accept a belief which seems to justify every excess in which he may choose to indulge. He thus becomes, in turn, the contaminator of others—the medium through which this evil belief is continued and transmitted in the ranks. Everything opposed to this belief he hates and denounces. A professor of religion in the ranks he believes to be a hypocrite, whom he is bound to denounce and expose; in doing so, he may count on the approval and sympathy of the majority who hold the same views. A soldier who professes to be religious must, therefore, have the firmness of a rock in withstanding the fierce attacks of the traditional impiety to which he is daily exposed.

The married soldier is, in a great measure, exempt from these attacks. He has a home of his own, where he may live as he chooses: if he worships God, he may do so, none daring to make him afraid. He is not exposed to the ribald jests or the coarse ridicule of his godless companions: his home may consist of only one room, but it is still his home, where he may set up his family altar and worship God after his own fashion. The best men in the army are to be found among our married soldiers; but, unfortunately, the number of married soldiers bears only a small proportion to the whole strength of the British army: it does not exceed one-tenth; and there are obvious reasons why it should not be increased. In some of the Continental armies, where the period of service is much shorter, marriage is altogether prohibited—in our own army it is rather tolerated than encouraged. One fact in favour of the married men deserves to be known: they are rarely to be found in hospital, and scarcely ever from illness incurred through their own misconduct. They are the backbone, as it were, of the Church in the army.

If people knew the whole life of a single soldier, where and how he lives from day to day, they would be surprised, not that there is so little, but that there is so much religion in the army. As regards material comfort, the barrack-room leaves but little to be desired—it is spacious, well-ventilated, and clean; but it is far from favourable to religious or intellectual culture. The picture which Cobbett gave of life in a barrack-room was derived from his own experience, and is in no respect overdrawn or exaggerated. It is difficult for a soldier to read, to pray, or to meditate in the midst of ten, twelve, or fourteen men, from eighteen to forty years of age, who, as a general rule, have little taste for study, prayer, or meditation. One bad man in a barrack-room may make every one around him uncomfortable by profane swearing, by ribald songs, and other means of annoyance. There is absolutely no escape from him, for the barrack-room is the soldier's only home—his bedroom, his sitting-room, his dining-room, his retiring-room, his study, his oratory. If unhappy or uncomfortable there, he is tempted to worse haunts than even the barrack-room. If he is of a studious or religious disposition, how can he be happy or comfortable when surrounded by a dozen men, most of whom are engaged in gambling, swearing, larking, boxing, dancing, or playing at single-stick? And yet it is a remarkable fact, that in almost every barrack-room is to be found one man, if not more, who is moral, religious, thoughtful, and studious—the recklessness, the folly, the irreligion of his comrades seem to have the same effect upon him as the drunkenness of the Spartan slaves upon the Spartan children. We knew a private in the Scots Fusilier Guards who mastered Arabic amid the noise and confusion of a barrack-room, and mastered it so thoroughly that he was able to act as interpreter to some Turkish sailors who had to appear at the Westminster Police-office. He then, under our guidance, devoted his leisure hours to the study of French, and soon learned to read it with ease, and to speak it with some degree of fluency. All this was done amid the noise and tumult of the barrack-room. But few soldiers possess the same degree of perseverance, or, we may add, the same amount of natural talent. We knew another soldier, a private in the Artillery, who studied Hebrew and Greek for the purpose of reading the Old and New Testament in the original, and succeeded in his object, though he never attained to a minute or critical knowledge of either language. He gave a guinea every year to the funds of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and instead of spending his money in dissipation, like many of his comrades, he expended it in the purchase of books. It must be admitted, however, that these are exceptional cases; there are few soldiers who spend their leisure hours in studying Arabic, French, Hebrew, or Greek, or who subscribe to our religious societies. Nor would it be fair to infer that what was done by one might be done by all. No one will affirm that every shepherd-boy might construct an orrery, because James Ferguson did so while tending his sheep. Such facts prove merely that natural genius and indomitable perseverance enable men to rise superior to the most unfavourable circumstances. If we could only persuade our soldiers to read their Bibles in English, we should be content, though they remained ignorant of Hebrew and Greek.

A truly Christian man will be respected in the ranks as elsewhere; but he will have a severe ordeal to pass through in the first instance. He will not be accepted as a Christian till he has proved himself to be so; the proof is in most cases very trying to his patience and powers of endurance. He is treated at first as a canting hypocrite, who presumes to give himself airs, and think himself better than his fellows. He is the object of many rude practical jokes, of cutting sarcasms, of jeering mockery. If he ventures to kneel down to pray at night, he may deem himself fortunate if he is not assailed by a shower of heavy boots, or disturbed by the singing of ribald songs. If he loses his temper, he loses his character as a Christian; if he submits tamely to such insults, he is treated as a milksop, whom any one may insult with impunity. The ordeal he must pass through is necessarily a severe one; but if he remains faithful to the end, unscathed by the fire of persecution, he attains a position of influence among his thoughtless companions, and often sways them for good. A man of this stamp becomes most useful as a medium of communication between the chaplain and his charge; he knows the character of the men; he induces some of them to join the Bible class; he points out those who are not altogether lost, and who may be won over to good by a kind word or a kind act. One thing you may safely count on, whether he be an officer or a private, he is not a half-and-half Christian: he is thorough in all that he does and undertakes. There is no neutral ground he can occupy; he has taken his side, and he must stand by it. He must stand with his sword unsheathed—the enemy may be upon him at any hour.

It is a great matter to provide some quiet place where Christian soldiers may escape from the noise of the barrack-room, and meet together for the study of God's Word and for prayer. There has long been a felt want for such places of refuge; and of late years there has been a movement to meet this want. The commanding-officers of regiments are always willing to give the use of the schoolrooms in the evening to such soldiers as choose to meet for religious instruction under the guidance of the chaplains; but few seem disposed to profit by this privilege. The cause of this apparent neglect may be learned from the following incident, which occurred during a recent war, when the writer accompanied the forces to the field. There was one particular station he could visit only once a week, as our army was broken up in detachments and scattered over a large tract of country. A number of Christian soldiers, in one of the regiments at this station, expressed a wish to meet together for prayer during the week, and they were offered the use of the schoolroom. The writer was disappointed to find that they had not availed themselves of this offer, and inquired why they had not done so. They assured him that they met regularly for prayer, and invited him to attend one of their meetings. He readily consented, and he was conducted to a solitary spot about two miles from the camp. An intricate path led through the bush to a clearing, about twelve yards square, seated round with wattles; the bush rose so high on every side that a stranger, unacquainted with the secret, could never have suspected the existence of such a place. There were more than twenty men seated on the wattles with open Bibles in their hands: some of them had never been seen at our

"Son and daughter, must I go
Far from ye, with nought around me
Save the starry dead?"—p. 778.

prayer-meetings before. It must have been a work of considerable labour to clear away the bush and to form this open-air oratory, which was not so comfortable or convenient as the school-room. They had to walk a considerable distance, and the place afforded no shelter from storm or rain. They were evidently much pleased with it, however, and all their religious exercises were conducted with much solemnity and propriety. On our way back to camp, our guide explained why they preferred the clearing in the bush to the schoolroom. "You see, sir, every one who goes to the schoolroom is seen, and becomes a marked man; for they are always on the lookout to see who are turning saints, as they call it. We old soldiers don't mind it a bit; we are used to it, you know; but the young lads who would like to come, don't like the idea of being jeered and laughed at. That kept back a good many of them, I know; so we old hands laid our heads together, and thought it would be a good job to have the clearing in the bush: and a good job it has proved too. We have a good many new members, who would never have gone to the schoolroom. We manage it in this way. If I see a likely lad, who is at all serious or well-disposed, I say to him, 'Harry, won't you come out for a stroll this fine afternoon; I know a nice walk through the bush; don't be afraid, there's no danger of our being spotted by the enemy.' Well, Harry says he is not a bit afraid, and out we go. I am always on the watch, you know, and, when the right moment comes, I tell him I think him a likely lad, as I have had an eye on him for some time, and I would like to take him with me to our meeting; if he don't like it he need not come back again, only he must keep our secret and we will keep his. Harry promises, of course, and I take him to our meeting, where every one bids him welcome. He likes it, and is sure to come back again; no one has ever turned back or told our secret. Well, Harry may hap to know another likely lad, and he brings him too; so our number is always increasing. Now, I have told you the reason why we took to the bush."

And thus we parted with this amiable company of bush-rangers, who had taken to the woods from far different motives from those which influenced the outlaws of ancient or modern times. Their open-air meetings were kept up till the close of the war, and we have reason to believe that they are not discontinued in the far-distant colony to which their promoters have been removed. The truth is, that soldiers of a serious turn of mind are so sick of barrack-life that a change of locality, apart from other reasons, is a positive pleasure to them. They like a place where they can enjoy a little seclusion, where they can escape from the din and noise of their more boisterous companions. We have known a chaplain attempt to open a Bible-class in barracks, when the attendance has been so small that he has at length been obliged to give it up. The same chaplain, on opening a class for the same men at his own private house, found that he had not a room sufficiently large to accommodate those who wished to attend. The only difference was the locality; but the locality, as we have shown, is a very important consideration, which ought never to be overlooked in the formation of classes for religious instruction in the army.

PRESENT AND FUTURE.

BY a cottage sat one eventide
 An old man: withered and grey was he;
 His son was resting by his side,
 A blooming bride upon his knee;
 Bright and low, and lower yet the orb'd day went down before them;
 Deep and deeper yet away, the world through starry darkness bore them.
 And the father said:—
 "Thus the life-light quits my soul,
 Wears the radiant chain that bound me;
 Toward the spectral deeps I roll;
 Woe is me, ah! bitter woe,
 Son and daughter, must I go
 Far from ye, with nought around me
 Save the starry dead?"

Upon a supreme summit bright,
 Above a paradisaical star,
 Three spirits dazzled in the light
 Of universes gazed afar.
 Vast and rich, and richer yet the radiant spaces spread around them;
 Deep and deeper yet away, the throbbing depths of Being wound them!
 And exclaimed the three:—
 "Death and fear for evermore
 Have vanished from our spirits' vision,
 Space is ours from shore to shore;
 From sun to sun existence turns
 In endless gloried godlike dreams,
 In realms of bliss and thought elysian—
 Our soul's home is—infinity."

T C. IRWIN.

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XLIX.

FRANCIS HEATHERLY GETS TIRED OF NEWBURY.

LL is not gold that glitters," is an ancient saying of undoubted veracity; and in no case was its veracity more proved than in the case of Francis Heatherly.

He was a man to whom Fortune had only recently been kind. He had worked on in obscurity—chained, as he boasted, to his desk from Monday morning till Saturday night. He had been brisk and busy, all his life, till just lately. He would have been brisk and busy now, perhaps, if it had not been for one thing, which, like the fly in the ointment, spoiled his prosperity. This it was which changed the whole current and purpose of his life. I mean his love for Josephine.

He had always underrated women as a class. He had sneered at the blind god and his artillery; and now the blind god had his revenge. He had smitten Francis Heatherly with one of the keenest of his shafts.

Most of his time was spent in walking up and down the street where Miss Graham lodged, and in voluminous confidences made to his note-book. He filled a dozen note-books in no time. He even became poetical. Sometimes Josephine was a rose, sometimes a star, sometimes a seraphic being, who was raised far above this mortal economy. In fact, there was no end to his rhapsodies.

The worst of it was, he had not the least bit of encouragement. Once he wrote her a long letter, using every persuasion and argument in his power. A wonderful letter, he thought it, written in a clear business-hand, and expressed with the utmost perspicuity. But it had no effect whatever. Josephine might have inhabited a different sphere, as far as mutual sympathy went.

He sometimes tried to forget her. He felt angry at her obduracy. Were there not other girls quite as pretty? And, after all, who was Josephine, that he should be so frustrated? A lonely woman, living in humble lodgings, and earning her bread! He would go into society, and lose all remembrance of her.

But this plan did not answer, any more than the other. It is true, the Newbury girls were pretty; but the word pretty did not in the least express the style of Josephine's beauty, any more than it did that of the Madonna of Raphael.

Sometimes he thought he would amuse himself by building a grand mansion in the country. But what was the use of that? He hated the country. He had no aptitude for country habits or pursuits. He would be bored to death without Josephine. Ah! that made all the difference. With Josephine, town and country would be equally delightful!

As it was, he began to be very much bored. He had nothing in the world to do. He was not a studious man; indeed, he never opened a book from choice. And he did not ride, or sport, or care for the amusements which are so necessary to men of leisure.

When the Josephine episode was wearing to a close—as it naturally would do in time—the fact stared him in the face, that he was in danger of being very dull. How would it be if he went abroad?

The idea was not displeasing to him. He had never been out of England, and it would be a nice occupation to whirl from place to place, seeing new sights. Besides, another thought suggested itself to his mind. He might have the chance of getting one more interview with Josephine. Of course, it would be only courteous and proper to wish her good-bye; and, when she knew he was going, who knows but she might relent? Yes; and actually, at the eleventh hour, consent to be Mrs. Heatherly!

Full of this new hope, he rose one morning in capital spirits. Though his arrangements were not completed by any means, he thought he would present himself without delay at Prospect Cottages. On the success of this final interview, the whole expedition would hinge.

He made his toilette with elaborate care. As he did so, it occurred to him to wonder at Josephine's persistent refusal of him. He was really a very good-looking fellow, he thought, complacently.

A couple of hours after his early breakfast, he found himself at Josephine's door. Then he began to get nervous. What if he were not admitted? But that was a false alarm. He was admitted, and at once.

The little servant, who waited on the lodgers, opened the door of Josephine's room; and, behold! there was Josephine herself.

She was sitting at work as usual at the table by the window. When she saw Mr. Heatherly, she rose.

"Don't let me disturb you, pray, Miss Graham," he began to say. "I have no wish at all to intrude. I only want a few words with you."

Josephine, having done what was strictly necessary, sat down again and took up her work.

Yes, she was as different from the Newbury girls as could be!

"If she would only marry me," thought he to himself, "what a happy man I should be!"

While he thought it, Josephine was picking up beads on the end of her needle, for the further adornment of a pair of watch-pockets.

He would have liked to sit and look at her, for a time, and do nothing else. "Bathe his spirit," as he told his book, "in the pure delight of her presence!" But this placid enjoyment would not altogether do. He had an inward presumption that Josephine would soon get tired of it. No, he must say what he came to say, and the sooner the better.

"I came to tell you, Miss Graham," he began, "that I am getting tired of Newbury."

"I am sorry for that," replied Josephine, picking up her beads.

"Sorry—you sorry!" exclaimed he, ecstatically. "Oh, Miss——"

"Sorry on this account," interrupted Josephine, determined not to be misunderstood: "there is so much for a man of your wealth and influence to do, in a town like Newbury."

"Do! I have nothing on earth to do," said Francis Heatherly, in a tone of despair. "What is there for me to do?"

"A great deal, if you were disposed to avail yourself of the opportunity," she replied, steadily picking up her beads. "There are the schools——"

"I hate schools!" replied he, abruptly.

"And the poor," suggested Josephine.

"Don't mention them, Miss Graham. I never hear the word poor, without being reminded of a squalling baby, a tub of soapsuds, and a string of wet clothes across the room."

Josephine looked very grave.

"Except, indeed, you wished——" began Francis Heatherly, betrayed into tenderness.

"It is for your own sake," she interrupted, coldly; "and because wealth brings responsibility. I can have no further wish in the matter."

Francis Heatherly sighed.

"I think of going abroad," he began, a few minutes after; "it seems to me as if I were not wanted here."

Josephine did just what he most wished. She raised her eyes and looked at him. What beautiful eyes they were, to be sure! In all Newbury there were none like them.

He began to think a little sentiment would answer better than anything.

"I am a lonely man, Miss Graham. I have no friends or associates. My home is solitary. No one cares for me; whether I go or stay."

"You are a comparative stranger," she replied—touched, he vainly fancied, by his complaint; "but friends are easily made in a kindly, hospitable town like this."

"Then you would have me stay—you wish it?" he exclaimed, hastily and prematurely.

"I wish! I can have no wish in the matter," replied Josephine, going back to her beads.

"Ah!"—and he put on his most lack-a-daisical air.—"you are very cruel, Miss Graham. But I shall not trouble you long; I am going away."

"What! at once?"

"Yes. I dare say I shall be gone to-morrow."

She said nothing: not a word.

"Miss Graham," he began again, "as I am going away—out of the country, in fact—and may never have the chance of saying it any more, I want to ask you—don't look angry—for an expression of annoyance came to her face, "if you are quite sure that you will not relent?"

Josephine shook her head.

"Because, if you will—and it is the last time—if you will, I shall just be the happiest man in the world; and I need not go abroad," continued he, hurrying on, to prevent her from speaking, "but we will settle down like a pair of turtle-doves, and not care for anybody!"

Josephine could scarcely keep from laughing; but she shook her head notwithstanding; and shook it with an air of such resolution, that Francis Heatherly was fairly crushed, as regarded all hope of her ever relenting. It was no use his sitting there languishing and sighing; Josephine would not have anything to say to him!

CHAPTER L.

LADY SYLVESTER MAKES A MISTAKE.

"AND now, my deary," said Dame Humphreys, wiping the tears from her wrinkled face, "now you will go in and have some tea."

"Oh, yes; I will go in, and God be praised!" again repeated Rachel, fervently.

In the sense of joy for a great deliverance, minor trials are forgotten. Rachel, for the moment, could think of nothing but the fact, that her most distressing fear was relieved. Very soon, however, the gaunt shadows, that must be met, began to gather round her.

Her husband's absence still remained a grievous and bitter trial. All kind of painful mystery gathered round it. He might, and, indeed, no doubt did, flee in a moment of panic, and thinking that Isaacs was dead. Her heart was sore troubled as she pictured to herself the horror that would seize upon him. Where had he fled to? What was become of him? How was it possible to undeceive him? These questions were brought vividly before her, and how could she answer them?

Dame Humphreys tried to persuade her that John would come back. "He'll never leave house and home on a venture," she said; "depend on it we shall have him back by night."

But Rachel had not the same hope of it that the old lady had. She thought John might have left the country.

If he did not return for the sale, Dame Humphreys said, she should fear so too; but she would keep up her spirits till after the sale.

The sale was fixed to take place on the next Thursday, and it was agreed that Dame Humphreys should take up her abode at the farm till then. It would not be right to leave the place while the furniture remained in it. But when the sale was over the house would have passed into other hands. Rachel would then have been homeless, were it not for the good offices of her mother-in-law.

"Of course you will come to me," Dame Humphreys had said.

A new tie seemed to unite these women, sorrowing for a son and a husband. For John did not come. In vain anxious hearts yearned after him day by day; in vain wistful eyes were ever looking out for him; in vain affectionate preparations were now and then made for him; in vain the hope woke with morning light, and waxed faint and weary with the evening shadow; in vain prayers were offered, and tears wept. The blank sense of absence was not removed. He did not come!

"I shall about give him up now," said the old lady, her head drooping on her breast.

It was the last night of Rachel's stay in her home. To-morrow was the sale.

The old lady had bore up bravely till now—in fact, she seemed almost the strongest of the two; but John's continual absence, and the heart-sickness of hope deferred, began to tell upon her.

"I am an old woman," she said, pathetically, "and trouble has come at the wrong end of my life."

As she sat by the fire, her head drooping, and her poor wrinkled face ploughed into deeper furrows, Rachel began to perceive, with dismay, how sorely the last few days had changed her. In fact, if this grief and anxiety went on, there was no knowing what the end would be.

Every possible inquiry and search had been made. It was not Rachel's custom to sit with folded hands. All had been done that could be, but without a particle of success. It was hinted by some consoling friends that John had made away with himself; but Rachel would not give ear to the suggestion a moment; no more would Dame Humphreys. Dame Humphreys spoke very well on this point.

"John knows what's right," she said to Rachel, "and depend on it, the proper feeling will come back in his trouble. He'll seek his God, not go farther from him."

In the meantime the sale came, and the house went, and still there was no trace of John. And now began that actual daily struggle with affliction that tests the strength and endurance of the soul. Rachel's whole life was one deep and silent grief. But for a time she contended against it. She did not lose, even now, her activity or her industry. She would not, on any account, be dependent on Dame Humphreys, and her husband's affairs had gone, as people said, to rack and ruin. She took up a business which she had some knowledge of, and tried to turn it to account. She worked with her needle at plain sewing and dressmaking, and whatever she could find to do. But it soon appeared that a more important work demanded her attention.

Dame Humphreys began suddenly to break up. There is no doubt her trouble about her son told fearfully upon her. From being brisk and active, she would sit brooding for hours. She would rarely go out. She would be always thinking of her son. She had a little likeness of him, and one day she brought it out, and hung it up over the chimney-piece. A few old tattered letters that he had written when a boy, and that had been put by in a drawer, were always being brought out and read. She would have the daily paper looked over carefully from end to end, in the vain hope that there might be some intelligence of John. Her nerves were always wrought up to a painful pitch. She would start at the least sound.

Her poor wistful eyes had always a question in them about John. Whatever attempts were made to amuse her, her heart never quitted its sorrow.

Tears, as she once said to Rachel, had become her meat night and day. Yet it was evident she had given up all hope. At first, such expressions as these were constantly being used: As soon as John comes back; such and such an arrangement will do till John comes back. But after a time, you never heard such a thing hinted at, as John coming back.

It was clear to Rachel that he had left the country. She never said so; but she knew that Dame Humphreys thought it too: for Dame Humphreys' health and spirits seemed to die out with her hope. She grew decrepit and broken down. Her friends and neighbours scarcely could believe she was the same.

"Ah, poor thing!" they said to Rachel, "she'll not be long for this world."

Rachel had, very soon, to give up all her employments, and attend only to nursing Dame Humphreys. She herself was worn almost to a shadow. You would wonder her strength held out so well.

"Two people destroyed because of us!" said Alice Sylvester, in hot indignation, to her mother.

"Nonsense, Alice! as if we were answerable for John Humphreys' wicked conduct," replied Lady Sylvester.

And then, she said, in a tone as if the vastness of the condescension would heal every woe, she said she should pay a visit to Dame Humphreys.

It was not often that her ladyship entered the house of mourning. Dame Humphreys was sitting by the fire, though the day was warm. Her head drooped on her breast. She would sit thus for hours, without raising it, or uttering a word. Poor patient Rachel sat beside her, her work in her hand, and the large-printed Bible open before her. The room was very silent; when, suddenly, came the clatter of the Sylvester horses down the street. The noise disturbed the old lady. A moment after, the horses stopped, and she looked up at Rachel in alarm. Her thoughts were ever recurring to John. Rachel saw that, in her face.

The door of the house stood open, and Rachel could see the footman alight, and hand out her ladyship. Then Lady Sylvester, in her trailing robe, walked majestically into the room.

There was no need to wait for an invitation when she, on a rare and magnanimous occasion, deigned to visit Dame Humphreys.

The old woman looked up at her with a keen, sharp expression. "Be you come to tell me anything about John?" asked she.

About John? The question rather staggered her ladyship. She thought her mere presence would sweep away every other idea.

"Because, if you are not," said the old woman, with great asperity, and setting the Sylvester dignity at open defiance, "you had better go away again!"

For once, Lady Sylvester was struck dumb with surprise; and a kind of shame too, if she had chosen to confess it.

"You had better go away," continued Dame Humphreys, getting more and more excited; "you have ruined my boy with your dishonest ways, and brought down my grey hairs with sorrow to the grave. What do we want with the Sylvesters here?"

Lady Sylvester did not answer a word. She turned round and stepped back to her carriage.

"It was a mistake," said she to herself; "these kind of people are not capable of appreciating us!"

The great, important us, standing out large as life!

CHAPTER LI.

"FAMILY INFLUENCE."

DECISION has in it half the ingredients of success. A purpose formed, is a purpose half carried into effect. This remark holds good in the case of Raymond Sylvester. His character had in it some elements of greatness. He had resolution, energy, tenacity of endurance, and self-control. He had no luxurious habits to overcome, or battles to fight with self-indulgence. He had been abstemious, active, and self-denying at all times. The purple was worn, not as soft clothing, but as a badge of his position.

Once free from the hold of prejudice, Raymond came out a new man; and there was no dallying with his lately-formed resolve. He set himself, at once, to consider what was to be done.

His total want of experience met him at the onset. No hermit of the desert knew less of the ways and means of the work-a-day world than he did. The world, in fact, which lay outside his narrow sphere, was like a piece of complicated machinery that stunned him with its noise and velocity; a machinery, nevertheless, with which he must have to do.

His ideas, at this juncture, were still of an exalted nature. He began to think of government appointments, and rich, warm berths, to which he fancied his position and birth entitled him; and, as a natural consequence, he ran over the list of his friends. It was a small list, when all was said and done. Straited means and crumbling fortunes had forced the Sylvesters into a kind of seclusion. Ever on the brink of ruin, they dared not launch out with the pretentiousness of earlier years; and so it chanced that, one by one, their family connections had dropped off. Raymond could think of but one relative likely to do him service, and this relative was his mother's cousin, the Earl Lynthwaithe.

His lordship would never have attained to the title if—as the old Lord Lynthwaithe observed, with great bitterness—if Margaret had been a son.

But Margaret had not been a son, and through this mischance the title lapsed.

The Margaret in question, or, to speak more correctly, Lady Margaret Lynthwaithe—the most imperious beauty that ever lived—became, in course of time, Lady Margaret Sylvester, popularly called my Lady Sylvester; and Pride, as the public opinion said, was matched with Pride.

To Lord Lynthwaithe, then, Raymond resolved to apply. He knew the peer was a man of large and brilliant connexions; and though no special intercourse had been kept up, still his help would surely not be denied to a son of so illustrious a house. Raymond was still somewhat entangled in the myths and fables of the past.

At any rate, he would lose no time. It appeared very important to get into something suitable, he told Alice, at once: for he had taken Alice into his confidence.

"Oh, yes, Raymond; and I am so thankful that it has come into your mind," said she; "but, pray, don't be too grand."

"No, Alice; but you would not have me go into a trade;" and there was a touch of the old spirit in his voice.

"There are honest and better people than we are to be found in trade," she said, with bitterness.

"But, Alice, I cannot lose my status. Think of my education. A young man does not go to Eton to end his career by selling tea and sugar."

"If we had sold tea and sugar," she replied, the same touch of bitterness in her tone, "we should have been more worthy of respect than we are now, and not have so many debts!"

"Don't be cross, Alice."

He said it in his old familiar tone. She looked up at him and smiled.

"Dear Raymond, I have not patience to think of it!"

"It will soon come to an end, Alice. I shall get a famous berth somewhere, and then you shall come and live with me—you and my mother. Don't look so incredulous; I am really going to work."

"And not be too grand?"

"Oh, no!"

"That's right, dear," and she went to him, and kissed him.

"Alice," and he gently detained her, the colour coming and going in his cheek, "Alice, there is one thing I want to say to you before I go."

"What is it Raymond?"

He looked down and said, in a low voice, and without raising his eyes, "I should like Josephine to know what I am going to do."

She was silent. A stern look came into her eyes. When she spoke, her voice sounded hard and cold.

"I have been ashamed to face Josephine!"

He said nothing more. He stood a few minutes looking down. Then he roused himself. But he said no more of Josephine, nor did she.

It was resolved—for the conversation went back to its old topic—it was resolved that Raymond should go up to town the next day, and try to obtain some employment.

Alice did not appear very sanguine about the advantages to be derived from Lord Lynthwaithe's patronage.

"I would be as independent as possible," she said. "God helps those who help themselves."

(To be continued.)

WISE IN HER OWN EYES.

A STORY FOR CHILDREN.

AGNES CLAYTON and her little brother Bobbie had each a flower-bed of their own in the pleasure-ground, that lay just before the drawing-room windows at Clayton Hall. The children were very proud of their little gardens, and vied with each other in their efforts to keep them neat, and full of sweet, bright flowers.

Bobbie was but seven years old, and Joe, the garden boy, sometimes helped him to dig up the ground when it was hard and dry from want of rain; he showed him, too, the best places in which to sow the little packets of seed given him from time to time by his mother. But Agnes, who was full ten years of age, rather despised any advice or assistance, and felt quite sure that she knew as well as Joe or any one else how to sow mignonette, or train up sweet-pea.

Every Sunday morning Bobbie and Agnes each gathered the very best flower from their little gardens, and laid them on the breakfast-table as a gift for their father and mother. Sometimes a bit of sweet-smelling wallflower, or a little cluster of lily-of-the-valley, might be found lying at each end of the table on the white damask cloth; sometimes only a little spray of sweet-briar, or a few heads of lavender; but whatever they had best at the time was always treasured up for the Sunday morning gift.

In the centre of each of these flower-beds stood a small red rose-tree, and as it was now the month of June, there were several tempting little buds peeping out here and there through the leaves.

"I know the flower I'll have for mamma next Sunday," cried Agnes, gaily, one fine Wednesday morning, suddenly throwing down her rake and skipping about on the grass: "it will be the best of all we have had yet."

"What is it? Show it to me," answered her brother, raising up a very dirty face from his work. Bobbie always contrived to smudge his face over with clay in his efforts to keep his little plot of ground free from weeds.

"Come here," said Agnes; "just look in there at that beauty!" and drawing aside a branch of the rose-tree, she disclosed a little bud much further advanced than its companions, with streaks of red already bursting through the green covering of the bud. "Now," added the little girl, triumphantly, "now have you anything as lovely as that in your bed? In spite of all Joe does for you, I don't think you'll beat that."

"I don't know," replied Bobbie, soberly; "but I'll try."

Soon an exclamation of delight from Bobbie told Agnes plainly enough that another treasure had been discovered, and she ran hastily across the grass to her brother's garden.

"Look," cried Bobbie, with sparkling eyes, raising in his turn a branch of his rose-tree, "look, Aggie! another just like yours bursting through the green. Won't it be jolly? I do believe they'll be the first red roses in the garden."

Joe came along the gravel-path trundling his wheelbarrow, and was immediately invited to a view of the rose-trees.

"Why, Master Robert, you are a great pair of gardeners, you and Miss Agnes," said he, smiling and touching his cap. "Those buds will be the first in blow in all the garden."

"There, I told you so," exclaimed Bobbie, in triumph, "and they'll come out both together."

"Of course I knew they'd be the first," replied Agnes, throwing a little grandeur into her voice that Joe might have a proper opinion of her cleverness. "Roses are scarce at this time of year; but, Joe, we intend to make a present of these to papa and mamma on Sunday morning, when they are full blown."

Hereupon a puzzled expression passed over Joe's face, and he scratched his head to relieve his mind.

"I'm thinking," he said, presently, "that those buds will never be full blown by next Sabbath morning."

"Nonsense, Joe, of course they will. Don't you see the red colour coming already?" answered Agnes, quickly. She could not bear that her plan should be so suddenly set aside, and her knowledge of gardening called in question.

But Joe could not be got to change his mind. "They'll not be in full blow before next week," he repeated, decidedly, nodding his head as he spoke; "but if so be you choose to cut them, they'll be a pretty pair of buds enough by next Sunday morning."

But this did not satisfy Agnes. "Joe," she persisted, "could we not help them to open faster; might we not pick them open some way with our fingers?"

"Lay never a finger on them, Miss Agnes, or they'll never blow on Sunday or any other day," responded Joe.

"Well, we might try with a penknife ever so gently," suggested Agnes.

"No, nor a penknife neither. Don't meddle with them at all. Take my advice," said Joe, returning to his wheelbarrow.

Every day after this the children visited their gardens, and watched anxiously the buds that would not open quickly. When Saturday came, Agnes was in despair to find the flowers still half closed.

"I don't see why we might not help them a little," she said, nervously, to her brother, grasping the branch as she spoke. "I am sure it could do no harm to draw down those green bandages with our fingers, and let the flowers come out."

"Oh, Aggy, stop. Don't you remember that Joe said it would kill them," cried Bobbie, eagerly stretching out his hand to save the flower.

Agnes let go the branch. "It is always 'Joe said this,' and 'Joe said that' with you," she retorted, in anger; "you never think for yourself. But perhaps I may have a full-blown rose in my garden to-morrow, perhaps I may, Bobbie, in spite of Joe's grand advice.

The sound of the wheelbarrow approaching rapidly over the gravel-walk caused the colour, for some reason or other, to mount high in Agnes's cheeks, and, without another word, she turned away, and, running up the grass slope, entered the drawing-room through the door of the conservatory.

But though she ran away from Joe and the flower-bed, she did not forget either of them. Every hour she thought with vexation of how her troublesome bud would not bloom out at once into a full-blown rose, if it were only just to convince Joe and Bobbie that she could be right as well as they. Yes, Joe, and even little Bobbie, had given her advice about it. Advice to her!—she who had always prided herself upon managing her garden so well, and needing no help from any one! So ran her thoughts.

That evening, at about six o'clock, when Bobbie was busy over his mug of hot bread and milk in the nursery, Agnes, hastily finishing her supper, made her way unperceived to the garden. With trembling haste she leaned over her flower-bed and grasped a branch of her rose-tree. One quick glance over her shoulder to see that no one was looking, and she began her work. Drawing away the green covering of the bud, she unfolded the delicate rose-leaves within. "Beautiful!" she exclaimed, in delight, as she carefully spread out one or two crimson leaves. "Won't Bobbie be surprised? Ah! but I wish they were not so sticky and crumpled! It's very hard to divide them. Oh, what's that?" she cried, suddenly, in her alarm letting go the branch, which swung back into its place, leaving two of the sticky, crumpled rose-leaves in her fingers. It was only a thrush in the garden-hedge; but Agnes feared every interruption now, because she knew she was doing foolishly. Nevertheless, she grasped the branch again, and completed her task. All the delicate young leaves were obliged to unroll themselves beneath her fingers, until, fearing discovery should she remain any longer, she hastened back to the house, scarce giving herself time to bestow a glance on the effect of her work.

"What a lovely rose-bud!" said Mr. Clayton, when he entered the breakfast-room on Sunday morning, and found Bobbie's offering, still wet with the early dew, lying beside his plate. "Why, Bobbie, you are quite a clever gardener!"

Bobbie's face glowed with pleasure.

"And am I to have nothing?" inquired his mother, smiling. "Where is Agnes? Has she quite forgotten me?"

"Oh, no," answered Bobbie, brightly, "Aggie has another beauty for you, mamma, just like mine. I saw her going to fetch it from the garden. She will be here in a minute."

But the minute passed over, and Agnes did not come.

Bobbie ran into the hall, and out through the glass-door, to look for his sister. He soon found her. Poor Agnes was sitting on the door-step, her face buried in her hands, and at her feet her rose-bud. Poor thing! It was no longer a blooming beauty; nothing but a wretched, dying, ill-used blossom. The leaves that were last night so rich in colouring were all blotched and torn, and their delicate green covering, turned backwards, lay drooping down the stalk.

As the glass door opened, Mrs. Clayton heard the sobs, and hastened after Bobbie to find out what was the cause of so much grief. There was no need for a long explanation. The faded flower almost told the story.

"Never mind about the rose-bud, Aggie, dear," said her mother, kindly, when she knew what had happened. "Come, and I will choose another sweet flower out of your garden for myself. But I hope my foolish little girl will not be too proud another time to take the advice of those who are older and wiser than she is. People that are wise in their own eyes generally find that they have been only very foolish after all."

Agnes only grasped her mother's hand in reply, but she did not soon forget the lesson taught her by Joe and her withered rose-bud.

KEY TO ENIGMA ON PAGE 736.

"Increase our faith,"—Luke xvii. 5.

1. I rijah	Jer. xxxvii. 12.
2. N aaman	2 Kings v. 18.
3. C helub's	1 Chron. xxvii. 26.
4. R echabites	Jer. xxxv. 6, 7.
5. E zion-geber	1 Kings ix. 26.
6. A doni-zedec	Josh. x. 3.
7. S hobach	2 Sam. x. 18.
8. E liakim	2 Kings xviii. 37.
9. O n	Gen. xli. 45.
10. U rijah	Jer. xxvi. 21.
11. R abbah	2 Sam. xii. 30.
12. F elix	Acts xxiii. 23.
13. A masai	1 Chron. xii. 18.
14. I shbi-benob	2 Sam. xxi. 16.
15. T ob	Judg. xi. 8.
16. H anani	2 Chron. xvi. 10.

ANSWER TO SCRIPTURE ACROSTIC ON PAGE 768.

"Oreb,"—Judg. vii. 25.

1. O see.....	Rom. ix. 25.
2. R ehob.....	2 Sam. viii. 3.
3. E hen-ezer	1 Sam. vii. 12.
4. B arzillai	2 Sam. xix. 32.

THE BOYVER

— Saturday, August 29, 1868. —

(Drawn by H. Woods.)

"I took him in his little chair to the warmest spot I could find."—p. 787.

A WATERY WEAKNESS.

BY GEORGE MANVILLE FENN.

A H-H-H! There, don't you take no notice of on it sometimes, and the perspiration on it always. my groaning, sir; that's my back, that is, Nice bit o' green swade, though, as any in the and all along of that bit of lawn-mowing and sweep- county—spongy, and springy, and clean. Deal o' ing, with the sun on it sometimes, and the rain worrit though, to get it to rights, what with the worms a-throwing up their casties, and them old starlings pegging it about and tearing it to rags, and then the daisies coming up all over it in all directions. There aint nothing like daisies: cut their heads off, and they like it; spud 'em up, and fresh tops come; stop 'em in one place, sir, and they comes up in another. I can't get riddy of 'em. That bit o' lawn would be perfect if it wasn't for the daisies, sir; but they will come up, and like everything else in this life, sir, that there lawn aint perfect. They will come, you know: they will live, and you can't kill 'em. They aint like some things in this life that won't live, do all you can to make 'em.

There, don't you take no notice of them; they aint tears, they aint; that isn't crying, that's a sort o' watery weakness in the eyes through always being a gardener all your life, and out in the wet. Only, you know, when I get talking about some things living do all you can to kill 'em—such as weeds, you know, and daisies; and of some things not living, do all you can to make 'em, like balsams in frosty springs, you know—I think about my boy, sir, as was always such a tender plant, do all I would, and about all the plans I'd made for him, and all cut short by one o' the sharp frosts as the good Master of all sends sometimes in every garden, whether it's such a one as this, sir, with good shelter, and a south aspeck, and plenty of warm walls for your trained trees, or the big garden of life, sir, with the different human trees a-growing in it; some fair plants growing to maturity, and sending out fine green leaves, well veined and strong, well-shaped blossoms of good colour and sweet smell, fair to look upon, sir, and doing good in this life; sturdy, well-grown trees of men, and bright-hued, tender, loving plants of women; some with tendrils and clinging ways—the fruitful vines upon your house, sir—and many clustering blossoms of children; and bad weeds, and choking thorns, and poison-berries, and all. Life's just one big garden, sir, and when I stick my spade in like this here, and rest my foot on it, and my elber on the handle, and my chin on my hand, I get thinking about it all in a very strange way, oftens and oftens.

Say I get a bit of ground ready, sir, and put seed in, sir. That's faith, aint it? I put those little tiny brown grains in, and I know in all good time, according as the great God has ordained, those tiny grains will come up, and blow, and seed in their turns. Not all though, sir; some gets nipped, and never comes to anything, spite of all your care, some slowly shrivels away, and those that do are generally the best.

That's the watery weakness again, sir. Don't you take no notice of that; only, you know, whatever I get talking about seems, somehow or other, to work round to my poor boy as we've laid in the earth over yonder by the old church—a human seed, sir, sowed in corruption, to be raised in incorruption, eh, sir, eh? Those are the words, aint they? And that's faith, too, you'll say.

We were quite old folks when we married, you see, not being able to afford it early in life, and when that boy was born, being an odd, old-fashioned gardener of a man, I was always looking upon him as a sort of plant sent to me to bring up to as near perfection as we can get things in a garden that isn't Eden, sir. And there I used to sit at dinner hours or teas having my pipe, as made the little thing sneeze, but kept away blight, you know: and then I used to plot and plan as to how I'd work him; how, every now and then, I should, as he grew, carefully loosen all the earth about his tender young fibres, and give him some of the best, well-mixed, rich soil when I repotted him, shaking it well in amongst his roots, giving him room to grow, every now and then, by putting him in a larger pot, watching carefully for blight, taking away all green moss, giving him proper light and air, and all the time while it was nursery gardening, treating him as his tender nature required.

Light, rich, loamy soil I meant him to have as soon as he was fit to go on a border, and then I meant to train him, sir; ah, that I did! I'd made up my mind that no one else should touch him, but that I'd train him myself. A weed shouldn't come near him, nor slug, nor snail neither, if I knew it, but I'd cover him over, and shelter him from all frosts, and then watch him grow and grow in the light and warmth of God's beautiful sunshine. And let me tell you that you people who live in your big towns don't know the real pleasure there is in seeing a young plant grow day by day, putting forth its wonderful leaves from out some tiny bud, where they have lain snugly shut up from the winter's frosts, then the beautifully-painted flowers with their sweet scents. There, sir, when I go to bed every night, in my humble fashion, I thank God that I was made a gardener, with the chance through life of watching his wondrous works, and how he has ordained that man, by industry and skill, can change the wild, worthless weed or tree into the healthy, life-supporting vegetable or fruit. And yet I don't know but what I'm doing you town-dwellers a wrong, for I've seen many a pale face in your close, crowded courts watching patiently over some sickly, sun-asking flower in a broken pot, watering it, maybe, with a cracked jug, and then I've longed to put that pale face down in such a place as my garden here—I call it mine, you know, though it's master's—to watch it brighten, and see, as I've often seen before now, the tears of joy come into the eyes of that pale face because things were so beautiful. There's nothing like gardens, sir, to make people good and pure-hearted, for there's something about flowers that leads the thoughts up and up, higher and higher. There's religion in gardens, sir, and I think if you put beautiful flowers within reach of people, sir, you do them more good than by showing them grand buildings and sights. There's a something in flowers, sir, that makes its way to the heart—not only in the grandest blossoms, but in the simplest; and I aint going to set up for a prophetic person, sir, but I mean to say that as long as this world lasts there will always be a tender love in every human heart for the little, gentle, sweet-scented violets. I've lived in big towns myself, and seen the girls with their baskets full of fresh-gathered blossoms, nestling amongst green leaves, with the water lying upon them in big, bright beads, and when, being only a poor man, I've spent my penny in a bunch of the fragrant little blossoms, and held it to my face, what have I breathed in?—just the scent of a violet? Ah, no! but God's bright country—far away from the smoke, and bricks, and mortar—and health and strength, and then it would be that a great longing would come on me to be once again where the wind blew free and the sun shone brightly.

That was, you know, when I went up to London to better myself, and didn't; thinking, you know, to get to be gardener to some great man, or in one of the societies, but there wasn't room for me.

I've heard about some poet saying something about a man to whom a primrose by the river's brim was a yellow primrose, and nothing more. I wonder what sort of a man that was, who could look upon the simplest flower that grows, and not see in it wonder, majesty, grandeur—a handiwork beside which the greatest piece of machinery made by man seems as it were nothing. But then, sir, that's always the way with violets and primroses, they always have a tendency towards bringing on that watery weakness. They do it with hundreds, bless you, if given at the right times. They're so mixed up with one's early life, you see, and with days when everything looked so bright and sunny; and with some people, I suppose, that is the reason why they act so upon them; while with me, you see, there's something else, for when I think of them, I can always see two little bunches lying upon a little breast, with never a breath to stir them,—bright blossoms, smelling of the coming spring-time, but soon to be shut from the light of heaven, and buried deep, deep with that seed to be raised where chill winds never come, where the flowers are never-fading, and where the light of love shines ever upon those thought worthy to enter into that garden of life everlasting.

For it was all in vain, sir: it was not to be. I made all my plans, I took all the care I could, I meant to train and prune and cut out all foreright and awkward growths, I meant that boy to be something to be proud of; but it was not to be: he was not to blossom here,—this did not seem to be his climate; and though I wouldn't see it, sir, there was the plain fact, that there was a canker somewhere out of sight where it could not be got at; and though I tried, and the doctor tried, all we knew, it was of no use, and at last I was obliged to own that my little fellow was slowly withering away. I used to have him out in his little chair in a sheltered spot, when there was sunshine, and give him a bunch of flowers to play with; but at last he grew too weak to be taken out, so I used to take him some flowers home, and it was always the same, he would hold them in his hand till they withered away, and then cry to see how they were faded.

And at last there came a day when he did not seem any worse than usual. It was one of those soft, bright, warm, spring days, that come in all at once, setting the buds bursting, the birds building, and your heart seeming to drink in a kind of joy from the soft breeze. I'd been to dinner, and was going back to the garden, to finish a bit of nailing in over there upon the south wall, that ought to have been done long before. Well, I'd got to the door, when my poor little fellow burst out crying to go with me; and at last, seeing how bright and warm it was, and how sheltered he would be there, under the sunny wall, we wrapped him up, and I took him in his little chair to the warmest spot I could find, gave him some violets and primroses, and a crocus and snowdrop or two, and then I was soon up on my ladder, nailing away, laying in young wood there, moving a branch here, and, being fond of my work, and soon interested, I was sometimes a quarter of an hour together without looking at our little fellow; but I was down four times to pick him a fresh flower or two, and the last time I was down I thought he seemed a little drowsy.

At last I got off to move my ladder, and had my foot on the round to get up again, when I looked at the little chair, and started to see that my boy was lying fast asleep, when, for fear of cold, I caught him up, and carried him towards our cottage; but I had not gone half-way, before a strange shudder seemed to run through me, and I stopped short to look in the little face, saying something that I knew would make him smile if he heard it; and then, hardly knowing what I did, I rushed home with my light burden, whose little hands were tightly holding some of God's early gifts of spring against the little breast now growing colder and colder.

No, sir, he didn't hear me; but there was just the faint dawning of a smile about his little mouth: for God is very kind to some of those he loves, and there was no sign of pain there as he went to sleep. And I can't think that I'm wrong, sir, in always fancying my boy where never-fading flowers bloom, for he was too young to have ever angered his Maker; and besides, sir, did He not say, "Suffer little children to come unto me," and, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven?"

Don't you take no notice of me, sir: that's a watery weakness; but, now, just look there, sir,

I went over every bit of that lawn reg'lar, last week, and then there wasn't a bit of daisy to be seen; while now, here they are coming up in a bunch. But it really is the case with flowers, sir, that those you want to kill and get rid of won't die, while those you wish to save— There, don't take no notice of me, sir: it's only a watery weakness.

BRUTALITY TO BRUTES.

BY THE REV. J. B. OWEN, M.A.

IN the simple Old Testament times and manners, our first introduction to Rebekah is by her graceful act of equal hospitality to Eliezer and to his weary beasts. No welcome from the lips of high-born London lady could exceed the courtesy depicted in the kindly words: "And when she had done giving him drink, she said, I will draw water for thy camels also." This was justice as well as pity. The need of the camels was equally pressing, perhaps more so, than that of their master. They had served him, it was only honest requital that he should serve them. The kindness of Rebekah acknowledged the claim of both.

The right of the domestic animals to our consideration is founded on the nature of things. With all his god-like faculties, who is more helpless than man himself, when stripped of the aids which he constantly receives from those numerous classes of inferior creatures whose qualities, powers, and instincts are so admirably and wonderfully constructed for his use? If in the examination of their natural instincts, we could discover nothing else but a singular adaptation to man's wants—if the lower animals presented no organs for their own gratification, no sensibility to pain or pleasure, no grateful appreciation of kindness, no capacity for suffering from neglect or injury, no senses analogous, though inferior, to our own, there might be some paltry excuse for simply making the best use for ourselves of the property in and dominion over them, which God has bestowed upon man; but when it is remembered, that it requires no extensive acquaintance with the science of natural history to perceive that the infinitely just and impartial God of Nature has provided every creature on earth with special organs and sensations for its own use and enjoyment, as well as, in the case of the domestic animals, for the service of man, then it is clear that God intended their rights to be as sacred, and as entitled to respect, as our own. Almost every sense with which man is endowed is equally theirs. Seeing, hearing, feeling, thinking, the sense of pain and pleasure, emotions of love and anger, and sensibility to kindness or oppression, are inseparable characteristics of their natures as well as of our own. Moreover, all our experience and observation tends to show that pity is on the side of policy—that the inferior animals are most useful when least abused—and thus in this, as in every other case, our duties and our interests are obviously identified. Mercy in all things is the best policy in man, as it is the highest attribute of God. Is it not a cruel contradiction then, which some maintain, arguing from the peculiar instincts of certain animals—such as the alleged antipathy between the bull and the dog, and the ardour of the hunting-horse in the chase—that any creatures were made and ordained to be tortured? It might be as fairly contended, from the wars and oppressions between nations and classes of mankind, that men were ordained to fight, and be oppressed. In both instances, whether of animal torture or of human wrong, it is a transgression and departure from the law of their being. It is a gloomy attestation to the existence and baneful operation of sin in the world. It is a spectacle to abase us, to make us blush, and weep with them that weep. Our original creation, and that of the animals, are both of the earth, earthy; dust we are, and unto dust we both return. The only difference between us constitutes a stronger plea in their favour—viz., if they have no after life, as we have, this is an additional reason why their short life that now is, should not be unnaturally made shorter, or oppressed, because they cannot be compensated in a future world. God forbid! He whose "tender mercies are over all His works," gave them their charter in His creation equally with our own. His precept is—"And to every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to every thing that creepeth upon the earth, wherein there is life, I have given every green herb for meat: and it was so"—and it must be so. Their right to the fruits of the earth is precisely the same as our own—viz., the original grant of the Divine Proprietor, for "the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof;" and not only so, "all the beasts of the forest are his," and so are the sheep upon a thousand hills, and a strict account of our dealings with them, their God and ours will require at our hands.

Besides, St. Paul reminds us, "every creature of God is good;" good after its kind, good for its natural use; and therefore none can be despised nor oppressed, without the sin of contempt against their God and ours. Wanton injury, or gratuitous cruelty, inflicted even on those creatures which, like the alligator, tiger, or serpent, are obnoxious to human safety, is a reflected offence against their Maker, and a trespass upon the purpose contemplated by their creation. All of them have a purpose to fulfill, for "the Lord hath created all things for himself." It is true, dangerous beasts may be legitimately destroyed. It is clear from the language of Scripture there are "brute beasts made (or appointed) to be destroyed." Their very destruction supplies the provision for other creatures. There is every year an interesting illustration of this economy of life promoted by death, witnessed in the gardens opposite my house in Chelsea. There is an acacia-tree, which every spring is denuded of its leaves by swarms of caterpillars, which cover the whole tree from the trunk to its remotest twig. When the caterpillars are full-grown and fatted with the spoil of the green leaves, they are at once removed by innumerable birds, as they afford the softest and most suitable food for their young ones. After a time, the seemingly dead tree again puts forth a fresh mass of foliage, and the young birds, which had been fed by its destroyers, unconsciously sing the praises of God among its hospitable branches.

If there were no wise arrangements by which the birds and beasts of prey subsist upon each other, their prolific progeny would consume all the fruits of the earth; myriads of them would be constantly dying by inches, and their innumerable carcases would so putrefy the air, that the earth would become one universal scene of festering corruption and death. Hence God in his wisdom and mercy sacrifices their lives by millions for the life of man; consequently, it is as ungenerous as it is gratuitously wicked for men to multiply their tortures. Even the vermin that excite our predicted enmity and disgust; "the poor beetle that we tread upon, which in corporal suffering feels a pang as great as when a giant dies;" the meek worm that turns upon the heel that crushes it, not in anger but in anguish, the writhings of whose physical agony assume the appearance of an impotent resentment; and the pretty insects that float upon the invisible wings of the sunbeams—all are the humble ministers to our health and comfort. Like Nature's scavengers, they remove by consuming the carcases of the dead and dying creatures, which would otherwise poison the air, and soon render the atmosphere one mighty sepulchre wherein to entomb all animal vitality. That was a gracious sentiment uttered by a popular writer, as he gently put aside out of harm's way a little insect which he had captured, "I will not kill thee; the world is large enough for us both."

Again, the Holy Scriptures summon our attention to a rich variety of moral and industrial lessons, which we may glean, if not too proud to stoop to such tutors as quadruped instructors. There is the hint of fidelity from the dog, gratitude from the ox and the ass, diligence and forethought from the ant, watchfulness and perseverance from the spider, and parental care and tenderness from them all. But if we could learn nothing from them, could get nothing; if, on the contrary, they merely disputed with us, as competitors for the possession of the earth, and of its produce, apart from any exchange or return whatever, still we should have no right to blame their Creator, much less to hurt or destroy them with unnecessary cruelty, because their right to life and food is as clear, divine, and holy as our own.

The third general ground on which we denounce cruelty to animals, is its brutalising influence on the cruel themselves.

This effect was so well understood by the ancients, that cruelty of this kind was severely punishable by their statutes. One of the laws of Triptolemus was—"Hurt no living creature" ("Archæol. Græc.," bk. i., chap. xxvi.). The child that tyrannises over the lower creatures, betrays the first index of a despotic and cruel man to his fellow-creatures. When the monster Domitian was first advanced to the imperial throne of Rome, he amused himself with tormenting and killing flies; his subsequent career was to torture and destroy his subjects. Our great moral painter, Hogarth, in delineating a series of youthful profligacies which issued in a barbarous murder, introduces the culprit in his childhood tormenting a wretched dog. Well may the poet warn us:—

"Ye therefore who love mercy, teach your sons
To love it too.

Mercy to him that shows it, is the rule

* * * * *

By which Heaven moves in pardoning guilty man.

And he that shows none, being ripe in years,

And conscious of the outrage he commits,

Shall seek it, and not find it, in his turn."

St. Paul admonishes us to "resist the beginnings of evil." On this principle, a Christian parent will check his child for killing or tormenting the meanest insect. To make a sport of suffering in any shape, has a hardening effect upon the heart, impairing the natural instinct of sympathy, which is as indispensable and distinct a sense of the human mind, as the sense of touch or taste. Let this tender fraternising quality become blunted or vitiated, the child grows up a monster, not a man. How many a name of the homicide or murderer, written on our calenders of crime, was first smeared in the gore of tortured insects, like a bloody ensign on the window-pane of its profaned home!

To delight in suffering of any kind—to revel in the convulsions of a baited bull, or in the racked sinews of a frantic racehorse, or the pantings of a hunted fox or hare, or the cruel mutilations of a dog or cock fight, or in the fierce struggle for life of the badger or otter, or in the bitter impaling of a fish—which sports once disgraced our national character, and some of which still indulge and stimulate the venatory instincts in man's fallen nature, occasioning a vast amount of gratuitous animal suffering, all tend to brutalise and debase the mind. The poor brutes avenge their wrongs by the retributive degradation of their oppressors to a level with themselves, like a tyrannical slave-owner becoming to himself a slave. If a gracious and loving God exercised his power over us, as man abuses his power over his inferior creatures—if the ruling hand of our heavenly Lord and Master always dealt with the scourge, and his word was ever accompanied by a blow, this earth of ours would be an antepast of hell, or as miserable a drama of hopeless thralldom as man often makes it for the poor helpless creatures who depend upon us for their food and ease, protection and shelter.

We involved them in our sin, surely they should share in our mercies. Well may St. Paul exclaim: "The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now—waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body;"—waiting for that philanthropic, glorious crisis, which will be the end of pain and penalty, and the last chapter in the chronicles of sin and sorrow. Then in the glowing stanzas of Isaiah: "The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them. And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together: and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice' den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain:"—and why? "For the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea;" and under its filial waves of universal amnesty, reconciliation, love, and adjusting mercy, "death shall be swallowed up of victory."

Thus it is the rule and tendency of the knowledge of Christ to evoke universal peace and fellow-kindness, and to extend the yearning of its bowels of mercy, far as the Redeemer's kingdom is to reach, over "everything wherein is the breath of life," reverencing the sacred spark enkindled in the skies, even where it is found burning in so mean a shrine as the organisation of a glow-worm.

When I pass on the highway a lean, over-burthened ass, crouching, alike from want and weariness, under a load disproportioned to its strength, and mark its ruffian driver beating with a bludgeon its head and loins, till the miserable beast, half frantic with agony and bewilderment, at a loss which way to turn, falls down as if to seek rest in death, and lies as though it were dead, insensible to the storm of infuriated blows by which its inhuman tyrant in vain endeavours to goad it on its legs again—when some sympathising passer-by venturing an appeal to spare it, is met by a volley of oaths and abuse, during which diversion the animal has a momentary respite—when I have marked the patient and forgiving look, and the big tear, like a man's, trickling down the creature's face gently and silently, as if it even wept meekly, lest a more obtrusive sign of misery should provoke a fresh infliction—I have remembered Him, who rode in his lowly majesty into Jerusalem, sitting upon one of them, and thought there was a day coming when his almighty power, that opened the mouth of an ass "to rebuke the madness of the prophet," would make the memory of their wrongs speak a fearful judgment in the condemnation of their oppressors!

Might there not have been something significant of the general tenor of these reflections, in the appointment of a domestic cock to be the unconscious minister of rebuke to Peter, the fowl's unconscious fealty to its lowly office contrasting strongly with the unwatchfulness and blasphemous denials of the apostle? There are many who, remembering their participation in the barbarous pastime of the cock-pit or other cruel sports, may well repent, and be ashamed of the low and vulgar inhumanity of such sins against God in the persons of his suffering creatures. There are many—perhaps some among our readers—whose unfaithfulness to Christ, whose forsworn vows of obedience to his Gospel, whose grievous backslidings and denials of their Lord and Saviour, whose pusillanimous dread of his cross, envenomed by the scorn, the wormwood, and the gall of the ungodly, has left them no other fitting posture except the son of Jonas's, who, when the cock crew, went out and wept bitterly. With this practical moral let us close. If all the rest of our reflections be forgotten, let this be remembered. Then with the soul's imbibing a Christian spirit—the humane accompanies the devout—we shall have no heart to ignore the dues of a groaning and travailing creation. We shall rather groan and travail with them. As St. Paul has put it, "Not only they, but ourselves also, which have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption." We shall pray, and long, and sigh for the on-coming day, when the music that struck its first sacred note in Bethlehem, shall charm an expectant universe in tune to its sweet minstrelsy, and "on the bells of the horses shall be holiness to the Lord."

Instead of cruel, indifferent, heartless thoughts concerning all creatures doomed to die, for the safety or the food of man, let us lift an eye of faith upon the appointment, as a perpetual homily and illustration of the one grand covenant atonement for the sin of man, by the blood and righteousness of their Maker; and let us be humbled at the reflection that, "for us they suffer and for us they die." The sin that made man mortal, infected with his doom of death all living things, but as the representatives of all things living went up into the ark of Noah, the antitype of that fact, is their ultimate interest in the salvation of the Ark of Christ.

NECESSITY AND LUXURY.

O two persons are, perhaps, exactly agreed upon the boundary-line which should separate the absolute necessities of life from its luxuries. With the very poor, habituated to scant clothing, restricted to hard and meagre fare, and limited, too often, to the barest decencies in the way of household accommodation, the things needful to mere existence may be summed up at a figure inconceivably small in the opinion of those more happily provided with the good things of this world. Taking into account alone the covering of the body, the distinction is assuredly a somewhat wide one between the simple garb of an English cottager and the innumerable swathings of an Oriental: such an amount of clothing being frequently carried by the latter as to render any attempt at walking abortive, the effort to move the limbs resulting in a heavy swaying of the entire figure from side to side—a species of locomotion described by an eye-witness as "one of the most singular misdirections of human energy that wondering man ever saw." To what absurdities of costume, indeed, we may, by fashion, or the gradual force of luxurious habits, become at length the slaves, is almost incredible; and it behoves us to look earnestly about us, and to bring ourselves to a knowledge of man's real wants in this respect, as well as in the article of food and other equally important matters, before we shall become so morally blinded by usage as to lose the sense to see and comprehend what alone is truly needful to our well-being. It may be said that it does not become any one member of society to prescribe to his neighbours what he may himself consider to be the sum of their actual necessities. These may reply—

"Oh, reason not the need: our basest beggars
Are in the poorest things superfluous:
Allow not nature more than nature needs,
Man's life is cheap as beasts."

Be it so. All that is insisted on is, that every one should try to ascertain for himself, with some degree of certainty, the point at which his actual wants end and his mere indulgences begin. Every man is the better for such self-discipline. Were each individual in the human hive in his turn to become a worker, instead of playing the drone, he would be better able to judge for himself what are his own capacities of endurance, as well as better able to discern how very little of the honey of this world's wealth is really essential to the sweetening of his labours. It is well, occasionally, for the post-captain to quit his stand on the quarter-deck and take a spell at the oar, if only to strengthen his thews and sinews, and acquaint himself of what mettle he is framed. Of the prisoners in the Afghan war—among whom was at least one lady, the heroic Lady Sale, bred up in the lap of luxury—we are told that they were reduced, not only to the necessity of washing their own linen, but, as their clothes wore out, were only too thankful to receive as a gift from their captors a piece of calico, together with a little flax, which with their own hands they were obliged to spin into thread before they could convert the humble material afforded them into wearable garments.

Now, there are very many worthy women in the middle ranks of life who think it no particular hardship to make their own apparel, even to their best visiting dresses; yet there are few, we believe, who would not at first sight consider that a little silk or cotton, ready twisted or reeled to their hand, as positively necessary to the success of their delicate manipulations. Yet the raw material, in the hands of those whose teaching had been in the hard but chastening school of adversity, was found to be sufficient to meet the exigences of the time; and the maker and wearer of those humble garments lived to return to her native country, respected and honoured for her graceful and cheerful yielding to the force of unfavorable circumstances which the voice of duty had called her to endure.

When, in the reign of the Czar Peter the Great, the legions of Russia marched to the Crimea and seized on the stronghold of Perekop, the royal head and director of the enterprise was quietly earning an appetite for his noonday meal in a ship-carpenter's yard at Amsterdam: doubtless, the labour he delighted in "physick'd" the pain of being absent from his army in such an hour of conquest. Even the heir of England's throne has not disdained to take a turn at the chisel and the saw—as royal a method as we know of making "good digestion wait on appetite." Perhaps the happiest moments ever tasted by king or kaiser have been those when, casting aside for a brief space, under the impulse of some earnest purpose, the barren luxuries of the great, and assuming the labours of the lowly, the hand has found out its cunning, and the freshened mind has gathered up its strength for the work of common men. None, save those who have tried it, can conceive how sweetly rest comes after toil, even though the worker lie stretched on the bare ground—sweeter far than the half-repose snatched amid the tossing of "restive sloth" that "finds the down pillow hard."

During some brief space, then, stolen from a life of luxurious self-indulgence, it is well that every man should take work upon him, to earn the bread he eats with the sweat of his brow, and feel for once the warmed blood sent healthfully coursing through his veins beneath the spur of aroused self-exertion. He who does so will find his account in many an after-suggestion of usefulness. Those who have had their eyes once well opened to even a single one of all the many delusions which obtain on the subject of the necessities of life, will be able to look with cleared vision on the true state of things around them. They will be brought to know that the imaginary wants of their own more artificial life in an age of over-civilisation have no existence in the stronghold of nature, and that what is "one man's meat is another man's poison." It will be found that that which is the chosen fare of the luxurious man is received with positive distaste by him who "dwells with humble livers in content." Turtle may be an aldermanic necessity, yet we are at fault if there be not some stomachs that would turn with loathing from the unaccustomed luxury. Less in his element were a field-labourer at a feast in Guildhall, than a wandering Bedouin chewing his grass stem in an Arab tent.

Even selfishly speaking, habits of discipline thus acquired will not be without fruit. They who have made themselves masters of the uses of toil may never, it is true, have to exercise their faculties in a precisely similar direction to that in which their experience was gained. They may never have to turn ship-carpenters on their own account, nor to become hewers of wood and drawers of water, nor be forced to put to sea in a coracle, and "bale out death with a pipkin;" but they may be driven by adverse winds of fortune to exchange their black cloth for "Oxford mixture," the silk gown for the alpaca compromise, the luxuriously laid table for a board of more humble fare; they may, under the forceful whip of circumstances, be chastised into a knowledge that limbs were given for use abroad in the world's highways, and not for cradling in the lap of self-indulgence. Then, should a household be suddenly thrown into disorder, should unexpected loss of means entail the necessity of retrenchment, he who has once made himself acquainted with his own real requirements, will be enabled without difficulty to sift clear the indispensable from the needless, and, braced and strengthened, rather than depressed, by adversity, will cheerfully take up new toils, finding gain, rather than deprivation, in the putting away of some of those accustomed luxuries whose enervating influence was never suspected until their forcible withdrawal left clear the field for wholesome energies to grow. Let us all look to it. We are, for the most part, far too much the slaves of our own fancied wants. The craving for luxury is, of all desires, the one most apt to "grow with what it feeds on."

So much, then, for the uses to ourselves of a true knowledge of our real needs of life. Next, let us consider what is the value of that knowledge as affecting our dealings with those around us. Out of our savings in the way of cast-off superfluities what rest to the weary toiler, what comfort to the sick and suffering, might not be afforded! What to us would seem but an insignificant sum withdrawn from a needless and idle expenditure, would be positive wealth to the indigent and labouring poor at our doors. At seasons of extreme cold or of great dearth especially, when the needs of life are greater, and work more scarce than at most others, and when sickness, consequent on a lowered temperature, will press hardly on all who are unable to provide for themselves the clothing and the food needful to their existence, the helping hands of those richer and more prosperous might fittingly and graciously be stretched out to the relief of the suffering. No better channel is open for the expression of our own thankfulness for the better means given to us. It was a saying of the pious Madame de Miramion that "the road of the hospitals is the path to heaven." Let us walk it, then, untiringly, and let our charity be, as was said of that of a countrywoman of our own, "as the dropping of fruit all the year round." Even when we have done all in our human power for the relief of the oppressed, much of suffering and of sorrow must still remain unmitigated and unconsolated with which a Higher Will than ours can alone deal in tenderness and mercy. A beautiful expression of our mere human powerlessness to redress the evils of mortality beyond a certain point is recorded of the good and charitable Hedwiges of Hungary, the wife of Jagellon, Duke of Lithuania. Some poor peasants came to her in tears, complaining that the servants of her husband had carried off their cattle, and that they were suffering from the worst ills of poverty, and consequent starvation. Hedwiges went to her husband and obtained instant redress. "The cattle have been restored to them," said Hedwiges, "but who shall give them back their tears?" E. L. H.

(Drawn by F. W. LAWSON.)

“The fatherless forgot their discontent.”—p. 794.

NOT DEAD, BUT GONE BEFORE.

I.

NOT dead, because in memory he lives,
And all men speak of him with softer breath;
But gone before, until the grave-bed gives
Her dead up to the Lord of life and death.

II.

The great ones grieve; but not alone his peers;
The cottage fire hath burned with lower light,
And peasant eyes have known unusual tears;
Strong hearts have bowed in sorrow since that night.

III.

Helping the helpless, on his way he went;
The children kept for him their brightest beams;

The fatherless forgot their discontent;
The widow blessed him in her grateful dreams.

IV.

But now the hearth is desolate and cold;
Hunger is standing at the wretched sill;
The sheep have lost the keeper of the fold;
The fatherless are greater orphans still.

V.

The widow, weeping o'er her infant son,
The oft-told tale of misery tells o'er,
And whispers to her sleeping little one,
"Surely he is not dead, but gone before."

BURTON WOLLASTON.

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER LII.

"A CHECK."

WITH regard to his mother, Raymond was in decided disgrace. She would not hear any more of his sentiments, as she called them. She declined to discuss the points.

At her age, she told him, she was not likely to desert her old principles, and the principles of her race. It made rather better of it when he told her he was about to pay a visit to Earl Lynthwaithe. But her anger against him, and her disappointment with regard to him, almost neutralised the assertion.

She did not see him off the next day, or say a word of kindness. Alice did both.

Raymond made it his first business to call on his titled relative.

Earl Lynthwaithe was a man who was more to be found in public, than at home. He had lost his wife, and his only son was travelling abroad with a tutor. Raymond had not seen him more than half a dozen times in his life. Before the Sylvesters were driven to give up their house in town, there used to be a few rather chilly family dinners exchanged between the cousins. But, on the whole, Lady Sylvester had no special liking for the man to whom the title had lapsed. It would have been her crowning ambition to have it appertain to her son: even now, in her secret heart, she often speculated on the possibility of it coming back. The merest shred of possibility, and without, as Raymond used to say, a leg to stand on. But there were no bounds to her ladyship's aspiring tendencies!

Lord Lynthwaithe was at breakfast when Raymond called, and, on the score of his relationship, the young man was admitted without delay.

"Though I have only half an hour to spare," said he, giving Raymond two of his fingers. "Never was a public man so over-worked as I am!" And even while he spoke he was glancing his eye over some document which had just been brought to him.

"My cousin is well, I hope," added he, a minute after, and looking up at Raymond. "Won't you take some breakfast?"

"No, thank you," replied Raymond, to whom the difficulty had occurred of opening his mind to so pre-occupied a person as his lordship.

"I had some thoughts of running down this autumn for a little shooting. Newbury stands where it did, I suppose?"

"Oh, yes; it stands where it did.

But by the autumn where would be the Sylvesters?"

Lord Lynthwaithe, after this slight attempt at doing the hospitable, had gone back to his document.

The half-hour was verging rapidly to a close. Unless Raymond seized the present opportunity, there is no knowing when he would get another. He therefore plunged boldly into the subject, and having considerable tact and skill, he put the case before his lordship in a few words. He ended by preferring his request for his lordship's good offices.

During Raymond's speech Lord Lynthwaithe's attention was painfully distracted between the correction of the document—the proof-sheet, in fact, of one of his own addresses—and the desire to give some decent consideration to Raymond's affairs. I am afraid the proof-sheet got the best of it.

"The fact is, my dear fellow, I am overrun with petitioners. The whole kingdom would hardly be too much to divide among them."

"I thought, as I had the honour to be a relative," began Raymond.

"Oh, of course—of course! and I will do what I can: you must leave it in my hands. By the way, I am sorry I cannot ask you to dine; but you will not be leaving town at present," and his lordship rose.

Raymond rose also, there was no help for it.

"Of course I shall be very glad to see you, when I am at home," said his lordship, ringing the bell, and ordering the carriage to the door. "Can I convey you anywhere this morning?"

"No, thank you," replied Raymond, scarcely able to conceal a touch of disappointment.

"Well, then, good morning to you. I regret excessively having to be so unceremonious, but public matters are imperative, and we have two committees this morning. Adieu!" and he waved his hand smilingly.

Raymond, full of vexation, made his way into the street. Delay in his case was the thing to be most dreaded. If he had to wait for that rich berth, he perhaps should lose the chance of getting it.

He was standing in the street, looking absently after the carriage of his titled relative as it disappeared round the corner, when some one tapped him on the shoulder.

"If I guess right, sir, I am speaking to Mr. Sylvester."

The man who spoke was a stranger to Raymond.

"Because," continued he, taking what looked like a writ from his pocket, "I have a little business with you, if you have no objection."

"What is it?" asked Raymond, his face white, and his lips quivering.

"It's this, sir: I arrest you for debt!"

CHAPTER LIII.

LADY SYLVESTER IS FORCED TO RETREAT.

It was a proof of the severity of Lady Sylvester's displeasure, that she never once, during the day of Raymond's departure, mentioned his name; added to which, she seemed wholly absorbed in some business matter of her own, and Alice saw very little of her. But the next morning, this business appeared as if settled; for, soon after breakfast, Alice, who was quietly working in her own room, received a summons.

"Her ladyship wishes to speak to you," said the attendant of Lady Sylvester.

It was habitual to the family to live in a constant state of alarm; and an undefined sense of ill made Alice step hurriedly to her mother's apartment.

Lady Sylvester was, to Alice's surprise, surrounded by various packages; and a casket, containing the old family jewels, stood on the table before her.

"Dear mother, what is the matter?" asked Alice, anxiously.

"Nothing to make you look so scared, child. Sit down, and listen to me," said Lady Sylvester, in a tone of great composure.

Alice sat down. She trembled, in spite of her mother's words. She felt sure that something of importance was going to happen.

Lady Sylvester closed the casket, and sat down, too.

"Alice," said she, "I am about to take a step which, though it may appear abrupt, has been well considered by me. I have looked at it on all sides, and am convinced that nothing else remains for us to do."

"What is it, mother?" asked Alice, fearfully.

"It is to leave Newbury; and at once."

"What! to leave the old home, mother!" cried Alice, with surprise, and yet with a certain sense of relief. If the policy might be altered with the change of residence, all would be well.

"Yes. It is impossible to hold on to it any longer. I have tried, Alice, and stood my ground to the last; but things have gone hard with me."

She paused a moment. Alice knew that she was thinking of Raymond.

"I have resolved to leave quietly, and without letting our removal get wind. We have many enemies in Newbury."

"Victims!" thought Alice, bitterly. "And where are we to go, mother?" asked she, aloud.

"That has been a matter of consideration, Alice; but I have come to a decision. There is but one refuge open to us, where we can go; I mean the Grange."

"The Grange!" and Alice started in dismay; "you do not surely mean the Grange, mother?"

"I do, Alice; I mean the Grange."

"But it is in ruins; it is a mere desolation. I cannot bear to think of it," and she shuddered. "Oh, mother, do not take me there," added she, in a tone of entreaty; "let us find some bright, cheerful dwelling, no matter how humble, where——"

"I do not like your humble dwellings, Alice; nor will you get me to live in them," replied her mother. "Our position requires certain things of us. The Grange may not be altogether what we like; but it is our own house. There is a prestige about it, say what you will. If we take up our abode there, it will merely be a retirement from one part of our possessions to another; any other move would involve a going-down in the world; and that I shall resist to the last."

"But, mother," and Alice struggled as for life against the purpose, "you cannot realise the state of the Grange, or the utter dreariness of its surroundings. Let us go abroad; let us go anywhere, rather than there!"

"You are a silly child, Alice; and if it were left to you, the dignity of the Sylvesters would never be upheld. I tell you I have seen the Grange but lately; and that preparations are being made for our reception."

"Oh, mother!" and Alice sat with a face of blank despair.

It was sad enough here—with loneliness, and disgrace, and danger on every side; but there, the loneliness would close round them like a shroud: there, in those vast dilapidated rooms, surrounded by marsh, and fog, and swamp—for the situation was notoriously unhealthy—they would be absolutely lost. And all to keep together the last faint shred of the worn-out purple!

But when her ladyship had made up her mind, it was like the law of the Medes and Persians. Alice knew it was vain to argue or resist; yet for a time, in her despair, she resisted. She besought and implored her mother not to take her to the Grange.

But Lady Sylvester was inexorable. There was no alternative, she said. The mortgagee was about to seize on the house, in default of payment: for the house, like everything belonging to them, was involved as deep as could be. It was quite time they withdrew, before absolute ejectment came; and to no other place would she go, in the wide world, but to the Grange. And she said it in a tone that admitted of no further parley.

There was another motive for her resolution. She had determined, with the power of her iron will, to crush out all thoughts or hopes connected with Harold Blake. She had kept a keen watch on Alice. One letter had been intercepted and burnt; and Harold, unknown to her, had been dismissed without audience, or even admittance.

On this point nothing could shake her. Their fortunes, she said, were under a temporary cloud. Alice was young, and beautiful, and a Sylvester. There is no knowing to what elevation she might not attain. And Harold Blake was the overseer of a silk-mill!

Raymond, even, kept firm to this fallacy. He had not retracted all his errors, and this was one. He had chimerical ideas of the future, as far as Alice was concerned; and he set his face against the suit of Harold Blake.

It never occurred to either of them that, perchance, the battle might be too hard; and the delicate organisation unfit to prosecute it to the end. They forgot how changed she was; how she drooped and faded; and how the iron was entering into her soul. How sad was her youth; how drear the prospect before her. They forgot that the human heart has been known to break, and sorrow to kill; they forgot this!

CHAPTER LIV.

WHAT RUINED MARTHA.

"Is Lady Sylvester at home, pray?" asked a rather determined-looking man, who had just rung a loud peal at the front door of the old house.

"She is at home; but that's no reason why she should be called to chance-comers," replied the butler, with some asperity. "And that's your way, round you corner," and he pointed to the back part of the premises.

"My way is straight forwards, and that's the best for us all," replied the man, nothing daunted by the coolness of his reception. "You'd best just tell her ladyship she's wanted."

The butler paused. It was generally felt, through the whole establishment, that evil days were close at hand, and dangers were lurking everywhere. In fact, the establishment had grown to realise that it was on the eve of dissolution.

"Perhaps you had better step in, and I'll speak to my lady," said the butler, after some hesitation.

"Ah, do," replied the stranger, with the smallest possible amount of respect for the Sylvester dignity.

He waited a few minutes in the hall while the butler was gone. He was shabbily dressed, and his boots made a creaking noise as he walked up and down. He had not cared to remove his hat.

"Which shows he does not know his place, whoever he is," thought the butler, as he made his way to Lady Sylvester's apartment.

Very soon he came back again. "My lady wishes you to call again, when Mr. Sylvester has come home," was the message delivered.

"Then her ladyship, for once, won't have her wishes gratified. I mean to see her now, this very morning. You may go and tell her so."

"What a silly child you are, Alice!" said Lady Sylvester, as the girl's face grew ashy pale. "The least thing frightens you. Look at me. I am as cool and collected as I ever was in my life."

Alice did not speak. She had shrunk into a corner, and sat there trembling, not with fear—her mother misjudged her—but with shame and anguish.

She knew that some disgraceful scene was coming—that some work of ruin and dishonesty had been going on, and was about to be dragged to light; and this made her tremble.

When the man's heavy foot was heard on the stairs Lady Sylvester laid down her pen. She was writing directions for the several packages which stood outside, and which were intended for removal to the Grange. Then she leaned back in her chair. She did not flinch a hair's breadth. All the pride and the resistance of a whole line of Sylvesters was expressed in her face as the man came in.

His eye glanced round the room, first at Lady Sylvester and then at Alice. After what appeared a moment's consideration, he removed his hat.

"Well, my lady, so I've got speech of you at last," he began.

"Perhaps you will let that speech be as brief as possible," was the reply of Lady Sylvester.

"That's as happens, my lady. I've got a goodish long story to tell. With your leave I'll tell it sitting down."

A flush of anger came to her cheek, but she said nothing. The man sat down.

"Happen you'll want to know my name, and what business I have here. Well, I'm not ashamed of my name. It's James Meadows, and I was born in Newbury."

Lady Sylvester cast down her eyes a moment; then she raised them, the unquenchable light burning as brightly as ever.

"My daughter kept a shop here, in this town. It mayn't interest you to know that I set her up in it. I'd worked hard, and saved a bit of money, and, thinks I, I'll invest it in a good thriving business, and my girl shall manage it. She was a first-rate woman of business, was my poor Martha."

It did not interest her ladyship in the least. She had taken up her pen, and was writing directions.

"So I sets her up, and goes and lives in Yorkshire, along with my wife's relations. And all would have gone well, for the girl worked early and late. I call her the girl, though she was over thirty a good bit. It's a way I've got."

Lady Sylvester went on writing her directions with great industry.

"She worked early and late, and she'd have done well, and saved money soon, but for one thing, and that thing has ruined her—debt!"

Alice gave an involuntary shiver. Gradually the man had ceased to address Lady Sylvester, and directed all he had to say to her. There was no lack of sympathy or of interest, here.

"Not that she got into debt," continued he; "it's not in our way. We never owed a sixpence, and no one was ever the loser by us, or would have been. It was you that did all the mischief. It was you that ruined my poor Martha!"

Lady Sylvester laid down her pen. "Is this all you came to say?" asked she, coldly, and without an atom of sympathy.

"No, my lady; but I'm a coming to it, if you'll have patience and hear me out. You went on having things and not paying for 'em, till you got deep into her books. Not too deep, mind ye, if you'd been honourable; but you wasn't!"

Alice hid her face in her hands. It was just the thing she feared. Perhaps worse even than that.

"You wasn't; and so it was like working in the fire. She, that's my poor Martha, got poorer instead of richer. In fact, you took the bread out of her mouth; that's what you did."

"All this is very unnecessary and impertinent," exclaimed Lady Sylvester. "I have tolerated your intrusion so far; but really, there are bounds to my endurance. When my son returns——"

"Ah! that's just it," interrupted the other. "I want to speak to you about your son."

Her attention was arrested now, in spite of herself. There was a quiver of the iron mouth, and the eyelids that had not flinched were a trifle lowered.

"You owed us three hundred pounds. The shop has to be shut, and my girl is ruined. You won't hear our complaints, or listen to what we have to say. Well, one day I get the news that Mr. Sylvester has took himself off. This is more than I can bear. It's the egg, my lady, as has broke the horse's back. It is easy to guess what course I should adopt."

The quiver was plainly to be seen now. A white ghastly look spread itself over Lady Sylvester's face.

"I went to the police, and set 'em on. I would not have let him slip if it cost my last penny. I sent after him to London. Well, I've just heard that he's been took."

"Taken! my son——"

She checked herself: it was an outbreak of feeling that, for one moment, had been uncontrollable.

"Yes, my lady, your son, and they've lodged him pretty safe in gaol by now!"

She did not speak this time. She got up, opened the window wide, and then sat down again.

"If I hadn't done it, another would. There's a dozen writs out to my knowledge, and the bailiffs will be in by night. That's all I came to say, my lady;" and he rose.

Not a muscle of her face moved as he looked at her, which he did steadily. There she sat, as proud and as defiant as ever. She was sitting thus, when he left the room.

(To be continued.)

A TALE OF THE LORD MAYOR'S SHOW.

LITTLE Bob and Milly Pringle lived down the cellar stairs of a very high house in Cherry-Tree Court.

If you should ever happen to find yourself in the middle of Newgate Street, and you would like to see Cherry-Tree Court with your own eyes, you have only to take the first turning to the right and the second turning to the left, and you will be sure to discover it—or a place very much like it; but as you would not be justified in taking that trouble, I will place my memory at your service, begging a few moments' attention in return.

Cherry-Tree Court! does it not sound charmingly?

It reminds you of clusters of pretty white blossoms that scent the air, or later on of those fascinating red bunches of cool fruit that tempt your thirsty lips and your eager little fingers. And so you think you would like to have a Cherry-Tree Court all to yourself? Well, come and see.

This is Cherry-Tree Court. It is a narrow strip of pavement, with a shallow gutter running down the centre, and a row of tall, tumble-down houses on either side, looking as if they were intended as props to a very small roofing of sky. This is what is called a "blind alley;" that is to say, it does not lead to any other thoroughfare than that we have just left, but is closed up by a building as tall and dilapidated as the rest of its brethren. And where is the cherry-tree? Some years ago there remained a stump to tell its story of blossom, fruit, and decay; but one hapless day many longing eyes, such as are now peering at us over soapsuds and lazy broom-handles, were cast towards the relic, and there was a storm of dispute over various claims to the possession of it. This was unexpectedly settled by the most daring of the parties—none other than Mrs. Pringle—who got up at dead of night, perseveringly sawed the little stump from the ground, and rolled it down the hole in front of the cellar window of the end house, where it was chopped up into firewood, so that there is now nothing left of our cherry-tree but the name at the corner, and even that is nearly obliterated by the smoke and steam from the eating-house next door.

And this is where little Bob and Milly Pringle lived. Mrs. Pringle kept a mangle, and over the grating that protected her cellar window she had a board hung up, which contained a highly-coloured picture of a mangle, with the legend—which plainly shows how Mrs. Pringle earned her living, and that she worked hard for it. She was a widow, poor woman! and Bob and Milly were all she had to care for and to care for her. You will be glad to hear that they were generally very good children to her, and helped her a little in her work; but sometimes they thought themselves wiser than their mother, and got into trouble for their pains; and what I am going to tell you about, was the great incident of their lives.

MANGLING
DONE HERE

It happened on the ninth of a cold, murky November, when the street flags were very muddy, and the fog was very yellow, and upon this Lord Mayor's day Jack Frost was king. Woe to those whose fingers were ungloved, and whose boots were unsound! the nipping monarch pinched them well, you may be sure; and as for noses! they are his lawful prey, and are always within his grasp.

This morning Mrs. Pringle was up betimes—indeed she always was—and declared to Bob and Milly her intention of getting done very early to-day.

"Why, mother?" asked Bob.

"Because it's Lord Mayor's day, my dear," replied Mrs. Pringle, with the pride of a citizen.

"And will there be a Lord Mayor's Show to-day?" pursued little Milly.

"Of course there will, my child," answered her mother; "and I am going to see it to-day. Your aunt, Milly, has two windows in her house which will give a good view of it all; and she has kindly offered to let me have one of them to myself."

"But may we not go too?" asked Milly, with some apprehension.

"Oh, yes, both of you may come with me; that is, if you are good children while I am out this morning."

"Oh, won't it be fine!" exclaimed Bobby, dancing round the mangle, and Milly clapped her hands for joy. It was a great thing to look forward to, for the only shows they had seen were a monkey show, and "Punch and Judy."

"Oh, mother, dear!" added Bobby, "do tell us what it will be like."

"I haven't time to tell you all about it," said Mrs. Pringle, "for it is a very large show indeed. Imagine a thousand Punch and Judies, and it's bigger even than these would be."

"Oh, what a monster show it must be!" chorussed both the children.

"Indeed it is," continued Mrs. Pringle, warming with her subject. "There are hundreds of soldiers, on horseback, all dressed in scarlet and gold, and volunteers in green and grey; and watermen in red coats and badges, carrying the most splendid flags you ever saw; and then there are the men in armour—"

"What's that?" interrupted Bobby, open-mouthed with astonishment, for he had not heard of such a thing before.

"Why, my dear, the men in armour are the brewers' draymen, who are chosen to wear the heavy coats of mail because they are such burly fellows. These iron coats of mail used to be worn by soldiers many—many years ago, to protect them from the enemy's blows; but that was long before guns and cannons were thought of. And they look such a funny set! Then there are bands of music, playing more tunes than ever you heard in your life on the street-organs that come to this place; and there are lots of fine carriages, with grand people in them; but, last of all, and finer and grander than all, is the great state carriage containing the lord mayor himself, who takes his hat off, and bows, and smiles to all the people."

The grandeur of this description was so overwhelming to the two children that neither spoke for some moments, and then they could only say "Oh!" and "Fine!" and such expressions, over and over again.

"And now, children," said Mrs. Pringle, putting on her bonnet, "I am going to take home some things. I shall be sure to be back long before the time comes for us to go to your aunt's, so do not be afraid I have forgotten you, if I don't come back as soon as you think. Above all, do not leave home till I return; and take no notice of any rumours that the Lord Mayor's Show is 'coming,' for there are some people who like to say so 'for a joke,' as they call it." So saying, Mrs. Pringle lifted the great basket upon her head and trotted out.

To say that Bobby and Milly were prepared to wait the return of their mother with the utmost calmness and patience, would be as much as to say that they were more than human; and that would not be true, for the two children were very ordinary little specimens of humanity. Bob's blood seemed turned into quicksilver, for he seemed all over the room at the same moment, and his sister was scarcely less energetic in her anticipations. Every now and then they would turn to look at the clock—for Bob perfectly understood the oracle. It was a large old Dutch clock, whose measured tick-tack resounded loudly when the mangle was not working. Very soberly and deliberately went the pendulum this morning in the impatient hearing of the children, and they began to think that the clock must be going slower on purpose; it was such a hard-sounding, leisurely beat, hardly a quarter so fast as that little strange pendulum thing which throbbed so rapidly in their own breasts.

"I am sure it's going slower and slower," said Bob. "I shouldn't wonder if it wants oiling."

"Wants oiling?" echoed Milly.

"Yes; I see mother oiling it a long time ago, and 'praps it's got thirsty again."

"A clock getting thirsty! Oh, you funny Bob!" laughed little Milly.

But Bob began to think where he could find the oil and feather, and was looking amongst the pots and pans to find it, when both were startled by hearing a sudden rumble in the distance.

"It sounds like thunder," said Milly, under her breath.

"Why, you silly girl, there's never no thunder in November. I'll tell you what it is," added Bob, hurriedly, as a second rumble sounded, this time a little nearer, "it's drums!"

"Are you sure?"

"As sure as my name's Bob!"

"But it isn't the Lord Mayor's Show, is it, Bob, dear?" asked Milly, now becoming very much excited.

"I—I do think it is!" exclaimed Bob. "Who knows? The clock may have been going too slow, and mother may be kept waiting longer than she thought for."

"It has been a long time," said Milly, anxiously. "What a pity!"

"It's a shame!" cried Bob. "But I don't mean to be done out of it."

"What can we do?"

"Do! why do you suppose mother could expect us to stay in when we hear the show passing? Let us make haste and see it while we've a chance."

"But," demurred Milly, "mother said we were to be sure not to leave the house till she came back for us; so it would be wrong to go."

"Wrong fiddlestick!" was Bob's precocious exclamation. "Come along, and don't waste time in talking about it. We shan't see it at all if we do not run."

Ah, Bob! you were running away from your own conscience then, although you could talk so glibly about what "mother could expect." He took care to give Milly no time for reflection; so he seized her hand and pulled her up the stairs.

"Look sharp," he bawled; "it will be ever so far away in another minute."

They soon made their way to Newgate Street, where they found an unusual bustle of people and traffic of carriages. Several policemen were standing about the road and bawling to the drivers to "clear out;" but the people seemed to be going their ways in pretty much the same manner as usual: and all beside that Bob and Milly could see, was a glimpse of red coats on horseback, which were fast disappearing round the corner to the tune of the "British Grenadiers."

"Oh, Milly, it's all gone by!" said Bob. "Let us run after it and catch it, if we can."

So saying, he took his sister by the arm and dragged her up the street, jolting her and himself against the elbows and knuckles of the foot-passengers; but they felt that they could run a much heavier gauntlet for the chance of seeing the wonderful show. In this way they got to Cheapside, from whence the carriages had already been banished; and where the people were strolling about the roadway. But, strive as they might, they could only see the backs of the red coats, and Bob was ready to cry with disappointment. As they neared the Guildhall, the concourse grew into a dense crowd, which occasionally swayed about so recklessly, that the two wanderers began to fear for their own safety.

"Oh, Bobby—Bobby dear! let us go home," sobbed Milly, "it's no use stopping here any longer."

"Don't go blubbering in that way," returned Bob, roughly, for he was beginning to think he had acted very foolishly throughout; "I'll tell you what, though, I shall ask that big policeman whether it's all over."

So saying, he went up to a tall man in helmet and blue clothes; and gazing up to him as one would gaze up at a very threatening cloud in the sky, said, "Please, sir, is there going to be any more?"

"More o' what?" snapped the policeman. He had no time to waste on small boys, for there were many grown-up "boys" there who required a good deal of vigilance to keep them in order.

"More Lord Mayor's Show," explained Bob, trembling at his own temerity in holding a conversation with so stern a limb of the law.

"Pooh! my young shaver, it aint begun yet—they's only the sogers a-goin' to the 'rongdevoo.' The Lord Mayor won't start for another hour; a look here, youngster, you'd better be clearing off, and take yourself and your sister out of harm's way."

Bobby now saw what a silly thing he had done. Only the soldiers going to the— What did he call it? And now the only thing to be done, was to make the best of their way home again. However, the resolve came too late. At that moment the blare of more trumpets sounded in the distance, and there was a blind rush round the corner to see what might be coming. Milly felt herself dragged away from her brother, and carried violently along by the force of the crush, and mercilessly tossed about hither and thither. For a little while she was conscious of the shouts and yells of the mob, mingled with cries of "stand back," and other remonstrances from the policemen; then she came violently to the ground, and knew no more for a time.

And where was Bob? He felt himself carried away by another tide; but very soon was fortunate enough, by dint of dodging and ducking, to get clear of it—but—he had lost Milly! He went in the direction in which he thought she had gone, but nowhere could he find her. He called “Milly! Milly!” but he could scarcely hear his own voice in the fast increasing hubbub. It was now Bob’s turn to “blubber;” but all the blubbing in the world would not help him, and he knew that; so after a fruitless search in any but the right direction, he resolved to run home and tell all to his mother—if she had come back—who would know what was the best thing to be done.

How guilty and wretched he felt as he sneaked through the court, and crawled down the stairs! He now began to realise more than ever the evil he had done, and the grief he would bring to his mother. She was not yet returned when he arrived there, but in another moment, when he looked up through the grated window, he saw her cheery face, which looked unusually sunny then, with the anticipation of the treat her good little children would have that day.

“Now, Bob, my dear,” said she, as she came in and laid down her basket, “we will have something to eat, and make ourselves tidy and be off; just tell Milly I want her.”

“Oh, mother—mother!” said Bob, crying afresh, “Milly’s lost—she’s lost!”

“Milly lost, child! how is that?” asked Mrs. Pringle, her face turning white with apprehension.

“Oh, mother! I’ve been very wicked,” sobbed he; “we heard a drum, and I thought it was the show—I took her with me—and there was a crowd—and I lost her!”

“You naughty, naughty child!” exclaimed the distracted mother; “come with me, as fast as you can, to the place where you lost her—every moment makes it worse for her.”

With breathless speed they ran towards the spot where the crush took place; but before they had gone through Newgate Street they met a small knot of people following a policeman, the very one to whom Bob had spoken, who carried in his arms a fainting child. There was a rough bandage round the white face, and the blood was still dropping through the matted hair. What a sickening and pitiful sight for the eyes of the people!—what a horrible and heartrending sight for a mother! It was Milly.

“I am a taking of her to the hospital, mum,” said the policeman; “they’ll soon make her all right at Bartholomew’s. Somebody gave her a blow by accident with his cudgel and hurt her head—but cheer up! bless yer, she’ll be all right.”

But the mother said nothing: she only motioned to him to give her the child, and come along with her to the hospital. On she went, with a face as white and rigid as marble, Bob following her steps, not knowing how to bear the agony of his self-reproach; only feeling that he would give anything to have been the sufferer instead of his sister, whom he had led into all this pain and trouble.

Arrived at the hospital, a surgeon was quickly in attendance, and examined the hurt.

“It is very severe,” said he, gravely, “and I fear it will be fatal.”

Poor, poor mother! She tried to say something, but her strength all at once forsook her, and she dropped on the floor insensible. It was some minutes before they could recover her. In the meantime the little child was fast dying, and had some sort of consciousness now. “Mother—mother!” was her last feeble cry, which proved more efficacious to the swooning one than any other restorative, for she sprang up, crying, “I am here, my child, my darling!” and looking upon the face of her little one, saw that she was not suffering now.

The bereaved mother began wailing out to her dead child, and would not be separated from the body. All at once, however, she altered her tone, and broke out into little fragments of lullabies and baby-songs, and spoke caressingly to Milly, as though she were once more a babe on her knee. At this the doctors looked pained and anxious, and the onlookers and attendants wept, while Bob looked on bewildered, as though he saw a dream.

“Poor thing,” said a kind-looking nurse, answering the inquiries of the chaplain, who had just arrived; “the trouble has turned her brain.”

“And who is this?” asked the chaplain, tapping Bob on the shoulder.

“Her son, I think,” said the nurse. “He hardly understands it all yet, poor boy.”

“Oh, please don’t call me poor boy,” cried out Bob; “it is all my fault that this has happened; and I wish I was dead too!”

“Hush—hush!” said the chaplain, “you must not say that. Now come and tell me all about it,” added he, leading the sobbing boy to one side of the room.

Bob confessed all that he had done, to the good clergyman, who spoke gravely, but soothingly in return. “It is a lesson dearly bought,” concluded he; “you have lost your sister for ever, and turned the brain of your poor mother—at least, for a time. This will teach you that the smallest acts of disobedience may bring the greatest misery upon yourself and others.”

I must bring my story quickly to an end. As Mrs. Pringle’s only relative was too poor to keep him, Bob was sent to the poorhouse. His mother had to be taken to an asylum, until her mind should regain its balance and her body its wonted strength, which, the doctor hoped, would be the case in a month or two.

And Milly—I speak of her last, because you will be sure to think of her longest;—Milly has been removed from Bartholomew’s Hospital, but not to the desolate home in Cherry-Tree Court. Little Milly’s body is sleeping in a very tiny grave; and little Milly’s spirit is singing in one of those far-away mansions, where there is no more sorrow, nor waudering, nor any manner of pain.

THE BIVVER

Saturday, September 5, 1868.

(Drawn by M. ELLEN EDWARDS.)

"Aggy knelt down and gave Nelly's message."—p. 804.

NELLY'S MESSAGE.

POOR little Nelly sat alone in the drawing-room, trying to imagine she was not very dull; but the gilt-framed mirrors that hung 'neath the lustres held each and all a different opinion.

What they reflected was, a very desolate little figure and a very blank little face, though both looked very young, and both were very pretty.

You see, she was a very young married woman to be left alone, night after night, as Geoffrey would leave her, and she could not spend her evenings with Aggy in the nursery, because little Aggy's nurse rather frightened Aggy's mother, whose visits were expected to be paid at stated times.

Presently a latch-key is heard in the door, and the owner of the key comes up, and the mirrors reflect a tall, handsome figure and a very handsome face, albeit the expression is somewhat conceited.

"All alone, Nelly?—poor little woman! Where's Aggys?"

"In bed," says Nelly, shortly. It is a little aggravating when you have been left alone five nights out of a week, to be compassionated with on the sixth. "Where should she be? and do not call her Aggs."

"Too like eggs, eh?" says Geoff, stretching out at full length on a sofa. "Poor little woman, what a deal she did think of her baby."

This being delicate ground, Nelly took her dainty little feet gingerly off it.

"Do you dine at home to-morrow, Geoff? Bob has sent us some grouse, and I thought if you did, I'd have them cooked."

"To-morrow," says Geoff, emphasising his words. "Well, no, not to-morrow, Nell. To-morrow, as it happens, I'm engaged at the club. Don't think of me, however, in your arrangements. You and Aggy can eat the birds."

And the next day Geoff dined out at his club, and Aggy and mamma had an early little dinner; a chop for Aggy, and a bread-and-milk pudding; and Nelly and her child composed a little game. I am not prepared to say that Nelly herself enjoyed her dinner. Like many other girls, she entertained a rooted objection to underdone meat, bread-and-milk puddings, and slops of all kinds; but such things were good for the little one beside her, and Aggy would not eat without mamma.

And at breakfast next morning, Geoff both eat and enjoyed the grouse. And thus Nelly's life went on in a dull routine; so dull that her brother Bob, lately returned from India, and coming about this time to visit them, had his kind heart considerably harassed by the cavalier treatment to which his favourite sister was becoming so used.

Nelly, though she said very little, certainly felt very much; and the quick-sighted Bob was not taken in with her many attempts to feign unconcern; and even little Aggy noticed how frequently misty were mamma's blue eyes—Geoff was so constant now at the gaming-house, his neglect of his wife so complete.

Yet still, though he saw the evil, the power to remove it Bob felt was not his; but all too soon that power arrived.

It is night, very cold, very bleak, very icy, and a soul is passing out of the world.

A slight young girl, white as a very snow-flake, is lying in the midst of a grand, massive bed, her pretty hair loose on the pillows.

"Sensible now," say the doctors; "she may see her child if she wishes, sir,"

And Bob assenting by a motion of his hand, they bring her in Aggy.

"Aggy," said the dying girl, raising herself in bed, "listen to me, darling, and try to understand, because mamma's very ill, and it hurts her to talk. Papa is away now, I know, but he will come back again, and will want his little daughter to make him happy. When he does not want you, stay with Uncle Bob; but when he is quiet and grave, when you think poor papa is sad, go and sit in his lap, and love him, as you do with mamma when she's well. And then, Aggy (and now, though the words were still said to the child, Nelly's blue eyes were fixed on her brother), then if papa speaks, as sometimes he does, as if he were not always good, and so were not always happy, tell him mamma's last words, that she gave them a message to Aggy." And then, in the presence of death, the dying girl gave to the little one beside her the last words she should send to her husband on earth.

Very softly, very slowly were they uttered, that the little listening child on the bed might remember them all through her life.

"In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you."

How faint grew the dear voice! what a mere thread of life was keeping poor Nelly on earth!

"Aggy darling, kiss mamma; Bob, you will take care of my child."

And the mother, folding her daughter in a last embrace, passed away from this world.

Weeks went on, and Geoff stayed at Paris, where he had been at the time of his wife's death, not caring, perhaps, to visit his home now that the wife that had loved him was dead.

On Bob alone fell the charge of Aggy. Poor Aggy, too young to see through her mother's words, how the note that had rung through them was death, and who would now very sorely be missing mamma.

So thinking, Bob met on the stairs this very same desolate little Aggy.

It was usually a gay little face, sparkling over with sunshine, and with liquid dark eyes.

"Wo! hi! step there, little beauty. Where are you going?"

"Don't top me," said the child. "I can't play with you now. I'm looking about for my pretty mamma."

And the mother was lying in her grave:

Bob sat down suddenly on the stairs, and put up his hand to his brow. Who was he that he should tell the little child she had lost her mother; that the baby-voice might now ring through the house, and the "pretty mamma" not run out at the sound? Yet, if not on him, on whom must it fall? So the young soldier, with all his courage ebbing away in the most unregimental-like manner, took up Aggy on his knee, and commenced, perhaps, one of the most painful tasks he had ever undertaken.

"Aggy, you mustn't go 'looking about' any more."

Here Bob caught his breath.

Aggy opened her eyes wide at this intelligence, as denoting surprise, but otherwise took it quietly enough.

This encouraged Bob, and he went on again.

"She's—mamma's—gone away; but, Aggy, you must be good, or I shall just put on my red coat, and get out my sword, and be off into battle."

This was a prodigious threat. Bob was a very great pet of little Aggy's. The merest allusion to red coats and war, sent up her arms clinging round his neck, and her soft face nestling against him.

"Well, well, then you must be good."

Baby lifted up her face from his shoulder, and her lovely dark eyes were swimming in tears, and her rosy lips quivering painfully. The cry seemed inevitable now, and Bob resigned himself to his fate, but Aggy made very little noise.

Bob got up presently, and, setting the child down with some force, ran up to his own room, and then the key turned in his door.

And thus for some time things went on in this way. The servants sent up what dinner they pleased, and particularly bad taste, it struck him, they had; and, as before it had been with the mother and child, so now Bob and the little girl were company for each other. Only sometimes a chance remark of Aggy's would send Bob flying up to his room, to reappear later, with all his lightheartedness very obviously forced.

Weeks rolled on, and Bob, partly on account of his own health, which would not stand the continued sojourn in hot climates, but much more so from a remembrance of his favourite sister's dying charge, sold out of the army, and, paying his brother a certain liberal sum for his board and lodging, took now entirely the charge of little Aggy. Bob's idea of the charge of a child was a bath in the morning, pinafores all day, and a constant looking after the hands; and, it is needless to observe, that with notions like these, the taking care of Aggy was a doubtful sort of pleasure. Bob, however, went through with it bravely, till, when Aggy grew into a grave little girl, with ordinary features and glorious eyes, Geoff took it suddenly into his head to send her to Paris.

"Good-bye, Uncle Bob," said his disconsolate little niece. "I will give you my cat, and my dog, and my bird; but you must not stroke pussy's hair the wrong way, and you must be sure to remember to take Bouncer for walks, and you must always give Dick his groundsel on Mondays and Thursdays, Uncle Bob."

"Good-bye, Aggy," Bob replied, gravely. "I hope you will keep your curls in good order, and give some thoughts to the mending of your gloves, and always remember that to keep hands clean, the only known plan is to wash them."

"And you will take care of my things, Uncle Bob?"

"As surely, my child, as you attend to my wishes."

And certainly in their utter neglect of injunctions, they both kept their promises equally well.

After this, Bob's life was a blank, till the passing years brought round the day on which Aggy was expected.

Expected at nine, and at seven there was the table laid, groaning with good things most tempting to a traveller.

Then Bob, stirring up the fire into bright blazes of light, drew up his own large easy arm-chair, and sitting himself down in it, fell into a reverie. And the ghosts of the past rose up before him. Nelly standing in the light of the large chandelier, tossing up her baby, all her soft hair turned to gold, her blue eyes deepened in colour, and the happy flush of a very young mother on the transparency of her cheeks.

How pretty she had looked! what a contrast she had made to her dark little baby! So thinking, Bob fell asleep; and when he awoke there stood beside him that dark little baby. A girl of very fair average height, with a pretty rounded figure, and a very sweet face. The same liquid dark eyes that Bob so well remembered as belonging to his pet, and something of the charm of expression which had been essentially Nelly's. And this, even more than her frank, winning manners, very speedily replaced the girl in her old place in Uncle Bob's heart.

You would hardly have guessed from Aggy's manner how Aggy still grieved for her mother; but one night Bob, going up later to his own room, passed Aggy's, and heard how softly, and under her breath, the girl was sobbing out her heart.

"Mamma! mamma!" he heard her say; "oh, mamma, if you could only come back!"

Ah, "if," indeed! Bob knew something of the agony of that feeling. If she could only have come back, the loving young mother, the sweet, gentle wife.

But that was just what could not be.

Through all the troubles of their lives they could never again turn to Nelly. Never more would her sweet voice and eyes work their mission of love on the earth.

Yet Nelly was not forgotten.

Though now long years had passed since last she had tossed up her baby, since last she had spoken to Bob, her image was still fresh with her brother and child.

But though Aggy remembered her mother, by Geoff she seemed utterly forgotten. It was not till the close of his long, ill-spent life, and he lay on his death-bed, that her influence fell on him also. Wild with despair, he then uttered words that chilled Aggy only to hear, for they were utterly without hope.

"Oh, Uncle Bob!" cried out Aggy, "if I only knew better what to say."

"The message, Aggy, now give your father Nelly's message."

"A message from Nelly?" said Geoff; "a message from Nelly to me?"

"I have kept it all these years," said Aggy, hurriedly, "because—because the time that mamma spoke of never came; but I think it is come now, papa. Oh, I think, I hope it is come!"

"Quick, Aggy—quicker my child!"

And then, with the angel of death standing by, Aggy knelt down and gave Nelly's message.

"In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you."

Oh! words that were first uttered so very long ago, how clearly we see that your power cannot die. What Aggy's love, what Bob's life, had not done, the inspired words effected, even as long ago, on that bleak, icy night, his dying wife perhaps had foreseen.

The look of despair passed away from Geoff's eyes, the face that had always been handsome, even when disfigured by the traces that his many different passions left upon it, became radiant, as with a new hope.

Aggy, bending over him, caught his last words.

"Ah! Nelly, yes, you are right! Many mansions, and a place in them even for me— Oh! my God, who has given me so much, and for whom I have done so little, forgive me now."

And with this realisation of Nelly's last wish, the aim of Bob's life was accomplished.

• COBWEBS FROM A CROMWELLIAN MANSION.

A KNOT of mischief-making maidens, playing at hide-and-peek

With the sunbeam and with shadow, into cornerway and creek;

In a rambling, mouldy mansion, where without the shadows fell,

And within the spider revelled, since the day of good Cromwell.

Was it not a rare good pastime, skipping through forgotten rooms,

Bringing up those buried wonders, from their filmy, cobweb tombs;

Opening casements, never thinking, that the hands that closed them last,

"Earth to earth" had long since mingled, and were with the buried past?

Books that had been read and written, oh! so many years before;

Keepsakes kept for "auld acquaintance," fall to dust upon the floor;

One, a bookmark worked on ribbon, with a braid of golden hair—

"Forget me not"—how mockingly the motto paleth there!

Crumbling carpets, torn tapestry, where the moth hath reigned supreme;

Oaken faces in the ceiling, such as haunt a childish dream;

Mirrors dim, and damp, and dusty, falling from their faded frames,

Once gave back in gorgeous grandeur, noble knights and stately dames.

Childish forms in ancient fashions, crumbling from the canvas fold;

Just to think their joyous laughter once awoke those echoes old;

That they plucked spring's dewy blossoms, gathered summer's rosy sheaf;

Saw their children gather round them, in the sear and yellow leaf.

Now those children, grown to girlhood, full of merry laugh and song,

Shake the clinging dust and cobwebs, till they rest their curls among;

And methought, they fell prophetic, mid those raven tresses fair—

Of the spider-web that Time is weaving, oh! so surely there.

Thus the passing years will gather names unto its record still;

Curls will droop and bright eyes glisten, and youth toil Fame's frozen hill;

We forgetting, they forgotten, soon ourselves will be forgot;

Thus the wheel of life is whirling man unto the common lot!

Let us aim to leave behind us, not a name in trophied state,
Where the passer-by alone will read our name, our age, and date;

Carve it though in hearts that love us, they the faithful, fond, and kind,
And we live a double lifetime in the lives we leave behind.
A. M. N.

RELIGION IN THE HOME.

BY THE REV. W. B. MACKENZIE, M.A., INCUMBENT OF ST. JAMES'S, HOLLOWAY.

PARENTAL GOVERNMENT.

IT has been shown by writers on natural theology that the world we inhabit is adapted, with consummate wisdom, to be the dwelling-place of beings constituted as we are; that He who made the world as it is also made man as he is, and exactly suited the one to the construction of the other—that the world was made for the inhabitant, and the inhabitant was fitted to the world. Dr. Whewell has admirably demonstrated the fitness of the heavens and the earth to the physical organisation of man; while Dr. Chalmers has shown their adaptation to his moral constitution. The same wisdom is evident in the arrangement of mankind into families. That parents and children, brothers and sisters, the old and the young, should live habitually in each other's society as a family, is so calculated to promote their highest interests, to check and root out the evil tendencies of each, and cherish their virtues, as to show that the family arrangement is from God. The sternness of man's constitution is liable to defects which can only be effectually remedied by the companionship of woman, and the tender susceptibilities of women are apt to lose their grace, and degenerate into other forms, if restricted to their own society. So that the highest moral perfection was aimed at in that first social law, promulgated "in the time of man's innocency," "They two shall be one flesh." "Neither is the man without the woman, nor the woman without the man, in the Lord" (1 Cor. xi.). Each unconsciously moulding the other for good; not that the man becomes effeminate, or the woman manly—

"Not like to like, but like in difference.
Yet in the long years liker they must grow;
The man be more of woman, she of man:
He gain in sweetness and in moral height,
She, mental breadth."

But it is in the work of preparing children for the eventful duties of coming life that the wisdom of the family management is especially seen. When we remember how helpless a child is, and how many are his wants, the loving tenderness and gentle forbearance with which he must be treated in each stage of development, we shall admire the goodness and wisdom of God in making provision for this arduous and delicate task in the depth and fervour of parental affection; and it is rendered still more evident by the extreme difficulty with which any substitute can be found to repair the child's loss if either parent should be taken away.

In the Jewish law the religious training of children occupies an important part of home duty. When the Lord had enjoined the Israelites to love him with supreme and constraining reverence, and that his laws should be graven in their hearts, he added, as the code of their national education, "And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes. And thou shalt write them upon the posts of thine house, and on thy gates" (Deut. vi. 7—9). Thus their training was to be carried on in the daily, ordinary intercourse between parent and child. It was to form the matter of easy and pleasant converse with their children in the house, when they walk with them in the street, or fields, when they sit to rest, or rise up for labour, when about to sleep, or when awaking for the day's duty; the whole habit of the parent's life is to be rendered instructive to the child, and his observant eye quick to make the commonest events tributary to good—finding maxims of wisdom "in the running brook, sermons in stones, and good in everything."

"The trivial round, the common task,
Would furnish all we ought to ask;
Room to deny ourselves, a road
To bring us daily nearer God."

Water will not rise higher than its original level. Parents will seldom train their children beyond their own moral standard. The family takes its tone from the parents, and the children unconsciously grow up according to it. Like produces like. The family life shapes the life and character of the children. Exceptional cases may occur, but children ordinarily fall into the mould which, wisely or unwisely, their parents form for them. The copy may be set unconsciously, but the children grow up to resemble it; their opinions, habits, manners, and even looks and intonations of voice, are formed at home. As the children of healthy parents are usually endowed with good constitutions, which, if rightly cared for, may be expected to issue in robust and vigorous development, so the children of Christian parents, when brought up "in the admonition of the Lord," may be expected to imbibe their spirit and walk in their steps. The precept and the promise can be fulfilled only by godly parents, to "train up a child in the way he should go," so that "when he is old he will not depart from it." Experience shows that the children of such parents, who have received right training are likely to turn out well. The presumption is that, through God's blessing upon such parents' wise discipline, example, and instructions, their children will occupy an honourable position in this world, and live in the diligent preparation and hope of a better.

These results occur with the settled uniformity of a law. God threatens to visit the iniquities of the fathers on the children; but that retribution falls on the children in aggravated weight because they neglected the warning against their parents' iniquities, and reproduced them in their own misconduct; while the mercy of the Lord is upon children's children, because each generation was brought up in his faith and fear, and copied the example of their parents' piety. It was permitted to Abraham that, blessed himself, he should be a blessing to others. But, instrumentally, the blessing came to Isaac, through the wise and religious training he received from Abraham. "I know him, that he will command his children and his household after him." And so with the other patriarchs. And where families have, from generation to generation, been blessed with sterling personal piety,—where the parents and grandparents have been God-fearing, wise, truth-loving, frugal, industrious, conscientious, there is a strong presumption that their children will grow up in the same way, and transmit these blessings to coming generations. "The children of thy servants shall continue, and their seed shall be established before thee" (Ps. cii. 28).

This shows the great necessity of making a wise selection in marriage. There was a far-seeing wisdom in the prohibition to Abraham, that Isaac should not marry any of the idolatrous daughters of Canaan; and, afterwards, Moses forbade that a Jew should marry out of Judea: no heathen woman, however beautiful, or rich, or upright, was to form an alliance in a Jewish household; Ruth, for special reasons, was an exception. And the law, in spirit, still holds good. No small amount of the unhappiness, sufferings, obliquities, and morbid experiences of human life is to be attributed to the disregard of the great laws which God has laid down to provide for the physical, moral, and social well-being of families. Many a family is stricken with sorrow, and pressed down with years of intolerable anxieties, which, humanly speaking, might have been spared, if, in the greatest event of their lifetime, they had only asked direction of the Lord, and if they deferred to enter on so solemn a relationship until they had sought the just and reasonable sanction of some wise Christian counsellor, able to expound the will of God, and administer advice on a step so difficult, so responsible, and if once taken never to be retraced.

No parent will expect his children to be perfect, nor must he be disheartened if they are overcome by failure. Life is a conflict in which the most skilful combatants are not always successful. The battle may go against us, and we suffer the shame of defeat. But the difference between one man and another lies in the power of recovery. Anybody may fall; but only some speedily spring up again, and walk more warily for the future. Every one is tempted with evil, and prone to fall; but if he falls, it is not every one that recovers himself, and learns wisdom from his downfall. Now the children of godly parents, wisely trained by their example and teaching, are endued with a power of recovery; the latent springs of good are called into action; and the still, small voice of conscience is listened to and obeyed. Godly sorrow works repentance, repentance leads to forgiveness, and forgiveness brings strength. "Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast down: for the Lord upholdeth him with his hand." While the children who have had no such early training, when they yield to evil have no such power of self-recovery, but are apt to go from bad to worse, and, but for some marvellous interposition, fill up the measure of their iniquity.

The innate disposition and propensities of children vary. The germs of their future character lie within the bosom, but as yet so faintly developed and immature, that even the eye of parents cannot as yet comprehend them. The most sagacious parents, who watch their children with unintermitted anxiety, are unable for awhile to understand them, to "know what manner of spirit they are of." Mothers are usually more discriminating than fathers. Their love is gifted with keener intuition and they are less liable to err in discriminating judgment. It is never said in Scripture, "Mothers, provoke not your children to wrath, lest they be discouraged;" but fathers are cautioned against undue severity. Men are stronger in understanding, and support their conclusions with an array of reasoning which no woman would attempt; but nature has given women clearer intuitions to discern the right conclusion. This wise-heartedness makes judicious mothers peculiarly well qualified to deal with the every-day faults and failings of children. The mother is with them all along, and with considerate sympathy marks the rise and out-growth of the mischief. The father returns home, occupied with care and jaded with the day's worry, and is confronted all at once with the aspect of the developed wrong-doing. Of course he is apt to judge prematurely, and visit the offender, perhaps unjustly, with the marks of paternal displeasure. These things are not forgotten.

Childish follies are not to be treated as grave faults. Many things manifest themselves in the exuberance of youthful spirits, which will disappear by the force of natural causes. There are states of mind, as of the body, through which children have to pass. Certain diseases are incident to their years; you reckon upon them, and know that when one is over, still another has to come. Many of the failings of children are only the natural developments of power incident to their age. Some of their affections are strong, while mental powers are weak; the understanding and conscience have not yet taken their place in the child's self-government. He is impulsive rather than thoughtful; likes and dislikes are stronger than right and wrong. Some faculties are more developed than others. Swayed by fancy, the child wants power, and mind and body are alike unformed. All you can do with either is to train gently and wait. By-and-by things will assume their symmetry; time alone will correct many failings and supply many deficiencies; and conscience, through God's blessing on your wise training, will assert her supremacy and put things right.

The object which parents should ultimately aim at in governing their children is, to train the children rightly to govern themselves. Self-government is, after all, the perfection; all other government is but the scaffolding, reared often at vast expense while the building is in construction, but taken down as soon as the erection is complete. It is but the support to which the sapling is attached for awhile, but removed when the young tree can stand the storm alone. It is true that some trees are never able to stand alone, but require permanent support; and there are many people who sway to and fro under any impulse, and yield piteously to the power of temptation, who might have been preserved in their uprightness if they had some one stronger than themselves to lean upon. "Unstable as water, thou shalt not excel."

But others suffer from being over-governed. If as the child grows up you keep him constantly under your eye, and regulate every action by the word of command, instead of treating him as a wise and self-conscious agent, able to choose the good and refuse the evil, you are just making the child an obedient machine; and so long as your voice is heard directing his actions, the proceedings of his everyday life will be uniformly correct. But let circumstances separate you, and the child then growing up find himself alone in the thick conflict and temptations of life; perplexed and embarrassed by strange scenes, his helplessness attracts observation; snares which he never was trained to escape soon entangle his feet; and the sights of evil of which he never heard, and was never taught to shun, betray him to sinful acquiescence. He falls into evil, not so much because he was depraved as because he was ignorant. He did not mean to sin—nay, he meant not to sin—but he found himself sinning before he was aware. If, at that critical moment, when temptation was presented, his parent's voice had warned him to beware, he would have fled instantly from the scene of danger; but left to himself, he had neither the quick discernment to see his danger, nor the power of self-government to repel the temptation with righteous and resolute indignation. "How can I do this great wickedness and sin against God?"

The supreme object of parental government, then, is to teach and accustom the children to govern themselves. It is not by a continuous, persistent, unrelaxed government over them that they are prepared to enter on the arena of life and acquit themselves with comfort and success, but by instituting such government in them that they may know for themselves what to do and what to shun, and where to look for strength, wisdom, and deliverance, when the conflict waxes hot. Taught by little and little, and learning self-government while under their parents' eye, and while they can avail themselves of their parents' counsel, we may expect them to grow in wisdom to discern and power to fulfil the demands of duty. The playful fancies of childhood will then give way to the hopeful tendencies of youth. As youth passes on, the character assumes more manly traits, the eye is clearer, the judgment more matured, the will has more regal power, and conscience is seated more firmly on the throne. The young man feels himself under everlasting obligations to his parents, who, with infinite pains and watchful care, formed him to be what he is; and, above all, offers the homage of his heart and life to that ever-gracious Being, who gave him such parents, and added His blessing to their wise and godly discipline.

PITILESS.

RIGHT and left the flood is flowing
Of the dreamless city;
Right and left, when the sun is glowing,

When the soft west wind is blowing,
When the bitter snow is snowing,
To and fro are the people going;
No time is for pity.

They are full of pride and plenty—
World-worn forty, hopeful twenty,
Through the sleepless city.
Is not one, or eve or morning,

Beggar-born, or beggar-scorning
Careless youth, or maiden pretty,
Unto whom my woe is warning,
Can give passing pity.

God hath made us all, hath given
Strength and food for want and hunger;
And these weary hands have striven,
When these weary years were younger,
In the plenteous city.
Strength is gone, but hunger still
Feeds upon this bosom, till
God and death take pity.

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER LV.

THE CLOUD THICKENS.

THEY were both silent, the mother and the daughter. The blow seemed to have stunned them. Alice came to her mother and stood beside her. It was the last scene upon which they were entering, and they knew it.

A simple, every-day circumstance roused them. The great gong sounded for luncheon. Lady Sylvester rose. "Come, Alice, we must keep up appearances."

"Oh, mother, I cannot!"

"Yes, you can. Our race ought never to be seen at a disadvantage. We will go down as usual, and then I know what to do. We will retire—before" (her voice failed somewhat) "before any further mischief happens. We will set off for the Grange."

Alice shuddered.

"It is our only refuge, Alice. We are doomed to it. Lean on me, child; I am stronger than you."

"Dear mother, I can stand alone;" and Alice smiled mournfully.

The luncheon was set out as usual, in the great dining-room, and the two women sat down.

Alice could not force herself to eat. But Lady Sylvester carried matters with a high hand. She made desperate efforts to appear as usual. She entered into conversation on indifferent matters, and abated not a whit of her ancient spirit.

"A wonderful woman," said the voice of the public, "was Lady Sylvester!"

She had ordered the carriage to be at the door in half an hour. She was resolute to carry her point. She had sent many articles away already, and a handful of worn-out furniture was there, as a matter of course, the house having been partly furnished. The place was deeply retired, and that was what she wanted. Anything, so that she might get away from Newbury!

Alice rose from table as soon as she could, and went to her room. Her heart was racked with anxiety and sorrow. Not for herself did she mourn, but for Raymond. How intolerable would be his position! What utter ruin would come upon him! How keenly did she feel the separation! If she could but have gone to him, the solace would have been great. She was sorry, now, that she did not dissuade him from going to London.

"His conduct will only be misrepresented," said she, bitterly. "No one will give him credit for a single good intention."

Lady Sylvester had not thought much of Raymond, and what thoughts she had concerning him, ran in a different groove. She blamed him in her heart. She accused him of supineness, and of having allowed the means of rescue to go past him. She felt sure that he had not prosecuted his suit with the needful ardour and industry, else he would have succeeded.

"When did a Sylvester sue in vain?" said she to herself, with bitterness. "Never!"

The whole burden now fell on her shoulders. She, and she alone, must bear up the pillars of the sinking house. Well, she was thorough-bred, and knew how to endure.

She did not yield up the point, even now, nor did she think of any compromise of dignity, or any deviation from the course she was pursuing. She had arranged her plans with reference to the crisis that had come at last upon them, and it did not take her at a disadvantage. Though for the moment startled, she was soon as cool and as collected as ever. Nor was she troubled with remorse, or even a passing feeling of sorrow, for the ruin they had caused to so many.

What were the whole multitude of sufferers compared to them, the Sylvesters?

All her schemes now centred in the retreat to the Grange. Once there, and the old house abandoned, as by a sheer necessity, she fancied she should find a refuge. Angry tongues might clamour, but prying eyes could not behold their humiliation.

She rose from table with the determination to set

(Drawn by L. STRASZYNSKI.)

"Strength is gone, but hunger still
Feeds upon this bosom, till God and death take pity."—p. 808.

out at once. But a delay arose from the beginning. The butler, having watched his opportunity, desired to speak with her.

"If your ladyship has no objection," said he, respectfully, "I think we had better look out for fresh situations."

We meant the whole of the establishment. Lady Sylvester knew that perfectly well.

She had an answer ready in a moment. She said she intended to go, for a time, to their country residence. Her daughter's health required it. And as a second establishment might be inconvenient, there could be no objection to the man's request.

She spoke in a tone of unconcern, as though no other motive, than the one stated, could possibly be suspected—as though their affairs were clear and straight as noonday.

The man still hesitated. She was sweeping by, as though nothing more remained to be said. But the most important part of his speech had to be spoken.

"If you please, my lady, I am sorry to detain you, but I have been in your service nearly all my life. I am an old man now, my lady, and not so well able to work as I used to be."

He paused in a kind of embarrassment. She looked at him with that air of supreme indifference that she was wont to assume to those whom she considered to be her inferiors.

"During all that time, my lady, I have never received a farthing of wages."

Still she looked at him with that cold, indifferent air.

If it was so, and she said it in so many words, he had been under the patronage of the Sylvesters.

"That is true, my lady," said the man, waxing more and more earnest; "but patronage will not keep me from want in my old age. I should be much obliged if your ladyship would pay me before you go."

Before she went! What unparalleled insolence! To be dunned by her own servant. Her eye gave that peculiar flash it always did when she was angry.

"I cannot speak to you now," she said, "or, indeed, at any time on these matters. My son is from home. Your best course is to see Mr. Carlton."

The man gave a sigh of despair. Lady Sylvester pretended not to hear it. She passed out with great dignity.

"Is the carriage ready?" she asked of another domestic, who seemed as if waiting for her at the head of the stairs.

"Yes, my lady—no, my lady," replied the girl, in an agitated manner.

"Because I am going out. Tell Miss Alice I am waiting for her," said Lady Sylvester, stepping forward.

"Oh, my lady! don't you know what has happened?" cried the girl, clasping her hands in a kind of terror; "they have put an execution in the house!"

Lady Sylvester stood against the old oak balustrade of the staircase. For a moment, she put her hand upon it, as if to steady herself. It was the only sign she gave that the news affected her; and that sign was a transitory one. She recovered herself, in a moment, and, in a steady voice, bade the girl find the old butler, and send him to her. Then going into her room, she wrote a few lines to Mr. Carlton.

"In as clear and bold a hand as ever she had used in her life," was the remark made by the lawyer on this occasion.

The note, when folded and duly fastened down, was delivered to the butler by her ladyship's own hand.

"You must wait for an answer," said she, as calmly as though she had been sending out a note of invitation. This done, and Mr. Carlton summoned in a peremptory manner, she went to her room. A few moments' retirement was absolutely necessary; for nature could no longer endure the strain upon her energies. The forced calm was breaking up; and the woman so proud of her self-repression and her iron will, sank down on the floor, and lay there in an abandonment of grief terrible to behold.

But the paroxysm was soon over. She rose, and gathered up her long hair, twisting it round and round in a massive coil. Her hand still shook a little; but it would be as steady as ever it had been, ere long. The reign of repression and of iron fortitude was coming back. She was again herself—Lady Sylvester.

The lawyer arrived sooner than even her ladyship expected. He had met the butler on the road, and taken the note from him. The news had reached him of Raymond's arrest; and he was on his way to the old house on the common.

"Not that I can do any good," he thought, as he went; "but I cannot forsake the poor ladies in their distress."

"Now, Mr. Carlton," said her ladyship, in an imperative tone, "I want to retire from this very unpleasant affair, and the storm which a revengeful man has brought about us. And I wish to retire at once—immediately!"

The lawyer began softly to rub the back of his head—his habit under peculiar difficulties.

"And where may your ladyship be intending to go?" he asked, mildly.

"To the Grange."

"I beg pardon—where did you say?"

"To the Grange." This was spoken angrily and defiantly.

The lawyer made a dead pause. Lady Sylvester chafed against it with unusual irritation.

"We need not stay here," she said; and she looked at him with an expression of iron resolution that nothing could shake.

"Now," continued the lawyer, assuming a business-like tone, "I see no objection to your withdrawal, for a time, to any place you like. I object to the Grange, simply for your own sakes, and on the ground of its being barely habitable. But if her ladyship has made up her mind—"

"Which I have done," interrupted Lady Sylvester. "Exactly;" and the lawyer bowed deferentially.

"Then you can go there, provided nothing is recovered. The law is strict on these points, and the claims are numerous, as you must be aware. You must be prepared to abandon everything, even your jewels."

Lady Sylvester winced a little at this. Alice quitted the room abruptly.

Very soon she came back with a small casket in her hands.

"Here are all the valuables I have," said she. "I would not, if I could, retain one of them."

"There is another thing I regret having to mention," said the lawyer, politely. "Of course your affairs will be in confusion for some time. I cannot arrange them in a day. And there will be very little allowed for your immediate wants. You will kindly bear this in mind," added he, glancing towards her ladyship, who was still at the window.

She turned slowly round to him. "What do you mean?" she asked, haughtily.

"I mean—you will excuse my plain speaking, but the estate is literally eaten up with debts. Now the creditors are aroused and clamorous, I fear that nothing of it will be left."

She turned back to the window without speaking.

"I will do what I can," continued Mr. Carlton, hurriedly. "I only made the remark to impress on you the necessity of the strictest and severest economy."

And then, feeling that the conversation was treading on rather delicate ground, he began to hasten the preparations for their departure.

The old coachman was to drive them to the Grange, and then bring back the carriage. Carriages, horses, everything was to be sold. Beyond the actual necessities of clothing, they had to go literally empty-handed.

This was a bitter pill for her ladyship to swallow. She did not shake hands with Mr. Carlton. From some cause or other, she chose to regard him as an enemy. She gave one look up at the windows of the old house—one hurried look; but it told what was passing within. It was like the glance of a defeated general, at the fortress he has been compelled to abandon.

But she carried it off bravely. She began to speak already of the affairs being soon settled; and the temporary humiliation over. She did not seem to bestow even a passing thought on the disgracefulness of their fall.

It was a dreary journey. The road soon quitted the smooth turnpike, and led down almost inaccessible lanes—not rural and pleasant, but bleak and open on either side—to a wild waste common, that had scarce an atom of pasture. No houses or villages were even in sight. They met scarce a human being during the whole of the ride.

Alice did not speak many words. Once, when a white spectral-looking building appeared in the distance, she gave a kind of shiver. She knew it was the Grange.

Standing desolate and decayed; a sullen moat, with green, stagnant waters winding about it; a waste, neglected garden, with rank grass and weeds, and a few worn-out shrubs; a broken flight of steps, leading to a kind of terrace overgrown with weeds, and a dilapidated statue at either end: a place utterly forlorn and lonesome; telling of past greatness, but of present ruin. This was the Grange.

The great iron gates were too rusty with disuse to make it an easy task to open them; but the old coachman succeeded at length, and the carriage made its way along what was called the drive, but which, like the rest of the place, was overgrown with weeds. Then it stopped before the decaying steps of the terrace. Lady Sylvester alighted.

Alice got out as quickly as she could. There was a strange, horror-stricken look on her face. She glanced fearfully up at the white, ghostly mansion which was to be her home.

"It will not be so bad as you think, Alice," said her mother, still reassuring her. "We can make some improvements; and there is a kind of grandeur about the old place yet. See! that is the crest of the Sylvesters over the doorway; and the motto, 'Noblesse oblige.'"

The contemplation of this motto seemed to afford her ladyship a vast amount of satisfaction.

They had now entered the vast empty hall, in which was literally nothing to be seen. The blackened ceiling and damp walls struck a kind of chill even into her ladyship.

"We will go forward, Alice," she said, hastily; "some of the rooms have furniture."

A woman, who was to be the entire representative of the Sylvester establishment, came out to meet them. Guided by her, they entered what was called the drawing-room.

It was a long, low apartment; the paper and paint of which had done its duty some time ago. In places, both of them were nearly obliterated. The creaking door worked uneasily on its hinges; the narrow windows, which looked out on the moat, were, some of them, broken; the scrap of carpet on the floor; the few shabby articles scraped together to supply the immediate necessity; the gloom—the darkness—the utter desolation, struck Alice to the heart.

She sat down, as if unable to proceed a step farther.

"Alice, my child, do not give up!" cried her mother, in a tone of real distress: "for my sake do not!"

"I will do what I can, mother," replied Alice, faintly, and bursting into tears.

CHAPTER LVI.

A VOYAGE PLANNED FOR CAPTAIN JACK.

THERE is a great deal of meaning in that well-known term "good luck." Captain Jack thought himself, and was thought to be, the most lucky man that ever lived. With no capital to begin life with, except a pair of handsome eyes, and a share of what is popularly called "impudence," he had contrived to climb to an elevation, unattainable by many a more striving and, perhaps, a better man. He was now the affianced husband of the richest woman in the county. But, smooth as the course of love was running, there were still some shoals and quicksands to be avoided. It is not to be supposed that the Pierpoint family had withdrawn their objections to Captain Jack; far from it. No sooner had the news spread far and wide enough to reach their ears, than the storm of opposition began to rage again. Letters came thick and threefold, containing all the expostulation that could be used. "We must do what we can to prevent Alicia from making a fool of herself," was the popular mode of expression. But Alicia considered that she was the best judge in that matter. She would hold to her dear Jack, she said, to the last drop of her blood!

The person, however, who considered himself most aggrieved by the approaching marriage, was Sir Hugh Macbriar. When he received the intelligence he was in town, immersed, as was supposed, in politics. But even politics, now and then, give place to love. Sir Hugh thought the injury too deep to be passed over without an attempt to redress it.

One fine morning, to the surprise of every one, he made his appearance at Brooklyn Hall, intent on demanding satisfaction of Captain Jack. Not in the old-fashioned style of bullets, but by quite as stringent a process.

"I will let him know that there are some bounds to his insolence!" said the irate baronet.

He had travelled all night; but that did not prevent his breakfasting tête-à-tête with the widow. Captain Jack had taken up his quarters at the best hotel in Newbury; and had not yet become visible.

"It is as shocking a thing as I ever heard of!" said Sir Hugh, with more vehemence than could be believed.

"I don't see anything shocking at all in it," replied the widow, twisting the corner of her handkerchief. "When people love each other——"

"Don't let us talk of love!" cried the baronet, putting up his hands, "for goodness' sake, madam; don't let us talk of love! Do you suppose for a moment that Captain Jack——"

"I won't have a word said against Captain Jack," said the widow, so stoutly, and she maintained her point so resolutely, that Sir Hugh began to feel his nocturnal expedition might not unlikely be a failure.

However, he was determined on one thing. He would not leave the place till he had seen and spoken with Captain Jack.

"If nothing else will do, I'll bribe him," thought the baronet. "A scamping fellow like that can easily be bought off with money."

Intent on this scheme, he strolled into the garden in search of his enemy. He very soon found him. The first sunshiny corner he came to, stretched all his length on a bench, was Captain Jack.

Sir Hugh stood looking at him with stern displeasure. "So you are come back then?" said he at length. "And a great pity it is too!" continued the baronet, severely.

"You must ask Alicia about that," replied Captain Jack, "my wife that is to be, next Thursday fortnight."

Sir Hugh's face grew excessively red. "Captain Jack," he began, "I am come, not to appeal to your honour, or your sense of propriety, or any of those—those feelings which are found in the breast of—a gentleman. That, sir, would, I am aware, be useless." He paused, and wiped his forehead with his handkerchief. "But I am going to appeal to your—your pocket," continued the baronet, with a stress on the word that might have been offensive to sensitive ears. But Captain Jack's ears seemed rather tickled with the sound of it.

"I have a proposal to make to you," continued the baronet, eagerly. "I am not a rich man; but I would become a beggar, rather than a lady, whom I regard with such respect, should be sacrificed. I will pay you a sum of money, on condition that you leave the country, and resume the roving life so suited to your habits and disposition. This I will do, Captain Jack."

"Name your figure," replied Captain Jack, who was sadly addicted to slang.

"Sir, I will give you a thousand pounds, on condition that you go back with me to London, and that I see you on board some ship ready to start from the docks."

"Much obliged to you," said Captain Jack, touching his cap.

"You agree to the conditions then—you will go?" exclaimed Sir Hugh, eagerly.

"Oh, yes! I will go, provided you give me the money," said Captain Jack, looking about for his stick.

"Come, then, I leave in an hour!" cried Sir Hugh, joyfully. It was quite unnecessary, he thought, to have another tête-à-tête with Mrs. Brooklyn; most important to get Captain Jack out of the road.

Captain Jack did not appear so refractory as might have been expected. He got up, and walked by the side of Sir Hugh. Now and then he gave his pocket a slap, as if in anticipation of the bribe.

Sir Hugh was resolved not to lose his man. He kept him close under his eye until the carriage was ready. When the carriage was at the door, he made Captain Jack step in first, which that gentleman did without the slightest reluctance. Sir Hugh was altogether in earnest. "I will give you the cheque when you are fairly on board the vessel," said he. An arrangement with which Captain Jack seemed perfectly contented. "Half knave, half fool!" thought the baronet, contemptuously.

Arrived in London, Sir Hugh, still keeping his man closely in hand, made his way to the docks. A vessel was about to sail for Australia. He knew that; and Australia was in fact the Antipodes. What could be better than Australia?

The docks were reached; the master of the vessel communicated with; the passage-money paid; and Captain Jack hauled—to use his own expression—on board. By this time, Sir Hugh had grown somewhat fatigued by the forced march he had attempted. He had a mortal dread of the vessel getting under way. Consequently, he said to Captain Jack, "And now nothing remains but to give you the money."

The vessel gave a terrible lurch. Sir Hugh, frightened and agitated, put the cheque all duly signed into Captain Jack's hand.

"Thank ye!" said Captain Jack, putting it in his pocket.

Sir Hugh, still frightened, stumbled down the ladder into the boat, glad enough to escape with his life.

Captain Jack left on deck, with the continent of Australia looming before him, gave another slap to his pocket; then, casting a keen glance round, he dropped over the side of the vessel with the agility of a monkey. In a few minutes, he had swum safely to shore, and, while Sir Hugh was jolting back to his house in a cab, Captain Jack had reached the station on his way to Brooklyn.

A few days after, the following announcement was made in the Times:—"On the 3rd inst., at the parish church, Brooklyn, Alicia, widow of the late Samuel Brooklyn, Esq., of Brooklyn Hall, to Captain J. Haines"—that was our friend, familiarly called Captain Jack.

(To be continued.)

PRYING FLORRY.

AMMA, why does the clock go tick, tick, in such a funny manner? I don't tick."

"No, Florry, of course not; you are not a clock."

"But is it not its heart beating, mamma?"

"No, my dear! It is a little wheel going round which makes that noise. If you are a good girl, I will show you the inside of a clock some day."

"There, that is just like mamma," soliloquised little Florry May, "she always says she will show me things at some other time. I want to see it now. I have half a mind to take a peep for myself. Mamma is going out directly, and no one will know."

When Florry was quite sure that her mamma had gone, she stole into the drawing-room, where there was a timepiece, and, mounting on a chair, she proceeded to lift off the glass shade. In doing so, she knocked it against the corner of the mantelshef, and cracked it; but she thought she would not stop before she had seen anything, and she could put on the shade the other way, so that the crack would be on the other side.

The first thing that attracted her notice was the key, and having seen her mamma wind the timepiece up, she thought she would try her hand at it; so, placing the key in the little hole, she commenced turning it. At first it went rather easily, but in a few seconds it would not move at all. Florry tried with all her might, and at last succeeded, when suddenly, whizz—whizz—whizz went the clock, making a most terrible noise. It was in vain Florry covered it over with her pinafore to prevent it screaming, as she thought; but it seemed to her only to scream the more, and she was just about to replace the shade and make her escape, when she fell to the ground with the shade in her hands, which was smashed to pieces.

At this juncture the servant came running in, and when she found what had happened, she exclaimed, "Oh, Miss Florry! I'll tell your ma. You're always in mischief, you are. There, don't stop there, making that noise" (for Florry was crying); "come along—do, and mind you don't go meddling with anything else!" saying which, she took her up-stairs, telling her she must stay there till her mamma came home.

When Mrs. May had heard the tale of her little girl's naughtiness, she was very much grieved, and, though it pained her greatly to do so, she told her that, as a punishment, she would not be allowed to leave her room till the next morning.

But this adventure, I am sorry to say, had but very little effect on Florry. By the time the punishment was over, the impression it had made on her mind was gone also, and her inquisitiveness led her into a trouble of a much more serious nature.

The next time Mrs. May went out, Florry, tired of doing nothing, thought she would have a look round her papa's study, and see if she could find anything there to amuse her.

She turned over several bright-covered books, and looked at the pictures which some of them contained; but, as there were not very many within her reach, she soon abandoned this source of amusement, and was just about to help herself to some of the pretty wafers she had found on her papa's desk, when her eyes fell on a letter lying on the table.

She immediately fell to speculating as to what the contents could be. "Perhaps," she thought, "it is from Aunt Lucy, asking me to come and stay with her a little while; she said, last time she was here, she should invite me to see my little cousins some day. Oh, I am sure it is from Aunt Lucy. I wish I knew though! Shall I open it? I wish I might!"

All this time Florry had been giving the seal sundry little tugs, and now the envelope was broken just above the fastening. This temptation was too strong to be resisted, and, without thinking of the consequences, she finished breaking the seal, and took out the letter, which, on unfolding, she found to contain a piece of very thin paper, with some printing on it.

She then endeavoured to read it; but it was not from Aunt Lucy, and the writing was so funny, and the words so long, she could make nothing of it.

The next consideration was, what to do with the letter. If her papa or mamma found out that she had opened it they would punish her, she knew; and if she left it on the table, they would certainly find her out.

What was to be done? Already she had begun to feel the consequence of her fault. She did not dare tear it up, for fear any one might find some of the pieces, and, being summer-time, there were no fires, except in the kitchen, and the servants would be sure to ask her what she was doing if she attempted to burn it before them. Then, what could she answer them? The only thing to be done was to put the letter into her pocket, and carry it about with her till she found an opportunity of ridding herself of it.

All the rest of that day she could eat nothing, and when she went into the drawing-room to bid her parents good night, they both noticed how quiet she seemed—so different from her usually lively manner.

The next morning, while she was sitting with her mamma at lessons, her papa entered the room, exclaiming—

"I suppose that letter has not arrived yet, has it?"

Then, as Mrs. May answered in the negative, "I can't think how it can be. It is a most glaring piece of negligence. I must write and see about it."

All this while Florry was in a state of mind almost unbearable. She thought surely her reddening cheeks would betray her, and she put her hand in her pocket, almost expecting to find that by some unknown agency the letter had found its way out; but her fears on this score were soon dispelled, for the letter was there quite safe, and she did not again loose her clasp of it while her papa remained in the room.

After tea her mamma sent for her from the nursery, and told her that her papa had just heard from the gentleman from whom he had been expecting the letter, who had informed him that he had sent it two days ago. Mrs. May was going to question the servants, but first she asked Florry if she had seen, or knew anything about it; to which Florry answered—"No." A little while ago, Florry would have been dreadfully shocked at the bare idea of telling such a wilful falsehood; but now she reasoned with herself it was necessary; so soon does one fault lead to another.

Mrs. May then questioned the servants; but the only information she gained was that Jane, the housemaid, had taken in a letter the day before yesterday, answering to the description given, and had placed it on the table in her master's study.

Thither they proceeded, and commenced a search for the missing letter; but no trace of it could be found: and as Jane—who had been greatly annoyed at perceiving the significant looks that passed between the other servants—would take no part in the proceeding, her mistress's suspicion fell upon her.

The days passed on as heavily for poor Jane as for Florry, for when it was made known that the lost letter had contained a cheque, no doubt seemed to remain in any one's mind as to where it could have gone; and her fellow-servants, who were by no means sparing in their remarks, seemed to take delight in the poor girl's trouble. Notwithstanding, she being conscious of her own perfect innocence, although surrounded by distrust and suspicion, I doubt not was really much happier than the little girl, who had apparently not a single thing to trouble her. For Florry was by no means happy; the dread of being found out, the idea of her wickedness in letting some one else bear the blame of her fault, and the knowledge that the loss of the letter was the cause of much trouble to her parents—all these things weighed on her spirits, making her feel depressed and thoroughly miserable; her appetite became worse every day, and soon was such as to make her parents think it advisable to call in the doctor.

When Florry heard of this, she was very much frightened, for she had a sort of notion that the doctor would be able to see directly what was the cause of her pale looks and loss of appetite; and she made up her mind she would get rid of the hateful letter at any risk, and then, perhaps he would not be so likely to find her out.

While wandering about the house, as it had lately become her habit to do—for she could not play—she happened to see a drawer standing open, and quite empty. This drawer was in Jane's room, and Florry thought this was just the opportunity she needed, for, as it was empty, she settled it in her mind that no one used it, and, therefore, if she closed it no one would think of looking in it; so, putting the letter in the furthest corner, she very carefully closed the drawer, and quitted the room. Now, she thought, she was free from discovery, and she would be, comparatively speaking, quite happy again. But the matter could not be so easily disposed of, for Jane, going to the drawer—which she had only turned out in order to re-arrange—found the letter, which she at once carried to her mistress.

This seemed to Mrs. May conclusive evidence against the girl; for, having forbidden her children to enter the servants' rooms, how could she believe Jane's tale? It was so very improbable that any one would put the letter in her drawer, after having kept it all this while, and though both Mr. and Mrs. May were very loth to do so, they believed it to be their duty to give her in charge. Poor Jane, therefore, in spite of her tears and protestations, was carried off and placed in the county gaol, there to await her trial.

When Florry perceived the dreadful consequences her first fault had entailed, she was almost persuaded to tell all; but, unfortunately, her fear of punishment overcame her good intentions, and it remained untold. She grew daily more and more unwell, and though the doctor gave her a great deal of very nasty medicine, it seemed to do her no good. All day long she tossed restlessly to and fro; the burning thirst, parched skin, and dreadful pain in her head, being hardly worse than the pain of mind she experienced. Her mamma scarcely ever left her bedside. Oh, how Florry longed to tell her good, kind mamma all about it! but she could never summon the courage.

Poor little Florry! she only just escaped death; and when, after a long, weary period of danger, the fever left her, she was very weak indeed. She lay all day long with her eyes closed, even the soft light of the darkened room being too glaring for her poor, weak eyes.

Then the doctor put a bandage on her eyes, giving her mamma strict injunctions not to let it be removed, and Florry heard him say something about "the only chance," "very great care," and other snatches of like sentences. Poor little child! she little guessed the calamity that was about to befall her.

For days Florry wore the bandage; and though it was very, very unpleasant, and she begged very hard to have it taken off, only just for a few minutes, her mamma remained firm.

One beautiful spring day, Florry had been sitting up, for the first time, in a great easy chair. Such a lovely day it was! just like summer time; and the scent of the roses and spring flowers came in so deliciously at the slightly-opened window—how Florry wished she might take off the bandage, and look at them! it was so long since she had seen any.

While she was indulging in this fit of musing, the doctor arrived; and after feeling her pulse, and satisfying himself that she was going on capitally, he told her he was going to take off the bandage. Florry clapped her hands with delight; but he told her she must be very quiet. Then he took it off; and Florry looked up to see her mamma's face, but she could not: it was so dark she could see nothing.

"Oh, mamma!" said Florry, "do bring a light; I want to see your face, and it is so dark I cannot. I did not think it was so late."

"My poor child!" exclaimed Mrs. May; and burying her head in Florry's lap she sobbed aloud.

"Oh, mamma! what is the matter? Oh, please don't cry, dear mamma. Oh, don't cry so!" said poor little Florry, the tears streaming down her face.

"Oh, Mrs. May, you must not give way like this," interposed the doctor: "you promised me you would be brave; and now you have made my little patient cry—the very worst thing she can do. Why, she will lose her only chance if she does that. I think I must call nurse."

"Oh, no—no!" said Mrs. May; and in a few minutes she had regained her composure.

The doctor then whispered to Mrs. May that he would light a candle; and doing so, he placed it close to Florry's eyes, and asked if she could see anything. No, she answered; she could feel the heat, but she could see nothing. Then he took her in his arms, and placed her on the bed; arranged her pillows so nicely, and told her she must try and go to sleep.

This Florry was very glad to do; for she was so weak, that the exertion of sitting up had made her feel very tired. When she awoke, she heard her papa and mamma talking together by her bedside. Her mamma was crying again. "I wonder what makes mamma cry so," she thought: "perhaps it is about the letter. When papa has gone, I will tell her;" and then, without opening her eyes, she lay waiting till her papa should leave the room. Presently, she heard her papa say—

"You know, my dear, there is hope. Blind people have often been cured, and——"

But Florry did not wait to hear the last of the sentence. Starting up, she exclaimed, "Oh, mamma —mamma! am I blind? Is that the reason it looks so dark; and that I cannot see your or papa's face? Oh, mamma, dear, I am not blind, am I?" and poor little Florry burst into tears.

"Hush, my child, you must not cry like this; it is our Father who has sent us this trouble; and you know He does it in love: for the Bible tells us that He is love."

"Oh, mamma! He is punishing me for my naughtiness. I took the letter, and I put it in Jane's drawer, because I was so afraid you would be very angry with me if you found out that I had taken it. Will you forgive me, mamma?"

"You have offended God, my child, and you must ask him to forgive you." And then Florry's mamma knelt down by her little girl's bedside, and asked their Father to forgive his little repentant child.

Gradually Florry's sobs became less violent and further apart, and when, a little while afterwards, nurse came to see how she was getting on, she found her fast asleep in her mamma's arms.

As Florry grew better, she found it very hard to bear, not to be able to run about and play as her little brothers and sisters did, and not to be able to see any of the pretty flowers she was so fond of; but she thought it made it almost worth while being blind to discover how very kind and thoughtful for her comfort every one was. Even her papa, of whom she had always before been so frightened, was so very tender with his little blind girl, taking her out, and leading her about so kindly, always choosing such nice quiet lanes, and soft grassy places for her to walk in!

During this time poor Jane had been taken from prison, and you may be sure that Mr. and Mrs. May did not forget to make her full reparation for the injustice they had unwittingly done her. Then Florry asked her to forgive her, and Jane was so much touched by the sight of the little pale face and sightless eyes, that she could not think of refusing. And so Florry was made very happy, for she hardly dared hope that Jane, whom she had wronged so much, would forgive her.

When Florry was strong enough, her parents took her to a very great physician's in London, to see if anything could be done for their little girl; and then Florry had to undergo a very painful operation, which she bore so remarkably well that all her friends were astonished, and not one of them but agreed that, though she had lost her sight, she had gained something which made them love her a great deal more than they had done before, when she could see as well as any other little girl.

But the operation, I am sorry to say, did not cure her; and though other means were tried, they all failed; and Florry knew that never again would she be able to see.

You must not suppose, however, that this was no trouble to Florry. It was a very great one, and there were times when she felt very rebellious indeed; but, as the years passed on, she had very often cause to thank God for sending her an affliction which had served to endear her so much to those around her, and draw her so much closer to himself. L. M. C.

NEW BOOKS.

THE associations of the mess-room or the drill-ground do not seem to be such as would very tenderly cherish a taste for poetry. Here, however, is a small volume of poems* which, as the title tells us, were written in barracks; and upon this bare statement the author has made no comment, for he has forborne (and, we think, judiciously) to bore his readers with a preface. He is truly military in his taciturnity, and is content that his poems should speak for themselves and him. But to the readers of THE QUIVER, at least, Mr. Butler needs no introduction, and the former will find included in this collection some old and, we trust, pleasant acquaintance. Notwithstanding the martial front which the title-page bears, there are only two or three pieces of a corresponding character. Flowers, birds, fields, forests, and waters are the writer's more frequent themes; and never did a warmer devotee haunt the sweet places of Sylvia. What is still more to be commended, he endeavours to turn his observations of Nature to some good account. As he tells us in his last poem, "The Lantern-Bearer,"

"Wherever in his path he finds
A flower, he sings of it to you;
And from the coil of life unwinds
The lovely and the true."

The tendency of the present is to dress up an idea in a profligate magnificence of language, and to force some simple, but intrinsically beautiful, thought or fancy to stagger along under an overpowering ballast of tinsel. There is a fashion in poetry as there is a mode in dress, and we cannot help thinking that at this time there exists between them a tolerably faithful analogy. In some instances Mr. Butler has not been free from the taint; but, as a rule, the poems under review are exceedingly simple in tone and diction, and from this very circumstance their effect is sure and impressive. Poetry cannot be played with. One thought should arise spontaneously out of another; nothing strained by grasping, or weakened by fumbling; "the iron struck while it is hot," a definite shape assigned it, the blows are firm and well-directed, and no idle taps given when the idea has been completed. We are glad to see that Mr. Butler believes this. Hence the convenient brevity of the poems.

Here is an autumn picture, not so familiar to most of us but that we can appreciate the painting of it:

"Gold-tinted in the autumn sun, the autumn leaves are glowing;
Silently falling, one by one, while autumn winds are blowing.
More beautiful than in their birth, as Christians are in dying:
They softly rustle down to earth, while the forest boughs are sighing.

"And while the elm-tree's ambered store, chestnut, and red-brown beech
Are writing thus the solemn lore their fading beauties teach,

* "Poems Written in Barracks." By Alexander Hume Butler.
London: Longmans, Green, and Co.

Young children, winnowing the leaves, the fallen nuts are seeking—
Spring leaves themselves, they little know what the autumn-leaves are speaking!"

A touching little poem is that called "Teddy's Grave," and as it is a very fair specimen of Mr. Butler's familiar style, we quote as much of it as we may:

"O'er Teddy's grave the storm may rave,
And bleak winds loudly blow;
He will not hear, our Teddy dear,
He sleeps so sound below.

"On Teddy's bed the grass is spread
To keep our Teddy warm;
A daisy lies on Teddy's eyes
To hide them from the storm.

"When Teddy dear was with us here,
Before he made us weep,
Our mother oft, with music soft,
Sang Teddy dear to sleep.

"But now they've spread his cradle-bed
Among the churchyard flowers;
The angels ring the bells, and sing
A better hymn than ours."

We do not think that Mr. Butler has been supremely successful in his more ambitious attempts. His "Odes" contain many fine passages, but they are not well sustained throughout, and consequently fail in that dignity without which your Pindaric becomes merely a column of eccentric verse.

We have now done our best to show our readers what they may expect of the perusal of this volume, concerning which we wish that more of the legion of "poetry-books" that are published were as equal to their pretensions.

The perusal of the under-named interesting volume* conveys a full idea of the various evangelistic efforts made during the Paris Exhibition. It is well written, interspersed with anecdotes and illustrations, and contains a large mass of very useful information. The volume is arranged in the form of letters, and each letter is preceded by a well-selected page of appropriate verses from the best authors.

We have received the last volume of a periodical devoted to the interests of missions,† chiefly abroad. It comprises many well-written papers illustrative of the perils and successes of mission life; and readers will find in it a concise and valuable record of the work of God in heathendom. Of the biographical sketches, those of Sir James Brooke, Dr. Livingstone, and St. Patrick are well worthy a careful perusal. An account is also given of the Rev. H. Stern's labours and travels among the Abyssinians, which at this time are invested with peculiar interest.

* "The Standard of the Cross in the Champs de Mars. A Narrative of Christian Effort in Paris during l'Exposition Universelle." By V. M. S., Author of "The Standard of the Cross among the Flags of the Nations." London: James Nisbet and Co.

† "Mission Life; or, The Emigrant and the Heathen." London: Rivingtons.

THE GIVVER

Saturday, September 12, 1868.

(Drawn by J. A. PASQUIER.)

"At this moment there was a splash."—p. 820.

ALDA'S LEAP.

A TALE OF THE VAUDOIS VALLEYS. IN THREE PARTS.

PART I

AT the foot of the Mount Pirchiriano, some three kilomètres' distance from Susa, there stood, two centuries ago, the finest water-mill in Piedmont, belonging to one Jean Iserau, a wealthy man, who loved himself first, his daughter Verena second, and his neighbours according to the grist they brought to his mill.

His father had been a wealthy miller before him, and left his business and his riches to his only son. As long as the oldest inhabitants in the valley could recollect, there had not been a single day that the mill had been idle, or the wheel ceased its labour. The sound of the mill-stream had become more familiar than the song of birds, and the face of Jean Iserau was as well known as the face of the sun itself.

The miller was neither a fanatic nor a bigot in his own religion. The heretic's corn must be ground, as well as that of the monks above, in the grim monastery on the summit of the mountain. And this bleak afternoon, in January, 1655, the miller stood gloomy and abstracted at the door of his house, as one Garcino, a rich tanner from Turin, poured into his ears the unwelcome tidings, that an edict had suddenly been promulgated in the town, requiring all Protestants to remove within three days, on pain of death, from the chief valleys of Piedmont.

This news did not please Jean Iserau. The heretics were honest and true in their dealings with him, and paid him well. At least one-fifth of his yearly profits must fall with their fall. He was a far-sighted man, too, this miller, and he could foresee a struggle bloody and long, war and all its attendant horrors, and not the least in his eyes, the destruction of property and lands, and laying waste of young corn-fields.

"What wilt thou do with thy brave son-in-law-to-be?" asked Garcino, as his eye rested with a newly-quicken interest on the figure of a girl seated on a hewn chestnut-tree, opposite the mill-wheel, but who had remained so wholly absorbed in the perusal of her book, she had not noticed his arrival. "Which will David give up, think you, his religion or his love?"

"Tut, tut, man! you have an eye yourself on the main chance," laughed the miller, uneasily. "Things may not be so bad, after all, as you would wish me to believe. David is an honest lad. I do not believe they would hurt one hair of his head, even if they had the power. Why, the monks themselves above in the monastery have been anxious to bring about this match;" and the miller pointed upward to the gloomy building on the overhanging cliffs.

"Ay, ay, I dare say; men snare foxes often, when it is unsafe to kill them in broad daylight."

"Thou hast the cunning of the fox thyself, Garcino," replied the miller, angrily, and turned away into his mill.

Garcino moved down the garden-path towards the spot where Verena still remained seated, wholly intent upon her book. His face was angry and dark, too, as the miller's; but he put on a smiling countenance as he approached nearer.

"Good evening, Verena."

The girl started up, screamed slightly, and dropped the book upon the grass.

"Ah! you frightened me, Garcino; you should not have stolen upon me thus." She stooped and picked up the fallen book, pushing aside the hand that would have assisted her, then re-seated herself distantly, and resumed her reading.

"You are cold this evening, Verena."

"Yes; the air is growing chilly." She drew her crimson shawl carelessly over her shoulder, but did not look up.

"I mean that your manner is cold."

"I cannot help it if it is," she replied, with something of the impatience of a worried child, who is interrupted in its favourite amusement. "If you have anything particular to say to me, cannot you say it at once and have done?"

"I have something particular to tell you, Verena, and a question which I would ask you."

"Not the old question," she answered, with an almost deprecating sincerity; then suddenly perceiving, as she looked up, a kind of gloomy triumph lurking in Garcino's manner, she continued with more excitement,—"Tell me quickly what you have to say. If your news and your question are to prove disagreeable to me, which I guess from your manner they are, the sooner they are heard and answered the better."

"Good—you shall have neither my news nor my question, my haughty young damsel," replied Garcino, with a sudden burst of anger. "You will learn them from dearer lips than mine, no doubt, before the day is over; but the news will be none the sweeter." And Garcino passed out through the garden-gate into the road.

For a few moments after his departure, Verena remained abstracted in thought, with her eyes fixed on a crimson gash in the grey sky, which looked as if a bloody sword had ripped it open; then she turned to her book again, and resumed the narrative which had previously entranced her imaginative mind.

Meantime the rift in the sky became wider and broader; and the sunset glow deepened on all around her. When next the girl looked up from her book, with a blush of triumphant joy over its conclusion, the distant Alps seemed to have caught her rosy enthusiasm. The naked stems of the chestnut-trees were like pillars of ruddy gold, and the mill-wheel revolving in tawny grandeur opposite, seemed to cast at her feet votive offerings of rubies and garnets.

"Oh! would that I could excel even St. Alda, the beautiful St. Alda, in purity and faith!" cried Verena, with a zealous clasp of the hands. "Would that God might choose me out as a favoured servant and saint!" She would have cast herself upon her knees in her enthusiasm, but that there was again a step upon the garden-pathway.

This time a well-known step, and looking round, Verena saw David Barolo, her betrothed, coming towards her up the vine-walk.

An almost imperceptible shadow of pain and hesitation crossed her face for a moment, and then laying her book on the grass beside her, she rose to meet him.

But it was no shadow of pain which clouded David's face this evening, as taking both Verena's hands in his, he drew her to him. It was the very substance of pain itself, the very essence of suffering, which darkened everything around him, and made this meeting with his best-beloved a martyrdom in itself. There was hesitation on his face, too, but the hesitation only of a manly heart, which shrinks from inflicting the pain it feels itself on one weaker or less able to endure it.

"Verena," he said, drawing her arm in his, and leading her towards the same spot where she had been previously seated; "let us sit down here and talk for a while before we go into the house."

"Yes, David," she replied, with a quick sympathy, "we will sit down here, and I will talk and you must rest, for you look pale and tired."

"I am tired of life, Verena, and of its many crosses," he replied, gloomily; "and yet," he added, after a pause, "we read that the good soldier must endure to the end."

"Why, you are not going to turn soldier, are you?" asked Verena with emotion, striving to guess also at the cause of his sudden discomfiture.

"No, my dearest, I was only quoting a text from the good old Book, the best Book, Verena, that ever was written—the best and truest, because it was written by God himself."

Verena was silent: she was generally silent when David spoke of this book—which was a sealed one to her; but she tried to look the sympathy she felt for his evident distress.

"Oh, Verena!" he cried, passionately, as if his grief had burst loose from the constraint he had hitherto maintained; and rare tears rushed into his eyes. "Do not look at me so sorrowfully; why does God visit with his harshest trials those who love him best? why were we not reared in the same faith—baptised into the one Church, that we might be blessed and happy in it now together?"

Verena trembled at this sudden and fierce appeal; and her face became as white as the hand which rested still in David's grasp. At length she answered, hesitatingly—

"If I knew what troubled you, David, I could answer you better; if it is the difference in our faith, is not the Church always open to receive those who wish to enter it?"

David looked away as Verena spoke; he was ashamed of the tears which clouded his eyes, and yet which could not blot out the pleading purity of her expression.

"You are the most innocent Eve that ever sought to ruin man," he said, with a curious gentleness of voice. "But, Verena, though at this moment it is difficult to feel it, I know that my faith is even stronger within me than the love I have for you. It is the proof alone which can test its true value; and that proof I must give to my God this evening, when I say farewell to you for ever."

"For ever, David!—no, not for ever! Why, David, what have I done? what have I ever said?"

Here Verena's question ended in a sudden sob.

"You have said nothing, my love—my heart's darling. It is the decree of Fate—the decree of the government—and I must accept it also as the decree of my God. An edict has been published in the town, and all over the country this morning, that within three days every Protestant, of whatever rank or degree, must quit his home and lands, and retire over the Alps, into certain valleys appointed as places of safety, from the sword and vengeance which in all districts are to follow him, even to death."

"They will not—they cannot carry such an edict into effect: they have not the power!" cried Verena, indignantly.

"They have the power, and the will, and the determination. The government, for the hundredth time, is bent on our destruction and extermination. Why otherwise have they chosen a time when the valleys are flooded with waters, and the snow lies thickly on the hills? why else do they hunt us into a poor patch of country already overburdened? I tell you, Verena, your kind heart will bleed yet for the sufferings of our Protestant martyrs; and this parting of ours must not be for once, but for ever!"

David's voice had trembled so, he could scarcely bring his explanation to a conclusion; but now, the moan of pain which burst from the lips of his betrothed, filled him with a sense of shame for his own weakness.

"David—David!" she cried, piteously, "it is my fault—this sudden separation is my fault. Day and night have I not prayed to my God that I might love him always better than any one else—better even than you, my David. I prayed not an hour ago that he would make me a chosen saint and servant; and now, he whom alone I could love better is taken suddenly from me."

Verena could get no further. She leaned her head against David's shoulder, while with her hand she nervously plucked the bark from the stem of the fallen tree on which she was seated.

"Hush, my Verena! we must not blame God for too quickly or too slowly answering our prayers.

Some day, though long deferred, he may answer the prayer of my heart also."

"What is that prayer, David?"

"That the time may come, however distant, when your eyes, my Verena, shall be opened to the truth; and that casting yourself on Christ, and his sacrifice alone, you may throw off the false yoke that now oppresses you, and that we may become one in heart, and hope, and love. I have brought with me this evening a parting gift, Verena, which for my sake you must accept and value."

He drew a Testament from the pocket of his jerkin, and placed it in her hand.

"It is sin," moaned Verena, shudderingly withdrawing her fingers from its cover.

"God knows, if it were sin, I would not ask you to touch it."

"I dare not."

"For my sake," pleaded David, hoarsely; "even for my sake. It is God's own book, it is truth itself."

At this moment there was a splash, and sudden circles of water broke the quiet repose of the mill-dam. Verena looked up, and became aware of Garcino's face peering above the garden-wall.

"He has seen me, David. I dare not—I dare not touch it!"

David looked up also, and recognised him who, for Verena's sake, he dreaded most in the world. He instantly resumed possession of the Testament he had offered to her. He was no coward, but he dared not risk by his own gift a life more precious to him than his own. Before, however, he replaced the volume in his jerkin, he tore a few pages from its cover, and folding them up, held them tightly in the palm of his closed hand.

Verena meantime had raised her own favourite book from the grass, where it had lain so long unnoticed, and looking up at David, she urged timidly that though she might not accept his gift, he would accept one from her, even this precious volume of "The Lives and Miracles of the Saints," her most treasured possession.

"May I not also pray for your conversion, my beloved?" she said, in a voice almost below a whisper, fearing she might cause more pain.

David smiled as he took the book from her hand —a kind, but incredulous smile. He saw the fear with which she had proffered it, and turned over a few of its pages, where strange woodcuts illustrated the wonderful miracles and stories which it related.

David stopped as he came to one which represented a girl throwing herself headlong from the summit of a precipitous rock.

"There—there!" cried Verena, excitedly, stopping his hand with hers, lest he should turn further; "that is the story I read this evening—the story of the beautiful St. Alda, who, committing herself to the care of the blessed Virgin, threw herself from an enormous height into the valley beneath, and came down unhurt. It was into this very valley, David—where the crucifix stands by our chapel-wall—from that very rock above our heads, she cast herself down. Oh, David, you could not read that story, and remain incredulous in the pity and protection extended to us by the blessed Mother of our Lord. Read that book, David, when I am far from you; and may she whose love and power it extols, turn your heart to accept the truth."

"And Pilate said unto him, What is truth?" murmured David, sorrowfully, as he looked into Verena's face. "Christ is truth, my Verena; 'there is none other name under heaven given amongst men, whereby we must be saved,' and pressing the pages torn from the Testament into the hand of his betrothed, he took his last farewell.

Verena watched his departure with a sick faintness, which rendered her steps uncertain and slow; but presently she turned towards the house. The sunset glow still rested on the distant Alps, the trees, and the slowly-turning mill-wheel; but the thoughts within the young heart were changed. Fear now reigned paramount, and the pictures fancy but awhile ago had suggested, were changed also.

The distant hills were flushed with vengeance; the chestnut-stems were flaming stakes; and the wheel was the martyr's wheel, from which dropped goutts of blood into the gloomy tank beneath.

Verena placed the forbidden pages in her bosom, and going within the mill, sank like a stone upon the ground.

(To be continued).

MARY THE SISTER OF LAZARUS.

HERE are, perhaps, no more remarkable words of commendation spoken of any one by our blessed Lord when upon earth, than those he spoke in reference to Mary the sister of Martha and Lazarus, on the occasion of that woman anointing his feet, and wiping them with the hair of her head. Referring to that woman, and the act of kindness shown to him by her, speaking to his disciples, he says: "She hath done what she could." Was there ever greater praise than this?

Let us turn to the history of the woman who obtained such favour in the eyes of Christ.

Our Lord meets her three times. He may have met her oftener; but we read of three meetings in the Gospel. The first occasion upon which he meets her is after his conversation with the lawyer, who had endeavoured to tempt him by asking him the conditions required of those seeking for eternal life, and which our Lord answered by repeating the parable of the Good Samaritan. It was at this moment that Martha complained of her sister; for Mary, adopting the position of the Jewish scholars whilst listening to their rabbim, or learned men, had sat down at the feet of Jesus, and suffered Martha to superintend alone the arrangements of the feast. In this respect she puts one in mind of Paul, who had once sat at the feet of Gamaliel. Paul sat for instruction at the feet of Gamaliel; but Mary listened to a greater master than Paul's—Jesus was mightier than Gamaliel. How applicable to her, whilst sitting thus, were the words of the Psalmist-King: "Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel, and afterward receive me to glory. Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside thee. My flesh and my heart faileth: but God is the strength of my heart and my portion for ever."

The second meeting of Jesus with Mary takes place upon the death of Lazarus. On account of the violence of the Jews, our blessed Lord had to retire to a place called Bethabara, beyond Jordan. While there, Lazarus grows sick. Messengers are sent to apprise Jesus of the fact. When he draws near to Bethany, Lazarus is dead. How do the two sisters act upon this occasion? In the eleventh chapter of John, Martha, upon hearing of the arrival of our Lord, is represented as starting up, and going forth to meet him, whereas Mary is represented as sitting still in the house, notwithstanding the intelligence. What a key to the respective character of these two women! Even with death and mourning in the house, Martha is still the same.

Impetuous, busy Martha! She was eager to see all and do all herself—she could not think it just that her supine and less active sister should earn more of the Saviour's love and esteem than she did. If, reader, you require proof of the eagerness and impetuosity of this woman's disposition, contemplate her now as she is running to meet her Lord. If you desire to see the domesticated and practical side of her character, go back to the feast, and behold her superintending its arrangements. And if you would discover what ability she had, how clever she was, how high and advanced the tone of her religious knowledge, turn to and attentively read the conversation she holds with our Lord, in the eleventh chapter of St. John's Gospel, upon this very occasion. In that conversation she exhibits an ability, a faith, and a knowledge of spiritual matters, which stamp her as a woman of no ordinary kind.

When, however, we come to look into Mary's character, we find a woman of a totally different type. Mary's ways and her disposition resemble those of the beloved disciple, St. John. She possessed many of those qualities which made him the most endeared amongst the Twelve. Her ways were loving, she was affectionate, she was gentle. Less practical, less worldly-minded than her sister, sorrow appeared to sink deeper into her heart, and affliction to overpower her more. Oh! look how keenly she felt her brother's loss—look how sadly she left the house, and proceeded to meet Jesus, when urged to do so. In fact, the woman's distress was such that Jesus was troubled at it—that he was vexed—that he groaned in the spirit, and that upon this, the only occasion, Mary opens her mouth, "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died," Jesus wept.

The third and last occasion on which Jesus comes before us in connection with this family, is the most interesting of all. The passover is nigh at hand. In a little village—the village of Bethany—a feast is being held. It is in the house of one Simon, a leper. Jesus is in the house, and present at the feast. His presence has attracted others. Martha has left her own house, and is present, rendering the peculiar services for which she is so remarkable; and Lazarus, who had been dead and now is alive again, is also there. So are the disciples. Supper has commenced, and where is Mary—the faithful, loving Mary? Has she forgotten her Lord and Master? Suddenly the door opens, and a woman enters. Neither St. Matthew nor St. Mark tells her name, but St. John does. The woman's name is Mary. What brings her hither? She had heard that the priests and elders were deliberating in Jerusalem upon the capture and death of Jesus; she had heard of his determination to go up to Jerusalem, and face every danger that threatened him. The presentiment of what he was about to do and suffer was before her eyes—future events had appeared in their forecast shadows. Restless fears therefore laid hold upon her woman's heart, and she now appears upon the scene—having hurried hither to pay the last tribute of a grateful love. Indeed, the thought may have crossed her mind that this might be the only opportunity she should ever have for exhibiting kindness to one who had done so much for her. She enters the room, bringing with her an alabaster box of ointment of spikenard, very precious. She breaks the box, and pours the ointment upon his head and feet. Then washing those feet with tears, she wipes them with the hair of her head. Oh, what a scene for the painter's pencil! Try and realise it, reader. Down the centre of the room, we will suppose, runs a long table, upon which are placed dishes of various kinds of meat and fruit. At the head of the table reclines the form of the Son of Man, and close to him that disciple whom he loved so well. In the background are the attendants and women, bringing in fresh dishes, foremost amongst their number being the figure of the busy, impetuous Martha. And here, before her Saviour, on bended knees, is the saintly Mary, raining tears upon the feet of Jesus, and wiping them in her long, flowing hair. The disciples and the other guests are busy in the discussion of various matters; but there is one disciple that demands our especial notice, whose name is Judas. Always alive to the question of gain and money, this man's head is turned round, his eyes resting upon the good woman and her acts. Hear now the thought which passed through his mind, as he looked upon the scene: "Why," he says, "was not this ointment sold for three hundred pence, and given to the poor?" . . . "not," we are told, "that he cared for the poor, but because he was a thief and had the bag, and bare what was put therein."

Given to the poor! How frequently we find the same excuse reiterated in the present day, whenever any great work of Christian piety is being done. The poor are sure to be uppermost in the minds of certain people then, and it not unfrequently happens that these are the very people who give least of all to the poor. This class of people will grumble in whatever way money is spent, even though none of the money so expended has been extracted from their pockets. Such people, for instance, cannot tolerate the expenditure of money upon the beautifying or the restoring of God's house, and whenever they hear of moneys being subscribed for the restoring or rebuilding of those grand old cathedrals, which the piety of a former generation raised up, which have outlived even the departure of the ancient faith from their shrines, and which, existing now, call forth the glory and the pride of England, their cry is, "Give it to the poor; build iron churches for the poor." If, however, it could be ascertained how much these very utilitarian spirits give to the poor, the result, we have little doubt, would show that the men most anxious for the restoration and improvement of God's temples, are likewise the men who give most to the poor. Here, in the Gospel narrative, we have Mary, who poured a rich ointment upon her Saviour's feet; and there is Judas, who carried the money-bag, and expressed such solicitude for the poor. Reader, from which of these do you think the poor would get the more sympathy and support? Ah! surely the poor, who know human nature well—who can read the disposition in the face, would turn aside from this calculating and insincere professor, and lay their wants and sufferings at the feet of that good woman, who said so little, yet did so much,—who, as our Lord said of her, "hath done what she could." But what was the defence Jesus entered for her, when the disciples took up the strain, and echoed the words of Judas? "Let her alone," he says; "why trouble ye her? she hath wrought a good work on me. For ye have the poor with you always, and whensoever ye will ye may do them good: but me ye have not always. She hath done what she could: she is come aforehand to anoint my body to the burying. Verily I say unto you, Wheresoever this Gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, this also that she hath done shall be spoken of as a memorial of her."

Only consider what esteem this woman had for our Lord. You may gather a slight and imperfect idea of it from the ointment she used. It was very precious, we are told. According to the computation of Judas, the ointment could have been sold for three hundred pence; but £20 or even £30 of our present currency does not perhaps adequately represent its value. Putting aside, however, the question of the costliness of the ointment, what are we to say of this act—this pure womanly act, of watering those weary feet and wiping them with the hair of her head? You will not say that it was bare pity which led the woman to perform such an office upon our Saviour. No; pity could never lead a woman to perform such a sublime act as that. You will not say that it was bare admiration. No; admiration would never lead to such an act as that. You cannot call it love. No; love would not impel a woman to perform such an act as that. You cannot say that it was the result of exalted veneration. No; even exalted veneration, powerful as it is, is powerless to prompt to such a deed as hers. You may put all these qualities together—pity, admiration, love, and veneration—you may combine them all, and yet the whole will be too little to represent the promptings of such an act as that. That act so true to nature, so tender in feeling, so rich in beauty, proceeded from virtues so rare, that it claims homage even in heaven. To the Second Person of the Trinity, to the Saviour of our lost and ruined world, it was left to embody that act in words: "She hath done what she could." Happy Mary! Wheresoever this Gospel has been preached throughout the whole world, this also that thou hast done—this glorious act of thine—has been spoken of for a memorial of thee. Happy! happy Mary! Thou art now immortalised on earth! thou art glorified in heaven! it was thou who didst anoint the Saviour's body aforehand for the burying. Almost two thousand years have rolled away since then. The words of Jesus have come true—thy memory is green, it is embalmed for ever! Happy, happy woman! On thy bended knees, thou didst rain tears upon the Saviour's feet. Thou didst dry them with the hair of thy head. The proudest and fairest of earth's daughters now envy thee that office. Of a truth, the blessing of Heaven did rest upon thine head! Its purity was in thine heart. Happy woman!

G. M. L.

THE EXPLORATION OF PALESTINE.

BY THE REV. CHARLES BOUTELL, M.A.

CHAPTER VII.

THE masonry of the walls which now enclose the Haram, as it is visible above the ground, and doubtless also the masonry of the buried upper portions of these same walls, is of varied character, due to the numerous reconstructions experienced by the walls themselves in the course of their strangely eventful history. In every instance, however, the work of reconstruction may be considered to have included the use, in a greater or a lesser degree, of the old materials, as they would be found lying ready at hand where they had been cast down. In such a great reconstruction as that by Herod, it may be assumed, if he commenced his work (as it is almost certain that he did) upon the lowermost courses of Solomon's masonry, that he would assimilate his work to what he found remaining of the masonry of the magnificent first founder of the Temple. Such assimilation can scarcely be expected to have taken place in any of the reconstructions that have succeeded to one another, subsequent to the destruction that followed the capture of Jerusalem by Titus, A.D. 70. In the earliest of these reconstructions, however, the old materials would naturally have been used again to a considerable extent; and it is probable, also, that the influence of the evident grandeur of the old masonry may have induced the rebuilders to endeavour so far to emulate their predecessors, as to quarry their new blocks of stone of very great size. But the rebuilders did not make any attempt to follow the noble example of earlier times, beyond using again the old blocks of stone, and quarrying fresh blocks in some degree approaching them in magnitude. No effort was made to secure for the reconstructed walls the beautiful regularity, the consistent harmony, and the peculiar effectiveness of the ancient masonry. Nor do the more recent builders appear to have possessed either the sound judgment or the technical skill which would have enabled them to build as their predecessors had built. They have left behind them the most conclusive evidence of their great want of judgment, in the choice of their materials, and of their inability to make the best use of the materials that were at their disposal—materials of so excellent a nature, that many of the noble blocks of stone, which now appear fixed in the existing walls by unskilful hands, are still as sharp at the angles as when they were first finished by the ancient masons, while their sides are clean and perfect, and their marginal drafts not unfrequently bear the marks of the toothed chisels with which they were cut.

The excavations have already revealed original masonry, veritably in situ; still remaining, that is to say, in its original position as placed by its original builders—sometimes injured and worn, before the friendly accumulation of the earth and ruins at once protected and concealed it; and sometimes sharp, and fresh, and perfect as when it left the hands of those masons, masters of their craft, who worked under either Solomon or Herod. And as the excavations are carried on, it may safely be assumed that, in like manner, the accumulated earth and ruins will be discovered to have concealed and preserved other portions of the same ancient masonry. While we are awaiting further discoveries such as these, we may advantageously accompany the explorers a short distance round the exterior circuit of the Haram walls, and see what are the results of their careful and minute examination. We shall find that at one point the explorations that have been already carried on deep beneath the present surface, have led to discoveries not inferior in interest to the results of Lieutenant Warren's researches at "Robinson's Arch." (See Chapter IV.)

The south-west angle of the Haram wall, says Captain Wilson, when describing that wall as it now is visible above the ground—"the south-west angle, and 50 feet on either side of it, is the finest and best preserved (visible) piece of old masonry in the wall, and the stones have more the appearance of being in situ here than at other places . . . The bonding of the stones has been very carefully attended to, and the workmanship is admirable." At the distance of 39 feet from the south-west angle, proceeding northwards along the western wall of the Haram—proceeding from x towards F in the diagram, and at the point x, "Robinson's Arch" commences. The width of this arch, as I have stated, was 50 feet. From the arch onwards to the northern extremity of this western Haram wall, various buildings, chiefly of modern construction, abut upon the great wall itself; and, consequently, in a great measure they effectually under this lintel, led over the Tyropœon valley from the western city into the sacred enclosure at a low level, and, consequently, gave access to prevent the uninterrupted examination of the lower courses of the masonry.

No. 1.

TWO PAGES OF THE BOOK OF THE SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH, PRESERVED AT NABLUS, THE ANCIENT SHECHEM.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH, TAKEN FOR THE "PALESTINE EXPLORATION FUND," BY SERGEANT PHILLIPS, R.E.

the substructures that were beneath the Temple.

The first building adjoining the Haram wall, to the north of "Robinson's Arch," is the house of the Turkish effendi, Abu Seud. From the arch to this house, and in this house, as far as can be seen, there is, in the lower courses of the wall, a mixture of plain chiselled stones, and stones with a marginal draft; but, just beyond this, ancient masonry of a more decided character appears, in the form of an enormous lintel, which covers a gate-way through the wall, now closed up. The

In ancient times another arch must be supposed to have carried the passage (or street-way) over the valley to this gate-way; and also, without a doubt, another open way originally led along the face of the Haram wall, under the causeway arches, from north to south.

Immediately to the north of the great stone lintel is the "Jews' Wailing-place," or "Wall of Wailing"—that portion of the west wall of the Haram to which access is permitted to the Jews by the Turkish masters of Jerusalem, that there, close to the sacred spot where their Temple once stood, they may mourn over the lamentable fortunes of the Holy City. The wall at the "Wailing-place" must be considered—at any rate, in parts—to be a very early

No. 2.

(Drawn by B. BRADLEY.)

"The trees shall bend to welcome us,
The flowers shall clasp our feet."—p. 827.

reconstruction of ancient masonry. The stones are very large, and have the chiselled marginal draft from two to four inches broad, and not exceeding three-eighths of an inch in depth. The faces of these stones are finely worked; but the joints between many of them are coarse and wide. The stones themselves are placed without care or judgment, and "a few of the blocks are set on edge." The holes that are seen to have been cut in some of these stones were designed to receive the groin-points of vaulting-arches, which at some period were evidently built up here abutting upon the great wall.

The same style of masonry may be seen in a small garden adjoining the "Wailing-place," to the north. From this garden, also, the face of the Mahkama (or court-house) may be examined. This edifice, constructed with ancient materials, abuts on the Haram wall; and it is supported by a double series of arched vaults, apparently of different ages, but none of them, as it would seem, of any remote antiquity. Immediately to the north of the vaults which support the Mahkama is a great pool or cistern, which Capt. Wilson discovered to be in part roofed over with a noble arch of ancient masonry, in width 43 feet, and with a span of 42 feet—6 inches wider than the span of "Robinson's Arch." This arch, now known as "Wilson's Arch," which, like "Robinson's," springs from the Haram wall, is supported westwards by a massive pier, constructed of masonry, resembling that of the opposite portion of the Haram wall, and built after the same style as the lowermost courses of "Robinson's" western pier, discovered by Lieutenant Warren. "There are," says Capt. Wilson, "twenty-three courses in the arch, of equal thickness, which gives it an almost painful appearance of regularity." The stones of which this arch is constructed are in perfect preservation; and the arch itself, still standing uninjured, must always be regarded as one of the most remarkable existing relics of the Jerusalem of antiquity. It would seem to be certain that this archway has survived the general destruction by Titus, and that it is a genuine work of an age certainly not later than that of Herod the Great. Over this archway a second high-level causeway, parallel to that over "Robinson's Arch," led across the Tyropœon valley from the western city to the Temple and the adjoining edifices on Mount Zion; as the principal approach to the Haram area passes over this same archway now. If the surmise be correct, as there is every reason for believing it to be, that this archway has remained as it now appears from Herodian times, its perfect preservation after the taking of the city by Titus, as Captain Wilson has well observed, may be easily understood, from "its forming the best and readiest means of communication" within the city "for troops passing from one hill to the other, and as such it would be of the greatest importance to the Roman garrison."

"Wilson's Arch" does not completely cover the pool, which, after Mahomet's mysterious charger, is named "Al Burak," up to its northern extremity: the remaining portion of the pool, accordingly, is covered by another arch of a perfectly different character, built of rubble-work of small stones, and not having so large a span—the work of a more recent period, and probably constructed when the pool itself was formed beneath the great old arch in the accumulated earth and ruins.

Captain Wilson was not enabled to carry out any further his discovery of the arch which bears his name: so that it was left for Lieut. Warren to resume the operations in this most interesting field for exploration. Warren entered in earnest on his researches in connection with "Wilson's Arch" towards the end of November last, when he at once sunk a shaft under the arch towards the south, "alongside the Haram wall, to see what it was like." At a depth of 15 feet he found the stones to be bevelled, of the usual size, and 3 feet 9 inches in height. At 26 feet his progress with his shaft was very slow, as he then found himself amongst the "débris of huge stones" that were "hard as iron." As he descended, he observed that "the stones in the Haram wall assumed the appearance of those found at the south-west angle." By Dec. 21st, notwithstanding the difficulty of the work, Lieutenant Warren had sunk his shaft about 45 feet below the surface; and from this point it would seem that the obstructions were more easily overcome.

As the excavations proceeded, fresh discoveries were continually made; until, early in February last, at which date for the present I take leave of the explorer at "Wilson's Arch," Lieutenant Warren had the satisfaction to report that he had discovered, not only four more arches, connected with Wilson's Arch and carrying on the causeway westwards from it, but also an extensive "system of vaults, tanks, and aqueducts," buried beneath the present surface of the ground, "in connection with, and to the west of, Wilson's Arch. They are apparently of similar age and construction, and are likely to throw considerable light on Jerusalem topography; in fact, it appears to me," writes Lieutenant Warren, "that this system of vaults is the key to underground Jerusalem; and, if we are not interfered with, we may reasonably hope very soon to have a good knowledge of the great embankment which runs across the Tyropœon valley."

With this paper we also give our readers a careful representation (No. 1) of an important manuscript—no less than the famous Samaritan Pentateuch, which was photographed at Nablus (the ancient Shechem). Its importance consists in the circumstance that it is more ancient than any of the Hebrew MSS.; and also more complete and explicit in its histories. It is written in the Samaritan character, which is much older than the present Hebrew letter; and most likely was that in which Moses penned the original. Taking into consideration the extreme antiquity of the document, it is still wonderfully legible; and, indeed, may almost be taken as a literal verification of the truth that "The Word of the Lord abideth for ever."

In the diagram No. 2, A B represents a section through the Haram wall. A C is the present surface of the ground. D is "Wilson's Arch," covering the pool "Al Burak." F is the first "Warren's Arch." G is the sub-arch to F. H is the second "Warren's Arch." E E E, accumulated rubbish beneath the arches. K, running water, flowing from north to south. From A to B is 88 feet; and from A to C is 112 feet.

Here we see how happily Lieutenant Warren is developing Captain Wilson's discovery of the true character of the ancient arch which now bears his name; and how the "underground Jerusalem" (to repeat his own striking expression)—the Jerusalem of antiquity, in part actually remaining to the present day, is gradually becoming revealed to us through the instrumentality of his explorations.

All further consideration of that "stream of water, running through the midst of the land," through the midst of the city also, deep in its subterranean channel, I must leave for a while; together with whatever inquiries may trace it to its source, determine its character, and follow it onward along its long-hidden way.

THE WORKMAN TO HIS WIFE.

COME, Mary, throw your work aside,
And let your troubles be;
Leave care, and toil, and smoke awhile,
And spend an hour with me.
We'll seek the cowslip on the bank,
The primrose in the lane;
And happy sights and sounds afar
Shall make us young again.

It's long, my love, since you and I
Have heard the blackbird sing,
Or caught by running brooks and woods
The glory of the spring;
It's long since you and I have trod
The paths where hawthorns blow;
Then, Mary, fling your work aside,
And let your troubles go.

The trees shall bend to welcome us,
The flowers shall clasp our feet,
The very bees shall hymn our praise
In murmurs soft and sweet;
The winds shall swell with ready voice
The chorus high and loud,
And we'll forget the world, my wife,
And all its busy crowd.

A thousand things await us, love—
Blue skies and balmy air,
Green fields whose very sight shall make
The heart forget its care;
Then never sigh, be glad to-day,
Throw sorrow to the wind,
Nor pause till we have left our ills
A summer's hour behind.

MATTHIAS BARR.

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER LVII.

MR. ISAACS APPEARS IN A NEW CHARACTER.

"MY eyes are failing me, Rachel. Are you sure you have not passed it over?"

"Quite sure," replied Rachel, with a sigh, and folding up the newspaper.

"It is very strange he did not answer that last advertisement, where it said, 'Absence is killing your mother.' If that does not bring him, nothing will."

"He did not see it," returned Rachel, putting on her bonnet. The Times had been hired for an hour, and she was going to take it back.

While she was gone, the old lady sat by the fire, her head drooping on her breast. Sometimes she muttered a few words; then she seemed to doze. But her whole demeanour was unlike herself.

Presently Rachel came back. "Mother, it is so bright and sunshiny out of doors," said she, trying to speak cheerfully; "will you go out a bit?"

"No, thank you, Rachel. I am sure it is very cold," said the old woman, drawing nearer to the fire.

Rachel closed the door, which she had left open to admit the pleasant gleam of sun that came in with her. Then she took up her work, and began to sew.

The old lady's head drooped again. "What a clock is it?" asked she, presently.

"Half-past three, mother."

"No later than that!" said the old lady, in a weary tone.

"Should you like a cup of tea?" asked Rachel, getting up.

"No, I don't want my tea. Sit down again, Rachel."

Rachel sat down. The sort of thing I am describing had gone on for some time.

Presently Dame Humphreys spoke again. "What a'clock is it, Rachel?"

"It has just struck four, mother."

"Only four! Dear me! how long the days are getting."

"Let me read to you," said Rachel, pityingly, and again laying down her work.

"Oh, no! I don't want that. I only want one thing, Rachel—my boy to come back."

She said it in a tone of such deep pathos, that Rachel could hardly bear it. Rachel, herself, was sadly changed since the days when she was a happy, hopeful bride. She looked old, and thin, and worn: for though six weeks had passed, no tidings had been heard of John.

Dame Humphreys sat a little time silent, her head drooping. Then she said, "I am sure it must be bedtime, Rachel."

"Dear mother, it is only five o'clock. I am going to get the tea ready."

"The clocks are so slow, Rachel," said the old woman, in a complaining tone. "I am so tired——"

"Will you go to bed, mother?"

"I think I will."

Rachel's eyes were moist with tears. She knew that Dame Humphreys was breaking up very fast indeed. She assisted her to bed. The most affectionate daughter that ever lived could have done no more for her than Rachel did. Then, when the weary head was laid on the pillow, she went down to get a cup of tea.

Some one went by the window, and then stopped. No! it was not John, though her heart seemed to leap into her mouth, and she turned as pale as death. It was not John. John would have come in at once; this person knocked at the door.

She opened it with a trembling hand. Her nerves were always wrought up to the highest pitch, and the least surprise startled her. She was startled to see Mr. Isaacs. He had quite recovered the effects of the blow, and was about again as usual.

The sight of the man through whom her husband had come to so much grief, was more than Rachel could bear. It affected her as any other shock would have done. She sat down on the nearest chair, and turning her face away, burst into tears.

Mr. Isaacs, in the meantime, stepped in through the door she had left open; then he closed it, and sat down.

Rachel turned hastily round. She felt indignant that he should have come. It seemed to her a gratuitous piece of cruelty.

"Don't be angry, Mrs. Humphreys," said he; "I am sure I'm very sorry for what has happened."

"But that won't bring me back my husband!" cried Rachel, still weeping bitterly.

"No; and I'm sorry for it. I was a bit hard on him. I've thought so since, many times."

Rachel was still weeping.

"Of course I'm not responsible for what he's done," continued Mr. Isaacs. "I could not help his running away from his family; that was no fault of mine. You see the worst of poor Humphreys was——"

"I will not hear a word against him—not a single word!" interrupted Rachel, trembling with anger.

"No—oh, no—of course not. I wasn't going to say it either. I was only going to remark that it was a pity he went off so quick. He was in a panic, I suppose."

"He had never lifted his hand against any living creature in his life," spoke out poor Rachel, still trembling violently. "He was as good and peaceable a man as ever lived." And she burst out into another flood of weeping.

"Pray don't take on so, Mrs. Humphreys," said Mr. Isaacs, rather at a loss for the right form of expression.

"I may well 'take on,' as you call it, when my husband is gone," sobbed Rachel.

"He'll come back, you may take my word for it, some of these days," replied Mr. Isaacs, trying to cheer her up. "I am sure he needn't stop away because of me. I'm all right."

There was a decided comfort in this assurance, but at the time Rachel did not feel it, the wound smarted too intolerably.

"Now," continued Mr. Isaacs, drawing his chair a little nearer, and speaking in a confidential tone, "I'm come to give you a bit of friendly advice. I'm not a bad-disposed man in my heart; but business is business, you know, Mrs. Humphreys; and when a man thinks he's been taken in by rotten security, it's apt to drive him a little. I was driven to turn your husband out of the farm."

"It was very cruel of you," exclaimed Rachel, indignantly; "and God will judge between us some day. My poor husband never gave any one rotten security."

"Not with his knowledge, perhaps. But it's a matter of business, that is, and we need not go into it. I came to speak to you about the Sylvesters."

"Ah!" said Rachel, bitterly, as if the name conjured up a hundred painful associations.

"They've crashed up, you know. I only wonder they kept on so long. The young man is in gaol. He tried to abscond, but the police was after him, and they took him up in London."

"I am glad they did," said Rachel, still with unusual bitterness.

"And so am I. They all deserve their fate. No one will feel a bit of sorrow for them!" responded Mr. Isaacs, heartily. "But," continued he, a moment after, "it seems to me as if this were just the time for you to put in your claim. You have as much right to put in your claim as anybody else."

"If it would only bring John back again!" cried Rachel, with another burst of sorrow.

"But it will be all the better for John when he does come back," said Mr. Isaacs, briskly. "It won't be much, mind, and it will be a precious long time coming. They say there won't be more than half-a-crown in the pound; but half a loaf is better than no bread, don't you see, Mrs. Humphreys?"

"Yes," replied Rachel, reluctantly. She felt a decided repugnance to this man mixing himself up with her affairs. Perhaps he perceived it. He was a sharp-sighted man enough. At all events he said, a minute after—

"Don't you suppose, now, that I'm come for any other purpose but to see you righted. It's no concern of mine at all. But the fact is, I have had a twinge or two of conscience, and I want my conscience to sit a bit easier. And I know you are a lone woman; and the old lady is not long for this world, poor thing; and she's got her money in an annuity; I happen to know that as well." And he nodded confidentially.

"You and the Sylvesters together have helped to break her down," said Rachel, warmly. "She was as hale and hearty an old woman as ever lived, before this happened."

"So she was, and I'm very sorry—on my word I am. But you are rather hard on me, Mrs. Humphreys. How could I help the poor fellow knocking me on the head, and then running away? Of course I couldn't. And another thing you forget. The blow might have made an end of me, and what would have happened then?"

Rachel gave a little shudder.

"So that, really, you ought to look at what somebody, in some book or other I once read, calls mitigations. And it's a great mitigation that I am ready to forgive your husband, and not take the law against him."

So it was. Rachel could not deny that.

"And now I want you to send in your claim. Carlton is the lawyer for the Sylvesters. And if you want any one to stand by you, I will."

"Thank you," said Rachel.

It was, as he afterwards told her, the first civil word she had uttered.

There was a decided consolation to Rachel in this visit of Mr. Isaacs, when she came to reflect upon it. To feel that his ill-will against her husband was removed, and that there would be no reckoning with him for that unlucky assault, was a great point gained. And also, in this hour of loneliness and weakness, to have a friend to speak up for her was another point of equal advantage. He had gone away, telling her not to trouble about anything, and that he should employ his own lawyer to get the money, without any cost to herself.

All this was very extraordinary, and remarkably kind.

"God must have put it into his heart," thought Rachel, tearfully.

All this time Dame Humphreys was in bed in the room up-stairs. Rachel wondered that the talking did not disturb her. She had been expecting, every moment, that the weak querulous voice would call down the stairs to know who was there; but it did not.

"Perhaps she is asleep," thought Rachel, and she stole softly up-stairs to look.

She had a tray in her hand, with the cup of tea and the toast all ready. She put it down on the table, for the room was still and dark. She had closed the curtains to keep out the light.

Very softly, and without making the least noise, she stepped to the side of the bed.

Dame Humphreys lay as if asleep; but it was easy to see, at a glance, what had happened. Rachel uttered no cry as she gazed at the pallid face on the pillow, nor did she faint, as some women might have done. Yet an awful certainty forced itself upon her—a certainty that admitted of no one single doubt. Dame Humphreys was indeed asleep; but it was a slumber that no mortal cry could break. Death had laid his hand on the poor aching heart, and stilled it. She was gone!

CHAPTER LVIII.

AN ACT OF JUSTICE.

"A GENTLEMAN has been waiting for you, sir, this last hour," said the clerk to Mr. Carlton, on his return from the Sylvester mansion.

"Waiting for me! pray where is Mr. Sowerby?" asked the lawyer, with some asperity.

"Mr. Sowerby is within, sir, but the gentleman declined——"

"Ah! that's just the way," interrupted Mr. Carlton, holding up his hands: "unless I run away from the town altogether, I might as well be in harness again. Where is the gentleman, pray?"

"In your private room, sir. He said"—and the clerk could not suppress a half-smile—"he said that his business was strictly confidential."

Mr. Carlton, still grumbling softly to himself, walked up-stairs; the card, which his clerk had given him, in his hand. "I am sure I don't know any such person," grumbled he, as he read it.

When he opened the door of his room, there came into view the well-got-up person, slight figure, and cold blue eye of Francis Heatherly. He came forward at once to meet the lawyer. "Mr. Carlton, I presume? Then I have the pleasure of speaking to the first lawyer in Newbury."

It was a well-timed compliment, and mollified Mr. Carlton considerably. His faculties being sharpened, he was not long in making the discovery as to who Mr. Heatherly was.

"I am sure it was very unpardonable of me not to recognise the name at once," cried he; for the status of his new client seemed to rise in no small degree. "But the fact is, I am getting old, Mr. Heatherly, and my memory is beginning to fail. If I could only retire altogether from business:" and he gave a hopeless kind of sigh as he thought of Mr. Sowerby.

"I am glad you have not retired," said Francis Heatherly, briskly; "because, you see, my business is of such a—delicate and confidential nature, that really, except to a gentleman of your experience, I should be reluctant to mention it."

"On my word, I wonder what is coming!" thought

Mr. Carlton: but he only smiled blandly, and begged his client would be seated.

"In the first place," began Francis Heatherly, glancing round, to assure himself that no one was there to listen—a very needless precaution, as it happened—"in the first place, I suppose you know that I am the inheritor of the late Miss Graham's property?"

Mr. Carlton smilingly replied that he did.

"It was an unjust will, as you must be aware," continued the client, warmly: he was thinking of Josephine. "By it, the most admirable young lady that ever lived has been condemned to poverty."

He was very much excited when he said this, and blushed to the roots of his hair. Mr. Carlton was not excited at all: he still smiled in his blandest manner.

"While I, who have no claim to the money, or, indeed, right to it, being about the twenty-fourth cousin, am rolling in the wealth which belongs to another."

"By law you have a claim, my dear sir; your legal right is indisputable," suggested Mr. Carlton, with some animation.

"Law is one thing, Mr. Carlton, justice is another," said Francis Heatherly.

The lawyer, with all his acumen, was not prepared to dispute the point. Besides, a very natural idea had occurred to him. "Are you acquainted with Miss Graham?" he asked, raising his eyes to the countenance of Francis Heatherly.

Francis Heatherly's eyes dropped under the mild but inquiring gaze of the lawyer.

"Well, yes, I am," replied he, abruptly.

"A confession which explains everything," thought Mr. Carlton.

"I am acquainted with her, and—and—in fact I—" He stopped: with all his boasted powers, as set forth in his note-book, he was scarcely able to express what he wanted.

The lawyer attempted to fill up the gap. "It seems to me," he said, suggestively, "that your kind intentions towards Miss Graham would be very easy to carry out. Why not, as she is so admirable—why not—excuse my plainness; I am an old man, you know—why not marry her?"

"Ah! that is the worst of it, Mr. Carlton; she won't have me."

He said it in a tone of deep dejection.

"Not have you, my dear sir!"

"No; she won't."

"That is very extraordinary," resumed the lawyer, a few moments after. "Pray what are her resources? if I may ask the question."

"You may ask it, and welcome. She has none!"

"No resources!"

"Not except what she earns. She makes watch-pockets, and kettle-holders, and such things, and then sells them."

"You don't say so!"

"But—do; how else is she to live?"

"And yet she refuses you?"

"Refuses me point blank!"

"Perhaps there is a rival in the case?" suggested the lawyer.

"Oh, no!" exclaimed Francis, vehemently rebutting the assertion; "I am sure no gentleman goes there, I have made inquiries on purpose to find out."

The lawyer smiled to himself. There was a little episode in Josephine's history, that was well known to the inhabitants of Newbury; he did not think it necessary to make Mr. Heatherly acquainted with it. Nor did he suppose that the interview was intended to refer solely to his client's disappointment in love.

"Now," resumed Francis Heatherly, recovering his briskness, "I'll tell you what I think of doing: I am a man remarkable for my strict justice, my integrity has never swerved from the line and plummet. I must put forward that assertion to explain what will follow."

The lawyer began to tap softly on his silver snuff-box. It was evident he had nothing to say to this.

"I do not think of giving up the whole of my property." Mr. Carlton started, as if a pistol had gone off at his ear. "Not the whole! that would be sheer folly, and I am not foolish—I have always been considered rather wise."

Mr. Carlton began softly to tap again.

"But I think of making her an allowance: I wish to leave her in the enjoyment of a comfortable income!"

"Leave her!" repeated the lawyer, ceasing to tap.

Mr. Heatherly's tone had so relapsed into the tragic, that he might have been referring to his own dissolution.

"Yes! leave her: the fact is, I am sick of Newbury!"

"Indeed! that is a great pity."

"I am! What is there for me to do here?" ("Now I cannot marry Josephine," was the concluding argument; of which, however, he said nothing.)

"I should have thought, with your wealth and position," began the lawyer, blandly.

"Nonsense! what good does my wealth do me? Don't you see I am a broken-hearted man?" and he leaned back in his chair, with an assumption of extreme despondency.

"Allow me to remark, Mr. Heatherly, that there are other young ladies in Newbury worthy of your regard," suggested the lawyer.

"Oh, no! that is no consolation. Perhaps if my heart had been free"—and he called to mind certain visits paid now and then at a certain house, where a pair of bright eyes had been wont to welcome him—"but that's all over now; I shall go back to Dorsetshire."

"Is that your native county, may I ask?"

"Yes; I have a few friends there, who care for me," said Francis Heatherly, in a dismal tone.

"Come, come, my dear sir, you must cheer up; it will never do for us to lose one of our most influential men," said the lawyer, with a touch of flattery.

"Oh, nobody will miss me; nobody will care where

"I go to!" continued the disconsolate lover, meaning that Josephine would not care.

"You will think better of it to-morrow."

"No; I shall perhaps be gone to-morrow."

"Then you wish the business settled at once?"

It was not to be supposed that Mr. Carlton would endure this sort of thing much longer.

Francis Heatherly roused himself at the word business.

"Yes, certainly; that was what I came about: I think I have explained to you how matters stand."

"Perfectly so: I only wait for instructions," replied the lawyer.

"Well, then, I wish to settle on Miss Graham the sum of two hundred a-year."

"And a very nice thing too." He was secretly glad that such an arrangement had been thought of. He had always been sorry for Josephine; and he had had his own opinion of the way in which she had been dealt with.

"For her life," continued Francis Heatherly, solemnly, and as grave as a judge.

"Exactly, for her life; and, as I said before, a very nice thing too! But as for leaving the county, my dear sir," continued the lawyer, writing down his client's instructions, "you will think better of that."

"Oh, no; I have quite made up my mind To-morrow will see the last of me in Newbury," said Francis Heatherly, tragically. He had told his notebook so, and he meant to keep his word.

(To be continued.)

VELVET-HEAD.

THE house was infested with rats. They visited each room, and were to be met on the stairs: in a word, they were everywhere. What was to be done to banish these unwelcome guests? One remedy alone remained untried—a cat. The children were delighted. Papa did not like the idea, but seeing there was no alternative, he gave a reluctant consent to the addition of a kitten to the family circle. Soon after, cousin Harriet came to pay a visit, and to the children's great joy, drew from beneath her cloak the prettiest little black and white pussy they had ever beheld. Even papa, when he came home, noticed the playful stranger, and admitted he had never seen so interesting a specimen of the feline race.

A great discussion then arose, as to what the new favourite should be called. "Minnie," was first proposed, but unanimously rejected, as being too common. A number of other names were mentioned, but some objection found to each, until it seemed likely the kitten would remain pussy, all her life, when little Amy said:—

"What a pretty black spot she has on her head, so very smooth and soft. I will call her Velvet-head."

"A good name, and uncommon too," exclaimed Arthur, the eldest boy.

"Yes, yes, it is settled," was the universal cry, "let that be her name."

Now Velvet-head had some adventures in her youth, and hair-breadth escapes too; such as being locked up for nights in presses and boxes, in which she had a peculiar talent for hiding.

One evening she fell asleep in papa's slipper, and just when he was going to put it on, he heard a faint mew, and saw a tiny tail.

"You never could imagine," he said, as he carried her to the children, "what a funny sleeping-place she found for herself. Why do you not make her a comfortable bed, and spare my slippers?"

The children laughed at the idea, and as soon as he was gone, Helen exclaimed, "Indeed, Velvet-head ought to have a bed. I wish we had a basket, and I would make a nice soft cushion."

"I will give my doll's cradle," said Amy; "it will be quite large enough even when she is grown up."

And so the cat's cradle was brought, and placed near the parlour-fire, and every night the kitten was put to bed. Sometimes it was hard enough to find her, for she had a trick of keeping out of the way at the right hour, like some silly children who like to sit up late.

Arthur had a mischievous school-boy friend, who, on one unfortunate occasion, seeing Helen's scissors on the table, and being alone with Velvet-head, thought it would be fine fun to clip her whiskers; and had just accomplished cutting off one, when the door was suddenly opened, and Helen entered, followed by Amy. The latter burst into tears at seeing her pet so disfigured. Helen was too old to cry, but she felt very indignant; and it was a long time before she could bring herself to pardon the offender.

At length these kittenish days passed away, and Velvet-head became a large handsome cat. No rat now dare enter her dominions. She was respected and dreaded by the mice, and beloved by the children. Aunt Martha, indeed, who occasionally visited at the house, was her inexorable foe. "I cannot endure cats," she used frequently to say. The children could not understand why; but supposed their aunt must have some good reason for disliking so useful a class of animals. There is no doubt that one morning pussy was caught with her head in the cream-jug, at the same time stirring Aunt Martha's cup of tea with her tail, on which occasion she was called "a nasty, ugly, green-eyed monster." (Amy always had an idea that green eyes were particularly beautiful.) But Arthur truly remarked, that we should not judge these little delinquencies too harshly, because cats cannot be taught, like children, to ask leave before touching anything not their own; and, on the whole, Velvet-head was quite as honest as any of her species. Alas! her worst misfortune is yet to be told.

It happened that one evening there had been company in the house, and the children had been allowed to sit up later than usual. When they left the drawing-room, Helen said, "Go down, Amy, and see if Velvet-head is in her bed."

"No," replied the little girl, "I am tired and sleepy" (and cross, too, she might have added).

"I put her to bed last night," said Helen; "it is your turn now."

"I will not go," replied Amy. "Send Arthur."

"Arthur," called out Helen, "will you go and see if the cat is in bed? and if not, look for her; perhaps she is locked out."

"Well, we cannot help that now," he answered; "my going down would not bring her in. She has spent the night out before, and I'm sure is safe enough."

"Oh, Arthur, do, like a good boy, see where she is. I'm uneasy about her to-night."

"It's too long a way to the parlour," he replied.

"I'm cold, and I want to go to bed. If you care so much about her go yourself."

"Don't you care, too?"

"I tell you she's safe enough," he said, in an impatient tone; "and it's your turn to see about her. I went the night before last."

"You are both most provoking," said Helen, angrily. "I will not go, for it is Amy's night."

"Well, send Amy, and don't torment me any more; and that's an end of it," said Arthur, as he shut his door with a loud clap.

"I told you before I would not go," persisted Amy. And the more they argued, the more determined each became not to give way, until, in the end, all went to bed, too quarrelsome and angry to think much of the safety or comfort of poor Velvet-head.

It is a sad thing to fall asleep in such a frame of mind, when we do not know under what circumstances, or if ever, we may waken. Yet so did these three children lie down to rest, utterly unconscious of the fearful danger with which they were threatened.

Early in the morning, when the servant went down-stairs, she observed thick smoke, and a strong smell of fire. Hastening to the kitchen, as she opened the door, she felt something rush wildly past: what it was she had no time to conjecture, for the sight which met her view at that moment was indeed sufficiently frightful to chase all other ideas from her mind. The whole room seemed a mass of flame—walls, ceiling, all involved in one brilliant blaze. With wonderful courage she dashed through the suffocating smoke, across the scorching floor, and flung open a door at the opposite side. With the help of a passer-by, from whom she implored aid, a barrel of water was rolled in, and emptied on the flame. By this time more efficient help had arrived, and with much labour the fire was extinguished.

Aunt Martha, hearing these unusual sounds at so early an hour, sprang from her bed, and, running about distractedly, shrieked, "Fire! fire!" all the time convulsively clutching an empty water-jug, with which, no doubt, she hoped to be of great assistance. Her screams alarmed the whole household, who assembled just in time to see her go off in violent hysterics. Of course all attention was devoted to her restoration, therefore it was some time before the children thought of going to the parlour. When they did so, a sad sight greeted their view. Velvet-head stretched on the rug, her empty cradle in its accustomed place, which, alas! had been unoccupied during the previous night.

She had been accidentally shut up in the kitchen, and no doubt mewed most piteously to be released; but no one heard her cries. The poor little animal was terribly scorched, her paws shrivelled with the heat of the burning floor, her hair singed in various places; in short, she was a deplorable object. How great must have been her sufferings during that long night, imprisoned among the flames! It was supposed she had taken refuge under a large press, which the fire had but just reached when the door was flung open, and darting madly from the suffocating atmosphere, she had only sufficient strength left to reach the parlour. The children gathered round her with feelings of grief and remorse. "Oh, had we only known—could we have imagined how it was! Poor Velvet-head, how cruelly we have treated you! I wish—I wish we had looked after you last night!"

"Yes," added Arthur, "and we might have discovered the fire when it first began, and saved papa so much loss."

"I care more for dear Velvet-head than anything else," said Amy, "because she is alive, and can feel pain. What a lazy girl I was, not to have gone down last night."

"Oh! so was I," said Helen; "why did I not go, when I knew you were sleepy and tired?"

"I was the worst," said Arthur, "I ought to have gone, and saved you both the trouble. Oh! Velvet-head, my dear cat, if I had not been cross and disobedient, you would not have been in this sad plight to-day."

Such were the lamentations, mingled with bitter self-reproaches, poured forth by the children over the fate of their favourite; while she, poor thing, could only lie licking her burned paws, and uttering at intervals a faint and plaintive "mew." Helen ran for a saucer of warm milk, but the suffocating vapours in which she had passed the night, had affected her breathing, and she was unable to drink. After a time she raised herself slowly, and endeavoured to jump to Helen's lap, but had not strength for the spring, so Amy gently placed her where she wished. Patiently did Helen nurse her most of the day, and great was the universal joy when, towards evening, she swallowed a little milk. It was a long time ere she was able to run about as usual, but eventually she recovered. The children never forgot the sufferings they had caused her by the indulgence of their quarrelsome tempers, and if at any time they were inclined to dispute, or say unkind words to each other, "Remember Velvet-head" was sufficient to render them gentle and obliging, and ever reminded them to give that "soft answer which turneth away wrath."

THE GUYVER

Saturday, September 19, 1868.

(Drawn by J. A. PASQUIER.)

"He looked over her shoulder into the mill-dam."—p. 834.

ALDA'S LEAP.

A TALE OF THE VAUDOIS VALLEYS. IN THREE PARTS.

PART II.

THE unhappy prediction of David Barolo came to pass; within a few weeks of their parting, a merciless persecution, unequalled in its cruelties, overtook the poor fugitives from the valleys, and Verena's kind heart had to bleed in silence for the sufferings of Protestant martyrs. Bigotry, like another Moloch, was lifted up in the land, and slew its hundreds; and in the quiet of Verena's country life these human sacrifices assumed an overpowering horror, affecting her spirits, and even the tone of her mind.

VOL. III.

The early spring came round, with its budding leaves and opening blossoms, but Verena scarcely ever ventured outside the precincts of her father's garden; she fancied, foolishly, that she could hear in the valley the shrieks of flying women, or the wailing of mothers over their slaughtered children. She had worse fancies than these, but she dared not frame them to her mind lest her reason might slip from her hold.

Her sleep, too, was broken, and her rest was gone from her. Night after night, unable to find repose in her bed, she rose and paced her room, or sat by the window which overlooked the mill-dam, chilly and comfortless in the moonlight. Away, away, to the distant Alps, on whose cold slopes she knew there were motionless forms lying by the hundred. David's father, she had heard (on whose knee she had sat so often and listened to his pleasant flow of genial words), was already numbered amongst the ghastly multitude. What must David have suffered ere he watched the spirit go out, whose calm, steady light had been his guide since childhood! Would not a bitter vindictiveness fill his breast against all her creed, which must in time extend even to herself? Then, turning from the window, Verena would cast herself upon her knees before the crucifix at the foot of her bed, and plead with an erring devotion for the suffering flock, which were being driven to and fro amongst the mountains.

But day by day, instead of the persecutions drawing to a close, their horrors increased. Verena heard how, in one small village among the hills, more than a hundred women and innocent children had been massacred.

Verena's spirit, pure, loving, and pitiful, but devotional even to fanaticism, was like a bird in a storm—the mere plaything of the wind. She could not listen to these recitals of wild cruelty and excess without shudderings of heart; but, on the other hand, she might not listen to the rebellious thoughts which arose in her bosom against the authors and perpetrators of these cruelties. She drifted she knew not whither.

Her priests, too, and spiritual directors, who but a few months ago had sought to lure her lover to their fold, now denounced him and his religion in words so bitter and vengeful, that Verena, returning slowly from her confessional, felt that, if she would gain heaven, she must slay this deep love she felt for David, on the very threshold of her upward path.

She began to tremble now for her own power of endurance. Her mind as well as her body was growing weak. There were moments when she could scarcely trust her reason or her sight. When she sat in the garden for rest, the clouds overhead took strange and fanciful shapes, as of a stricken multitude, which filled her heart with gloomy suggestions. If she sought to read, the words presented no meaning to her mind.

Once, with a strange impulse, she took the pages of the Testament David had given her from her bosom. She believed in tests; she would try if they could give her back her mental vigour; but no, they were meaningless as the rest. And was not this a sin—this gift of David's—a sin she was hiding in her bosom? She would test truth again; she would cast out this sin, this last relic of a forbidden love, for ever.

She crumpled up the pages and cast them into the mill-dam. Suddenly—yes, this time the test had triumphed—the words which when read a moment before carried no sense to the vacant mind, rose up now from the tank at her feet, and appeared as if printed in letters of fire on the water, "There is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved," a text from the forbidden book, the last words uttered in her ear by David.

Verena pressed her hands over her eyes to shut out their meaning, but the words were written within on her eye-balls. She looked again down into the mill-dam: they were flaming there still. The illusion was so strong, she stooped and threw a stone into the water. Of a sudden, the splash and the widening circles brought back the day of bitter parting, and Garcino's wily face gazing at her over the vineyard-wall.

"Verena."

With a scream and sudden forward leap, she had almost precipitated herself into the mill-dam, for it was Garcino himself who touched her on the shoulder.

"What dost see in the water, Verena? I warrant there be fish in the stream, but none that will come with money in its mouth."

"What has brought thee here again, Garcino, with a foolish speech in thy mouth?" she asked, bitterly. "I want neither thee nor thy money. This is my father's garden—cannot I sit here unmolested?"

Without replying, he looked over her shoulder into the mill-dam, and his eye rested on the torn leaves she had dropped into the water.

"Belike you have lost a love-letter; Barolo, no doubt, finds means still of addressing thee;" and as he spoke he approached the place where the paper was caught in the sedge.

"Garcino," she cried, in hasty confusion, "come here. I would not have thee take my words unkindly. I have been out of sorts to-day. Tell me, hast thou no news from the town?"

"Ay, you will give heed to my news to-day.

Verena, hast thou considered my words? Thy heretic lover has forsaken thee; but, lo! I am here to protect thee and thy father."

"My father and I are above suspicion; we do not need thy aid," she said, sternly.

"I know not how that may be, Verena. I know I love thee."

"I am sorry," was all she replied, but she turned towards the door of her house.

"Verena, you are sorry! Have you no heart or pity?"

"No, I have none; I have neither heart nor pity left," she cried, passionately, waving him off. "My heart is long since dead, and pity has been murdered."

"Is it even so?" he muttered between his teeth. "The day may come when you may call on Garcino for aid, and he will reply, 'My pity is dead also.'"

The words fell upon Verena's ear with significance and presentiment. She felt inclined to turn and fly. At that moment the miller, who had overheard the voices in the garden, appeared in the doorway.

"Father, he threatens us!" she faltered.

"Dog of a tanner! what brings you skulking round my house and garden? If a maiden's refusal does not touch thy pride, must I hunt thee forth? One would think there were skins enough these days to dress to keep thee pretty busy."

"Miller, you shall answer for this. Take care, take care; I may have you ground yet in your own mill, or baked in your own oven. I have you in my power."

"Big words are not grinding-stones, nor can hot breath fire the oven," replied the miller, contemptuously, as he assisted his daughter within the mill.

But Garcino waited till he was out of sight, and stooping down, drew the torn leaves of the Testament to the edge of the mill-dam, and carried them away.

That evening, Verena sought peace early in a sleep which seemed to overpower her; but her mind was still feverish and restless, and broken images of danger and hurried flight oppressed her. Again she was anxiously seeking for something which she must find before it came into other hands. It was dear life to her to find it; she stretched out for it, muttering, "None other name given under heaven," and woke with a gasp. She then remembered the leaves of the Testament which she had left behind her, forgotten in her confusion and vexation.

"What have I done?" she cried. "Garcino saw it. We are lost!" She sprang from her bed, and hastily attiring herself, she lit a lantern and went down the staircase in trembling agitation, yet with a noiseless step, careful not to rouse her father.

She quickly opened the door leading into the garden, and a bright flood of moonlight smote her face and figure as she stood there, anxious and uncertain.

"I will not bring the lantern," she murmured, laying it softly on the bench within; then, half closing the door, she crossed over towards the mill-dam. Everything was ghostly still save the black mill-wheel with its hoarse splash.

On hands and knees, she peered into the water, and snatched at something white. It was only a handful of foam, and her heart sank within her. With hasty steps she traversed the bank backwards and forwards, searching in vain: there was no trace. Garcino had carried it off as a witness against them.

"It is a false witness," she said. "My father and I have no taint, and may the saints keep us from it."

She returned to the house and took up the lantern. Striving to be calm, she sat for a while on the bench, till the flame, heating the framework, burnt her tender hand, and the pain at length penetrated her reverie.

As she went up the stairs she paused at her father's door, and looked in softly. The old man was bound in healthy sleep, his white head resting on a brawny arm, the very picture of earthly security and dependence upon self.

"How weak and faithless I am," she murmured, "and he is passing brave and strong; yet I might be stronger and calmer than he, with a strength not my own."

She set down the lantern on the floor, and stealing to his bedside, sank upon her knees, and prayed fervently that God would bring her into the sweet haven of peace, and lead her among the ways of those blessed women whose lives were written on her brain.

She was for a long time absorbed, with her face buried in her hands, and might unconsciously have passed into sleep, when suddenly the room seemed illumined, and she saw a pale and fair maiden in white garments stand as it were on the brow of a cliff, which formed itself she knew not how beneath the rafters, and the figure beckoned to her, and smiled upon her, and the words seemed to come from a distance:

"Verena, bid thy father farewell, and come stand by me."

She gasped, stretched out her arms, and rose to her feet; but the room was dark, the light within the lantern had gone out, and her limbs were numbed with cold.

"Father, father!" she cried, laying her hand on her father's shoulder, "did you not see her?"

"Garcino, I have thee by the throat!" muttered the old man, in his half-broken sleep.

"Father, tell me, did you not see her? the blessed Saint Alda was in the room with us."

The miller sat up, but bewildered and cross that she should have disturbed his slumber, bid her return to her bed; "what did she there?"

Verena was too excited to reason with him: her imagination was in a state of ecstasy as she rose to her feet. She looked to see before her on the winding stair, like a guide and comfort, the vision which was but the idle creation of an overheated mind; but all was dark, except the glimmering of the moon through the cracks in the wooden casement.

Still in the same mood, she sat up in her bed, murmuring appeals to the saints for a continuance of their favours, and yearning yet trembling at the hope of beholding again the beautiful phantom on the cliff. At length she sank back into dreamless sleep, and when she awoke in the sunny morning all the events of that night—the splash of the cold water around her wrist, the moon-lit garden, and the beckoning vision on the cliff—seemed all the baseless fabric of a dream.

When she rose, the household cares occupied her mind to the exclusion of fantasy; and then when her eye fell upon a withered flower which she had received a short time since from David—a flower out of bloom in the present month—her thoughts fell upon him, his love, and his low solicitous voice, and above all his eternal farewell. There was fever in this theme, and it held her mind in the intervals of work during the day.

Her father, indeed, rallied her upon the disturbance of the night, and this gave her a shock of remembrance, rekindling her enthusiasm for a time. But it is hard for the impressions of the mind to contend with waking dangers and waking realities. "If this vision be sent from heaven," she said, "I shall see it again; if that invitation comes once more I shall obey its call. But let me not leave my father and my home for a dream," and Verena's eyes wandered off to the distant mountains.

"Verena, my girl, the sun is nearly down; go into the garden and call the night-miller. I doubt but the lazy loon is dapping for pike in the flood."

She had been sitting working by the old hearth, and her thoughts were away up the Alps. Her father's command was not unwelcome to her—to go out into the fresh air. It was the half hour before sunset, when all the land was warm and genial, and the heavy dews had spread the first faint haze over the fields. She crossed the garden quickly, and called the night-miller, who was making ready to return; and then, invited by the warmth, the freshness of the leaves, and the hum of the bees returning to their hive, she sat down upon the bank which skirted the north side of the garden, where the glare of the sunset was lost, and with nothing but cool streaming shadows and a deepening sky before her.

She knew not how long she was sitting there, but it seemed to her that a cliff had risen in the centre of the garden, where there was never a cliff before, and up against the sky a gleaming figure stood, and a voice came to her—

"Leave all earthly love, and come, stand by me."

"I will come!" she cried; "blessed St. Alda, I will come!"

It was a changed maiden who returned to the miller's house. Verena was silent and rapt during supper-time, and would eat nothing.

"Verena," said the miller, taking her hand, "this house has grown dull to thee, and well I wot the reason. He was a good lad, our David, and I should rue the day he came to harm. I wish him no worse luck, poor soul, than thee for a wife."

"I do not think of him," she said, with a strange vehemence. She paused for a few moments, and her hand trembled in his grasp. "Father," she said, "I have renounced for ever all earthly love. I have taken a vow, and I dare not break it. I must sleep to-night in the convent of St. Alda."

The miller dropped the little hand in astonishment. He expostulated, he reasoned with her; he argued even with tears in his eyes that he would be a lonely, childless, old man; that his riches, which for years he had been gathering, would turn to ashes in his hand.

No; in vain were his words; the call to be saint must be paramount to the love of father or home, or to the fulfilment of all filial duties.

But before the next evening had closed in, it seemed well to the miller that his daughter had found refuge for a time within the moss-grown walls of the convent, for in the afternoon a noisy crowd of surly men and soldiers, headed by Garcino, invaded the miller's house, garden, and mill, and demanded that Verena should appear before them, and give account for having had in her possession leaves from the forbidden book.

The miller stood up proudly before the vulgar crowd, and denied the charge; but Garcino drew the leaves of the Testament from beneath his cloak, and told how he had picked them, the evening before, out of the mill-dam; and again the soldiers, showing their warrant, demanded that his heretic daughter should be given up to them.

The miller then, looking fixedly into the triumphant and vengeful face of Garcino, gave them this answer:—

"I will prove now, in the presence of you all, that Garcino is a false liar, and that he has brought this accusation out of a mean revenge, and for a base purpose. The heretic daughter of the old miller, Jean Iserau, refused the tanner's love yesterday, and to-day she has sought refuge within the walls of the convent of St. Alda, to take upon herself the vows of a nun."

Thus did the old miller, ignorant of previous circumstances, repel Garcino's accusation; and the tanner slunk away, shame-stricken, from the reproaches of the crowd, who knew his motives well.

(To be concluded in our next.)

RELIGION IN THE HOME.

BY THE REV. W. B. MACKENZIE, M.A., INCUMBENT OF ST. JAMES'S, HOLLOWAY.

THESE papers, which for some months past have appeared in the pages of THE QUIVER, now draw to a close. Some may have read them with the grateful consciousness that there is "religion" in their "home." Others, convinced that nothing else can meet their increasing wants and prospects, may resolve that they will henceforth "seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness;" while some, mourning over the decay of their "religion at home," may justly ascribe their continued accumulation of sorrows and heavy cares to their ungrateful forgetfulness of God. A few practical suggestions shall now conclude the series.

Again, as to the difficult, but all-important, duty of the right training of children. It should be remembered that many of their early failings are merely the result of youthful inexperience. You see the frisky exuberance,—the wild, frolicsome effervescence of life and feeling in all young creatures, and recognise it as a wise provision, laying up a supply of fresh vigour to meet the wearisome demands of the future. The child is yet immature and undeveloped,—the fair blossoms of infancy are just forming into fruit,—its colour, form, flavour, are yet to come. You must watch and wait. Inside the rosebud lie curled up the latent, unformed leaves, as yet almost colourless; but the scent, the red hue, and luscious beauty of the flower will come out admirably by-and-by. It is not wise to stimulate the slow work of nature. You may easily spoil it by meddling. Many parents spoil their children by incessant interference. It is unwise, unnecessary, and degenerates into mischievous results. The child meant well. Sinister designs are imputed to him, which he inwardly resents. He feels that you misunderstand him, and he is dealt with unjustly; thus, his feelings of parental reverence are lowered; he has reason to distrust your judgment, and soon begins to question your affection. Parents should distinguish between the beginnings of evil, and the failings which belong to mere youth. The one is a poison plant that must be pulled up by the root; as to the other, a gentle word of admonition will put the child on his guard, and the fault will die away of itself.

Let every parent who desires to see his children's character formed in well-developed proportions, keep these three things before him:—

1. Cultivate, as the root of all personal excellency, the habit of open, truthful conduct. Nothing will more certainly vitiate the moral constitution than the permitted propensity to deal unfairly with truth—seeming to be one thing while they are another, concealment, disguise, equivocation, simplicity, unfrankness, untruthfulness in any form, whether action, motive, or speech. Transparent truthfulness must lie at the foundation, and grow up into the structure of every-day character. Every one understands truth; even wild, ignorant, vicious men feel an instinctive reverence for truth, though their lives are worse than wasted in its neglect.

2. Due self-respect, that disdains to do an unworthy action, is another element to be anxiously cultivated in children. Let them feel that you esteem them, you trust them, repose an honourable confidence that they do, and will do, right, and you are establishing a principle of self-government in their own breasts. This was one secret of Dr. Arnold's eminent success at Rugby. Young people should be led to feel that your estimate of them forbids you to be suspicious. You put them on their honour; and this delicate, honourable feeling adds a strength and charm to the character which ever grows and abides with them, and creates an attraction which wins the esteem of others, and influences them for good.

3. Then, teach them to act from conscience. Without this the character must be selfish, worldly, and unreal. Let them understand and acknowledge the supremacy of conscience,—that she sits upon the throne,—issues her commands,—dispenses her rewards for obedience, or visits the offender with shame, uneasiness, and remorse. God has so framed the human mind that there can be no happiness for an individual or a family except the "still, small voice" within whisper its significant approbation. Many pursue their rounds of vain, pleasurable excitement chiefly to escape the remonstrances of this inward witness. They may blunt the convictions of duty, and drown reflection in the tumult of worldliness and folly; but he who expects happiness in the disregard of conscience, is seeking grapes from thorns, and looking for the fruits of Paradise in the snows of Greenland or the burning sands of the desert;—"Dead Sea fruits that tempt the eye, but turn to ashes on the lips."

None can over-estimate the importance of cultivating early the habit of diligent employment. The want of occupation, leaving time to hang heavily on young people's hands, generates a thousand evils. The real superiority of one above another, is attributable far more to the persevering diligence of the individual, than to any combination of fortunate circumstances. To smooth the road to eminence, and facilitate men's progress, is the demand of the present age. But we are apt to forget the story of a father who bequeathed a field to his sons, in which it was alleged that vast stores of wealth were deeply embedded, which could only be reached by unwearied toil. The golden prize was nothing more than the habit of industry which they acquired for themselves in the search. "Seest thou a man diligent in business, he shall stand before kings, and not before mean men."

And yet it is a duty, though too much overlooked amid the temptations to selfish indulgence, that parents should make such moderate provision for their families, as may continue to them some measure of their domestic comforts if death should visit the household. It is surely one of the first dictates of intelligent affection, when entering on the responsibilities of married life, that a man should exercise such prudent forethought as to make the reasonable provision for survivors which his circumstances allow. The "sorrows of death," and the desolation of widowhood and orphanage, are sad enough by themselves; but when these domestic calamities are aggravated by the loss of social comforts,—when new habits of life, strange and hard to bear, must be resorted to for a maintenance, and the world's unkind looks encountered by a young, helpless widow, broken with sorrow, burdened with unlooked-for care and straitness, perhaps even debt,—compelled to earn her own bread, and seek it perhaps "in desolate places:" these are aggravations adding bitterness to sorrow, which, in many cases, might have been obviated by some moderate life insurance, or such other arrangements as would lighten the heavy burdens which too often crush the energies of early widowhood, and fairly break the heart.

For after all, sorrows must invade every home. The brightness of bridal days may long continue; and where the responsibilities and blessings of home increase, and parents are resolved to carry out the counsels advocated in these papers, there is every reason to believe that years of largely multiplying happiness will be in store. Still, clouds intervene, and at times overcast the brightest sky. Need, sorrow, sickness, or other necessity, may dim the lustre of the happiest home, and spread the aspect of thoughtfulness and grief over the fairest circle. No man can read his Bible, or look round on the circle of his friends, without feeling that he can claim no exemption from the common lot of man—his turn must come one day, and he too must enter upon scenes of which even the distant prospect makes him sad. From what quarter his home-sorrows are to spring,—what bright vision is first to fade,—by what sharp arrow his heart is to be pierced,—when, and where, and how often, and with what mitigations or otherwise,—it is needless to attempt to pry into these hidden mysteries of the future.

The events of life are lodged in wiser hands than yours. Your chief duty, then, is to train your households day by day, in His faith, obedience, and love,—to honour Him as Supreme in all the arrangements of home life,—to live ever as in His presence, and seek by everything, in will and deed, to please Him,—to exemplify the reality of your own religion in daily uprightness, and to employ every agency which the Scripture commands, and experience confirms, to gain each member of your household to God; let all this be continued, amid much prayer with them and for them; and then you may safely leave the future with Him. The stream of home-happiness will continue to flow on in uninterrupted continuance, and you will thankfully acknowledge His especial goodness. But if otherwise—if your home should be converted into "the house of mourning," you will still find that the bitterness of sorrow is mitigated by many ingredients of mercy, and the dark night of trouble is relieved by gleams of the Father's countenance and the whispers of his love.

But the great consummation is reached when, leaving in sorrow these earthly homes with their endearments, changes, and duties, we shall enter with rejoicing the mansions of the Father's house. As yet we know but little what kind of a home that is. Near as the Scripture seems to bring it, still, as yet, the veil of "this mortal" conceals it from sight. We know it is in the heaven of heavens, whither the Lord ascended in glory. There Enoch and Elijah went; and Moses and Elijah once, for a short time, left it for the Mount of Transfiguration. Stephen, a moment before his death, was permitted to see it; and the bright prospect of its glittering towers kindled St. Paul's desire to depart and be with Christ. Thus it is certain that God's people, when they die, "are received into everlasting habitations." Their earthly homes are the scenes of peaceful joy and holy fellowship, of endearing companionship and mutual satisfaction, which are unknown in the sumptuous habitations of worldly men. But their blessedness in that heavenly home is immeasurably greater. Their life there is neither disturbed by sorrow nor marred by sin; it languishes under no decay, nor is it ruffled by any care; no enemy can assail them there, nor will temptation ever awaken the fear of danger; spirits made perfect, who, like themselves, have finished their warfare, will be their companions,—a crown of unfading glory glitters around every brow, and joys, incomparable and everlasting, satisfy and overflow the heart. Once admitted into those blessed mansions, none will ever fall from their steadfast fidelity to Christ, who brought them there, but will ever abide in his glorious presence, and live on in endless duration, advancing to higher degrees of perfection, and travelling on from bliss to bliss. Oh! marvellous, transcendent prospect! And yet it is more marvellous that so few seem to think of that world! Children are trained up as if this world were everything, and there were no world to come,—as if this world alone was real, and the next all visionary, and hardly worth a serious thought. And so men live. To rise in the morning, and to buy, sell, and get gain,—to discuss public questions, or repeat private gossip,—to meet and part,—to share or show hospitality among their friends,—to sicken and recover,—to repent without real reformation,—to worship now and then without seriousness,—this is the sort of life that myriads are passing who throng our streets. But, as to God and Christ; eternal joy or sorrow; how a man should live to God in love, obedience, and fellowship,—where he shall find himself and what shall become of him, as soon as he “shuffles off this mortal coil,”—what he must do to be saved, and how he can, sinner as he is, secure peace with God, and the assured hope that it will be well with him in the world to come—all these matters are so practically unimportant to them, that they scarcely reckon them worthy of a passing thought. And yet what separates them from that world? Let some thin vessel through which their life-blood is now coursing, just give way, and what is this world to them, and all its fascinations then? Others continue to live on awhile,—but, as to these, the grand secret is at length disclosed—they are gone hence—to stand before God! “Oh, that they were wise, that they understood this, that they would consider their latter end!” Begin, then, without delay to acquaint yourself with the Lord Jesus Christ as described by the four Evangelists. Think who he is, what he taught, did, and suffered, and remember you may have “redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sin.” Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and these great questions are settled. Do not permit yourself to cherish the false and dishonourable suspicion that it is a matter of indifference to your Father in heaven whether you return to Him or not. He is not indifferent. The gift of Christ Jesus to redeem the world and all the promises of his blessed Gospel testify his intense, but righteous, solicitude in men’s salvation. Be assured, then, of his infinite benevolence towards you. Let the great question of your personal reconciliation with God be settled through your immediate and believing acceptance of Christ Jesus, and then beg of him to teach and guide you to promote the salvation of others. Survey your own family circle, and devise some means for promoting “religion at home.” If you are the head of a family, neglect it not for a single day. See to it that no member of your household henceforth neglects his soul’s welfare through any fault of yours. Bring them into daily fellowship with God in the devoutness of domestic worship and win them over by the attractions of a Christian life, and then, when your earthly home is broken up by the hand of the Great Destroyer, you will bid each other farewell in the sure and certain hope of abiding reunion in the home of the Father. Thus—

“When soon or late you reach that coast,
O’er life’s rough ocean driven,
May you rejoice, no wanderer lost,
A family in heaven.”

HEIDELBERG.

IF Heidelberg most people have heard, and many have visited it—that is, if one can call a hasty run over the beautiful old castle, a drive to the Wolfsbrunnen and a half-hour’s halt for lunch at the Prinz Karl hotel, a visit; but because there are no gambling-tables, extravagantly dressed ladies, or periodical horse-races, our nomad countrymen do not, as a rule, care to remain longer at this lovely spot than barely sufficient to say they have “done” the place.

With a three weeks’ vacation before me, I consulted a Bradshaw as to the pleasantest place, within a certain distance from England, at which I could remain during that time. After many “pros and cons,” Heidelberg seemed the most suitable in every way, and a few nights afterwards I started via Antwerp for that city.

I had paid a flying visit to Heidelberg before, and I sufficiently remembered the hospitality of the landlord of the Prinz Karl hotel to wish to go there again. On reaching the door of the hotel, the usual loud bell was rung, and out rushed my old friend the landlord, accompanied by one or two waiters, all smiles and bows, as the one relieved me of my umbrella, and the others ushered me into the hotel.

The second table-d'hôte had not yet been commenced, but after one or two days I had quite got out of my fashionable English dinner-hour, and found myself comfortably dining at one o'clock. The rest of the company consisted of students, merchants, and any casual "voyageur" who might be "doing" Heidelberg at the time. It was my good luck to sit next a very pleasant German student, a native of Hamburg, with whom I made great friends, and I continued to sit next him at dinner during my stay at the hotel. Through this I gained a great deal of information about the internal arrangements of the university, &c., that otherwise I should have had great difficulty in acquiring. My friend, also, had joined the university at rather an unusually late age, so that his opinion was the more unbiassed than if he had been a younger student, and felt bound to support customs and manners that in his heart he could not but reprehend.

From the plain of the Rhine suddenly rise the hills which form the two sides of the narrow valley of the Neckar. The river Neckar, though in summer but a small and sluggish stream, becomes in winter, more especially after the heavy rains, a considerable torrent. On its left bank Heidelberg is situated. Built on a narrow strip of land between the foot of hills and the river, the town proper consists of but one long street, nearly two miles in length. But of late years a very pretty addition has been made, in a sort of suburb running out towards the plain, where some detached villas have been built and public gardens laid out. At the other extremity of the town is the old ruined schloss, perched on the most picturesque of hills, and forming, with its ivy-grown outworks, ruined walls, and varied architecture, a picture well worth going many miles to see. To reach the castle from the town there are twenty different ways; and, unlike the generality of ruins, the Castle of Heidelberg is by no means only dependent on its general effect. On having climbed the hill and entered the courtyard, each archway has some peculiar merit to recommend it, each façade its particular style; and when satiated with the beauty of art, the visitor has only to walk from the courtyard to the terrace, and his eyes may take in at a glance the whole plain towards the Rhine; or, if that be too general a view, they may admire the quaint old town, the lovely valley, and the picturesque bridge situated beneath them. The original Heidelberg Schloss was at the summit of the hill; but the castle, of which we are now speaking, was not commenced until A.D. 1300, when it simply consisted of one strong tower. From that date until 1607 constant additions were made by the various electors. About the last piece of the castle that was added was that erected by the Elector Frederick IV., for the reception of the Princess Elizabeth Stuart, daughter of James I., and granddaughter of Mary Queen of Scots.

Let us descend again into the town itself, and hear something about the university. On our way down we pass the market-place, in the centre of which is the Church of the Holy Ghost, a by no means unsightly building, though of no very remarkable architecture. This church is divided by a partition wall between the Roman Catholics and Protestants, and the two services are performed under the same roof, and often at the same time, the divisional wall being of sufficient thickness to prevent the sound of the one organ interfering with that of the other. But now we are in the Universität Platz, and before us is the university—a mean, barrack-looking building. The lower storey is occupied by class or lecture rooms, whilst the university library is on the upper floor. To a Cambridge or Oxford man the university building at Heidelberg appears by no means what he would have expected; but when we consider that the university system in Germany is quite different to our own, and that the authorities only undertake to instruct, and do not interfere with the student's domestic arrangements, we find that the present building, with its class rooms and library, answers the purposes for which it is intended. Opposite the university building, and forming the other side of the platz, is the Museum Club, the lower storeys of which contain the students' assembly rooms for the winter's entertainments; the third storey is divided into five or six reading-rooms. This club is not only made use of by the students, but is most liberally thrown open at a very low rate to any stranger making a long stay in the town; for the first three months, however, a foreigner is admitted to the reading-rooms without paying anything.

The number of students residing in Heidelberg varies very much from year to year, according to the popularity of the professors. In Germany, a student does not go through his educational course at one university, but divides his three years between two, or perhaps three of them. For instance, a young man having occupied his first year in attending the classical lectures at Bonn, and intending to follow the legal profession, will go the following year to Berlin, or wherever the best professor of jurisprudence may at that time happen to be. The students—of which the number now at Heidelberg averages between 550 and 700—all live in lodgings about the town, and, as far as I could learn, are under little or no restriction as to the way in which they spend their time. ▲ rule exists by which they are supposed to be in their own houses by midnight; but I do not know that any punishment is inflicted when this rule is infringed. In the same manner, duelling, or fencing with swords, is strongly disapproved of by the authorities; but as it still exists, I doubt whether any very stringent measures have ever been taken against it. The consequence of which is, that these silly young men, with a wounded cheek or a broken nose, have often their faces disfigured for life.

(Drawn by H. Woods.)

“Nor vainly stored the golden sheaves;”—p. 842.

The society of Heidelberg cannot, of course, be very numerous; but at the same time there are many pleasant German and foreign families residing there. The number of English residents is between 300 and 400, and the generality of them remain throughout the year. The great attraction is the opportunity that offers, to persons of small means and large families, of giving their children a really excellent education at a small outlay.

In concluding this short paper, I am sure I cannot do better than advise any of my friends, who with a limited holiday and a not too full purse, are doubtful as to which spot on the Continent to pitch their tent on, to try Heidelberg, and in this opinion I am fully borne out by the poet Kotzebue, who says: "If an unhappy individual were to ask me what spot he would live in, to get rid of the cares and sorrows which pursue him, I should say Heidelberg; and a happy one asks me what spot he would choose to adorn with fresh wreaths the joys of his life, I should still say Heidelberg."

A. B.

HARVEST.

THE summer dies, and dying, leaves
Its glory to the winds and frost;
But all its glory is not lost,
Nor vainly stored the golden sheaves.

The summer dies, but it has left
Such sweet remembrance of its reign,
In ruddy fruit and garnered grain,
That scarcely yet we feel bereft.

And so they died, the great of old,
But dying left a life behind:
A mind that ever lives in mind,
And death has stamped as current gold

The thought and phrase of mouth and brain
Long mouldered into silent dust:
Or mocked upon the marble bust,
That changes not in joy or pain.

The summer dies, and winter's breath
Has chilled the earth and bared the trees;
But Faith, clear-eyed and hopeful, sees
A future life in present death.

The summer dies, the fallen leaf
Lies mouldering in the lifeless clay;
But life shall spring from out decay,
And hope shall triumph over grief.

And so they die, the good, the brave,
But we will cheer us in our gloom;
For, like the cypress o'er the tomb,
The roots of life are in the grave.

Beneath, corruption feeds her root,
Above, she spreads her leafy pride,
And decks her as the summer's bride,
While treading death beneath her foot.

J. S. W.

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER LIX.

ALBINA.

CERTAIN little incidents arise—chances they are sometimes called—that materially affect the career of an individual. A small rose-coloured billet, highly scented, and directed by a feminine hand, was lying on the table when Francis Heatherly got home. He did not see it at first. He had time to give orders to the housekeeper about his departure. He intended to pay a few visits, and then, if the secret wound did not heal, he would let the house or sell it. It was hard to be driven out of house and home by a woman; but so it was. He could not get over the fact that Josephine had refused him.

When he came back to the room he usually occupied, then he saw the billet. It was from a lady,

Mrs. Mills by name; of Hawthorn Lodge, and it contained a very pressing invitation to tea and croquet. The note went on to express the great sorrow Mrs. Mills and her daughter were experiencing, in consequence of a report that Mr. Heatherly was about to leave the town. Albina, the billet concluded by informing him, was inconsolable! The invitation was for Thursday, and this was Tuesday. If he accepted it, what was to become of his journey to Dorsetshire?

"I am not pressed for time," thought he, his eye falling, as if casually, on the word Albina.

He knew Albina well. A profusion of shining locks; a pair of bright eyes; a silvery voice; a charm of youth and sprightliness, without much else to back it—that was Albina.

Put a modern schoolgirl, half through her teens, by the side of Minerva of the Greeks, and you have Albina by the side of Josephine.

Still, there was some attraction to him in the word inconsolable. And that a pretty youthful little creature with the bluest eyes that ever were, should feel any regret for him, was a fact worthy of comment, "where all else is barren and sterile," he told his note-book.

He thought, all things considered, that he would go. It would be uncourteous to refuse; and also, it would give him time to settle the business with Mr. Carlton. He was fully resolved on that point, come what might.

He did not think Newbury was such a bad place, after all, if a man were but heart whole.

When Thursday came, he found himself getting ready for the visit, with more alacrity than he could have believed possible. That word, inconsolable, had left a vast impression on his imagination.

He knew how pretty Albina would look, in her sky-blue silk, with long streaming sash, and the shower of golden curls on her white shoulders. She was as unlike Josephine as could be. She played rattling polkas with wonderful execution. She said "yes, ma," and "no, ma," with a childish pertness. She called croquet "a love of a game!" She was given wholly to pic-nics and parties, and all the little innocent dissipation that lay in her power. She never read anything but novels. She was as ignorant of life, and all pertaining to it, as her parrot in its cage, and had about as many ideas—but then she had been inconsolable!

Hawthorn Lodge was a pretty retired spot, which had been purchased by the papa of Albina because it had gone cheap. It was not in a fashionable suburb, but Mr. Mills was not a fashionable man, and, if truth must be told, kept a shop in Newbury, to which he went backwards and forwards every day. He had a smattering of knowledge, just enough to be a dangerous thing; and it resulted in a few daubs of yellow, red, and blue, which he called pictures, and which adorned his rooms. This smattering led him earnestly to covet accomplishments for his daughter, and resulted in the polkas aforesaid; and with which Francis Heatherly was in raptures. But he had never heard Josephine play!

Still, Hawthorn Lodge was pretty, and on this fine afternoon, with the lawn dotted over by a group of gaily-dressed young ladies playing at croquet, it could not fail to be attractive.

Albina was among the players, of course. Not in blue silk this time; she wore a dress of pink muslin, and as she stood, her tiny foot planted on the balls, her bright locks ruffled with the wind, and her face a picture of youthful animation, Francis Heatherly might be excused a glance of admiration.

"Albina!" cried her mother.

The girl turned her bright face round; she was laughing when her mother spoke. "Well, ma?"

This was cross and pert.

"My dear, here's a gentleman wants to speak to you."

With a loud, sharp rap went the ball bounding along. Albina clapped her hands, and almost screamed with delight.

"Now, I am to go again," cried she.

"Albina! do you hear me?" called her mother a second time.

"Ma, how tiresome you are! you have put me quite out," said Albina, crossly, and turning from the game.

"Here is Mr. Heatherly, my dear."

She came up half smiling, half pouting. She looked charmingly beautiful.

"I can't stay a minute, ma! it's Mr. Richards' turn."

"My dear, how rude you are; you ought to have come at once, and spoken to Mr. Heatherly."

She put her little hand in his for a moment. Her face was turned towards Mr. Richards.

"See, that is his ball! Oh, what a good one!" and she clapped her hands, and screamed with delight.

"Whose side is Mr. Richards on, pray?" asked Francis Heatherly.

"On my side," and she looked at him as if wondering he could doubt it; "on my side, of course!" and away she fluttered, all eagerness to get back to the game.

"Who is Mr. Richards?" inquired Francis Heatherly, with some uneasiness, and glancing at a dapper-looking young man who had just given a masterly hit.

"Oh, he is only our apprentice, and there's a holiday this afternoon at the shop. He's wonderfully fond of croquet."

"Humph!" said Francis Heatherly, glancing at him again.

A maid-servant now came to announce that tea was ready—a summons which caused, as Mr. Richards expressed it, a hitch in the game. He consoled himself, however, by taking the fair Albina in, and flirting with her with all his might.

"Who is that snobbish-looking fellow?" whispered he, glancing at Francis Heatherly.

"Oh, a very rich man; and you are not to call him snobbish. He is an intimate friend of papa's, and papa says he is the most perfect gentleman he ever met with in his life."

"Do you think so, Miss Mills?"

"I am sure I don't know what I think, or what I don't think," said Albina with a childish little laugh.

Francis Heatherly, meanwhile, was established by the side of the maternal Mills, who was saying—

"I am sure I hope you'll change your mind, and stop amongst your friends. We shall make a great trouble of it if you go: Albina in particular."

"I think you must be mistaken," replied Francis, with a look at the laughing eyes and radiant face opposite him. "Miss Mills seems in as good spirits as ever I have seen her."

"Oh, but you don't understand Albina! She never lets any one know the state of her feelings," said Mrs. Mills, lowering her voice to a mysterious whisper.

"She seems so very happy in the society of that—that—what did you say the gentleman's name was?"

"Richards. Oh, take my word for it, she don't care a button for him!"

This fact was scarcely so apparent to Mr. Heatherly as he could wish.

After tea there was a general rush to croquet. Francis Heatherly made his way to Albina.

"May I be on your side, Miss Mills?"

"Thank you; I don't think there is room," replied she, the tiny foot planted again on the two balls, and the blue eyes looking up into his face.

"Oh, but surely you won't be so cruel. I am really as good a player as Mr. Richards."

"But I can't do without Mr. Richards, we always play together. There—there!" and the ball went bounding along with all its might.

"Please don't tease me," continued she, as he still lingered, "or ma will be so tiresome. Please go and talk to ma!"

Talk to ma, indeed! was that what he came for?

CHAPTER LX.

HAROLD GOES COURTING.

"Oh, Harold, this is nice!"

"I should think it is, Charley! this is home."

Charley's sofa had been wheeled up to the glass door that opened into the garden, and Charley lay there, looking complacently out on the bit of grass that Harold insisted on calling a lawn, and on the beds, gay with early flowers, that were in their beauty.

"I say, Harold! what an extravagant fellow you are, to be sure!"

"Why so, Charley?"

"Only think of your having bought that new piano. I am sure it was very good of you. Of course you bought it for me."

Harold coloured up to the ears. The fact is, when he bought the piano, Charley was never further from his thoughts.

"And the bookcase, and all the pretty things in the drawing-room," continued Charley, in a condescending tone; "of course you intended them for me."

"I am glad you like them—I am sure," stammered Harold, looking the picture of guilt.

"I do like them. I have been so used to having things decent about me. How I contrived to live in those horrid lodgings I can't imagine. It was enough to kill me."

Harold had opened the piano, and was playing over a tune, very softly, as if to himself.

"Ah, that is poor Miss Sylvester's tune; but how badly you are playing it, Harold!"

"Why do you say, poor Miss Sylvester?" asked Harold, stopping abruptly.

"Because—don't you know?—we shall never see her again, in all human probability," said Charley, with a sigh.

"What on earth do you mean?" asked Harold, turning round and facing him.

"I mean what Mrs. Brown told me. I am sure I thought you knew. That nasty, disagreeable mother of hers has taken her from Newbury."

"Taken her from Newbury!"

"Yes! What a habit you always have of repeating one's words! She has taken her to the Grange."

"To the Grange!"

"There you go again! To the Grange—a horrid tumble-down place, all surrounded by a swamp, and where she is sure to die. Poor thing, I always thought she was too good for this world," added Charley, with extreme philosophy.

"Charley, just please to explain yourself a little," said Harold, firmly.

"How stupid you are! You know how it tires me to explain things. The Sylvesters are come to their last legs—that's the plain English. The young man—I forget his name—is in gaol, and Lady Sylvester has carried off her daughter to the Grange."

"I wonder you can speak so flippantly, Charley."

"I speak flippantly? I am sure I care for Miss Sylvester a great deal more than you do!"

Harold turned round again, and softly closed the piano. Then he got up and went towards the door.

"Where are you going, Harold?"

"A little turn, dear, that is all."

"I thought you might have had walking enough," began Charley, peevishly; but Harold was out of the room before he finished his sentence.

Harold went straight to his own chamber, and closed the door. Then he did what was rather unusual for him—took a careful survey of himself in the glass. The result of this survey was an entire change of toilette, a polishing-up of himself, as he said, and a donning of his Sunday clothes. Next he took his best hat from its box, brushed it round and round, and put it on his head. Then snatching up his gloves, he went down-stairs. Before he finally quitted the house, he just stepped back into the room where Charley was.

"On my word, Harold! pray are you going courting?"

Harold did not answer. He was hovering about a stand of geraniums that were just coming into flower.

"You might, at least, tell me the name of the lady," persisted Charley. "I dare say, if the truth was known, you have been engaged ever so long."

By this time, Harold, having found a geranium to his mind, remorselessly snipped it off.

"Pray has Mr. Mapleson a daughter, Harold?"

Harold laughed. "My dear, he has neither chick nor child in the world."

"Then who is——"

"Now, Charley," said Harold, with a little air of authority, "if I am not home for tea, you are not to wait for me. Good-bye;" and he walked off, fixing the geranium in his button-hole.

"I hope it would not interfere with me, if Harold took it into his head to be married," was the train of thought into which Charley, by a law of his nature, fell, after his brother's departure.

Harold, meanwhile, walked off at a brisk pace towards the old house on the common. He gleaned, by the way, sundry pieces of intelligence. He got to know the whole history of the Sylvester crisis, and how the bailiffs were in the house, and all about Raymond's arrest. His heart beat very fast when these things were told him.

It was quite time that Alice should come to him, now. He could scarce bear to think of how she must have suffered. He quickened his pace along the road, which was very long, and very lonesome. He did not care. His busy thoughts beguiled the time, and he was at the Grange before you would have fancied it possible.

He was at the Grange. The white, ghostly-looking building towered before him, with its faded grandeur. How lonely, how ruinous, how desolate it looked! He read the motto over the old doorway, and smiled. "Noblesse oblige!" A grand watchword in itself, but how disastrous as used by the Sylvesters!

He had been refused admittance, as we know, once before, to the old house on the common. As he rang the bell, which reverberated through the deserted mansion, he wondered whether this would occur again; but it did not. The woman, who opened the door, admitted him at once.

He could see, at a glance, that the wolf Poverty had got within the fold. Now the threadbare hangings were rent down, the bare, hard, actual necessity of the case was apparent. The empty hall gave him a strange feeling of desolation. The one attendant, the absence of all the pomp and pretentiousness that had been clung to with such tenacity—the complete, absolute ruin, impressed itself painfully on his mind. Yet it gave him a secret joy too: for he thought all obstacles would be removed. Pride itself could fight no longer. They would say she might come!

Little did he know of the Sylvesters!

He was ushered into the dark, ill-furnished room. It was as drear as could be. None of the faded splendours had found their way here—no, not one!

He thought Alice would come, and he sat and listened for the light step he loved. His whole face was illumined with a look of glad affection, when there entered, coming upon him suddenly, and by surprise, Lady Sylvester.

He rose. He was surprised, and for the moment, disappointed. But this feeling was not apparent in his manner. He rose and waited, with an air of respect, till she should choose to speak to him.

She was not friendly to him, even now: he could see that, at a glance. It was as much as she could force herself to do, to ask him to be seated.

He did not find the least difficulty in opening the subject—it lay too near his heart. He told her, in a few words, what he came for—to see her daughter. To ask again that her daughter might be his wife.

She heard him to the end, but he could perceive that she had some difficulty in restraining herself. He had scarcely finished, when she said, with some vehemence. It was not to be thought of. He was labouring under a very great mistake. The Sylvesters had married equals, from the first generation downwards.

He gave a glance round. It was by an impulse he could not resist. She saw it, and the flash of the old unquenchable light was in her eye.

If he thought to take advantage of a temporary change in their circumstances, there never was a greater error. If they had retired, for a short time, to this secluded spot, it was because their health needed retirement. Very soon, they should emerge again, and take up their places in society. The best and the noblest of the families in England had now and then suffered from misfortune.

And she hurled the speech at him defiantly, and made him feel he had drifted against the sharp edges of the rock.

He was very calm and temperate. He put aside the shafts she flung at him, as if they had been straws. He began to speak of his great love for Alice, and he said—he would say it in spite of her—he said he wished Miss Sylvester to know that he had come with the earnest wish, and hope, that she would allow him to stand by her—yea, and hers too—in this sad crisis. His whole heart was devoted to her interests. There was nothing he would not do, to soften the blow that had come upon them!

Upon them, meaning the Sylvesters! Her and hers, meaning the Sylvesters also!

This was more than she could bear. What! Harold Blake, the overseer of a silk-mill, a man working for his bread, talk of standing by them, the Sylvesters! The Sylvesters who had come in with the Conqueror, —who had been grand and glorious ere the Blakes had an existence!—who, even in their ruin, were as far removed from him, as the east is from the west! You might have heard the ghostly dignities shriek and wail along the dreary passages, and wring their shadowy hands at the bare suggestion!

No! she told him, and she rose in all her indomitable might, no! every word he spoke was an insult—his presence was obnoxious. He had better withdraw, at once.

Still, he was calm. He bore the outbreak without a word of retort. The beggarly dignities might rail at him as they pleased, he was looking beyond them to Alice. Here was a being of another mould to them. Here was a true heart, a woman's loving nature, about to be stranded in this desert. Could he leave her? Oh, no! How he longed to see her! How he would have kissed the hem of this proud woman's garment, if she would but have relented! If she would but have allowed the word, the look, after which his soul was hungering and thirsting. But no! there was the rock of adamant, reaching to the very sky. A bird of the air could scarce scale its summit, much less Harold Blake!

CHAPTER LXI.

"A RUM ARTICLE."

"BETWEEN you and me, Mary, I think our new lodger a very rum article."

"He aint no ways ill-disposed, Jacob Potts, if that's what you mean to insinuate," replied his wife, as she folded the family linen with a pair of broad sturdy arms, and laid it in the flasket preparatory to carrying it to the mangle.

Jacob Potts was a cobbler, in the retired little town of Northwold, up in the north country, some hundred miles away from Newbury. He had but one eye, the other having been lost through an accident, and he wore a pair of broad-brimmed spectacles, through which he was examining, with a sinister expression, the hole in the boot he was mending. The door between the little workshop, and the room in which Mary Potts was engaged, stood open: a circumstance that allowed of the conversation I am narrating.

"What I look at, is this," continued Jacob, with another scowl at the boot, "here's a fellow comes in the dead of night——"

"Well, we wasn't gone to bed, however," interposed his wife, with a stoop of the brawny arms to the flasket; "and as for being a fellow, Jacob Potts, I aint gone washing and charing, and into what the parson calls a sphere of observation for nothing all these years, that I should be took in with anybody!" and she gave a vigorous crack to one of her husband's shirts as if to support the argument.

"The most knowing of us gets took in sometimes," observed her husband, sententiously.

"I tell you what, Jacob, you're so suspicious there's scarce any living with you!" cried his wife.

"But it strikes me, his purse is getting lowish. When all comes out, and none goes in, Mary, it's easy to see what comes next."

"How do you know that none goes in, pray?"

"Because he aint earning a penny, and he hasn't no letters or anything coming to him, and I know, for certain, that he took his watch—it was yesterday dinner-time—to the pawn-shop."

"He's been so ill, you know, Jacob," said his wife, after a pause; "perhaps now he's better he may get to work a bit."

"Perhaps he may," replied Jacob, in a tone which meant may not as plain as could be.

Mary Potts, by this time, had finished her folding and was putting on her bonnet. "Now, Jacob," said she, briskly, "you'll please to mind the house while I step to the mangle;" and lifting the flasket, piled up though it was, with ease in her brawny arms, she departed.

Jacob, left at home by himself, began to whistle as he vigorously patched at the boot. But he was not quite easy in his mind, either. The remembrance of the man up-stairs, whose pennies were fast going out, and none coming in, again distracted Jacob.

He was a careful, industrious, thrifty man, and the little room up-stairs had been fitted up as a lodging, in order to help pay the rent. It would be an ugly fact if the rent were to get lost.

"Losses are the worst part of business!" thought Jacob, as he hammered at his boot.

His wife having left him free to follow his own cogitations, he began to think it would be no bad plan to drop a hint to the lodger, should an opportunity occur; and, as it happened, the opportunity came that very moment. Jacob could hear the slow tread of the lodger as he came down-stairs.

He was a man in the prime of life, but his step was slow, and feeble, too. He had been ill. The first few weeks of his stay at Northwold, he had kept his bed.

Jacob laid down the boot. He was interested, very much, in his lodger's movements.

When there came a tap at the door of the workshop, he was very glad indeed.

"Come in—come in!" he cried, joyfully.

(To be continued.)

MOTHER'S PET.

MILL DARLING was the only son of his mother, who was neither poor nor a widow; but who had the misfortune to be very nervous. She was a small, spare woman, all anxiety and fidgets; not that she did not possess many excellent qualities; being a good housewife, a careful manager, and orderly in her domestic affairs: indeed, she carried the latter quality to the extreme; for so attached was she to cleanliness that, lest her parlour carpet, or her immaculate boards should contract a stain, it was her custom to lay down strips of matting, on which the family were required to walk—as on Mahomet's narrow bridge to Paradise—on pain of bringing on a fit of Mrs. Darling's nerves, should they by any chance forget.

"Dear me, Mr. Darling," she would say, "your feet are off the matting. Pray be careful, Mr. Darling, you are treading on the carpet!" until poor Mr.

Darling found it best to take his newspaper or magazine into the office to read.

In receiving her friends, Mrs. Darling was liberal and hospitable to a degree; and if it had not been for her fidgety anxiety, all would have been very well. But directly you sat down in her parlour, it was, "Now pray, my dear, don't sit there! you are in the draught of that door." In vain you protested that you were quite comfortable; you were driven from seat to seat to avoid draughts from door or window, until you were fixed in an arm-chair, or on a sofa, close by a roaring fire, in a room not more than ten feet square. Then, at the tea-table, it was long before you were permitted to sit down in peace; one place was too hot, another too cold. When at last you were settled, and the tea was poured out, Mrs. Darling did nothing but load the plates of her guests, and fill their cups with cream and sugar; all the while making no end of apologies for the indifferent quality of everything, which, in truth, was first rate; so that you could only declare, over and over again, that all you wanted was, to see Mrs. Darling eat something herself. After you had imbibed two or three cups of the luscious tea, and feasted to Mrs. Darling's satisfaction, you generally felt an ungrateful desire to escape from the small hot room, and from Mrs. Darling and her wearisome apologies.

Brought up in, and being the supreme object of, all this care, anxiety, and cramming, it is no wonder if Will Darling, at eight or nine years of age, was the most disagreeable, greedy little creature that could possibly be imagined. As he was, in his mother's opinion, too delicate to contend with his own sex, his companions were usually girls; and now and then, six or seven of them were asked to take tea with him. When they were assembled in Mrs. Darling's superlatively neat sitting-room, dressed in their best frocks and sashes, they sat, during the first hour or so, on a low form, borrowed from the school for the occasion, with their hands crossed on their laps, and their toes turned out, as during the dancing-lesson. Not a word was spoken; all having a wholesome dread of Mrs. Darling's order, her neatness, and her very irritable nerves.

Will made no attempt to amuse his visitors; but sat by his mother's side, staring at the row of mute, motionless little figures opposite to him. At tea, each child, in a clean white diaper pinafore, brought by Mrs. Darling's desire, was seated at the table, and stuffed, according to that lady's custom, with cake, toast, and strong tea. This done, they played at teetotum, or dominoes, for nuts—of which Will, somehow, always contrived to win and eat the greatest part. After which, home-made wine, fruit, and cakes, were again pressed upon the children, until most of them, having eaten more than did them good, fell asleep, especially the younger ones, and were carried home in that state by their respective nurses.

This method of training had just the effect that might be expected of it, and young Darling, at ten years of age, was a fat, heavy-looking boy, with dull eyes and a leaden complexion, silent and sullen, who had learned nothing, not even to read tolerably, and who was in wretched health, having lost all relish for any kind of food. In vain his mother provided delicacies to tempt him; his jaded appetite refused them all. Whole trays of pastry, which had been made for him, were given away to the poor children in the neighbourhood, plates of thin bread and butter shared the same fate.

In great alarm Mrs. Darling consulted a physician, who gave it as his opinion that sea-air and sea-bathing were what the patient required, and advised, as the best method of securing these advantages, that he should be put to a boarding-school on the south coast, moreover recommending that of Dr. Courtenay, at Beach Town, as peculiarly eligible.

Dr. Courtenay listened with exemplary patience to the long list of cautions and charges which Mrs. Darling poured into his ear when, according to the physician's advice, she brought her son to him for a pupil; they all culminated in a request that Master Will might not be allowed to eat mutton, as he had a particular dislike to it. Dr. Courtenay was politeness itself, and he answered urbanely that there was no occasion whatever for Master Darling to eat mutton, as there were always other provisions in the house; so the lady departed, in the full persuasion that chicken and asparagus, or some equivalent delicacy, would be provided for her pet whenever the objectionable meat formed the staple of the dinner.

When Will Darling made his first appearance in the playground, he entered hugging a large brown paper bag full of cakes, oranges, and other good things, which his mother had left to be his comfort when she was gone. As he kept munching his dainties, without offering a share of them to any one, a sharp little fellow, named Tom Steel—called by the boys "Gamey Tom"—came behind him, and, giving the bag a smart blow underneath, sent the contents flying and rolling in all directions. In an instant there was a scramble among the pupils, and great part of the eatables were trampled on and smashed, the rest snatched up and eaten by the ruder portion of the boys.

"Boo! boo! boo!" blubbered Will. "I'll tell my mother, that I will! Boo! boo!"

At this a general laugh rang through the playground, which was only stopped by the ringing of the bell for dinner. As it happened, a fine leg of roast Southdown mutton was placed before the doctor, who, after helping the rest of the pupils to a liberal portion each of the succulent meat, said—

"By-the-by, Master Darling does not eat mutton. Bring some other meat for him."

Upon this the servant disappeared, and soon brought a plate of cold meat. It was placed before Will. Even the presence of the doctor could not repress the general titter which ran round the table, nor the oblique looks cast upon the plate. Will wished that his mother had said nothing about him, for with appetite already sharpened by the sea-air, he felt that he could have enjoyed the hot mutton very much.

As may be supposed, Will soon became the butt of the school; and as on all occasions he "Boo-boohed, I'll tell my mother!" he was asked twenty times a day, in the usual schoolboy language of the period, various questions about his mother, which were calculated to do anything but please him.

Ridicule was changed into positive dislike, when it was found that whenever he had cakes, or other niceties, his custom was to hide himself in some retired corner of the garden or playground, and eat them alone.

"Why do not you share your things with the other boys, Darling?" asked Wilmer, a boy of the upper form, one day, when he happened to find the former feasting in secret.

"Because I don't like."

"But it would be much better for you to do so."

"Mother says I'm to eat them all myself."

"What! and not give any away?"

"She is going to send a cake for the others," said Will.

"That will not be half so good as giving them some of yours," answered Wilmer, as he turned away in disgust.

Mrs. Darling did send cakes, and other good things, to be distributed among the pupils; but as these gifts were not voluntary on Will's part, it soon appeared, as Wilmer had predicted, that benefits which required no self-denial inspired no affection.

As Master Darling grew stronger and taller with the pure air and temperate living, he at the same time grew thinner, and what he lost in flesh he gained in spirit; he no longer blubbered when he was offended, but returned insults with blows; these were repaid with interest, and there was much quarrelling and fighting, and a great deal of ill-temper and violence were displayed on both sides. I fear they all forgot how great sin they were committing, and that a judgment is pronounced upon every one who is even angry with his brother without a cause. However, Dr. Courtenay did his best to arrest the evil, by inflicting severe punishment on all who were guilty of it; and reminding them of that first blow, which rendered Cain a wanderer for life. However, Will Darling was only the more disliked for it; for, as Tom Steel said, "he was so greedy and so spiteful that no one could abide him." But this was not the only sin Will Darling's hateful propensity led him into; indeed, sin seldom lives solitary in the human bosom; one crime leads to another, and such was the case with Will.

Attached to Dr. Courtenay's house was a large garden, in which the pupils were allowed to walk, on condition of not picking the fruit, a liberal quantity of it being distributed among them daily. Adjoining one part of this garden was the dairy, shaded by the thick branches of some lime-trees that formed an avenue. The wall was overgrown with ivy, and a number of guelder-rose and lilac-trees added to the seclusion of the spot. The dairy had a window opening on to the avenue; but it was many feet from the ground. This was the place which Will Darling generally chose for the scene of his solitary feasts, and one afternoon, it being a half-holiday, and the boys at cricket in a field, he had retired thither to finish a cake which had been sent him a week previously. The weather was hot, for it was the beginning of June, and Will felt thirsty. "How I should like some milk!" thought he; "there is plenty in there! and the window is open too! I'm sure I could get up to it; I could climb on the branches of the ivy. I've a good mind to try! I only want to look in and see the milk!"

My young friends, beware of looking at, or even thinking of, a forbidden thing; avoid temptation, if you wish to keep in the right path. Well, Will climbed up the ivy, which, with its strong branches, formed a ladder under the window, and he looked in, and saw the milk dishes, some with the rich yellow cream spreading over the surface, others filled with the warm new milk that had been recently poured into them "Oh, how nice it looks," thought Will, "and cream, too, delicious cream! How I should like to taste it. I could get in directly; there is a shelf just below the window, and there is a spoon on the wooden table. One spoonful could not matter out of that lot." Such are the arguments which the Father of Evil suggests, to delude those who parley with the wrong. So Will had just put his foot inside the window for the purpose of entering it, when he heard the sound of footsteps on the gravel; they were coming nearer. In a hurry he withdrew his leg, and placed his foot upon the ivy, but in his haste and fear, he missed the strong branch, and was left clinging with his hands to the smaller tendrils; they were too frail to support his weight, and he fell heavily to the ground, where he was found, in a state of insensibility, by Dr. Courtenay himself, whose footsteps at some little distance had alarmed Will, and prevented him accomplishing the sad act he had meditated.

A doctor was sent for, and he found that Will had broken his collar-bone, and received a severe wound on the head; and his health being unsound in consequence of previous over-feeding, fever ensued. He lay in a precarious state for some weeks, nursed by Mrs. Courtenay and his mother, who had been sent for. When able to talk, he confessed his fault to Dr. Courtenay, who, as Will had suffered great pain, did not reprove him severely, but pointed out to him that all this sin and suffering arose from the habit of self-indulgence, which had been given way to so long. Will promised amendment; but he found it up-hill work struggling to overcome a propensity so deep rooted; however, he fought hard against the evil inclination, and in time, by God's help, succeeded, for he had learned, by sad experience, that gluttony and selfishness are alike hateful to God and man.

M. W.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

1. Who was by Paul to rule in Crete left?
2. The place where Abner was of life bereft.
3. Who of the Gadites first to David came?
4. Of what epistle have we but the name?
5. Which was the valley where the craftsmen dwelt?
6. What exile enmity to Israel felt?
7. What Grecian man of note on Paul believed?
8. Whose accusations false were yet received?
9. What city was by Jeroboam built?
10. Where Saul committed his first heinous guilt.
11. Which was the third well Isaac's herdsmen made?
12. The god to whom Sepharvaim homage paid.
13. The town against which Pharaoh-necho fought.
14. Whose sons five hundred men to Seir brought?
15. What brother next in age to David came?
16. What king reigned long and well, but died in shame?
17. What Syrian king against Hoshea fought,
And Israel to Assyria captive brought?

Though tempted so on every side,
That e'en the wisest fall,
"The Lord is gracious," and will still
Help those who on him call.

THE GIVVER

Saturday, September 26, 1868.

(Drawn by J. A. PASQUIER.)

"A grove of flame sprang up from the old mill."—p. 852.

ALDA'S LEAP.

A TALE OF THE VAUDOIS VALLEYS. IN THREE PARTS.

PART III.

FAR bitterer even than the sufferings of Verena had been those of David Barolo, her betrothed. She had dreamt and wept over the recitals of cruel deeds, but he had witnessed them. The screams of agonised mothers and perishing babes had pierced his ears and heart, while only their sad echoes had vibrated in the valleys.

Surprised by their base pursuers, in the retreats which had been promised to them as cities of refuge, David, his father, and a few others had succeeded in making good their escape into the rocks and woods, hoping, in a few days, by care and caution, to effect a still further escape across the frontier into that part of the opposite valley which belonged to France. But the hope, as far as David was concerned, proved delusive. Like Moses of old, his aged father beheld in the distance the promised land of rest and freedom, but might not reach it. The rough gust of persecution which only fanned the fire of resolution in David's breast, blew out the old man's life. Like Moses, also, God buried him, in a pall of snow—snow which fell heavily all that night, and gave to many a poor fugitive a more merciful death than the sword, the stake, or the torture.

Once his father was gone, David no longer thought of flight; he turned his back on the promised land, and, with many another brave-hearted Christian, resolved to sell his life dearly in the cause of his suffering brethren. Again and again, a mere handful of these courageous men repulsed the soldiers, as they strove to gain the ravines or heights which might lead them to fresh fields for butchery and carnage; and more than once, in these raids or open sorties, David's steps led him back in sight of the valley, nestled close under the old walls of Susa—the valley, with its spire, its vineyards, and its clustered cottages—and even within sight of the silver thread of water which, creeping over the hoary brow of Mount Pirchiriano, fed the mill of Jean Iserau in the valley beneath.

There had been a few who, in the false calm which succeeded their retreat to the cities of refuge, had ventured back, encouraged by their false lords, to revisit their fields and possessions, and even, in some instances, to recommence the tillage of their lands, and repairing of their tenements. But David Barolo was not among these misguided few. He did not believe in the false encouragement held out by the lord of Lucerna, or the false toleration extended to the deputies of the suffering Vaudois. Added to this, deep down in his heart, and hidden from every eye save One, lay the stern resolution neither to tempt nor to endure temptation. Verena, the miller's daughter, best-beloved still of his heart, and wavering, perhaps, in the misery brought about by their cruel separation, must not by earthly love or blighted hopes be led to forsake her creed, erroneous as it might be. God's right hand, not his, and God's strength, must lead her forth out of darkness into light. And in this right hand and this strength David reposed with unflinching confidence.

Thus was formed David's fixed resolve not to revisit his lost home; but though God's right hand is all-powerful to protect and save, surely the flesh is weak.

David would not return to see again the haunts of his childhood—the vineyard-paths, or the sunny mill-garden; yet he thirsted for news of his betrothed, for some tidings of her health, her life, and her daily actions.

While the first panic and flight lasted he heard but little; vague stories, and vaguer reports. She had been seen leaning over the vineyard-wall, gossiping with Garcino. He put such idle talking from him with a smile. She had fainted in the chapel when they cursed the heretics from the altar. Ah! this bore the stamp of truth; it was no smile of incredulity this time which shone on David's face. It was a smile of the sublimest pity gilded with precious hope.

But presently, in the midst of the bloodshed, and the flight, and the human-havoc among the mountains, came more alarming tidings. Verena was ill, or strangely affected in her mind. She no longer walked pleasantly among the vineyards, but stood for hours in the mill-garden, with dull eyes cast down upon the ground, heedless of those who traversed it for business, or of the rough jokes of passers-by; and at night, unable to find sleep, she had been seen to wander in the moonlight with vacant eye and preoccupied air by the side of the gloomy mill-dam.

A few days later came worse tidings still, and brought to David by no idle tongue, but by a friend long known and trusted. Verena had been accused by Garcino of heretic leanings. Soldiers had invaded the quiet mill-garden, and a warrant had been signed for her apprehension. David's heart leaped up with a fierce feeling, which was neither hope nor despair, only to fall again into the coldest depths of a joyless life. The report had proved almost without foundation. Garcino's accusation had been repudiated; for Verena, giving up the world, with all its future joys or sorrows, had become a nun, and entered the convent of St. Alda.

She was dead to him now—his betrothed, his much-beloved—as dead as the countless multitudes martyred on the hill-side. This thought was frenzy, and exceeded in misery every other doubt which had been suggested to his mind.

David discovered now, when too late, how much he had counted upon seeing her again, upon her faith to him, her endurance, her quiet patience, her unmeasured love; he did not now, in the first bitter moment of his disappointment, reason out how a shaken religion, a harrowed mind, a broken heart, still ever seeking for a peace which the world could not bestow, had driven her into this false haven.

Sometimes he argued, foolishly, with himself—had he but returned before this last fatal step was taken, had he but risked one short hour's parley, what words of comfort, truth, and religious consolation he might have spoken! Now her ears, in this living death, were closed for ever against all truth!

Every little token she had ever given him in her girlish love, he looked at now, like a relic of one that was dead or lost. The plume of peacock's feathers she had fastened in his cap, the buckle she had bought for his belt out of her own earnings, and her most precious possession, which she had given him on the day of their parting, "The Lives and Miracles of the Saints;" and sitting aside under cover of a rock, David drew the book from the pocket of his jerkin, and tears fell on its leaves as he sought out with trembling fingers that last page, where with her gentle hand she had stayed his, while, with a kindling enthusiasm, she recounted to him the foolish tradition of the "Leap of the Beautiful St. Alda."

But by-and-by, stranger and more incredible news came from David's old home to rouse him from his lethargy and despair. They said Verena had become a saint, and worked many strange and wonderful miracles. No longer bound within the convent-walls, she was carried hither and thither in triumph. They said she saw visions, and dreamt strange dreams; and that the beautiful St. Alda was her patron.

This intelligence created in David a desire, which grew in a few short days to a fixed resolution—namely, to return to his home, and make one last, earnest appeal, and endeavour to wean Verena from the state of fanatical frenzy on which her fragile mind seemed evidently bordering. There would be a fearful danger to his own life, and a possible risk to hers, but might he not now, when all other outlets of hope seemed closed, utter one, if even a dying, appeal for the truth?

Late at night, disguised as a cragsman, with shaven beard and lip, and armed only with a gun, which he took from the rigid hand of a dead soldier, whom he found cold and stiff among the rocks, he began his perilous journey homeward.

Though the spring was well advanced, the snow lay thickly still on the unbeaten paths chosen out by David. The climbing was stiff and arduous for one whose strength had been brought to a low ebb by privation and hardships. But there was a fire in his heart which led him on to overcome all the dangers and difficulties in the path of this "forlorn hope."

The sun had just risen, blazing and gigantic in the east, when David reached the summit of the mountain which overlooked his native valley. The birds were singing among the sweet-smelling pines, and far away in the distance, under the brow of old Pirchiriano, the bells of the village chapel summoned the early few to matins.

Everything in the fresh morning air breathed, and smelt, and sounded like peace, plenty, and prosperity; yet darker in David's breast at every step grew a sudden unreasoning fear which had taken possession of his mind—a fear that Verena was in danger, that her life, precious and pure, was in peril, that he must hasten on to her rescue, or she must perish.

There were ghastly sights, too, now at every turn of the road, which told him plainly that peace had been murdered, and prosperity was a name of the past. Whole vineyards on the hill-side blackened and seamed with fire, ruined cottages, and the bodies of Christian martyrs still lying as food for the wolves and eagles.

As David descended into the more inhabited slopes of the mountain he became wary in his movements, for there were an unusual number astir at this early hour, and pushing forward like himself in the direction of the town of Susa.

He was soon out upon the high road, bordered by chestnuts, now in full leaf, and here the travellers were more numerous still, and eager and excited in their demeanour. They joined themselves into companies of two and three, and argued and discussed as they hurried on. Stranger still, as they drew near the town they branched off also from the broad road, and took the way leading to his native village.

David's inexplicable fear increased with the air of mystery and excitement which was discernible on every face. As he approached the well-known vineyard-wall which bounded the miller's garden, the chapel-bell began to toll with dull, slow beats, like a funeral call, and between its throbs David paused and listened for the well-remembered sound of the rushing mill-stream; but this morning, black and grim in its distasteful idleness, the ponderous wheel stood still.

Not a few, also, among the crowd stopped and pointed across the vine trellises to the house of Jean Iserau, and David fancied he caught the words: "It was there she lived, poor girl;" or, "That is the miller's house, where St. Verena was born."

At a turn in the road, just where the garden-gate emerged upon the road, he came upon the well-known figure of an old man, leaning forward on the low wall, with his head sunk in his hands. It was Jean Iserau, the old miller himself.

David's heart yearned to stop and question him, but to discover himself now in the presence of so many witnesses, were certain death.

By the chapel-gates the crowd was dense, but in the long strip of deep pasturage beneath the shadow of the rocks it was denser still. There was everywhere a heavy odour of incense, and the sound of priests chanting solemnly.

At a signal (it was the bell from the convent of St. Alda, on the hill-side) the chanting ceased; a deep hush fell upon the multitude, and every head among the crowd was raised upwards, while the faces of women grew white, and those of men strangely stern.

"God help her! Is she not young and beautiful?" gasped a mother, with an infant in her arms.

"Ay, ay! a second St. Alda."

"They called her a heretic," muttered a third, with indignation.

"It may be they were not so far wrong," replied a fourth. "She calls this a test of the true faith."

A dread murmur passed through the crowd. David looked up with a shuddering prevision. On the summit of the cliff, between him and the sky, stood a slight, girlish figure, glorified in the morning light. In the features upturned and raptured by her sublime illusion, he recognised Verena, his betrothed. There she stood, the victim of superstition and self-sacrifice to the faith founded on the sand.

With a sudden impulse of agony, David called to her; but his voice was drowned in the hum of admiration and applause. If his spirit could that moment have left his body, it would have joined her like a thought, and held her back from her impious attempt.

He saw her stretch out her hands and step to the very brow of the cliff. His senses swam, and he would fain have withdrawn his eyes, but they were fixed and fascinated. Then, like a snow-drift, which, sun-touched, glides noiselessly over the edge of a precipitous rock, Verena dropped into the valley beneath.

The mob surged round David, and pushed him to and fro; then came a terrible silence, which seemed to freeze the blood in all veins; the silence was followed by a shudder and a groan; whispered words of horror ran round him through the crowd, and saturnine faces that mocked caught his eager eyes.

"Verily a would-be saint." "A fit punishment for arrogance." "There was something in the tanner's charge."

Such were the remarks bandied about, for men's hearts were callous in these days.

David's senses no longer failed him; a sudden strength was given to him, and he struggled through the crowd towards the base of the cliff.

There lay Verena—or what was lately she—a poor humbled form, motionless on the spot where she fell. The crowd were breaking up around her already, with harsh and unfeeling faces. They were under that merciless reaction which follows enthusiasm—each man angry with himself for his credulity.

It was strange how simultaneous was this reaction. The priests led the way, shaking their heads, and prophesying after the event. "This girl was not of the quality that saints were made of." "They knew it all along." "She had heretic sympathies." "She was betrothed to a heretic." "No, no, not of such a type was the blessed St. Alda."

They melted away, that expectant crowd, and Verena was left all but alone. A few women, indeed, more curious or compassionate, approached the place, as they might have done had a poor straying lamb fallen from the cliff overhead. They raised her, but seeing no sign of life, they went mournfully away.

Meantime, David, who dared not approach till the people had all gone, lurked faithfully near. "At least," he murmured, "I shall close her poor eyes, and lay her body among her people." And at the word "body" he shuddered and pressed his clenched hand to his heart.

But there was another for whom the tragic scene seemed to have an equal attraction. Above the prostrate figure, and casting a shadow over it, stood Garcino, the tanner; he also raised Verena's head, and looked into her fixed eyes. But at this moment the white lips opened, and a voice, as it were, of one returning from the dead uttered these words—

"None other name given under heaven whereby I may be saved."

"Wretched heretic!" cried Garcino; "so this is what remains of thee and thine insolence. Thy lot had been otherwise hadst thou not scorned me."

"Garcino, help me." Verena's eyes were fixed upon him in tardy recognition. "Carry me to my father's house in pity."

"My pity for thee is dead," said Garcino, turning and leaving her with a resolute step.

* * * * *

Around the miller's dwelling for many weeks there was a sinister watch set. Men who were strangers to the place peered round the house as if searching for some one concealed within. None knew whether Verena were alive or dead. But one clear, frosty night a grove of flame sprang up from the old mill, and hissing timber fell into its waters. Corn was scarce in the country, and the burning mill with its precious store caused great excitement and confusion in the neighbourhood. The miller and his daughter were forgotten in the panic, and three fugitives, under cover of the smoke and consternation, passed away and took their flight over the hills in safety. They were Jean Iserau, David, his future son-in-law, and Verena, his daughter. In her bosom was a clasped book the scattered Vaudois had learned to love; and its texts were written in her heart.

L. G.

DISCOURAGEMENTS.

BY THE REV. J. HILES HITCHENS, F.R.S.L.

MAN'S life-path lies through a hostile country, is circuitous and intricate, and often shadowed by overhanging obstructions. What the inspired penman wrote concerning God's favoured people of old, is true in its application to all of our brothers now, at some period of their course. "The soul of the people was much discouraged because of the way." The shades of night have gathered with terrific density around each hero-heart of past generations. Every manly soul now influencing the world has felt the rising of fear, and has recoiled for a season before the threatening gloom. Those in whose footprints we do well to tread, have watched with wistful eyes for the bright beams of the dawning day; have known the keen pangs of sickening disappointment, and have endured the weariness of protracted vigils. They struggled against difficulties, and found their struggle blessed discipline. Had they enjoyed Sybarite ease, in all probability they would have been strangers to Roman excellence. We must, therefore, be prepared for impediments. The distance between us and any worthy object we desire, must never dishearten. Cultivating an unfaltering purpose, and an indefatigable will, we must face the frowning obstacles, not waiting for special opportunities, nor calculating on propitious circumstances. England's great poet has well said—

"He is not worthy of the honeycomb
That shuns the hive because the bees have stings."

It may be profitable to inquire whence our discouragements most generally come. If we know the quarter from which we are likely to be assailed, we can best prepare for our defence.

Now, a very frequent source of discouragement is the greatness of the work on which we enter. We assume that the reader has a definite object before him—a task upon which his heart is resolutely set, and in the performance of which he is ambitious to succeed. Success, in any enterprise, is only attained by accustoming oneself to do to-day what is more advanced than the work of yesterday—making the goal of last week the starting-point of this. The higher the structure rises which our desires have planned, the greater the labour. If any man set himself a task which few or none of his compeers have performed, he must prepare for difficulties from the work itself of no mean order. Like Dr. Livingstone, in Africa, he must penetrate where he can see no smiling face, and hear no familiar voice of countrymen. He must feel his way, step by step, alone, there being no cunning hand to help, and no chart to guide.

Treading a terra incognita, he need not be surprised if there be times when success appears as distant as ever, and if he be tempted to sit down in the toilsome way, and listen to the gloomy counsels of despair. A glance at history, which Xenophon aptly denominates "philosophy teaching by example," will suffice to show that the men of whom posterity thinks with heart-burning, with affection, and a head bowing with reverence, were men who were ever and anon discouraged by the grandeur or gravity of their occupation, but who refused to succumb. Faint, yet pursuing—cast down, but not destroyed, they persevered. Their capabilities were tested; their latent energies were developed; and at last they learned that, like a bird, the very breeze which ruffled their plumage assisted them to rise. "Surmounted obstacles not only teach, but hearten us in our future struggles; for virtue must be learned, though, unfortunately, some of the vices come, as it were, by inspiration. The austerities of our northern climate are thought to be the cause of our abundant comforts, as our wintry nights and our stormy seas have given us a race of seamen perhaps unequalled, and certainly not surpassed, by any in the world."

Discouragement from the work itself is particularly the lot of those engaged in efforts for the moral and spiritual elevation of their fellow-men. Unlike the sculptor, the painter, the poet, the politician, or the warrior, they are toiling, not only for the present life, but for eternity. The influence of their labours reaches down the corridor of coming years in the world's history, and on—on into the undying ages. Their words touch chords which shall never cease to vibrate, either with dulcet notes of praise or doleful soundings of lamentation. This thought, linked to the indifference, the inconsistency, or the opposition of the masses whom the Christian worker aims to benefit, and his own powerlessness before his momentous duties, cannot fail oftentimes to press heavily on the mind, and make him exclaim, "Who is sufficient for these things?" Thus overwhelmed, Elijah retired to the lonely cave of Horeb; and Jeremiah uttered the melancholy words, "I will not make mention of him, nor speak any more in his name." So also Paul—albeit he could say, in prospect of persecution, "None of these things move me"—looked at the manner in which his work was defeated, and wrote "even weeping." Whenever we are disposed to despond from suchlike causes, let us remember that our task is set by the Lord of the vineyard, and that, so long as we are working with purity of motive, we can afford to leave the issues in his hand. He giveth the increase; and whether we are crowned or crownless, it matters not, so that his work is done. Though conscious of our own weakness, we should not lose the comfort and courage accorded by the thought, that He who apportions the work will not fail to vouchsafe strength for the same. Napoleon the Great, wearing high-heeled boots, stood before the picture of Alexander by David, and, taking out his snuff-box with apparent satisfaction, said, "Ah! Alexander was shorter than I am!" We can look on the portraits of multitudes—a great cloud of witnesses—who were as feeble as we are, but who proved valiant and victorious. Their experience should stimulate us. The minister of a Christian church, meditating the relinquishment of his position, fell asleep, and dreamt that he was a labouring man seeking employment. A person to whom he applied for work pointed to a great mountain, and ordered him to remove it. Thinking that the toil of a lifetime would not perceptibly diminish the towering mass, he ventured to express his doubts as to the benefit of such labour. "Never you mind; do your work; I'll pay you for it!" was the reply. Thereupon he earnestly commenced his duty, but to little apparent purpose, when, suddenly, by some supernatural agency, the mountain disappeared. He woke from his dream with this lesson on his mind: "I am to go on with my work, though I see but little evidence of success." He went to his sacred engagements with renewed zeal; and before long a visible improvement took place in his charge, and many precious tokens of Divine favour were enjoyed.

Many are the discouragements which come from the folly, weakness, and inexperience of those with whom we have to do. In our earliest years, many seeds are sown in the plastic mind, which bring forth noxious, deadly weeds to trouble us in after years. Relatives and friends should be very careful what they say to childhood. A soldier, on one occasion, having fractured his skull, overheard the doctor's remark that his brain was visible. The poor, fainting sufferer exclaimed, "Do write and tell my father, for he always said I had no brains." Injudicious observations, of which that father's speech is a specimen, will be found the surest way to prevent the development and stunt the growth of powers that may be possessed. How often have deserving characters suffered, because of the inability of those around to discern latent capability. Genius is not infrequently thrown into the shade because it appears on the world's stage without the metropolitan stamp. The possessor of the coveted power is young, poor, or unknown to fame, and hence he is not estimated rightly. No good thing can come out of Nazareth. He must toil on and on, and see men, unworthy to loose his shoe-latchets, chosen before him to the posts of honour the world has to offer. Sheridan, in his early years, was advised by Woodfall, the reporter, to relinquish the effort at public speaking, as he would never distinguish himself as an orator. When Hogarth desired to dedicate his celebrated "March of the Guards to Finchley" to George II., the king pronounced the painter insolent for sending it to him, and added, "Take his trumpery out of my sight." And every one knows how the clever author of "Dreamthorp" was unsparingly condemned, because of the luxuriant style of his maiden effort. So books have been at first bandied about as worthless, which are now highly estimated—to wit, "Robinson Crusoe" and "The Vicar of Wakefield," which were rejected by several publishers as undeserving the light.

It does not do to be too attentive to the criticism of onlookers, or a worker will soon throw up his occupation. It will fare with him as it did with the Venetian artist, who hung his picture in public, with a request that observers would write, on a sheet of paper attached to the picture, any fault they might discern; and, lo! next day, there was not one line of the picture free from condemnation. Whatever opinion may be expressed, let us have force of character enough to follow the decisions of our own judgment.

Perhaps one of the most fertile sources of discouragement to the honest and true man, is the repeated triumph of falsehood and duplicity. The wise, but modest man, is allowed to walk alone; whilst the fool and the rogue—because self-reliant and self-asserting—are encompassed by cheering multitudes. The public is, alas! woefully gullible. It will often cast aside the solid article, for that which is veneered—like the Trojans, in the days of Cassandra, preferring deceit to truth. This is painfully galling to the faithful worker, unless he keep prominently before him the fact that real merit often consists simply in the earnest and persevering endeavour.

"Compute the chances,
And deem there's ne'er a one in dangerous times
Who wins the race of glory, but than him
A thousand men, more gloriously endow'd,
Have fallen upon the course; a thousand others
Have had their fortunes founder'd by a chance,
Whilst lighter barques pushed past them: to whom add
A smaller tally, of the singular few
Who, gifted with predominating powers,
Bear yet a temperate will, and keep the peace.
The world knows nothing of its greatest men."

Some who spend their best energies of body and mind in endeavouring to open up new veins of thought, are discouraged by a class of persons who are satisfied with matters as they are. Ignorant obstructives, they imagine that the whole of truth has been discovered; they are devoid of all desire to make accessions to their knowledge, or, if they admit the value of anything new, it is only as it serves their selfish ends. It was one of this class who meeting a philosopher one day said, "All your books on natural history are very pretty, but you have never yet saved a leaf from the teeth of the insects."

Even amongst those who are professedly anxious for social progress, there is evinced sometimes a remarkable tardiness to receive what is new. The history of mechanical inventions and scientific discoveries is, on the whole, a painful one for this reason. The very novelty of what the sons of science and art have introduced, has been the stoutest barrier to success. Men have seemed to reason thus:—The thing may be an advantage; but it is an innovation—ergo, at all hazards it must be discouraged. The photographic art is now immensely popular, and a prodigious business is done therein; but there were thirty-seven years of struggle with existing prejudices, before that useful method of securing solar pictures was fully introduced. Straw paper is now no novelty; but when, at the beginning of the present century, Richard Twiss—the author of "Travels in Spain and Portugal"—was convinced that straw might be converted into paper, and embarked his fortune in the speculation, his favourite scheme was publicly pronounced "an erroneous opinion," consequently people stood aloof from him, and he became a ruined man. The telegraph, again, which is now admitted on all hands to be a national blessing, was three or four times rejected by the authorities of this country. Indeed, when its use had been demonstrated, and the scheme for uniting England and the Continent was explained to Sir R. Peel, the Prime Minister declined to have anything to do with it, consequently foreign aid was sought and obtained. Similarly with the sewing-machine. Elias Howe, a poor New York mechanic, could not find any of his countrymen willing to adopt his novel invention. He was obliged to part with half the patent for food and lodging. He then came to England, and here, in abject circumstances, parted with the other half of the patent for a comparatively small sum of money. These are but a few out of a lengthy catalogue of instances.

Thus, from the work itself and from the surroundings of the worker, have discouragements been encountered and conquered by our predecessors. When we are downcast we will aim to remember that no trial has overtaken us but such as is common to men. Reader, join yourself to "Great-heart"—whom Bunyan portrays as acquainted with the man "that tumbled the hills about with words." In his company there is little to fear.

"Happy is he whose will is strong :
He suffers ; but he will not suffer long."

And if, in addition, you have as your Counsellor and Guide that Friend to whom all power is given, you will have strength to descend the vales, cross the plains, ford the rivers, scale the mountains, and from the successive summits of victory sing, "I can do all things !"

REMINISCENCES OF WELLINGTON, WITH ANECDOTES OF HIS STAFF.—III.

BY LORD WILLIAM LENNOX.

WITHOUT wishing to enter into the diplomatic services of Wellington, who fully realised the anticipations expressed by the Speaker of the House of Commons, Lord Colchester, when congratulating the duke upon the high and important mission on which he was about to proceed, as ambassador to Louis XVIII., "that the same splendid talents so conspicuous in war, would maintain with equal authority, firmness, and temper our national honour and interests in peace," I cannot refrain from alluding to his exertions in the abolition of the French slave trade. Within three days of the duke's arrival in Paris, he apprised the King of the earnestness with which the Prince Regent and his Government, the Parliament and the British nation, wished that His Majesty would concur in immediately abolishing this traffic by his subjects, his grace adding, that "he urged the King by all the arguments that had been suggested by the English cabinet, and such others as occurred to him, to put an end to the nefarious system."

Finding the newly-restored monarch anxious to ascertain the feelings of his own people upon the subject, the duke still urged the King to restrict the trade as much as possible; and in a despatch addressed to the Prince de Benevento, then minister of foreign affairs, our ambassador again pressed the subject, requesting his highness to urge his most Christian Majesty to take some steps for the abolition of that trade, "so repugnant to the principles of national justice, and of the enlightened age in which he lived."

On the 5th of September Divine service was held, for the first time, at the hotel of the British ambassador. The English residents, amounting to more than a hundred, assembled in the great dining-room. The service was performed by the duke's chaplain; his grace attended, as he did upon every Sunday during the time I had the honour of serving on his staff.

The duke has been accused of want of sympathy for individuals, and of having an insufficient sense of the services of his army. He certainly was not demonstrative when on duty; his habitual reserve often concealed feelings that he was chary of displaying; but he was always fair and just when circumstances did not involve a compromise of system, or interfere with his sense of the public advantage. Let me lay before you two instances to prove his kindness of heart.

Although Wellington was ever foremost in the fray, he was never wounded except upon one occasion, and that was at Orthez, where he received a severe contusion upon his hip from a spent ball. This prevented him directing in person the last movements of the army on that day, but he did not quit the field until Soult had begun to retreat. In this engagement, my elder brother, the late Duke of Richmond, was most dangerously wounded, while leading his company to the attack. The wound was pronounced to be mortal. Upon the following morning, Wellington was enabled to get about upon crutches, and his first walk was across the street to the house in which his former aide-de-camp lay. He hobbled into the room, where the patient was still in a most precarious state. The surgeon, Dr. Hair, late of the Royal Horse Guards (Blues), who, exhausted with fatigue, was resting upon a mattress, started up at the entrance of the duke, and made a sign that the wounded man was sleeping. For a second, Wellington leant against the mantelpiece suffering from the most poignant grief. Suddenly my brother awoke, and recognising his chief, expressed a hope that he had been successful on the previous day. "I've given them a good licking," replied the great man; "and I shall follow it up." The exhausted youth turned to doze again, and as the duke quitted the room, he appeared broken hearted at the thought that he had taken a last farewell of the son of one of his oldest and dearest friends.

Another instance of Wellington's tender feeling may be mentioned. Dr. Hume, the duke's staff-surgeon, who had attended Sir Alexander Gordon, one of his grace's aides-de-camp, on the field of Waterloo, was anxious to report the death of that gallant officer as early as possible. With this view, Hume tapped at the duke's door, at about half-past three o'clock on the morning after the battle, and was told to come in. He found his grace sitting up in his bed, covered with the dust and sweat of the previous day. The kind-hearted surgeon told him of Gordon's death, and other casualties. Wellington was deeply affected, his tears dropped fast upon his friend's hand, which he held in his, and were chasing one another in furrows over his dusty cheeks. Brushing them suddenly away with his left hand, the duke said, in a voice tremulous with emotion, "Well, thank God, I don't know what it is to lose a battle, but certainly nothing can be more painful than to gain one with the loss of so many of one's friends."

With regard to an insufficient sense of the services of his army, I will here relate an anecdote exemplifying his estimation of it, and characteristically truthful of himself and those he commanded. After the battle of Toulouse, my old commanding officer, Sir John Elley, at that time adjutant-general of cavalry, dined at head-quarters. The duke was in unusually high spirits; he had received the news of Bonaparte's abdication; the war was at an end, and none seemed more rejoiced in its termination than he did himself. The conversation turned on the late immediate movements of the two armies, when Wellington exclaimed, "I will tell you the difference between Soult and me: when he gets into a difficulty, his troops don't get him out of it; when I get into one, mine always do."

Wellington's temperament was buoyant, joyous, and happy. It made his household glad; to use a common expression, but a forcible one, he was "the life and soul of the house." There was a celebrated character attached to his grace's household, no less a personage than the duke's state coachman, Mr. Turnham. Nothing could convince this knight of the ribbons that the glory of Wellington had not in some degree descended upon him, for in conversation he always spoke in the plural number, he talked of how our carriage had thrown that of the Prince Regent's into the shade, of our success in the Peninsula, of our reception at Madrid and Bordeaux, of what we had done at Waterloo, of how well we turned out at Paris, of our triumphant entry into the capital of France, and of the flattering manner in which the kings of France, Sweden, and Prussia, the emperors of Russia and Austria, had noticed us. Wellington often laughed at the grandiloquence of his coachman, but respected him as an honest and excellent servant.

Another celebrity must not be forgotten, the duke's chef de cuisine, than whom a better artist did not exist. It is not, however, with his culinary talents that I have to do; it is his knowledge of his chief to which I would refer. During the battle of Waterloo, as from hour to hour thousands on thousands of fugitives poured along the village towards Brussels, or at least towards the forest of Soigny, crying that "all was lost," "the English beaten," "the French victorious and coming," the incredulous cook continued unmoved his preparations for his master's dinner. "Fly," cried one after another, "the French are coming, and you will be killed!" but the imperturbable artist, strong in his faith of invariable victory, only replied, "No, I have served my master while he has fought a hundred battles, and he never yet failed to come to his dinner;" so he cooked on, spite of flying thousands: and the cook was right; the duke came, though rather late on this occasion.

(Drawn by C. J. STANILAND.)

"Thy voice brings back the olden chime."—p. 859.

Wellington's table was always very good in every respect. In the Peninsula he had three cooks, and an English and Spanish chief, who shared the command, and, by dividing the days, vied with each other in their culinary efforts. One day, at Irurita, a short time before dinner, a fire was discovered in the kitchen chimney, and a grand commotion took place; cooks, kitchen maids, scullery wenches, were running about in the greatest state of excitement; the alarm was given; and although it was pelting with rain, Wellington came out, without his hat, with merely a silk handkerchief round his head, and assisted for more than an hour in extinguishing the fire. The manner in which he gave his orders and did his work would have gladdened the heart of Captain Shaw of the London Fire Brigade.

I now turn to a playful anecdote. At an affair in the Maya Pass, on the 7th of July, 1813, Wellington ordered young Fitz-Clarence, afterwards Earl of Munster, who was acting as his extra aide-de-camp, to go and bring up two companies of a Portuguese regiment to attack. Away he went; it was close by, but he was proud of the order. After giving it, he espied a cherry-tree, and lost no time in climbing up it to break off a branch and eat the cherries. Wellington, in returning to head-quarters, lost his way in the fog, and while hesitating how to proceed, George Fitz-Clarence told him he was sure it was the right road, as he had passed the place where he found the two Portuguese companies. "How do you know that?" asked the chief. "By that cherry-tree, which I was up in just afterwards," was the reply. This amused Wellington greatly, who on the following morning called Fitz-Clarence up to him, and, with a grave face, as if giving an important order, told him to go and get some more of the cherries.

The duke used to tell a good story of himself, of a circumstance which occurred when his grace first went to Oxford to be installed as chancellor. It was necessary at the inauguration to make a Latin speech, and as in Wellesley's early days there were no competitive examinations for the army, his head had not been over abundantly stored with the classical language. He felt that any speech before so august a body was difficult, but a Latin one was impossible; so in his dilemma he applied to his family physician, as one most likely to know Latin, and who immediately supplied him with the requisite oration. Wellington's remark upon it was truly characteristic: "The speech answered very well. I believe it was a good speech; but I did not know much of the matter."

Another anecdote of the duke is worthy of being recorded. Some years ago, a farm in the neighbourhood of Strathfieldsaye was in the market, and as it lay contiguous to the estate, his grace was recommended to purchase it. After the sale was effected, his steward congratulated him on the bargain he had made. "What bargain?" asked the duke. "It was valued at £1,100," responded the other; "and, owing to the difficulties the farmer was in, we got it for £800." "In that case," replied Wellington, "you will please to refund £300 to the late owner; and never let me hear again of cheap land."

Although Wellington was a strict disciplinarian, he was ever ready to "season justice with mercy;" and whenever a prisoner was favourably recommended by the members of a court-martial, the culprit's pardon was almost always granted. In other instances, after carefully looking into the case, the duke would extend his forgiveness, "in consideration of the previous good character of the prisoner;" or "in consideration of the good conduct of the regiment to which the prisoner belonged;" or "because subsequent to his crime the offender had been released from confinement, and had actually been engaged with the enemy;" or "from a desire not to execute for desertion a soldier from such a regiment;" or "from the gallantry of the corps in such a battle;" or "from its being the first complaint of misconduct in the battalion to which the prisoner belonged;" or "from the thoughtlessness and levity of the offender." Upon one occasion the duke pardoned a prisoner "because he told the truth to the general court-martial, and thereby saved his comrades, who were by mistake charged with the offence of which he had been convicted." Occasionally Wellington remitted punishments in deference to the court, both of officers and men, but not from "concurring in their opinion," for he often stated "that he did it much against his own inclination." In cases of burglary and plunder, the duke repeatedly, in general orders, declared his determination to carry into execution whatever might be the sentence of the court on any soldiers found guilty of such wanton and disgraceful outrage; and whenever a report was made to him that a village had been plundered, the offending regiment was ordered to have the rolls called every hour, at which all the officers and men were to be present.

An anecdote of Wellington will prove that, although stern duty was foremost in his mind, he was ever happy when he could relax it without disadvantage to the service. The troops had taken to plundering a good deal, and as his former orders had been disobeyed, he issued a very stringent one, to the effect that the first man caught in the act should be hanged upon the spot. One day, as he was about to sit down to dinner, three men were brought in by the prévôt; the case against them was clear, and Wellington gave an instantaneous order that they should be led away, and hanged in some place where they might be seen by the whole column on its march next morning. Lord Nugent, who was travelling through Spain and Portugal, and a large party, dined with his grace; they were all dreadfully shocked, and would scarcely touch their food, nor was their host much more at his ease. Upon the following day, three men in uniform were seen hanging from the branches of a tree close to a bridge over which the troops had to pass. It was a terrible example, but it produced its desired effect—there was no more plundering.

Some months afterwards, it oozed out at headquarters, that some of the duke's guests had interceded with his grace's surgeon for the condemned victims, and as three men had recently died in the hospital, they were hung up, and the culprits returned to their regiments. At first the warrior duke felt a little angry at being thus deceived; but he shortly afterwards owned that, as his object had been gained without carrying out the last penalty of the law, he was delighted at the result, and gratified that the poor fellows' lives were spared.

THE WILD BIRD'S SONG.

ING, pretty bird; sing, happy bird;
Sing, and my heart will sing with thee;
Clear let thy ringing song be heard,
It brings back youth again to me;
Again sweet voice and kindly word—
Sing, happy bird, upon the tree.

Long stranded on the shores of Time,
My fairy boats, far up the stream,
I still sail on where age's rime
Whitens beneath the shivering beam—
Thy voice brings back the olden chime;
Sing, happy bird, and let me dream.

Like mountain tops in sunny light,
Those early years far off I see;
The nearer hills with snow are white,
The wind blows chill—but let them be;
While I may listen with delight,
Sing, happy bird, upon the tree.

Ah, well! sad thoughts will come again,
And tears through which I cannot see:
I would have back what I had then,

But—time and change—it cannot be.
Thou singest of my native glen—
Sing, happy bird, upon the tree.

In golden light the mountains glow
Still through that distance upon me.
How sweet the dream of long ago—
How merrily the days would flee!
Thou singest of their joyous flow—
Sing, happy bird, upon the tree.

Hushed gladness of the days of yore,
Not dead and buried, though it seem:
I come, but mine return no more
To meet me by the winding stream.
I dream they wait me, on before—
Sing, happy bird, and let me dream.

Oh! life is short, but love is long—
Those voices full of household glee!
Oh! life is weak, but love is strong—
Far on before they speak of me.
Sing on, sweet bird, I hear thy song—
Sing, happy bird, upon the tree.

J. H.

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER LXII.

THE CHARACTER.

T was a golden opportunity, thought the shoemaker, now his wife was out, to do a little business. For the strong-armed, large-hearted woman had taken the man under her protection, as she did everything, and everybody, against whom she considered the battle of life was running a trifle too hard.

The lodger came in. He was so changed, his face so white and worn, his appearance so forlorn and haggard, that the reader can hardly be expected to recognise him; yet it was no other than John Humphreys. He had found his way to this remote spot, and was lying here, hidden.

What he had suffered, a merciful Heaven alone was witness to. He dared not go home. He dared not face the terrible suspicion that haunted him. Far better for him if he had; but fortitude was not amongst his virtues—as we know.

He had lain here hidden, keeping from the sight of his fellows, not venturing to ascertain if the thing that was so crushing to his mind, had really happened or no. Ill, homeless, broken down, destroyed, that was what he thought himself—and what a man really becomes, if he suffer misfortune to ride roughshod over him.

How small his previous trials appeared to him now! Even the loss of the farm was a trifling evil, had he but met it bravely and like a man. But it was too late! all hope was gone, he thought, in his despair.

By this time he had come into the room, and was standing a mark for Jacob Potts's speculations to aim at.

"Well," said Jacob, more certain than ever that his misgivings were not without foundation, "well, and what did you want with me?" He dare not have adopted such a tone if his wife had been present. But the good woman was helping to turn the mangle, an occupation which would detain her at least an hour.

"I wanted," replied John Humphreys, interlacing his thin fingers nervously together, "to get a bit of work somewhere."

"Ah!" thought Jacob, "just so, my friend; depend upon it, we shall lose our rent." But he did not say a word of the kind; he scowled fearfully at the hole in the boot he was mending.

"Perhaps you know of somebody who would take me on," continued John, still painfully nervous; "I can do almost anything on the land."

"There's plenty of folks would be glad," replied Jacob, delighted at the chance of hitting the right nail on the head at last; "that is, if you've got a character!"

John turned very pale. The cobbler's one eye was brought to bear upon him with keen suspicion.

"If you aint, you know, why Northwold isn't just the place for you, that's all!"

John stood a moment as if considering; very unpleasant were all the outstanding circumstances of his life, just then!

Jacob's one eye, the expression of which increased in severity every moment, did not tend to restore his tranquillity.

"I can but try," he said, at length, turning to go.

"Hark ye, my friend," cried Jacob, emboldened more and more, "you've been vastly silent as to that hint of mine touching the character."

John stood pale and speechless. The good name! what an inestimable boon it is!—the gold of Ophir can scarce compare with it!

"And being silent," urged Jacob, "I've just a word to say. This is reckoning day, and my wife is out; now, how much more comfortable we should both of us feel, if we squared up our accounts!"

John put his hand in his pocket, his cheeks tingled with shame. "I can pay you," he said; "you need not be afraid of losing by me."

"Thank you, that's right all but a halfpenny, and that may stand over," said Jacob, catching at the money. "Now, in case you don't get work, I think it would be better if you shifted your quarters; we work hard enough ourselves, and we reckon to get the rent from the lodger, as is natural."

"Quite natural!" replied John, turning to go. The close air of the workshop seemed to suffocate him.

When he was gone, and the door closed upon him, Jacob began greedily to count his money! Finding, as he had done before, that it was all right, he slipped it down into his pocket with great alacrity.

"The missis needn't know anything about it," said he to himself; "it's all between the lodger and me!"

CHAPTER LXIII.

WAS IT WORTH WHILE TO LIVE?

JOHN HUMPHREYS had not been six weeks in Northwold without knowing something of his landlord's character. From the very first, that one suspicious eye, appertaining to Jacob Potts, had been a kind of nightmare to him. It was evident the man distrusted him, and if he could not get work, the sooner he quitted that locality the better.

There had been a time when nothing would have been so easy as to disclose the whole of his simple history to any one who asked him; but how would it be now?

Things had come to a great issue with him that day. He had spent the last shilling he had in the world, and it was imperative upon him to do something. He ought to have done something before; but for the last six weeks he had been like a man in a dream. Besides, the sheer terror lest he should be detected, had led him to keep close hidden. He had only once before been up the village street of Northwold.

He knew, however, that a rich farmer owned some land in the neighbourhood, and he had learned incidentally that this man wanted hands to work in his fields. Suppose he were to offer himself? It was a sad fall from what he had been; but absolute want stared him in the face.

The end of all this was wrapped in impenetrable gloom. What he intended to do, ultimately, he did not know. Like all imperfect characters, he was trying to shut out, from his mental vision, both the past and the future.

Strange as it may seem, he clung to his refuge at Northwold. The woman of the house had been kind to him, and befriended him. He was far away from Newbury. No tidings had come thither of his crime. He felt unwilling and afraid to face the world again. He was for ever separated from home, and wife, and all dear to him. He could, at best, remain in this shelter till he died. His death would free his wife from the terror that must be hanging over her, like a thunder-cloud, from day to day. As for his life, viewed in any pleasurable sense, it was wrecked, and lost!

He thought these thoughts as he walked slowly towards the abode of the farmer. He had not to go far, as it happened: he met the farmer riding on horseback to Northwold. He knew the man by a kind of intuition. There was but one person of any influence or position in Northwold. John stopped, and took off his cap. The farmer reined in his horse, and stopped too.

"Well, my man, what did you want with me?"

He had a brisk, cheerful voice, and there was an air of promptness and decision about him. John liked the looks of him amazingly.

"I took the liberty of stopping you, sir. I heard that you wanted more hands on your farm."

"So I do—provided I can get men with good characters."

He spoke in the same brisk, decided tone, and he looked steadily at John.

John quailed rather under the look. The farmer asked his name, and where he came from.

There it was, at the very beginning.

How dare he say he came from Newbury? Might not the whole matter have been made public in the papers? Might there not have been a full-length description of him? and might not the farmer have seen it?

"Well," said the farmer, getting rather impatient, "can't you give me a straightforward answer?"

No, John could not. He stood looking down, and fumbling at his cap.

"Then you won't do for me!" said the farmer, briskly. "Stay," added he, reining up his steed again, "are you the man who lodges with Jacob Potts?"

John's heart beat fast with terror. It was impossible not to see the effect the question had upon him.

"You are?" cried the farmer, interrogatively. "Well, then, I am sure you won't do for me. And what's more, I advise you to take yourself off. I'm a magistrate, and from what I hear, you are rather a suspicious person. Now, I don't want suspicious persons lurking about Northwold!"

John stood fumbling at his cap, presenting, it must be confessed, a very suspicious appearance. He could not even look the farmer in the face. Yet a few months ago, who would have dared to use such language to him?

The farmer darted at him another penetrating glance; then he rode off, leaving John standing bareheaded in the middle of the road.

The first sensation he felt, when the stunning effect of this little conversation allowed him to feel anything, was that of burning heat to his head. The sun was hot, and its rays beat down on his bare forehead. He hastily put on his cap, and looked round for shelter.

There was a stile close by, that led into the foot-path. A clump of trees was in the field, and a little river wound along like a silver thread. John went to the trees for shade, and sat down, close by the river's brink.

It was clear he could not go back to Northwold. Nay, if he consulted his own safety, he would flee from it, as fast as possible. There was no more refuge for him, under the roof of Jacob Potts. What was he to do? He must find work, or starve. Even if he found work, it was only the means of dragging on a wretched existence, amid dangers and distresses of every kind. Was it worth his while to try to live?

Black, indeed, were the despairing thoughts that came into his mind just then!

Was it worth while to try? he asked, when all was gone that made life happy—when he had lost his home, wrecked his life, ruined his prospects—was it worth while to try?

He could never go home again. If he did, his sin would find him out. No one would employ him. He should be hunted from place to place, till, in the end, Justice would meet him, and take her reckoning. He could come to no end that would not be a bad one.

Suppose he did not try?—and he glanced fearfully into the cool, clear depths at his feet—suppose he gave up the struggle? Suppose there was a plunge, a whirling round and round of the swift circles, and then all would be over?

It would not take long to do—to unbuild the temple which God had framed, and let the soul go free. No one would miss him; no one would care about this awful conflict that was shaking him to his foundations. When his wife got to know, it would be better for her than the suspense she must have suffered. She could begin life again, free and unfettered. She was a woman of great resources—too good for him, by half. Even she, would soon cease to weep for him. Should he take that plunge? There all was calm! There were no waves to toss him on that shore! There the wicked cease from troubling, and there the weary are at rest."

He rose up, and threw a troubled glance round. No one was in sight. Lambs were feeding peacefully in the meadow. The budding leaves rustled gently over his head. Again he looked down. He was holding on to the very brink of life, and he was getting faint and weary. Should he let go and drop?

Angels are ministering spirits to man in his weal and woe. I think an angel whispered to him, for there stirred in his heart a few long-forgotten memories. Something seemed to say to him that after death would come the judgment. He had not thought of that, and he drew back and shuddered.

He had been brought up piously, and taught his Bible, and all the wondrous doctrines it sets forth for us men and for our salvation. Those doctrines came into his mind with great vividness. He could not account for it, either, at that time, or ever after, but he began, by an irresistible influence, to think of the providence of God!

Not a sparrow, he thought, falls to the ground without His notice; and so consoling and softening was the reflection, that he sat down, and burst into a flood of tears.

No one but himself ever knew the healing virtue of those tears! A cloud seemed to roll away from before his mental vision, and lo! the edges of the cloud were tipped with silver!

His heart melted into penitence for his shortcomings, and his sins. He knelt down on the green grass, and while the spring buds yet rustled over his head, he prayed earnestly for help and pardon. All the old, better feelings revived. God, he thought, was all-present, all-merciful. In his distress he would fall back on God.

CHAPTER LXIV.

LADY SYLVESTER SEES HER MISTAKE.

"No, my lady, it is quite impossible—I am really very sorry to say so—quite impossible for you to hold your possessions by any kind of tenure."

"It is your fault; you have had the management of our affairs!" retorted Lady Sylvester, angrily. "I employed you to arrange them to the satisfaction of the creditors."

"Indeed, my lady, the creditors were never further from being satisfied in their lives!" replied Mr. Carlton, with unusual energy.

"I have nothing to do with that."

Her ladyship was beginning in the old strain; but he cut her short.

"The fact is, Lady Sylvester, this has been the most disgraceful failure ever known in Newbury."

She glared at him fiercely; but, for once, he was resolved to have his say out.

"It has been, I repeat, disgraceful. Hundreds of persons have been plunged into ruin. Your ladyship should think of that!"

"There is no need to think of that. Your business is with us—us," replied she, as haughtily as ever.

He was resolved she should come down from that pedestal, and the sooner the better.

"I rode over this morning," he said, "because I wished to warn you of what is going to happen. You have removed furniture and valuables from Newbury, I find. Well, they will be seized."

"Seized!"

Her face was very pale; but her eyes burned with the old light as unquenchably as ever.

"Yes, Lady Sylvester, seized. The creditors are justly angry, and more clamorous than I care to inform you. They will consent to nothing, while a stick or stone remains unclaimed." She pressed her hand to her forehead. "My advice to you is, that you leave this place—which like everything else is in debt," added he, with some bitterness; "that you take a cheap and humble lodging, and——"

"Do you know to whom you are speaking?" she asked, proudly.

"I do, and I regret having to assume such a tone. But the time for compromise has gone by, and the day of reckoning has come." She pressed her hand again to her forehead. "I am very sorry," he repeated, "to appear harsh, or to propose a step so distasteful; but unless you remove at once——"

"At once!"

"Yes, at once. I will find you a lodging. It must be humble and inexpensive. I do not mince the matter. The immediate income will have to be advanced by myself. There is literally nothing left."

She did not answer. It was evident she felt the pedestal begin to totter.

"I must give your ladyship another hint," continued he, after a short pause. "It will be absolutely necessary that some kind of employment——" He stopped. There was that in her face which made him not dare to finish the sentence. "Yet it will have to be finished some time or other," thought he.

Half an hour after, Lady Sylvester was walking, with a firm step, towards her daughter's room.

She was very pale; her hands were clenched, and there was a repression about the iron mouth that was painful to behold. When she reached the door she stopped, and pressed her hand to her heart. She was not thinking now of their affairs, or of her late interview with Mr. Carlton. No! she was thinking of Alice.

Alice had not left her room for several days. From the first, a kind of blight had fallen on her. Since she came to the Grange, she had hardly once been seen to smile. There is no doubt she was ill. Lady Sylvester was forced into believing so. And another thing was forced upon her reluctant apprehension, contend with it as she might. The girl's heart was breaking.

And sometimes a terrible misgiving happened to her ladyship as well. Had she brought Alice here to die? The place was inexpressibly dreary. Poverty sat by their hearth now. Ruin and disgrace were their portion—there was no gainsaying it—and the future was full of terrors.

"If I do not flinch, it is because I am a Sylvester," thought her ladyship, as she stood, her hand on the lock of the door. As she opened it, her expression grew softer, and more womanly: for now again she was thinking of Alice.

Alice lay on the bed; her eyes were closed, and when her mother spoke to her, it was with difficulty she roused herself to answer. When she had answered, she fell back into a kind of stupor.

"Are you worse, Alice? Oh, my child! my child!" exclaimed her ladyship, in a tone of anguish.

Alice did not reply; it was evident she could not. Then, the case with all its bearings came vividly into the mind of Lady Sylvester. She could not escape from it. Among the victims sacrificed to the great Sylvester dignity, would there be numbered this one—her daughter?

She did not allow the thought full sway. She dare not. She kept saying to herself, that Alice was sleeping; that she would wake up refreshed. All she could do was to watch beside her; and she did so the long silent day—communing, one should hope, with her own heart, and learning to be "still."

The day began to wane, and the twilight to steal over the desolate scene. Then her fears kindled into terror. Alice was still in a state of partial consciousness. She had not revived. In vain her mother spoke to her; there was not even a flicker of the eyelid, or a pressure of the hand. Not a sign of that returning energy so eagerly desired.

"Alice, my child! speak to me!" And she knelt down by the bed. "Think how terrible this is!" and she shuddered violently.

But Alice did not speak.

"I will take you from this place," said Lady Sylvester, hurriedly, and still bending over her. "We will go where you like—I care not. Do you hear, my child?"

The hand, which lay fast locked in that of her mother, gave a feeble pressure.

"Yes, we will leave the Grange. I know you do not like it. We will begin afresh, Alice—quite afresh," continued her ladyship, in the same hurried tone. "Let us work!"

She said the word with a painful effort. It was evidently uttered merely to rouse her daughter; but if it was so, it failed. Beyond the faint pressure of the hand, no effect was produced. Lady Sylvester remained silent a few moments, her face pressed against the bed-clothes. She might have been praying.

At length she raised her head. Her features looked shrunk and nipped; her lips were colourless; her brow contracted. She bent over her daughter.

"Alice," said she, in a tone as though the concession were wrung from her by a kind of torture, "Alice, I will send for Harold Blake."

There was a flicker of the eyelids now, and a faint tinge of colour to the cheek. Lady Sylvester rose, and stood looking steadily at her daughter's face. Her own face was an index of conflicting emotions. Fear, reluctance, pride, affection, sorrow—all these passed in succession. You could read the history of each. It was uncertain how the conflict would terminate, but affection conquered. You could see that, in the softened light of the dark, indomitable eye—the tender expression that invested the features lately so unrelenting—the bowed head, the quivering lip.

For once, the Sylvester dignity was known to stoop, and only once; and that was to save Alice!

Then, she cast a quick glance round. It was getting dark. Every moment of time gained was a boon too precious to be trifled with. Who should she send, out here in this lonely place, away from human ken and sympathy? Ah! who indeed?

She did not take more than a few seconds to discuss that point. She was a brave woman, who could set female timidity at defiance. What did she care for the lonely common, the dark night, the toilsome way? Her feet could carry her twice that distance, if needs be!

As she thought this, she was putting on her shawl and bonnet. The one attendant she had sent to watch by Alice. Then, she glided down the stairs, and stood, a moment, under the old doorway with the motto over her head: "Noblesse oblige!"

Perhaps, for the first time, she had forgotten it.

(To be concluded in our next.)

THE BUNCH OF DAISIES.

"THERE is a pretty pink-tipped daisy, Mary. Have you anything interesting to tell about so common a flower?"

"First, do you know why it is called by that name, daisy?"

"No; why?"

"Because it is the earliest blossom which opens to greet the sunrise; and therefore the poet Chaucer called it 'day's eye.'"

"How pretty," said Emily. "I shall always remember that. It really looks like an eye, too."

"I do not admire the yellow centre," said Charles.

"You would not say so if you saw it through a microscope," replied Mary. "The daisy is what is called a compound flower, because it is composed of a number of small blossoms, each perfect in itself, and the white or pink fringe which surrounds all is theray."

"I had no idea there was so much to be known about a common daisy. If it were a rare garden plant we should admire it very much."

"Mary," said Charles, "with you every flower has a story. Please tell us one, now."

"I know a sad tale connected with a bunch of daisies; but it is not one of my own experience. Some years ago, I was acquainted with a little girl, called Margaret, whose mother suffered much from prolonged delicate health. Margaret became so accustomed to see her pale looks, that they ceased to occasion her any uneasiness, and she imagined this state of things would always continue. One day she was sitting in her mother's room, learning her lessons for school, when she felt a hand gently laid on hers.

"Margaret, dear, is not to-morrow to be a holiday?"

"Yes, mamma, and I am learning my lessons for the next day, that I may have nothing to do."

"Will you spend it with me? I do not feel even as well as usual, lately, and would enjoy my little daughter's company. There are many things I wish to talk to you about, and I have long looked forward to this holiday for the purpose."

"Mamma, dear, I will be with you in the evening, but I cannot stay all day, for I have promised to go such a pleasant expedition with the girls. I must be off very early to meet them at the end of the lane; then we are to go in a party to the far field, for a regular daisy gathering; and when tired, we shall sit down and make nice soft balls to throw at each other: it will be great fun."

"And will my daughter not stay one day with her poor sick mother?"

"Oh, yes, mamma! some other time. There is to be another holiday very soon, and to-morrow I will bring home a beautiful bunch of crimson-tipped daisies, which I know you will like."

"I would rather have your company, Margaret, and perhaps next holiday may be too late; but go, dear, as you have set your heart on it. I hope to have you with me in the evening. Do not stay out too long."

"No, mamma," and Margaret felt a little twinge of conscience, as she added, "Do you think you will be very lonely?"

"I dare say not," replied her mother. "Jane (the servant) will be in the house, and I can call her to do anything I require.'

'Margaret could not help observing that she spoke in a weaker and more languid tone than usual, and looked very ill, but tried to banish the thought. 'Mamma is only tired,' she said to herself, returning to her lessons, which were not finished till near bed-time. Then she kissed her mother, and said, 'Good-night, dear mamma. I think I'll not come in before I go in the morning—at so early an hour I'd only disturb you—but I'll be home as soon as possible;' and she ran off to bed, thinking only of the pleasures of the next day.

'The morning was fine, and Margaret awoke early, had her solitary breakfast, and set off in high spirits. The sun shone brightly, and all nature looked gay. How could she think of anything sad? 'What a pity it would have been to stay in the house on so lovely a morning,' was her thought, as she hastened down the pretty green lane, where the hedges were budding, and the birds singing gaily. Then a graver idea seemed to cross her mind, to which she answered, 'There will be many a wet day, when I can sit with mamma, and she does not mind now, she will not be lonely;' and thus endeavouring to lull her conscience, she reached the end of the lane, and met her young companions.

'Margaret,' said one of her friends, 'I was afraid we should not have had you to-day, for my aunt said your mother was looking so ill yesterday, she did not think you could leave her.'

'Oh!' said Margaret, 'she does not mind; I can be with her all the evening;' and so the party set off on their expedition, and a great deal of laughing and fun they had by the way; but, amidst all, a plaintive voice from time to time kept ringing in Margaret's ear: 'Will my little daughter not spend one day with her poor sick mother?' She tried hard to banish the thought, but it would recur to her mind.

'Who are you gathering that pretty bunch of crimson daisies for?' asked her friend.

'For mamma,' replied Margaret; 'she likes wild flowers so much. I have often brought her some when she was ill, and the sight of them refreshed her. She is particularly fond of daisies, because that is the meaning of my name; she often calls me her little Daisy.'

'You are thinking a great deal of your mamma, to-day.'

'I cannot help it; she will come into my mind—I do not know why. But I wish I was at home, for I have not enjoyed myself as much as I expected. The greatest pleasure I have had was collecting this bunch for her.'

'Margaret was silent for some time, during which she was arguing with her conscience.

'Mamma will know I've been thinking of her, when she sees these daisies; and I'll have a great deal to tell her in the evening. She always likes to hear about the pretty places I've seen. I'll talk to her, and amuse her very much, for I have no lessons to learn for to-morrow.'

'Margaret's spirits rose after these comforting reflections, and she soon began to enjoy herself as much as the other children, and forgot her anxieties.

'They did not leave the field where they were playing till pretty late, and had a long way to walk home, so that it was nearly dark when Margaret again reached the end of the lane, where she must part with her young companions.

'How changed everything was since morning! Then the sun had been shining brightly, and the birds singing gaily, and all nature rejoiced; now the gloom of evening cast a sombre hue over every object, and a feeling of sadness—an unaccountable anticipation of evil—came over her spirit.' She walked on as rapidly as possible, still holding in her hand the already drooping bunch of daisies. 'They will revive when mamma puts them in water,' she thought.

'Just then a turning in the lane brought her home in full view; and instinctively she glanced towards her mother's room. What could be the reason that the window-shutters were closed at so early an hour? Perhaps the invalid slept; perhaps she was worse. The house had a desolate appearance; a strange stillness, a solemn silence, seemed to rest over it. Certainly it was evening; but why were the blinds drawn down, the hall door shut, and the servants not going in and out as usual?

'She went to the back door, and finding it open, walked in. No one observed her enter, and she rushed at once to her mother's room. The door was closed, but she pushed it open cautiously. A deeper silence reigned there, an awful stillness, which caused her to hush her very breath, and step stealthily across the floor. She approached the bed, where her mother's form lay motionless, her eyes closed.

'Margaret gazed for a moment at that calm and peaceful countenance, supposing she must be asleep; and so she was, but it was a sleep from which she would never more awake in this world.

'With a cry of anguish, Margaret flung the daisies on the bed, and sank on her knees. 'Oh, mamma—dear mamma! speak but one word; say you forgive me—that you do not think me very unkind.'

'But it was too late! those lips were closed for ever. Oh! how the tender though reproachful words echoed in her heart: 'Will my daughter not spend one day with her poor sick mother?'

'And this was the evening she had promised to devote to her. There lay the daisies she had gathered as a peace offering, a substitute for loving obedience. Alas! all too late.

'It would be vain to attempt to describe poor Margaret's feelings at that time. Many years have passed away since; and she is now a woman, remarkable for the unselfishness which leads her to sacrifice her own pleasure to the gratification of others; yet the memory of her mother never fails to bring back a keen pang of remorse; and she would give worlds to be able to recall that one day of her existence, to devote to her dying parent, instead of daisy-gathering.'

THE LANCET

Saturday, October 3, 1868.

THE TEMPLE CHURCH.

THE TEMPLE CHURCH.

THE PULPIT OF HOOKER AND THE GRAVE OF GOLDSMITH.

ON the 10th of February, in the year 1185, a crowd of citizens, monks, and nobles was gathered on the banks of the Thames, just outside the walls of London, at the head of the slope which rises to the west of the river Fleet. There is a look of earnestness about the assemblage, not at all suggestive of approaching amusement. Even the groups of boys at play, on the outskirts of the meeting, continually pause from their sports, as if looking out for some expected procession. We see that the multitude is gradually closing round a lofty and circular stone pile, surmounted by a cross, and bearing on its walls white banners, having a red cross in the centre of each. Two of the banners especially attract the reverential notice of the gathering throng. One is white, bearing the figure of a lamb carrying a cross; the other displays a series of black stripes on the white ground, with the blood-red cross in the centre. The former is the usual standard of "the militia of Christ," the other is the special war-banner of "the soldiery of the Temple." The name of the striped ensign, "Beausant," has become the war-cry of the Templars, and is well known on the battle-fields of Palestine.

The day has come for the consecration of the church of "the New Temple," and this morning a patriarch of Jerusalem is to dedicate the round and bannered building. The second crusade had just passed, like a huge war-wave, over Europe and into Asia, having failed to break the power of the Mahometans in Syria. A third expedition is projected, and surely Henry II. of England will gladly join in so grand a struggle against Saladin. So reasoned the ecclesiastical politicians in that age, so hoped the Knights Templars, and, therefore, Heraclius, the Patriarch of Jerusalem, had visited England to set before the king the duty and the glory of a third crusade. The patriarch's arguments were, doubtless, logical and weighty, but they failed to move the obstinate Plantagenet. Henry's naughty wife and rebellious sons had given him trouble enough, to say nothing of the flogging at Beckett's tomb; and he might well wish for a little repose at the close of life. Before, however, the disappointed Heraclius left London, he was induced by the English Templars to consecrate their new church, then just finished. Therefore was the crowd gathered; some to gaze on a patriarch, others to witness the procession of the Templars, from their monastery in Holborn to their new home in "the Fleet Street."

The procession was not one of the ordinary ecclesiastical pageants, so common in those times. The multitude regarded "the militia of Christ" as under the oath of the Cross. Their heroism on the battle-fields of Syria had won for the red-cross warriors the immortal crowns of martyrdom. Such were the feelings with which the great majority of the crowd gazed on the procession of the knights in their white mantles; noted the nobles who marched as "companions of the Temple," and struggled to get a near view of Heraclius and Brother Geoffrey, the master of the London Temple. All entered the round church thanting a litany, the consecration was performed, the censors swung, the "holy water" sprinkled, and a dedication feast followed, giving a festal finish to the ceremonials of the day. The structure thus opened was the part now called the "Round," which formed, for about half a century, the church of the London Templars.* A semicircular moulding over the entrance contained an inscription of seven lines, which narrated all the particulars of the consecration. This appropriate memorial is no longer seen, having been broken by workmen during the repairs in 1695. The remainder of the church, now forming the body of the building, was subsequently erected and consecrated about the year 1240, on which occasion Henry III. and his gorgeous Court took a part in the proceedings.

Shall we pause here to remind our readers that the Templars formed in the year 1118 only a small brotherhood of nine French knights, who then organised a "society" for protecting and aiding pilgrims in Jerusalem? The influence of the new order spread so rapidly, that in the year 1244 the number of estates belonging to the brotherhood was estimated at 9,000, and the annual revenue in 1311 has been reckoned at £6,000,000. Even the most cynical will admit that this was something like "getting on in the world." Of course, the knights endured many hard knocks in return for this prosperity, and were both dreaded and hated by the warriors of Islam. The method of "purification" adopted by Saladin when he recovered Jerusalem, in 1187, illustrates the intensity of Mahometan feeling. The Sultan sent to Damascus for five camels' loads of rose-water, with which the late houses of the knights were carefully washed in every part. Whether the housemaids of the Templars were slovens, or Saladin's tastes peculiar, may be matter of debate.

The two parts of the Temple Church, though differing in age only about half a century, are very distinct in style. The "Round" is semi-Norman, consisting of two circles, the whole surmounted by a tower resting on six pillars of Purbeck marble. The singular countenances sculptured on the walls should be studied by those who wish to gain some insight into the spirit of the old church architects.

The porch will repay the notice of all who can use their eyes wisely. The foliated capitals, lozenges, roses, the human forms with scrolls in hand, and the beautiful ribs of the arches, present a combination of elegant simplicity with quaint device.

The eight marble pillars of the Early English nave support an elaborately-painted roof. The floor is covered with richly-embazoned tiles; those on the south side bearing the winged horse, now the arms of the Inner Temple; while on the opposite side the lamb and cross denote the part of the church appropriated to the Middle Temple. The latter symbol was originally borne by the whole body of Templars, but about the year 1563 the classical, or mythological, or poetical tastes of the Inner Temple induced the Benchers to displace the lamb and adopt Pegasus. The winged horse will now probably keep his place in one-half of the Temple Church, while the lamb reigns in the other.

* Three other "round churches" are in England, formerly belonging to the Templars: one at Cambridge, another at Northampton, and a third at Little Maplestead.

The church should be seen from the west end of the "Round," from the east end of the nave, and from different parts of the triforium. In ascending the stairs to the latter, the visitor will, of course, step into the penitential cell, from which offending knights, under punishment, could see and hear the service in the church below.

Imagination may picture many a strange scene in the Temple Church, from the hour when the patriarch sprinkled the "holy water" on the pillars, to the day when the knights took the last view of their sanctuary in 1311. Even the reception of a new member must have been peculiarly impressive, performed as it was in the dead of night, with the blood-red crosses reflecting the gleam of many tapers, and the tones of the Templar's vow alone breaking the deep silence. Often has the Chapter met here, to listen, with breathless interest, to an almost obliterated despatch from Palestine, telling of Jerusalem lost or won; of brilliant victories, or terrible defeats. The church, too, was the place where penances of the lighter kind were inflicted. Think of a church turned into a whipping-room! yet in this "Round" many an erring novice or knight has received the lash, soundly laid on by some more righteous brother. To make the proceeding more pleasant, or more impressive, the time selected was often a Sunday morning.

How did the Temple and its church pass from the knights to the lawyers? About the beginning of the fourteenth century, Philip IV. of France stirred up the enemies of the Templars to accuse them, not only of heresy but of blasphemy, and of the most improbable crimes. Some not only charged the knights with trampling on the cross; but with adoring the image of a cat! Nothing like sensational lies for the superstitious; the wild story was believed by many, Edward II. of England joined in the outcry, hoping to share the plunder, and in the year 1312 the Pope was terrified into suppressing the order. Many of the vast estates went to the rival order, the Knights Hospitallers; but the London Temple, after passing through many hands, was granted by Edward III. to the professors of English law. Thus the sword of the knight yielded to the robe of the advocate, and through all succeeding ages the Inner and Middle Temples have been the colleges and homes of English lawyers.

The church has had one or two narrow escapes from destruction. Wat Tyler's mob hated peas, ink, and paper as ruinous to a state, and therefore heartily abhorred the lawyers. "The poor fools" set fire to a part of the Temple in June, 1381, destroyed parchments and books, but did not burn the church, being probably somewhat fatigued with the destruction of the adjoining Savoy Palace, and perhaps a little frightened by the murder of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Still more imminent was the peril of the ancient pile when the great fire of London swept through the Temple, stopping close to the church walls. But, though the building escaped the flames, it could not stay the deforming hands of a low and uncultivated taste. The rich devices of the ancient roof were, in the sixteenth and following centuries, covered with whitewash! The marble pillars and walls were treated in the same artistic manner, and as the unfortunate walls looked rather cold after the whitewashing, they were nicely covered up with wainscoting to the height of eight feet. The tessellated floor was carefully hidden beneath two hundred cart-loads of earth, over which lay vulgar slabs of common gravestones. The ancient "Round" was separated from the nave by a cozy screen and organ gallery. Was not all this thoroughly orthodox and comfortable? But what restored the church to its pristine beauty? Simply better education and a purer taste. The Inner and Middle Temples expended upwards of £70,000 in removing the defacements of ignorance and remedying the decays of time. The year 1868 shows the pile substantially as it stood when Henry III. and his nobles attended the consecration of the nave.

The names of Hooker and Goldsmith are too closely connected with the Temple Church, to be entirely passed over. Hooker preached from this pulpit the principles afterwards enforced in his great work, the "Ecclesiastical Polity;" and Goldsmith found a grave under the shadow of the church wall. Our space will admit of a few remarks only on each.

Most readers know that Mr. Richard Hooker was born at Heavitree, Exeter, in 1553, educated in the newly-founded college of Corpus Christi, Oxford, where his rooms are still shown; and that he was chosen master of the Temple in 1585. Few are ignorant that he resigned this office in 1591, to find more leisure for completing the "Ecclesiastical Polity," in the rectory of Boscum, near Salisbury. The first four books of the work were published in 1594, and in the next year Hooker left Boscum for Bishop's Bourne, near Canterbury, where he died, and was buried in the year 1600.

Hooker is now known only by his once famous "Ecclesiastical Polity." What is the book about? some may courageously ask. It is simply a moderate and learned defence of the Church of England, written by a man who could free his understanding from extreme views, and treated the most violent opponents with courtesy and even gentleness. His words will best illustrate his character: "Three words spoken in meekness and charity will have a more blessed reward than three thousand volumes writ with disdainful sharpness of wit."

This calm balance of judgment and noble placidity, have won for Hooker the enduring title of "the judicious." What connection has the "Polity" with the Temple Church? The reader will remember that Hooker preached in the morning to the Templars, but the afternoon lecturer was Mr. Walter Travers, Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and chaplain to Lord Burghley. Now Mr. Travers objected to bishops, liturgies, and surplices; so it fell out that the morning sermons pointed to Canterbury, and the afternoon to Geneva.

Archbishop Whitgift thought to hush the dispute by taking the preaching licence from Mr. Travers; but this made matters worse. The storm waxed louder and louder; Hooker, not being able to prepare his full argument in such a tempest, resigned his mastership and retired to Boscum. We very much fear, however, that even here the "Polity" was not always composed in a sublime calm. The divine had a wife; she possessed a waspish temper, and thought little of ordering Richard to rock the cradle, when the servant was busy. The dear, good, and too easy man would sometimes obey, jogging the cradle with his foot, while his hand drove the pen. There's a contrast! Hooker in the Temple pulpit, and Hooker rocking the cradle. Thus the morning sermons in the Temple Church, between the years 1585 and 1591, may be regarded as the rough drafts of the "Ecclesiastical Polity."

We do not expect that in these times, when books march forth by legions, we shall induce many readers to study this once famous work. The man of taste will still be struck with the beauty and majesty of passages in the first book, though the topics of modern controversy, and new modes of treatment, may tend to keep Hooker's work to the libraries of students. The principles laid down in the "Polity" are, however, applicable to some of the most exciting ecclesiastical disputes of the present day. As the Temple Church may be deemed the birthplace of a great work in English literature, it is to be regretted that the bust of Hooker in the church is the only visible memento of one whose name was formerly as famous in the Vatican as in London. Hare Court, with Johnson's and Goldsmith's Buildings, remind us of a lawyer, a man of letters, and a poet; but the visitor looks in vain for the name of Hooker on some of the many vantage spaces near the church.

From the author of the "Ecclesiastical Polity" to the writer of "The Vicar of Wakefield" is a long stride. The words, "Oliver Goldsmith," may be read on a large gravestone on the north side of the church, and Goldsmith's Buildings, close by, remind all of the strange man of genius, who ranked as the friend, pet, and butt of Johnson. Why was the poet buried here? He resided towards the close of life in the Temple, and became known to many who pitied his follies while they respected his kindliness and genius. The poet's last home was at No. 2, Brick Court, Middle Temple, his chambers being immediately over those of Mr. Blackstone, then a student, afterwards judge, and author of the famous "Commentaries on the Laws of England." The spring sun of 1774 was beginning to shine brightly on the dial in Brick Court, when a slow fever, partly produced by ceaseless anxiety, was rapidly wearing out the life of Goldsmith. On the 4th of April in that year men saw the windows of his room closed, and knew that the author of "The Deserted Village" was dead, at the age of forty-five. If many blamed his want of purpose, his undue love of ease, his vanity and little self-control, yet all appreciated the wide sympathy and simplicity, like that of a child, which marked his character. Few may agree with Crabbe's estimate, that "Never mortal left this world of sin More like the infant that he entered in,"

but many will admit that the associate of Johnson, Burke, and Reynolds must have combined moral qualities with surprising genius.

Thus the Temple Church brings before us the enthusiasm of ancient knighthood, the majesty of law superseding the power of the sword, the vestment and ritual disputes of the sixteenth century, and the peculiar struggles of a man of genius.

JACOB AND ESAU:

TYPES OF THE SPIRITUAL AND CARNAL MAN.

LOOKING at the story of Jacob and Esau, in the matter of the birthright and the blessing (Gen. xxv. 29—34; xxvii. 30—35), from a human standpoint, we cannot feel pleased with the conduct of the former. How unlike a brother to ask for anything in return for a mere "mess of pottage" to satisfy the biting cravings of hunger. And to ask for the birthright! What profound selfishness! And to ask for it at such a time! Here is something like Satan's asking the Messiah to change stones into bread when he was "an hungered" after his fast of forty days—conduct displaying a most ungenerous and cunning craftiness.

Then, in the case of the blessing, though he knew he would be doing wrong, he yielded to his mother's persuasion, and carried out her deceitful scheme. Here is a wilful sin deliberately committed against the warning voice of an unwilling conscience. And worse still—he openly lied to his blind father Isaac. Deaf to the additional warning given him by the recognition of his voice by his father—"the voice is Jacob's voice; art thou my very son Esau?"—he persisted in affirming that he was his eldest son Esau.

We have thus in Jacob's character the following catalogue of faults: selfishness; unloving and unlovely craftiness and deceitfulness; despising of conscience; untruth. From this point of view, therefore, we should conclude that he was anything but a good man.

Viewed from the same ground, Esau stands out well. A simple-minded, open-hearted young man; free as the air, "a cunning hunter, a man of the field;" his father's pride, for whom he delighted "to take venison" with his "weapons—quiver and bow."

We feel for him in his distress. We pity him, as with a loud wail he cries out, "Bless me, even me also, O my father."

The sympathies of the natural heart reverse the Divine decree, "Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated" (Rom. ix. 13.; Mal. i. 1, 2).

But let us look at the two men from a new standpoint—as they stand in relation to God and God's plans. Esau's mind and heart are "set on things on the earth." The world, the temporal, are all he concerns himself about. He is "of the earth, earthy." Let him enjoy his sport, feed and clothe him, and he is content. Man, as made "in the image of God;" man, as a spiritual being capable of holding communion with the heavenly and the divine; man, as intended by God for a higher and nobler stage of existence than the present, is a being totally unknown to, undreamt of, by Esau. All divine and spiritual things were far above his thoughts and affections. He walked by sight, not by faith. As the eldest son, he must have known that, after his father's death, the conduct of Divine worship would devolve upon him; that he should be, as it were, the priest of the family; and that, as such, it would be his duty and privilege to direct men's thoughts to the great promise, which separated the seed of Abraham from and elevated it above all other races of men—the promise that was made to Abraham after that mysterious transaction, the sacrifice of Isaac, on Mount Moriah—viz., "In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed" (Gen. xxii. 18). Though he could not have been a stranger to this, he never entered into the inner meaning of it. He could not by a spiritual gaze through the vista of ages discern the "form of the Son of Man"—the blessing of the nations. He did not, like Abraham, "see the day of Christ." It never struck him that God might intend him to be a link in the chain which was to end in the "desire of all nations"—Jesus Christ.

He was too gross, too material, to receive and to respond to God's call. He had no soil in which God's gifts might grow, and from which they might be dispensed to others. A man who lived in and for the present, as having nothing to do with the ages to come—such was Esau, and so he "sold his birthright." The very thing which he ought to have valued most, as linking him to the Eternal and the Divine, this "he despised." No wonder St. Paul should call him a "profane person." No wonder God rejected and hated him.

Of what use was such a man to carry out God's plan for the education and salvation of the world? The "blessing" would have been useless in his hands; nay, he would ere long have sold it as he did his birthright.

But, as it always happens, when a man despises one of God's gifts, and deliberately sets it aside, he loses another which he would fain retain. God's gifts to the soul are sister graces; and if one is wilfully parted with, the others will depart whether we will or no.

Esau sold his birthright. He lost the blessing. Vain his tears, vain his bitter cry; the sister grace—blessing—followed the birthright which he had so profanely sold. They now dwelt with a man who would value them. Value them. Herein lies the difference between the two men. Jacob could enter into God's plans. He would try to understand the mind of God; what he purposed to do, what he wished him to do, in order to bring about the fulfilment of the promise: "In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." Jacob was a spiritual man; a man of faith, a man of the future. He looked upwards and forwards, and taught others to do the same. God might trust such a man with a revelation. He had a spirit to converse with God, a mind to lay hold of his promises, a heart to love him for his holiness and his love, a will strong to execute his commands at all cost. The very selfishness and deceit which he showed in obtaining the birthright and the blessing, were a proof of the great value which he set upon them. He reminds us of the Great Teacher's words: "Be wise as serpents." "The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force" (Matt. xi. 12).

These blessings brought him into an intimate relationship with God. Is it to be wondered at, that when he found his brother's dulness of appreciation, he should covet his privileges? Nay, knowing as we do that his mother, whose favourite son he was, had been told by God that "the elder should serve the younger," and that she would, as a matter of course, hint at this to him, does it not seem to us that he was almost morally bound to endeavour to rescue them from his brother's profane indifference and contempt?

Without doubt, Jacob is the true heir to the promise; the man for God to employ to carry out his plans; the man to be the ancestor of the Messiah. It is God's "— righteous doom, that meek, true-hearted Love

The everlasting birthright should receive;
Isaac's fond blessing may not fall on scorn."

But it might be objected: "Then God approves of our doing evil that good may come." It is quite true that, in the matter before us, God so controlled events that they ended in the good of the world: but it is not true that God approved of Jacob's mode of obtaining the birthright and the blessing. It was radically wrong for the man of faith to employ the method of the man who walks by sight; for the spiritual man to use "carnal weapons" in a spiritual cause. And his after-life would seem to show that he was made to feel that he had acted wrongly. No sooner is the blessing secured, than his troubles begin. Henceforth his life is full of sorrow, suffering, and unrest. Deceived, persecuted, bowed down with grief at his sons' crimes, his daughter's shame, the loss of his wives, and the long absence of Joseph, he wails out a bitter confession before the King of Egypt: "Few and evil have the days of the years of my life been."

Consciously or unconsciously, he confirmed the truth of that great moral law: "Be sure your sin will find you out." "Verily there is a God that judgeth the earth."

But on the whole, Jacob's heart was right with God; and God was with him. Who can forget the ladder, and the angels, and the God of Bethel? "The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him."

Who can forget Jacob's return from Padan-aram, when he was met by angels; and when, after a whole night's wrestling with that mysterious "Man," he obtained a blessing, and the new name of Israel—Prince with God? Jacob was one of God's heroes; a pattern worthy of men's attentive study and imitation. In his sufferings, he is indeed a warning to us, never to do even the slightest wrong to secure the greatest good. But the chief lesson of his life is, the pre-eminence of a spiritual and religious mind; a mind which "seeks first the kingdom of God and his righteousness;" sets heaven above earth; God before man; the eternal before the temporal.

A WORD UPON BEING LAZY.

BY THE REV. W. M. STATHAM.

WHAT a picture Solomon gives us of the neglected farm of a Hebrew householder! All the historical associations of the scene are thoroughly Eastern. In the beautiful early light of morning, the wise man goes by the home of the slothful. There, in the curtained chamber, is the dull, leaden sleeper, turning from side to side, his life wasted in repose, his senses soddened with sleep. The sun is shining, the birds are singing, the great world is awake and active in its many forms of duty, and he, condemned by the very beasts, which know their time of rising and resting, still, in densest idleness, slumbers on. While he sleeps, however, we can take a look at the ravelled curtains of his window above, and can peep through the broken wall! We see the nettles uprising between the chinks in the yard pavement, the stone crumbling in decay, the vine dragging on the ground, and a tangled mass of weeds and thorns covering the ruinous enclosure. There is, it will be noticed, in this picture of Solomon's, another form stalking along to the dismal dwelling-place—viz., rude, gaunt, hollow-eyed Want, nearing, by steady but sure degrees, the scene. "Poverty cometh as one that travelleth."

Laziness has done it all. We might, indeed, look for ripening clusters of grapes, and, above all, for waving fields of grain; for all the world over man lives by bread, and accordingly, the corn of wheat is adapted to every climate and to every soil.

The field or vineyard needed, as we say, hedging or fencing, for Eastern grapes grow somewhat like our English hops; neglected, they are quickly trodden under foot alike of man and beast. A fenceless vineyard soon becomes a scene of dilapidation and disgrace, instead of a picture of plenty and beauty. So man makes or mars his lot; so the diligent hand maketh rich, and the lazy sleeper loseth even bread. Thus, while the sluggard is indulging in his sloth, an inspired etching has been taken of the scene while he slumbers, that we may learn from a faithful picture taken through the gap of a broken wall.

Will it be too much to suggest that laziness is no uncommon sin? Not that industry, in and of itself, is a virtue. There is much earnestness misdirected, and much arduous effort directed to that which is positively evil. Love to Christ ought to be the motive of all labour; so that, whether we eat or drink, get or give, we may do all to the glory of God. But if industry by and of itself is no virtue, laziness is unquestionably a vice. We are apt to criticise rather severely Eastern habits and customs, and to speak of the Turk reclining upon his ottoman as the symbol of a laziness which does not belong to us. I question, however, despite these criticisms on Asiatics and Turks, if laziness is not one of the great vices of our land. "What!" you say, "consider this busy, enterprising, active age; this age so full of discoveries in science and applications of those discoveries in practical ways; this age of eager competition and energetic hasting to be rich!" Yes, sloth is to be seen all around us in Britain, and that in many of its worst forms. How many fail in life from want of persevering effort, and hang on to anybody who will help to hold them up; men who start well, and, in a year or two, take to morning "refreshers," and to the shifting of hard duties on others. It was told me the other day by a settler that, in his country, every man tries as soon as may be to become a "boss"—a very peculiar title for master. That the settler may lean over the fence and look on whilst others do the handiwork, is not, however, equivalent to laziness; for he would have to use his brain, and probably find an experience of the fact that worry is harder than work.

No greater mistake can be made than that of those who constantly speak of the working classes as though handicraft was the hardest work. Brain work against back work, say I, for hardness, all the world over. Nor can any thoughtful observer doubt that laziness is the sin of all classes, and certainly of the poor as well as the rich. Most of the misery of the poor in all parishes comes from pure sloth. Some people smile at the Eastern picture of the women carrying the water-pots and other heavy burdens, but it is manifestly true in many cases amongst the poor that the fathers spend their money in drink and their evenings in idleness, leaving the women-folk the hard work of home. Think of the hundreds of thousands of men who, in our great cities alone, spend their hours when off duty in the alehouse, when they might be recreating their minds by some new form of activity, or easing home-burdens by lending a helping hand in some household cares and duties. All that dense drugging of the brain, all that lolling about of the body, induces sensual sloth, till human life becomes scarcely more than an animal existence. What are nine hours out of the day spent in work (and I hope no one looking at a London bricklayer, for instance, will call that exhausting labour), while the rest of the time apart from sleep is given over to mere lazy indulgence? Any one can see the relation of all this to religion. What chance has the Gospel when Sunday finds the home untidy, the garments unready, and the whole surroundings unhealthy?

The amount which the people spend in unnecessary indulgences is sufficient to feed, clothe, and educate the whole mass of the needy. With a population like ours, well provided with spheres of toil, there need be little want, were it not for this awful and amazing sloth. Sloth, then, is a sin, and not an uncommon sin—a sin of the rich and of the poor, a sin by which the higher nature becomes deadened, and the resources which God has surrounded us with, perverted and wasted.

Laziness is always a growing and deepening evil. It creeps over us like the lichen on the tree-trunk, like the ivy on the oak. It leads, in the end, to the loss of character and of reputation. We sleep in the lap of Delilah, and then our locks are shorn off. Those who do little work, come in a very brief time to do still less; whilst any one who knows anything of men must see that, if you want a thing done well, you must get it done by those who have already their hands pretty full. They economise time, order their arrangements, and husband their energies. It is not physical weakness that we suffer from, so much as physical perversion; we load the senses with chains. The lazy are always in a difficulty, whatever you may do for them. They lose the start. They are always shovelling away at the Augean stable of neglected duty, but can never clear their work. Moreover, they stand directly in the way of their own advancement; they neglect that work in the course of daily duty which is the best preparation for opportunities to come. As Ruskin suggests, it is not that there are too many efficient men waiting for places, but places are ever waiting for efficient men. Laziness sees the tide come up which only rises once or twice in a lifetime, and, instead of taking it at the flood, only mourns that the boat wants caulking and fitting to be ready for sea.

Laziness is not only an immoral, it is an un-Christian thing. We all of us ought to redeem the time. Our little day will soon be over. Ploughs of duty are all ready for us to put our hand to. The spade is ready for us to dig some channel for the living waters of the Gospel to flow in to other hearts and homes. Surely we ought to remember that we are "not our own;" that to be lazy beneath the motive power of the Cross is the worst infidelity to Christ. We know what the great Lord of the harvest thinks of the slothful servant; he has left us in no manner of doubt concerning that. Nor can we miss the lesson of his own divinely active life. In him mercy found, not only the fountain in which it springs, but the active channel through which it flows. He went about doing good. "I must be about my Father's business" was an utterance which breathed the whole spirit of his life. There ought to be in us all that Bishop Hall calls a "fulfilling our course;" not like Hezekiah's sun, which went backwards, nor like Joshua's sun, which stood still, but like David's sun, which "rejoiced as a giant to run a race."

Laziness is a dangerous and infectious thing. It tells on others. Let fathers and mothers look to this. Precept is of no use without practice. If our children are to be energetic, earnest, and successful—and what parent is there worthy of the name who does not wish to see his children occupying a higher position than he does himself?—then let them see that our ideas of providence are not puerile ones about sitting still and waiting, but rather of getting up and working. Let them see that we are alive to duty, and alive to duty for Christ. Carlyle says, "Think of living. It is no idle dream—it is thine own—it is all thou hast to front eternity with. Work, then, like a star, unobscured, yet unobtrusive." Yes! laziness soon affects our children, our neighbours, and our friends; and so does activity. How soon children catch the infectious influence of work, and love to have their little hand in it! What a crime it will be to let lazy, sluggish habits on our part affect their future history!

Laziness is often created by difficulties and disheartenings. We are in danger of giving up because of trials. The child begins to stitch the canvas better than she finishes it; the artist tires; the student's attention wearies. We go cheerily to the battle; but the conflict and the crowd dishearten us! As it is in the world, so it is in religion. After all, we are so often discovering the evils of our own heart—so often cast down in the most earnest conflict, that we by degrees become slack in well-doing. "Ye did run well; what doth hinder?" Some difficult irregular verb stops the boy in his Greek, and he begins to copy from the next form boy—and so loses his progress and his power. So some spiritual difficulty affects us. We give way to a fit of passion or a fit of temper, and we say, "Alas! it is of no use trying." So laziness creeps over our best endeavours after the divine life; and we ask and receive not, because we ask idly and amiss.

Laziness has many masks of virtue. We are sure to be deceived by every sin if we listen to it. "Oh," says the deceitful heart, "take care of the danger of over-zeal." "Oh," says the proverb, "too much haste overshoots the mark." "Oh," says the fair Prudence, "take care of the brain." But has not a recent physician told us that softening of the brain oftener comes from laziness than labour? At times we are tempted to think that the philosophy of "let be" is more in harmony with beautiful ideas of Providence than the philosophy of doing the best you can. In this case the Bible can answer for itself, and we need not doubt what the issue will be; for there are hundreds of texts enjoining diligence in all matters—social, civil, and religious.

Slothfulness casteth into a deep sleep, and the sooner we are aroused from the first nap the better, especially as we are in a world where all around us there are calls to work, and to work while it is called to-day. The Christian cannot slumber on without forfeiting one of the foremost resemblances which he should bear to the great Master. It was his meat and his drink to do his Father's will. "I must work the works of Him that sent me, while it is day." Work, hard and earnest work, is the lot of all Christ's disciples. By this I do not mean the outward show and seeming of work, but self-sacrificing spiritual consecration to Christ's great cause, in whatever sphere God's providence may have placed us.

Laziness grows on people till even to tie a shoe-string becomes a toil. Some people have had, in the after-time of some great tribulations, to thank God for renewed calls to duty heard through the bugle-notes of necessity. They had fallen into a sleep of self-indulgence, from which sharp battles with the world aroused them. And it may be that, in the great spiritual fold of the Church, hard battles with superstition, scepticism, and sin still await us, which, by their very intensity of strife, will arouse from their torpor those who cannot watch with Christ one hour, and whom the blessed Master always finds sleeping.

(Drawn by F. M. WIMPERIS.)

"Read me the lines that lie
Along that sunset sky."—p. 874.

A REVERIE.

READ me the lines that lie
 Along that sunset sky,
 O Thought! its living characters unfold.
 Tell me the wondrous things
 Trac'd, as with angels' wings,
 Across that broad, far-stretching scroll of gold.

Show me their meaning deep!
 Unlock, as from a sleep,
 The sacred tomes—the book that few can read.
 We read, but not aright:
 Scarce flasheth on our sight
 The untold Love that fain would fill our need.

What, though the ash-trees spread
 Their canopies o'erhead,
 And raise their draperied arms to screen the sky—
 By contrast they are dark!
 The eye would only mark
 Those sunset clouds, suggesting musings high.

Here, like the chequer'd Past,
 Twin'd, lacing branches cast
 Their curious shadows o'er our path the while.
 And soft the sunset falls
 On gray and crumbling walls,
 More lovely 'neath Time's frown than 'neath his smile.

Ah me! when friends depart,
 Not all at once the heart
 Recovers from its inner shock and strain
 To seek out new: but lo!
 Should they around it flow,
 Love is not new—it is the old again!

The power, from darkness brought,
 That flashes thought for thought,
 And speeds the ship across the stormy deep
 With swiftly-ploughing keel,
 And turns blind Fortune's wheel,
 Is not new-born, but wak'd from ages' sleep.

Ah me! who leaveth not
 The dear old haunted spot—
 The clump of trees—the wayside hut or stone—
 With sadder, fonder heart
 Than ever he will part,
 In after-years, from beauty newly known?

The clear blue hills that rise
 Sheer up to childhood's skies—
 The village church-bell—faces of old times—
 Say, loves not life to keep Their memories far more deep
 Than classic lay, or stately minster's chimes?

The sunset glory fades—
 The calm grey night's deep shades
 O'er earth their mantle solemnly have cast—
 But o'er its ancient track
 The light shall struggle back,
 And dawn shall blush again when night is past.

Lighten our darkness, Lord!
 Deliverance accord
 From perils and all dangers of this night.
 And when Death's night is past,
 Oh! bid us wake at last
 With Thee, for His dear sake whose love is light!

A. B.

A BRAVE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DEEPDALE VICARAGE," "MARK WARREN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER LXV.

ONE MORE VICTIM, AND THE LAST.

HARLEY had gone to bed, and Harold sat reading in his little parlour. It was a dark night, and rainy, and the doors were fastened. No visitors were likely to come at that hour. All at once, a knocking was heard. Then the bolt was withdrawn, and there glided into Harold's presence, Lady Sylvester!

He got up surprised, and a little alarmed. She went up to him; she, who had scarce deigned to breathe the air he breathed, laid her hand upon his arm.

"You must come with me," she cried, in a half-suffocated tone. "Alice is dying!"

"Dying!"

He did not realise the force of the expression, though it stunned him.

"Yes; come! come!" she repeated, with a wildness that terrified him. "See, I implore you!" for she fancied that he hesitated, and she did not understand, in the least, the nature of Harold Blake. "I, who have never knelt to any one, kneel to you, and beseech of you to come!"

He raised her gently. She had sunk on her knees before him. He was more affected than he had ever been in his life.

"Dear Lady Sylvester," he said, scarce able to speak for agitation, "I will go with you."

He raised her, but she sank again, and knelt, her head bowed to the earth. She might have been praying, and I think she was.

He left her there, a moment, while he made a few hurried arrangements. When they were completed, he went back to her. She was still kneeling, where he had left her. She was uttering suppressed ejaculations. She was saying, "God be merciful to me a sinner!" He spoke to her, in that soothing tone that was habitual to Harold Blake. She got up hastily, and drew her shawl round her. He took her hand, and led her to the hired carriage that stood at the door. She leaned on him, as if for support. Yes; on him, Harold Blake!

During the ride, she sat with clasped hands, and uttered not a word, if we except once, when she bowed down her head, and covered her face. Again I think she was praying!

Let her pray; let the hard heart dissolve in grief and penitence. The sins of a lifetime have been visited on her head to-day!

He did not try to speak to her. His own heart was rent with a mighty sorrow. But there was, unconsciously, a kind of link established between these two, who had been so long apart. From time to time, he gave her a look of sympathy, and she did not resent it. When the carriage stopped, she took his arm, and leaned on him; nay, she almost clung to him. Who was the strong one now, and who was the weak?

They alighted at the Grange. How silent and solemn it was! No one was there to meet them. Only a twinkling light shone in one solitary window. It was the window of Alice's room.

When a nature fortified by iron resolution and indomitable pride once begins to succumb, there is danger of prostration. Lady Sylvester had almost reached that point, as she entered the Grange. She was exhausted by mere physical fatigue. If hope be withdrawn she will fail; and hope is but catching at a straw.

Oh, to bring back but one fraction of the dread, irrevocable past!—one solitary fragment to stand between her and this overwhelming sorrow. On it she would build a new life; carry out new purposes. Ah! were it not too late.

She knew what she had done. Conscience had been ringing the changes in her ears all through the solitary day. She had killed her daughter!

Were there not victims enough, it asked, to the great Sylvester dignity, that she need let this one perish? Who was she, it demanded—a worm of the earth—a poor fallen child of Adam, the inheritor of sin and death, that she should be thus exalted? Let her lie low in the dust. Let the proud head be bowed, the lofty looks be humbled.

This is a sorrow that a lifetime cannot heal; a desolation too vast to be repaired. The whole dynasty of Sylvesters cannot atone for this.

But there was hope, she thought. Love is stronger than death; and these two had loved. Oh, let love do its utmost to recall the fluttering spirit back. Let him speak to her—when she hears him she will revive.

He did speak. He bent over her, and took the white hand in his. He said he was come to carry her away from here. He whispered again of home, security, and peace.

She heard him, and the eyelids quivered, and the hand gave a feeble pressure. But she could do no more. There came, even while they gazed at her—these two united in the bonds of a common sorrow—there came the final struggle. The tender heart that had been so racked for others' woes, ceased gradually to beat; the gentle spirit winged its way to a better and happier land.

Yes, even while they looked at her, she died!

CHAPTER LXVI.

JOHN HUMPHREYS FINDS HIS WAY HOME.

WHEN John Humphreys had finished his prayer, he rose, and looked about him like a man who is not quite decided what course to adopt. His mind felt calm and composed, a kind of peace long unknown to him had stolen into his heart; oil had been poured on the troubled waters.

In this calmness and stillness certain inward convictions were heard to speak; a voice seemed to say, "This is the way, walk ye in it."

He began to feel assured what he ought to do; all doubt and hesitation vanished. He ought to return home. He thought of home, and wife, and all the ties that had once been so precious, and wept as he thought of them. But his tears were not now those of weakness; he was strong. No matter what he might meet with on his return, his resolution was fixed; he had acted out a timid and sinful policy, and God had punished him. Now he would look his trouble in the face, and meet it like a man. Far better for him, had he done so from the first.

His resolve was quickly carried into action; there was no object in going back to Northwold, save just to say farewell to the woman who had been kind to him; this done, he would set off at once for Newbury.

How to get there he hardly knew. He had no money, he had sold, not pawned, his watch, and it could not be available a second time. A vista of weary miles rose up, between him and Rachel. Well, be it so! That Divine Power, which had saved him from destruction, and planted these better feelings within him, would surely sustain him to the end.

Good Mrs. Potts was watching for him at the door of her house; she had a kind of inkling as to what her husband had been about.

"So you've got work; well, I thought as much," she began to say, for the lodger's face was more cheerful than it had been this long time.

"No, I haven't," said John Humphreys, smiling.

"Ah, well, never mind!" She was a little disappointed, too, and she heard Jacob's hammer stop, as if he were listening.

"I haven't," continued John, still briskly, "and what's more, I don't mean to try for any, in these parts. The fact is, I'm going home!"

The words bounded from his mouth almost before he was aware.

"Home!" and a fulness of womanly sympathy and interest flushed into her face, and she sunk her voice to a whisper: "then you've got a wife."

John's eyes glistened, but he did not speak.

"Ah, I see! I see! Poor thing!"

This expression referring exclusively to Rachel.

He put out his hand and shook hers cordially.

"God bless you!" said he, in a smothered voice.

"Thank you, and I hope he'll forgive you," replied Mary Potts.

She thought he had deserted his wife, and was going back to her. In fact, a touching little history unfolded itself to the imagination of Mrs. Potts.

When the leave-taking was over, and it did not last long, John Humphreys set out on his journey. The days were gone by when he could whisk along the country at his ease, without care or thought for the future. Quite a different state of things had to be encountered now; if ever he reached home at all, it must be on foot.

He began slowly to drift towards Newbury; slowly, because his actual necessities had to be supplied; not by begging—he would never stoop to that, but by obtaining chance bits of employment on the way. When employment was not to be had, he suffered positive hunger.

Still, with all his hindrances and privations, he gradually approached his journey's end. And then, how did his heart begin to palpitate, with a variety of emotions, as he thought of Rachel!

He was very weary. He was so travel-stained, so haggard, so foot-sore, that no one would have recognised him as the spruce, light-hearted John Humphreys of other days.

He crept painfully into the town, under shelter of the evening shadows. He had got back to Newbury, but what then?

He had no one to thank but himself that he was returning thus. His own cowardice, his own impatience, too, had done the mischief. And how did he know what the extent of the mischief might be? How did he know, whether he should find Rachel? A great trembling seized him at the thought: Rachel—deserted, abandoned to all the tortures of suspense—might have sunk under her troubles—might have died! Yes, he might find his home desolate!

He had turned his steps towards his mother's house. He felt, instinctively, that this would be Rachel's refuge. As he walked up the street, his limbs shook beneath him. Once or twice, he stopped and leaned against the wall. At such moments he would look earnestly upwards, and clasp his hands together. He was praying that he might find Rachel!

See, there is a twinkling light in the window—a light that seems put there to guide him home. He hurries towards it, and then again he stops. That sickening dread is at his heart!

The blind was not down, nor the curtains closed.

He approached, still trembling, and looked into the room. A solitary woman sat by the fire. She was in deep mourning, and her face was buried in her hands.

For a moment, he thought he should have fallen, and the solid earth seemed to reel. Then, he composed himself, and looked again.

Yes, it was Rachel. Rachel, but how changed! How furrowed, how worn, the face that is lifted up! How sad, how solitary she is! What a wreck he has made her! Yet, thank God, it is Rachel!

He never knew, with any exactness, what happened during the next few moments; but he was in the house, and Rachel was in his arms!

At first she cried out with a kind of terror. She did not know him, in that uncertain light, and her nerves were sadly shaken; but when he spoke, oh! then came a gush of joy to the desolate heart—then came a sense of security, of gladness, of freedom! No matter how changed he was, how fallen, how like an outcast—a vagabond; no matter anything, so she could hold him in her arms, and feel assured that he had come back.

When he asked her to forgive him, when he told her of his deep penitence and sorrow, she did not answer except by tears. She had drawn the poor, tired head on to her kind bosom. She had made him feel, from the first, that whoever might reproach him, she would not. Very sweet were these few blissful moments of reunion!

But after a time, he roused himself. He knew what he had to do. There was a fearful question in his eyes. The old haunting terror came back. She saw it, and she smiled.

"Dear John, you need not think of that," she said, tenderly. And then she told him how mercifully Providence had dealt with them both, and how all his suspense and separation might have been spared. And as she said it, she wept for joy, and so did he. And he knelt down, and in the fulness of his heart returned thanks to God.

With that burden removed, how clear, how easy seemed the path before him! How he would strain every nerve to redeem the past!

There was another question that it would be more difficult to answer.

Every now and then he had glanced round with a look of expectation. He had stopped to listen for some familiar footstep. It had been on his lips to say, "Where is my mother?"

Now he did say it, and a little impatiently. He wondered she did not come. And as Rachel hesitated, he got up, repeating the words, "Where is my mother?"

Then, all at once he guessed it—all at once the expression of Rachel's face, her black dress, her solitary condition, her silence, told him the story. He knew, as by a quick, vivid intuition, that his mother was dead.

It was a blow that struck him to the very heart. It was a catastrophe, the result of his own misdoings. He had broken his mother's heart—he had brought down her grey hairs with sorrow to the grave!

CHAPTER LXVII.

RE-UNION.

THE chink of the hammer and the noise of the carpenters' tools were heard on the site of the old house on the common. The old house itself had been demolished—and time it was, so said the little world of Newbury.

Yet at this very moment, a Sylvester stands looking on the pretentious dwelling that is being reared on the spot where his race so long held ruin at bay. A Sylvester, on whom much depended at one time, and whose hopes were high. Now, he is shorn of all his grandeur, and treads the rugged highway of the world on foot.

There is an expression of sadness in his face as he gazes; but it is not born of any regret for the ancient splendour of his house. No, it is a sadness of contrition—one might call it remorse.

By-and-by, you will see him in a quiet country churchyard, not far from here; a place where the Sylvesters lie buried under marble tombstones, and seem as if, even in death, they could scarce shake off their pretentiousness. He is not thinking of them, or if he is, it is only with anger. He is kneeling by a grave, with a simple headstone, and on it is engraven the name, "Alice Sylvester."

And as he kneels, he says, in the bitterness of his soul, "We have killed her—yes, we, the Sylvesters!"

By that grave, he makes a vow, and it is registered on high. He will, God's grace assisting, be a humble hardworking Christian man; he will shake off, once and for all, the trammels of his race; he will up and be doing in this world, so full of enterprise and action. And, it may be, he lifts up his eyes as he thinks it, to the calm summer heaven; it may be, that he and the dear one for whom he weeps, may be united in a better land than this. For she is not lost, but gone before!

It was quite a country churchyard, as I told you. It lay out of the noisy track of life, under the shadow of the ivy-covered steeple, and great trees bent reverently over it. He lingered, to enjoy the silence and the deep repose. His days had been full of turmoil and unrest, he had had no space for recollection, or for communion with his God. It seemed good for him to be here!

As he lingered, there came a soft rustling sound, and some one was approaching. He thought then that he would go; he was in no mood for interruption; his hour of peace had ended.

Scarcely had he thought so, when the sound came nearer. It was that of a soft garment rustling on the grass. Some woman, perhaps, who had come, like him, to mourn over the dead. He turned to look, impelled by a feeling of kindred interest. There stood Josephine Graham!

Yes, Josephine! And they two were alone, close by the grave of Alice.

He was violently agitated. He had not seen her since the day he bought her picture. He had her picture now; he had cherished it, through all the wreck and ruin.

How passionately his heart clung to her! How tumultuously every pulse was stirred at the sight of that sweet face, mournful but calm! How conscience-stricken, how remorseful he felt! How bitterly he yearned to undo the past, to bring back that happy time when he might say to Josephine, "My love—my love!"

He dare not say it; he was afraid even to look her in the face.

She was calmer than he was, though the surprise made her heart beat convulsively. She loved this solitary spot, and had been wont to come there, never thinking to encounter Raymond.

She had heard his history, to the minutest point. She had seen the old fabric, he had struggled so to sustain, go to ruin. She knew how the Newbury world exulted over the humbling of the Sylvesters; but she did not exult. Oh, no! her nature was too generous, too pitiful. She had secretly wept over them!

Now, when she saw him, the man she loved, in his deep humiliation, and knew what he had suffered, and how bitter had been his experience, she felt her tears gush forth in her own despite; she turned away lest he should see them. But he did see them; he was by her side in a moment.

"Josephine, are those tears for me?"

She did not speak, she let him take her hand. Oh, was it possible! Could such a thing be, that in his loneliness and degradation, Josephine could yet love him?

He had nothing to offer her now. He had his way to work out of sheer poverty; his future was all uncertain; yet the first gleam of happiness stole into his mind, as he stood in this lonely spot with Josephine!

CONCLUSION.

THERE are no Sylvesters now in Newbury, the very name seems to have died out; the old Grange, their last refuge, has been pulled down, and not one stone has been left upon another. But if we look elsewhere, we shall find that the family is not without a representative.

Lord Lyntonwaithe has a secretary in whom he places implicit confidence, and who is likely to be a rising man. His name is Raymond Sylvester.

Raymond lives in a pleasant villa with a garden, in which children's voices are heard continually, and his wife is named Josephine. There lives with him, too, a lady with snow-white hair, and a figure bent more with grief than with years; a humble, pious woman, whose pride lies buried in a grave at Newbury, and whose life is one act of penitence and prayer: this is Lady Sylvester.

John Humphreys is fast working his way to competence. His grief for his mother's death was deep and lasting; but he did not allow it to sap his energies. He is now renting a small farm, and in all probability will purchase it ere long; and Rachel looks as cheerful and as blithe as ever.

Francis Heatherly thought better of his proposed removal into Dorsetshire. In fact, he found the society of Albina too attractive. He is, now, quite a family man, and his blue-eyed children run about the old house in Gower Street, and make it as lively as you please.

Harold Blake is owner of the silk-mill, and is one of the most influential men in Newbury. Mr. Mapleson was carried off by his hereditary complaint, the gout, and left all his property to Harold. Harold lives in a handsome house, on the outskirts of the town; and devotes himself to his business, and to doing all the good he can. But he lives alone (for poor Charley died some time ago), and he is a thoughtful, some call him a melancholy, man. He will never marry, they say; he will keep faithful to the memory of Alice Sylvester.

THE END.

UNCLE DAVID'S BUTTERFLIES.

ON a pretty hill in Devonshire, belted at its base with trees and bushes, stands a large white house, known to the inhabitants of the village as Rushbrook Grange. In this house lives Squire Rushbrook and his family, which consists of Mrs. Rushbrook and two little daughters, Maude and Amy.

Maude and Amy are the pets of all the villagers; especially Maude, whose gentle and amiable manners never fail to make her loved by rich or poor.

Never were two children fonder of each other than are Maude and Amy. If Amy is ever in disgrace with her parents, it is Maude who will plead for her little sister; it is Maude who is Amy's constant playmate, leaving her much-loved books at any moment when desired to join in Amy's favourite pastimes; and, in return, Amy is passionately attached to her sister, looking up to her almost as she does to her mamma.

Now on this particular day of which I am writing, great excitement prevailed in the little girls' minds, for Uncle David, who had just returned from India, and had come to live within a few minutes' walk of the Grange, had invited his little nieces to spend the afternoon with him.

Great speculations were rife as to whether Uncle David would be great or small, plain or handsome, kind or unkind, and it was therefore with no small delight that at the appointed hour the little girls set out on their way to their uncle's house.

When arrived there, Uncle David came out to the gate to welcome them, and after kissing them both, he took little Amy up in his arms and carried her to the house. Then he took them into the garden, and showed them such beautiful flowers, and such a pretty fountain; it made one feel quite cool to watch the jets of water dancing and sparkling in the bright, glaring sunlight. And then the fruit trees were laden with ripe, tempting fruit. Uncle David did not only show his nieces the pretty flowers and delicious fruit, but he also picked plenty of each for them, and better than all, let them help themselves. While thus pleasantly engaged, a lovely butterfly settled on a plant close to Amy, who immediately endeavoured to trap it by popping her hat over it, but Lady Butterfly was not thus easily to be gained, and, to Amy's sorrow, she flew off. Presently she lighted on another plant at a little distance, and Amy again tried to catch her, but without success. Amy's patience was by no means exhausted, and she commenced a chase, which proved to be of some length; but at last she brought back her captive in triumph. Maude and Uncle David both agreed that she was a splendid creature, and after they had sufficiently admired her, Uncle David told them that he could show them butterflies ten times as beautiful as that one, that he had brought all the way from India with him, and had put in glass cases, on purpose to show to his friends.

Maude and Amy were delighted at the idea, and Amy was especially so, when her uncle told her that he would put her butterfly in one of the cases.

So Uncle David took them in-doors, and they had to go up to the very top room, which they found, as Uncle David had told them, filled with glass cases, containing butterflies, beetles, moths, and in short every variety of insects, of every size and colour. Maude and Amy had never before seen such pretty insects, and could scarcely believe it possible that there should be so many different kinds. They were very much amused at what Uncle David told them of the habits of these little creatures, and in this manner the time slipped by so very quickly, that they soon found they had come to the last case.

Finding that his little nieces were so interested, Uncle David told them he had one more case which he had not yet filled (and for that reason had not yet placed with the others), containing English butterflies and moths, and telling them he should be back in less than a minute, he quitted the room in order to fetch it.

But though Uncle David had said he would be back in less than a minute, he did not return till several had passed, for when he went down-stairs he found the housekeeper had a letter, which she was just about to bring him, and which required some little consideration before he could give the messenger who had brought it the required answer.

When Uncle David left the room Maude and Amy continued to look at the cases, Maude remaining before one in which she was particularly interested; and Amy, flying about the room very much like the butterflies themselves would have done had they been alive.

Suddenly Maude was startled by a crash, and on looking round she perceived to her dismay one of the cases lying on the floor, the glass smashed, and all the insects, of which her uncle was so proud, with their delicate wings and legs entirely broken and spoiled.

"Oh, Amy! how ever did you manage to break it?" exclaimed Maude. "What will uncle say?"

"I was trying to put my butterfly in," replied Amy; "Uncle David said it should go in one, and I saw a little place in this case just large enough, and I was pulling to get it open, and it fell down. Oh! what shall I do?" and Amy sat down on the floor and began to cry.

"There, never mind, Amy dear. I dare say, uncle won't be very angry if I tell him how sorry you are."

At this moment Uncle David was heard returning, and Maude hastily dried Amy's tears.

When Uncle David entered the room, he looked at the broken case, and, turning to Maude, exclaimed, "How's this?"

"Oh, Uncle David!" exclaimed Maude, "please do not be very angry with me. I am so sorry for it:" for Maude, rather than her little sister should incur her uncle's displeasure, had determined to let him think that she was the culprit.

"You must have been extremely careless," was Uncle David's reply. "I thought you able to be trusted, but I find I was mistaken;" and turning to Amy, he exclaimed, "Here is the case I promised to show you, and this is the one your butterfly is to go in."

After they had looked at the case, Uncle David took them down-stairs, Amy holding his hand, and Maude following them.

Here they found the tea awaiting them, and the room was so delightfully cool, the window opened on to the lawn, and being almost covered with roses and honeysuckles, the perfume of the flowers was perfectly enchanting. But Maude, though she could not be quite insensible to the loveliness of the flowers and the refreshing shade, was anything but happy; she felt gloomy and miserable, and her self-inflicted sacrifice proved to be a much greater burden than she had supposed.

After tea, Uncle David showed them some beautiful pictures, and a great many curious things he had brought from India with him, and though he did not again mention the subject of the broken case, and seemed entirely to have forgotten it, still Maude could not feel at her ease again, and she felt sure her uncle must think she was a very tiresome little girl. Very thankful was she when the hour arrived at which their mamma had told them they must return, and it was with the utmost impatience she waited till the nurse arrived to fetch them.

Uncle David insisted on putting on Amy's pelisse and hat himself; and it tickled Amy's fancy immensely when he put on her hat the wrong way, and then asked her if that was right.

When they reached home Amy burst into the room where her papa and mamma were sitting, and began giving them a most animated account of the delights of the afternoon; but Mrs. Rushbrook, wondering at Maude's unusual silence, called her to her side, exclaiming, "Well, and how has my Maude enjoyed herself?"

To her surprise, Maude burst out crying, and when asked the reason, returned no answer. It was in vain her papa and mamma questioned her, nothing would she tell them of the cause of her distress; and, finally, her parents settled it in their minds that she was tired out, and, accordingly, bidding her good night, told her she had better not stay up any longer.

Amy was very sorry indeed to see Maude so distressed, and she made up her mind that, when her mamma came up to bid them good night and see that they were quite comfortable, as was her custom, she would tell her all about it; but she could not summon the courage to do so before her papa.

But, unfortunately, by that time Amy was fast asleep; so the adventure remained untold for that night at least, and, as it proved, for many other nights too: for Amy, though full of the best intentions, could not summon the courage, and therefore put it off from time to time, till she found a week had slipped away before she knew it.

But Amy was really a tender-hearted little creature; and when she saw poor Maude looking dispirited and miserable, she made up her mind that her kind sister should suffer no more on her account. Accordingly, that very night, when her mamma came up-stairs, she told her all that had taken place on that afternoon; and even asked her if she would take her to Uncle David's, that she might tell him all, and ask him to forgive her for all her naughtiness.

Mrs. Rushbrook was very much pleased to hear of her little girl's resolution; but, at the same time, she told her that if she had only had sufficient trust in her parents to have told them before, she would have saved several persons a great deal of unnecessary pain; for her papa, as well as herself, had felt rather anxious about Maude, thinking she must be ill.

Amy, too, felt very sorry that she had not before told her mamma; for the relief was so great, and she had found it so much easier a task than she had supposed, that she wondered now how she could have remained so long with such a burden on her mind.

But Amy's patience was put to rather a severe test; for she found that she would not be able to see Uncle David for a week at least, as he had gone to stay a week with a friend in London. But a bright idea had come into Amy's head. She would catch all the butterflies she could find, and get papa to put them into a glass case; and then, when Uncle David returned, she would give it to him. She would have plenty of time if she stayed out in the garden all day, and ran after every butterfly she saw. And this plan appeared to her to be a particularly happy one; as it would be some little sacrifice not to play all day long, but to stay out in the garden doing nothing for fear a butterfly should escape her; and she did very much want to show Uncle David how sorry she was.

In vain she thought over all her most precious treasures; she could think of nothing else that would do to give her uncle: for she was afraid he would hardly care about a doll, or a Noah's ark, though she had both, and would gladly have given him either.

After a great deal of weighty consideration, Amy determined that she would give Uncle David the case of butterflies; and having decided this important matter, she hastened to tell her mamma, and obtain her consent and approval.

